sudden occasion to expresse that vertue that was in him. For having apprehended Ezechias, G who was the Prince of those theeves, who ranged over all Syria a long time with a great troup of outlaws, he put him to death with divers of his complices. Which act of his got him no little estimation and credit among the Syrians: for by that meanes he rid their country of all those robbers, according as they desired. He was therefore praised thorow the villages and Cities for this act, as he that had given them peace, and assured possession of their estates. For this cause he was made known to Sextus Cæsar, who was uncle to Cæsar the great. Furthermore his brother Phasælus was incited to follow his noble actions, and inforced himselfe to obtain no lesse reputation then he had; for which cause he strove to get the good will of the common people in Jerusalem, and governed the Citie with such discretion, that he acted all things to each mans content, and abused not his power to any privat mans in- H jurie: which was the cause that Antipater was honoured by the whole nation, with no lesse respect then if he had been their onely Lord and Soveraign. Yet did not this eminencie of estate so far distract him, that he forgot the love and dutie he ought to Hircanus (as in such like occasions it oftentimes falleth out) notwithstanding divers of the greatest amongst the Jews (seeing Antipater and his sonnes so highly advanced both by the publicke favour of the whole nation, as also by the revenues, that they drew both out of Jewry, as also by the employment of Hircanus money) were grievously incenced against them. For Antipater had made friendship with the Emperours of Rome, and having perswaded Hircanus to send them money, he had appropriated the same unto himself, sending it not in Hircanus I name, but in his own; which though Hircanus knew, yet was he not moved therewith, but rather well contented. But that which most of all terrified the Princes of the Jews was, to behold the violent and audacious nature of Herod, who governed after a royall and tyrannicall manner: For this cause they addressed themselves to Hircanus, and accused Antipater openly. How long (said they) will you dissemble and wink at those things that are daily practised? see you not that Antipater and his sonnes possesse in effect the royall power and authoriy of the kingdome, and that you have onely the name? Assure your self that you are not out of danger in contemning thus both your self and your kingdome. For Antipater and his sons are not now your substitutes, neither intend they your profit, or your countries good, (whatsoever your opinion is of them) but they openly are known for Lords and K Commanders. For Herod (Antipaters son) hath already put Ezechias & his complices to death, and thereby trangressed our laws, which forbid to take away any mans life (how wicked soever he be) except he be first of all condemned to death by the councell: and notwithstanding this, he hath been so bold, as to do justice without your authority. When Hircanus heard this, he grew wroth (for their mothers, whom Herod had slain, had incenced them by their continual exclamations in the temple, exhorting the King and people to call Herod to account before the councell of that which he had done.) So that Hircanus moved by these women, called Herod to answer unto those accusations which were objected against him. Who made his appearance, forewarned by his father not to present himself after the manner a private person, but well attended and accompanied to withstand all inconveniencies. After therefore he had taken order for the affaires in Galilee (according as he thought meet in his own discre- L tion) and that he himself was sufficiently accompanied to make his voyage, with such a guard as neither might terrifie Hircanus with number, nor leave himself unsecured in danger, he resorted to Jerusalem. Furthermore, Sextus Cæsar Governour of Syria wrote unto Hircanus to absolve him, adding threats to his perswasions, if so be he should perform the contrary; which gave Hircanus occasion to deliver Herod in despite of the councell and their intent; the rather also for that he loved him as intirely as his sonne. When as therefore Herod presented himself before the councell with his retinue, all of them were astonished, and none of those that accused him in his absence, durst open their mouthes to speak one word, but all of them kept silence, not knowing what to doe. Now whilest they stood upon these termes, a certain man called Sameas, who was of upright conversation, and M for this cause was not distracted with fear, arose and spake to this effect. "Dread King, & you "honourable assistants, I could never yet remember, that ever any man which was called in "question to defend his cause before us, hath appeared in this equipage; & I suppose that none "of you can say, that the like hath ever hapned: but whosoever cometh into this place to re- "ceive judgement, he presenteth himself with humility and fear, with a countenance prepa- "red to implore mercy, having his haire long, and his garment black: but this gallant "Herod accused of murther (and for this occasion called before us) who could imagine that "he should appeare before us in a purple robe, having his haires trimmed, and be- "sides that, a guard of armed men about him? with an intent that if we condemne him,

Sextus Cæsar writeth to Hircanus to discharge Herod.

Sameas one of the Judges foretelleth Hircanus and his counsellers of their imminent death by Herods meanes.

A "according to law, he may put us to death without law, that after he hath violated all right, "he might escape and save himself. But I blame not Herod in this action, for that he hath a "more inward regard of his particular profit, then of the law: but I accuse both you and the "King, who have given him such assurance. Know therefore, that there is a soveraign God, "that will one day punish both you and the King, and him whom you will deliver by the "Kings means. And so generally fell it out as he had said: For as soon as Herod had obtained the kingdom, he put all those of the counsel to death, and Hircanus himself likewise, only Sameas was exempted: for he held him in great estimation, because of his wisdom and justice, and because that at such time as the city was besieged by Herod and Sosius, Sameas perswaded the people to receive Herod, telling them that by reason of their sins and offences, they might not escape from him; whereof we will speak in place convenient. Hircanus perceiving B that the Iudges were inclined to condemn Herod, deferred the sentence till the next day, and sent secretly unto Herod, counselling him to flie out of the City, assuring him that there was no other means to save his life. Thus posted he to Damasco (as if he had fled from the Kings presence) and presenting himself before Sextus Cæsar, after he had assured his person, he resolved with himself, that if the counsel should call him once more to answer, he would not obey them. But after his departure the counsel were displeased with Hircanus, and laboured to perswade him, that all these things tended to his destruction: which he well perceived, yet knew he not what to do, he was so negligent and void of foresight.

Herod admonished by Hircanus, saveth himself by flight, and appeareth no more in judgement.

When Sextus had made Herod Governour of Cœlosyria (which estate he sold unto him for C ready money) Hircanus was afraid left Herod should make war against him: neither passed there long time before the effect grew answerable to his fear. For Herod marched forth against him, with a great army, supposing himself to be much wronged by the assignation he had sent him, and in that he was summoned to give a reason of his actions before the councel. "But his father Antipater, and his brother Phasalus came forth against him to hin-"der his approach towards Jerusalem, striving to appease his fury, and counselling him not "to attempt any thing by way of action; but that contenting himself that he had threatned "and affrighted Hircanus, he should not attempt any further against him, who had raised "him to that high degree. They told him also, that it became him not onely to remember "that he was cited to answer, but that he was absolved also, and permitted to depart with-D "out danger or any violence. Moreover, that he ought to think, that God governeth the bal-"lance of warre, and that the issues of battels is uncertain, and for that cause he ought not "to expect the victory, if he made war against the King who was his familiar, and from "whom he had received far more kindness, and no displeasure: who though he made some "apearance and shadow of severitie, touching the accusation intended against him, yet not-"withstanding it proceeded not so much from him, as from his evil counsellers. Herod in some sort pacified by these perswasions, obeyed his father, supposing that it sufficed him in regard of his future hopes, that he had given the people so large a testimony of his power. This was the estate of the Jews at that time.

Herod marcheth against Hircanus with a great army, and is diswaded from war by his father Antipater, and his brother Phasælus.

But Cæsar arriving at Rome, prepared himself to set sail towards Affrick, with an intent E to make war against Scipio and Cato. To him Hircanus sent Embassadours, beseeching him to confirm the amitie and association that he had with him. But now at this present, I think it very convenient to declare all the prerogatives, and associations that the Romans and their Emperours made with those of our nation, to the end that all other people might know, that the Kings of Asia and Europe have been wel affected towards us, and have made great account of our valour and fidelitie. And although divers men lewdly affected towards us, believe not that which the Macedonians and Persians have written of us, because the same matters are not extant in all places, neither set down in publick writings, but only amongst our selves and some Barbarians; yet it is manifest that they cannot contradict the declarations made by the Romans, which are manifestly affixed in publick places in Cities; as F likewise at this present they are written in the Capitol in brazen pillars. Julius Cæsar, in like manner in a brazen pillar erected by him, hath declared unto the Jews that inhabited Alexandria, that they were free Citizens therein. And to the intent that these things may more manifestly appear, I will propose the decrees of the Senate, and of Julius Cæsar, made in the favour of Hircanus and our nation. Caius Julius Cæsar Emperour, high Priest, Dictator the second time, to the Governours, Senate and people of the Sidonians, Health: If you are well, we are in health, both our selves and our army. For these causes my will is, that "Hircanus, Alexanders son and his successours, be Princes of the Jews: and further, that they "continue always in the high Priesthood, according to the ordinance and customs of their "countrey: and that both he and his children be our associates, and be enrowled likewise "amongst our chiefest friends: and all that which appertaineth to the Priesthood, according "to the ordinances of the Jews, be attributed to him and his. And and if there happen any "difference as touching the discipline of the Jews, our pleasure is, that it be determined by "him. And as touching the munitions of war, and the money to be levied for the entertainment of souldiers, we think it not meet that they should be charged. That the high Priest and Prince of the Jews give favour and aid unto "those that are offended. That a brazen table be erected in the Capitol: and likewise at Sidon, at Tyre, and at Ascalon in the Temples, where- "in shall be engraven the contents hereof in Roman and Greek letters, to the end that all "the Treasurers that are in the Cities, and all other Magistrates may by this our Decree understand, that they are our friends, and that their Embassadours be entertained with kind- "ness and presents, and that these Edicts be sent into all places.

"Caius Cæsar Emperour, Dictotor, Consul, for the good of the Senate and people of "Rome, hath granted to the honour, vertue, and humanity of Hircanus the son of Alexander, "that both he and his children shall be high Priests in Jerusalem, and of the whole Nation, "according to the Rites and Customes, whereby their ancestors have enjoyed the Priest- "hood.

C sence of your Embassadours, and certifie us of a Decree made by you, whereby you forbid them the practice and ancient use of their sacrifices and oblations: I think it not meet that you make any such Decrees against our friends, and associates; neither that you forbid them to live according to their fashions and customes; or to imploy their purses together in furnishing their feasts and sacrifices, since in Rome it self they are not interdicted or forbidden to perform the same. For at such time as Caius Cæsar Consul, had prohibited by Edict, that in celebrating the Bacchanals, no one should dance about the Citie; yet were the Jewes alone exempted from this inhibition: and neither have they been prohibited to contribute, neither to banquet together. My self also in like case in the defence I have made to forbid all other sodalities, have excepted the Jewes therein, and have given them leave and license to assemble and demean themselves according to the Cu-

After Caius Cæsars death, the Consuls Marcus Antonius, and Publius Dolobella, assembled the Senate, and having brought in Hircanus Embassadours, they declared their request, and contracted amitie with them: The Senate likewise ordained, that each thing should be granted them that they required. There are besides these many other Edicts and Ordinances made to the like effect, by the same Generals, and by the Roman Senate in favour of Hircanus and our Nation, and some other Cities. In like sort there were divers Decrees and Writs sent unto the Governours and Rulers of the Provinces touching our priviledges: all which may be easily believed by those that shall reade our Historie, with no prejudicate opinion, if they consider those that we have here inserted. For we have shewed more expresse and lively testimonies of the friendship that we have had with the Romans, and such as at this day are affixed to Pillers, and engraven in Tables of Brasse in the Capitol; and that hereafter matter to insert all in this place; and I think that there is not any man of so sinister judgement, that will not believe how much we have been esteemed by the Romans, as they have given testimonies by divers Decrees published in our behalf; neither may any man suppose that we lie, considering the truth of that which we publish.

The year of the world, 3922. before Christs Nativity, 42.

Thus have we sufficiently declared the amitie and affociation, that in times past we have had with the Romans. About this time it came to pass, that the estate of Syria was sore troubled upon the occasion that ensueth: Cæcilius Bassus one of Pompeys partakers, laid an ambush for Sextus Cæsar and slew him, and seizing upon his Army, usurped the government: whereby there arose great war nigh Apamea. For Cæsars Captains marched out against Cæcilius, with great force both of foot and horsemen, to whom Antipater sent his sonnes with a H power to second them (in remembrance of the benefits he had received at Cæsars hands) supposing it to be an act of justice, that the murtherer should be punished for his so hainous offence. Now whereas this war continued a long time, Marcus came and succeeded Sextus. Mean-while Cæsar was slain by Cassius and Brutus in the midst of the Senate, after he had commanded three yeers and six moneths, as it is expressed in another place.

Cassius afflicteth the Jewes, and exacteth about eight hundreth talents at their hands.

I

After Cæsars death, the brand of civill war began to flame, and the greatest men of Rome travelled the one this way, the other that way, to gather men of warre. But Cassius came into Syria, with an intent to the Armie that was near to Apamea: and having levied the fige, he drew both Bassus and Marcus to be of his faction, and travelling from Citie to Citie, he gathered a number of souldiers, and much furniture, and imposed huge tributes: but especially he afflicted Jewrie, and exacted of that countrey more then seven hundreth talents of silver. Antipater seeing the State in so great fear and trouble, committing the exaction of the two parts of this money to his sonnes; the other he commanded to be assigned to Malichus, who was his enemy, and the other part unto another. Herod first of all gathered that which was commanded him in the Countrey of Galilee, and K for this cause was greatly beloved by Cassius: for he being prudent and discreet, thought it no small policie at that time to winne the Romans good will by other mens experience. Under the other Governours the Cities were set to sale, together with their inhabitants: and amongst them these foure were the chiefest, namely, Gophna, Emaus, Lydda, and Thamna: for Cassius sold the people thereof to them that would give most. Furthermore, Cassius was so much transported with choler, that he had slain Malichus (so much was he moved against him) if Hircanus had not restrained his furie, by sending him one hundreth talents of his own money by Antipater. But as soon as Cassius was departed out of the Countrey of Judæa, he practised Antipaters death, supposing that his cutting off L would assure Hircanus state the more strongly. But Antipater was not ignorant of this his resolution, for having an inkling thereof, he got himself on the other side of Jordan, and assembled an army of souldiers both Jews and Arabians. Hereupon Malichus (who was a politique and subtill fellow) denied stoutly that he had intended any Treason, purging himself with an oath before Antipater and his children, that he had never any such intent, especially, for that he saw that Phasælus held Jerusalem, and Herod an army at command. And in the end, perceiving the difficultie wherein he was, he reconciled himself to Antipater, and they agreed at that time that Marcus governed Syria: who perceiving that Malichus began to raise troubles in Jewry, resorted thither, and there wanted little but that he had slain him, had not M

Malichus poysoneth Antipater.

But imprudent Antipater saved Malichus to his own mischief: For when Cassius and Marcus had assembled their Army, they committed all the charge unto Herods hands, and made him Governour of Cœlosyria, and delivered him great forces both of foot and horse, and ships by sea. They promised him likewise the kingdome of Judæa, after they had

A had finiſhed the war, that was at that time betwixt them and Anthony and Ceſar the younger. Wherenpon Malichus mightily fearing Antipaters power, determined to make him away; and having corrupted Hircanus butler with money (with whom both of them celebrated a feaſt) he made him away by poyſon, and afterwards aſſembling many men of warre about him, he made himſelf maſter of the Citie. When Herod and Phaſalus underſtood of the traiterous conſpiracie attempted againſt their father, they were grievouſly incenſed againſt Malichus. But he denied all, and in eſpeciall abjured the intent or practice of the murther. Thus died Antipater a juſt and vertuous man, and ſuch a one as dearly loved his countrey. But Herod, who was his younger ſonne, incontinently reſolved to revenge his fathers death, and came forth with an army againſt Malichus: But Phaſalus, who was the elder, determined to circumvent him by policie, for fear leſt he ſhould raiſe a civill warre. He therefore accepted of B Malichus juſtifications, and made a ſhew that he ſuppoſed that he had in no ſuch ſort ſought Antipaters death, and onely intended his fathers monument and funerals. Mean while, Herod reſorting to Samaria, and finding it in deſperate eſtate, reſtored the ſame, and pacified the diſſenſions that were amongſt the inhabitants. Not long after (by reaſon of a feaſt) he came to Jeruſalem with his men of warre. Whereupon Malichus being afraid of this his acceſſe, perſwaded Hircanus that he ſhould not permit him to enter into the City; whereunto Hircanus condeſcended, alleadging for pretext of his defence, that amongſt the holy people it was not lawfull to intermix a troop of polluted men. But Herod made ſmall reckning of them that brought him this news, and notwithſtanding this command, entred the Citie by night:
C whereat Malichus was much amazed. Whereupon, according to his wonted diſſimulations, he he openly wept and bewailed the death of Antipater as his eſpeciall friend; but under-hand he prepared a guard for his own ſafetie. Notwithſtanding it was thought meet by Herods friends, to take no notice of this diſſimulation; but to make a ſhew for their parts, that they were well-affected towards Malichus.

CHAP. XX.

D HEreupon Herod certified Caſſius of Antipater his fathers death, who knowing very well of what converſation Malichus was, wrote back unto Herod that he ſhould revenge the death of his father: beſides, he ſent ſecret letters to the Captains that were in Tyre, commanding them to aid and aſſiſt Herod in that ſo juſt execution which he intended. After therefore that Caſſius had taken Laodicea, and the inhabitants of the countrey came togeather, bringing with them crowns and ſilver to preſent him, Herod expected that Malichus in that place ſhould receive his puniſhment: but he entring into ſuſpition of ſome practice, at ſuch time as they drew neer unto Tyre in Phœnicia, attempted farre
E greater things. For whereas his ſonne was a hoſtage in Tyre, he entred the Citie with intent to draw him thence, and afterwards to return into Judæa. After this, uſurping upon that opportunitie which he had by reaſon of Caſſius troubles (who haſtily marched forward to meet with Anthony) he determined to draw the people to an inſurrection, and to make himſelf Lord of the countrey: But God diſappointed his unjuſt purpoſes: For Herod being a man of a ripe judgement, incontinently diſcovered his pretence, and ſent one of his ſervants before, as if under purpoſe to prepare a banquet, becauſe he had told him beforetime that he would entertain all his followers: but in effect, he ſent him to the Captains to command them to iſſue out with their daggers, and to meet Malichus; who marching forth and meeting him neer unto the ſhore of the City upon the ſea coaſt, ſtabbed him in that place with their daggers. Which act did ſo much aſtoniſh Hircanus, that through amaze he waxed ſpeechleſſe: and finally being much moved, he demanded of Herods men, F what accident had happened, and who it was that had ſlain Malichus? Whereof when they certified him, and how nothing was done without Caſſius command: he anſwered that all things were well done, for that Malichus was a wretched man and a traitour to his countrey. When Caſſius was departed out of Syria, there aroſe a new tumult in Judæa: for Felix, who was left in Jeruſalem with an army, marched forth againſt Phaſalus, and all the people were in arms. For which cauſe Herod ſpeedily repaired to Fabius, Governour of Damaſco, and intending to ſuccour his brother, was prevented by a ſickneſs: ſo that Phaſalus obtaining the victorie by his own forces againſt Felix, encloſed him up in a tower, whence afterwards he

he diſmiſſed him under compoſition. Whereupon he preſently and grievouſly rebuked Hircanus, for that being forgetfull of divers benefits which he had received by him, he had given aid unto his enemies. For Malichus brother being at that time revolted, planted garriſons in divers fortreſſes, and namely in Maſada, which was the ſtrongeſt of them all. As ſoon as Herod therefore had recovered his health, he drew forth his forces againſt him, and diſpoſſeſſed him of divers places that he held, and after ſuffered him to depart with his life and goods. And that done, he came and encountred with Antigonus, and fought with him, and overcame him before he had ſcarcely entred on the marches of Judæa, and drave him from thence. When he was come to Jeruſalem, Hircanus and all the people honoured him with crowns: for already was he inſerted into Hircanus family, for that by promiſe he was his ſonne in law; by which means, he had more willingly undertaken his defence, for that he was to marry Alexanders, the ſonne of Ariſtobulus daughter, who was Hircanus neece: on whom he begat three ſonnes and two daughters. Antonius and Cæſar having overcome Caſſius neer unto the city of Philippi; Cæſar went from thence into France, and Antonius into Aſia. And being in Bithynia, Embaſſadours reſorted unto him from all parts: Thither alſo repaired certain principall men among the Jews to accuſe Phaſælus and Herod; ſaying that Hircanus had onely the name, but he the authority of the Kingdome. But Antonius greatly honoured Herod, who came unto him to anſwer thoſe accuſations that they had impoſed on him: for which cauſe they that were his oppoſites, could obtain no audience: for Herod had bought that priviledge from them with his money. As ſoon as Antonius was arrived in Epheſus, Hircanus the high Prieſt and all our nation preſently ſent an Embaſſadour unto him, with a crown of gold; requiring him that he would write unto the Provinces, that the Jews whom Caſſius had taken priſoners (contrary to the law of arms) might be ſet at liberty, and that their countrey (which was taken from them in Caſſius time) might be reſtored. Antonius ſuppoſing that the demands which the Jews had propoſed, were reaſonable, wrote back preſently to the high Prieſt Hircanus and the Jews; and ſent an Edict alſo to the Tyrians to this effect: L

A "versation and piety. For at such time as our adversaries and enemies of the Romane nation "spoiled all the countrey of Asia, & without regard of their oaths spared neither cities nor "Temples; we have opposed our selves against them, not onely for our private respect, but in "the quarrel of the common-weal, to the intent to punish the authors of such offences com"mitted against men, and of such impieties perpetrated against God; for which we suppose "that the Sun hath in a manner obscured himself, by beholding with unwilling eyes what an "hainous offence was committed against Cæsar. But we have gotten the upper hand of their "impious enterprizes, which are fallen upon Macedonia, as on the countrey and air, from "whence proceed such detestable and ungracious designs; and we have likewise cut off the "course of their desperate resolution, which made them encounter us near to Philippi a ci-
"tie of Macedonia, where we seized their places fortified by nature, and enclosed with B "mountains as if it were with walls, as far as the sea, in such manner as the passage was barred "up, as it were with a gate, had not the gods given us way by resisting their unjust exploits,
"and furthering ours. Brutus is likewise compelled to flie to Philippi, where being inclosed
"by us, he suffered the like ruin with his consort Cassius; and since they have been punished
"as they deserved, me seemeth that we are seized of peace, and that Asia hath had repose

"our victory. For which cause remembring us of you and your Nation, to the end to in"crease your good fortunes, we will bethink us of that which shall be commodious for you:
"and we have already sent letters from city to city, to the intent that if any one among you, C "either captive or free-man, have been sold to the utmost by Caius Cassius, or any of that "army, they may be set at liberty. And our will is, that you make use of the bounty which "we bestow upon you, both in our self as in Dolabellas right, forbidding the Tyrians to mo-

"Marcus Antonius Emperour and Triumvir, in the presence of the Tyrians assembled for "their publike affairs, hath declared, that Caius Cassius during the troubles, by the assistance "of his souldiers, hath ravished another mans Province; and hath in like sort spoiled our al-F "lies, and hath ransackt the nation of the Iews, who are friends to the people of Rome:
"and for that by our valour we have represt his insolence, by our edicts and judgements
"we will correct his offences; to the end that all things may be restored to our allies, and that "all whatsoever hath been sold, and appertained to the Iews (whether they be prisoners

"before and that each mans possession may be restored to his first owner. And my pleasure "is, that whosoever disobeyeth this ordinance, he may be punished. And he that shall "be convicted to have disobeyed the same, he shall be punished according to his de"ment. He wrote to the like effect to the Sidonians, Antiochians and Arabians; all which we will insert in a convenient place, to testifie what account the Romans made of our nation.

The year of the world, 3924 before the Nativity of Christ, 40.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11. Cleopatra cometh into Cilicia to Antonius.

Herod accused by one hundred Jews before Antonius.

AFter this, Antonius retired himself into Syria, and Cleopatra came forth to meet him near unto Cilicia, and entangled him in her love. At that time also 100. of the chiefest reckoning among the Jews, came once again in Embassage to him to accuse Herod, and his adherents: who to this end had chosen out the most esteemed Orator that might be found. Messala likewise undertook the defence of the young men that were accused, and made them answer. Hircanus also was there in person, who was already by marriage allied unto them. Afrer that Antonius had heard both the one and the other in the City of Daphen, he demanded of Hircanus, which of both the parties governed the common-weal best? who returned him answer, that they who were on Herods side, were most studious of the weal publike. Antonius (who long since had born good affection towards them, by reason of the ancient hospitalitie that he had received with their father, during the time that Gabinius was in Judæa) established them both for Tetrarchs, committing to their hands the affairs in Judæa: and to this effect wrote he his letters, and committed fourteen of their enemies to prison; whom had not Herod besought for their lives, he had condemned them to death. This notwithstanding, as soon as they returned from their Embassage, they could not contain themselves in quiet, but resorted once more unto Antonius to the number of ten thousand, to the City of Tyre where Antonius sojourned. But Antonius (already corrupted by store of money by Herod and his brother, who commanded in that place) ordained that the Embassadours of the Iews should be punished, for that they had attempted and affected some innovation; where contrariwise he confirmed Herods government. At that time Herod, who walked by the sea side, came unto them, advising both them and Hircanus (who at that present was with them) to give over their appeal, for fear lest some grievous misfortune should befall them. Whereunto since they gave no regard, certain Jews and inhabitants of that City, all at once ran upon them, who slew some of them, and hurt other some, and the rest taking their flight towards their countrey, ever afterwards contained themselves and lived in quiet, through the fear they had conceived. But when the people ceased not to exclaime and protest against Herod, Antonius was in such sort displeased, that he commanded all those whom he held prisoners, should be slain.

Antonius maketh Phasælus and Herod Tetrarchs.

A thousand Jews repair to Tyre to accuse Herod, who are partly slain, partly wounded, and partly put to flight.

The year of the world, 3925. before Christs Nativity, 39.

The year after, Pacorus the Kings son, and Barzapharnes a Prince among the Parthians, invaded and seized Syria. And about this time dyed Ptolomey the son of Mennæus; and his son Lysias reigned in his stead, who plighted friendship with Antigonus the son of Aristobulus, who obtained this favour at his hands by the counsel and sollicitation of a certain Prince of great authority and credit with him.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Parthians make war in Syria, to restore Antigonus the son of Aristobulus to his Kingdome.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 22. Antigonus promiseth the Parthians a great sum of money to install him in the kingdom.

Pacorus sendeth horsemen to Antigonus in Judæa.

The Jews inhabiting about mount Carmel, joyn themselves with Antigonus.

AFter this, Antigonus promised the Parthians to give them one thousand talents of silver, and five hundred women, if so be they would deprive Hircanus of the Kingdome, and restore it unto him, and withall put Herod and his friends to death. Yet did he not deliver them that he promised, notwithstanding the Parthians led their army into Jewry to restore Antigonus, to wit, Pacorus by the sea-coast, and Barzapharnes to the landward. The Tyrians locked their gates against Pacorus, but the Sidonians and Ptolemaidans received him into their City. He sent a troop of horsemen into Jewry to discover the estate of the countrey, and to give succours to Antigonus. The chieftain of these horsemen was the Kings butler, who in like sort was called Pacorus. But for that certain Jews (inhabiting about the mount Carmel) joyned themselves with Antigonus, and were prepared with him to invade his enemies, he conceived some hope that he might by their means reduce a certain part of the region under his government, which is called Drymæ: and certain of his wel-willers meeting him in the way, perswaded him to presse forward as far as Ierusalem; where being seconded by others (and his followers already much increased in number) they addresse themselves to assault the Kings palace. And whereas those of the faction of the brethren brought present supplies, and the skirmish was maintained in the market place,

A place, the young men repulsed the enemie, and drave him into the Temple. Which done, they sent certain armed men into the houses neer adjoyning, to guard them: but the people rushing in upon them, and seeing they were destitute of aid, burned both them and the houses wherein they were. But this iniquity of theirs was presently revenged by Herod, who in a skirmish that he had with them, slew a great number of them. And whereas there were daily assaults between both parties, the enemies expected untill such time as the people (assembled from all parts of the countrey) should repair to Jerusalem to celebrate the feast of Pentecost. Which being come, many thousands of men assembled about the Temple, both armed and unarmed, who seized both the Temple and the City; except the Kings house onely, which Herod made good with a few men of warr. The wall thereof did Phasælus his B brothers keep. But Herod with a company of his followers sallied out upon the enemy, who were planted in the suburbs, and fighting valiantly against them, he put divers thousands of them to flight, whereof some retired themselves into the Citie; other some into the Temple; the rest into a certain bulwark neer at hand. In this battell also Phasælus shewed no little valour.

Herod fighteth with his enemies in the suburbs.

Pacorus chieftain of the Parthians entring the city, perswadeth Phasælus to go Embassadour to Barzapharnes.

But Pacorus conductor of the Parthians, came into the Citie with some few horsemen at Antigonus request, making shew that he came to appease the sedition; but the effect and scope of his comming was, to obtaine the soveraigntie for Antigonus. Furthermore, after that Phasælus was come out to meet with him, and had courteously entertained him in his house, Pacorus perswaded him to goe Embassadour with him to Barzapharnes, laying a baite C under this pretence to surprize him. He suspecting no treacheries, was easily perswaded, notwithstanding that Herod misliked the course, who knowing the perfidious manner of the Barbarians, exhorted him rather to assaile Pacorus, and to assault and oppresse his forces, when they were come unto him. Nevertheless Hircanus and Phasælus undertook this Embassage, and Pacorus (leaving with Herod two hundreth horsemen, and ten of those whom they call free-men) conducted the Embassadours. Now as soon as they came into Galilee, the governours of the Cities in that countrey, came forth armed to meet them: Barzapharnes also at the first gave them friendly entertainment, and honoured them with presents; but anon after, he began to practise treachery. For Phasælus and his attendants were conD ducted to a lodging that adjoyned the sea; where hearing tydings that Antigonus had promised one thousand talents, and five hundred virgins to the Parthians, he began alreadie to suspect the Barbarians. For a certain friend of his had given him an inkling that there were treasons intended against him that very night, and that his lodging was privily beset with a guard. And surely they had been surprised, had they not expected that the Parthians (who were round about Jerusalem) should be seized of Herod, fearing lest he having an inkling of their dysaster, should betake himself to flight. And that this was true, they incontinently gathered by the guard that was set about them: For which cause there were certain of Phasælus friends, who counselled him, that without any more delay, he should betake him to his horse, and flie from thence: and amongst the rest, Ofilius was most earnest, who had E wrought out of Saramalla a rich Syrian (who offered them his ships that road hard by to further their flight) all that which they pretended. But Phasælus would neither forsake Hircanus, nor leave his brother Herod in danger, but repairing to Barzapharnes, he told him, that he did him wrong to use these sinister practices against them. For that if he had need of money, he was more likely to receive it at his hands, then from Antigonus; and howsoever he wrought, it was an intolerable injurie to put Embassadours to death, who came unto him under pledge of his honour, and had no wayes offended him. But the Barbarian hearing these things, protested by an oath, that no one point of that which he had suspected, was true; but that he was onely troubled with false surmize: whereupon he presently departed to Pacorus.

CHAP. XXV.

The Parthians lead away Hircanus and Phasælus into captivitie.

AS soon as he was departed, certain of the Parthians took Hircanus and Phasælus prisoners, who mightily detested their perjuries. But the Eunuch that was sent unto Herod, had commandment given him to entice and train him without the city walls, and afterwards to apprehend him. But Herod was forewarned of this treachery, by certain messengers (who were sent by Phasælus to give him notice thereof) who being intercepted by the enemie in the way, and Herod getting notice thereof, he addressed himself to Pacorus

(and those in greatest authority among the Parthians) as to them that were the masters: who G subtilly dissembled, notwithstanding they knew how all things went, telling him that he should do well to repair with them without the wall to go and meet those messengers, who brought him letters; who had not as yet been seized by their adversaries, but came to cer-tifie him of Phasalus good estate. But Herod gave them no credit, because he was alreadie otherwayes advertised of his brothers surprisall, and had also farre greater suspition of the Parthians by the sollicitation of Hircanus daughter, whom he had married. And although the rest made no account of her advertisements, yet Herod gave credit unto her, for that she was a most wise woman. Now whilest the Parthians were in deliberation what were best to be done (in that it was held no policy to make open assault upon such a man) they deferred the whole matter untill the next morning. Whilest thus they were debating of their differences, H Herod came unto them, who rather giving credit to that which he had heard as concerning his brother (and touching the treasons intended against him by the Parthians) then to his adversaries, as soon as it was night, concluded to make use of the time, and to make away, without staying any longer amongst those uncertain dangers, which his enemies intended against him. For which cause he fled with those men of warre which he had with him: and mounting his mother, his sister and his betrothed, whom he was to marrie (who was Alexanders daughter, the neece of Aristobulus) and her mother (who was Hircanus daughter) and her younger brother, with all their family and train, he departed into Idumæa without espi-all or suspition of the enemie. Amongst whom there was not one so hard or iron-hearted, who seeing such a pitifull spectacle, could not be moved to compassion, beholding the mothers drag away their little children, and abandon their countrey with tears and complaints: I and that which was worse, to leave their friends in bondage, without any hope of comfort or redresse.

The Parthians lay a plot to surprise Herod: he discovereth it, and preventeth them by flight.

Herod comforteth his friends in their flight.

But Herod mastered these misfortunes by his invincible courage, and for that he was a constant man in all fortunes, he exhorted every one of them whom he met in the way, to be of good courage; and not abandon themselves to immeasurable sorrow, for that by such means they might hinder his retreat, on which their sole and secureſt conservation depended:
whereupon they for their parts indeavoured themselves to digest their griefs, according to Herods exhortation. Mean-while he hardly refrained from laying violent hands on himself, by reason of the chariot wherein his mother rode, which overturned and had almost slain her; yea so much did this casualty terrifie him (for fear lest the enemy in pursuit should sur- K prize him during these delaies) as that he drew and prepared his sword to kill himself, had not some assistants and followers stept in to him and stayed the stroke, beseeching him instantly not to forsake them, and leave them subject to the enemies violence: assuring him that it was not the part of a valiant man to respect his own private interest, and neglect his friends perill. By these perswasions he was induced to hold his hands, both by reason of the apprehension of these words, which were spoken unto him, as also for that he was overruled by the multitude of those who would not permit his hand to execute his will: so that taking up his mother, and doing her all the service that the time permitted, he followed on his way, and with the speediest and neareſt means he could, he retired toward the Castle of Massada, L where in the way, he oftentimes fought against the Parthians that charged and pursued him, and returned alwaies with victory from them. The Jews also were not in peace with him during this his flight; for scarcely had he travelled sixty stounds out of the City, but that they assailed him in the high way: but he put them to flight and obtained the victory, not like a desperate man enforced thereunto through necessity, but like a discreet, well furnished and valiant souldier. So that in the very place where he obtained that victory against the Jews (after such time as he was made King) he builded a most sumptuous palace, and neer unto the same a city which he called Herodium. Whilest he remained at Ressa (a borough of Idumæa) Joseph his brother came forth to meet him, and to consult with him as touching their whole estate, and to know of him what should become of that great multitude that followed them, considering that they had no souldiers in pay, and the castle of Massada (whither M he intended to flie) was too little to hold all the people: for which cause he sent away many, to the number of nine thousand, willing them to disperse themselves here and there in the countrey of Idumæa; and for the better dispatch of their journey, he furnished them with victuals. As for himself, he took with him his most able souldiers and inward friends, and repaired to the castle of Massada, in which place he left the women and their train, to the number of eight hundred or thereabouts: and furnishing the place with corn, water, and other provisions necessary, he went unto Petra the chiefest city of Arabia. As soon as it was day, the Parthians sacked all that which appertained to the citizens of Jerusalem, and among other

Herod seeing his mothers chariot overturned, is ready to murther himself.

Herod retiring towards Massada, is assailed by the Parthians.

The Parthians spoil the citizens of Jerusalem, and destroy Ressa.

A other things they ſpoiled the palace; notwithſtanding they medled not with Hircanus money, which amounted to ſome three hundreth talents. They left divers other things behind them alſo that appertained to Herod, and eſpecially that which had been tranſported into Idumæa by his mature providence. Neither were the Parthians content with the ſpoil of the City, but they forraged all the countrey round about, and razed Mariſſa a very rich city. Thus Antigonus, brought back into his countrey by the King of the Parthians, received Hircanus and Phaſalus that were priſoners: yet was he vehemently diſpleaſed, becauſe the women had eſcaped, whom according to his promiſe he intended to have delivered with the money: and fearing leſt Hircanus through the favour of the people ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed in his kingdome (who then was priſoner in the cuſtody of the Parthians) he cut off both his ears, depriving him by that means from enjoying the Prieſthood any more, by reaB ſon of that maim, becauſe the law commandeth that they who are in that dignity, ſhould be ſound in all their members. But Phaſalus is to be admired for his great courage at that time: for underſtanding that he muſt needs die, he was no ways diſmaied with death, but that which he held moſt miſerable and diſhonourable was, that he muſt needs die by the hands of his enemie. Seeing therefore that he could not diſpatch himſelf by other means, (becauſe he was bound and chained) he knockt out his own brains againſt a ſtone, and ſo ended his life (with as great honour as may be imagined in ſuch a deſperate eſtate) depriving his enemie of that power which he intended to practiſe in tyrannizing over him at his pleaſure. It is ſaid that the wound being very deep, Antigonus ſent privily Chirurgeons to cure him; and that C under colour of healing him, they ſhould put poyſon into the ſame, where-through he might die. But before Phaſalus gave up the ghoſt, he underſtood by a certain woman, that his brother Herod had eſcaped from his enemies: for which cauſe he endured his death with farre greater cheerfulneſs and conſtancy, ſeeing that he left behinde him ſuch a man, as would revenge his death, and puniſh his enemies. But Herod was no ways diſcomforted with the greatneſs of thoſe adverſities which environed him round about, but was the more whetted on to finde out new inventions, and to adventure dangerous attempts. For he went unto Malchus King of the Arabians (to whom beforetime he had ſhewed much courteſie) hoping to receive the like of him in this time of his great neceſſity, and to draw ſome money from D him either by loan or gift, according as he had often and very bountifully pleaſured him. For being ignorant of his brothers death, he endeavoured himſelf to ranſome him ſpeedily from his enemies, by paying his ranſome (which amounted to three hundreth talents) and for that cauſe he led with him the ſonne of Phaſalus, who was only ſeven years old, to leave him in plead amongſt the Arabians for the ſumme that was demanded. But certain meſſengers came to him from Malchus, who charged him in the Kings behalf to retire back again, for that the Parthians had enjoyned him that he ſhould neither receive nor retain Herod. And this colourable pretence uſed he, becauſe he would not pay his debts: and hereunto was he perſwaded by the advice of the greateſt in authority among the Arabians, who E pretended thereby to make themſelves maſters of that treaſure that Antipater had committed to their cuſtody. Herod anſwered them, that he repaired not into their countrey to give them cauſe of any trouble, but onely to conſult with them about certain matters of great importance touching his own eſtate, and that afterwards he was reſolved to depart, and withdraw himſelf into Egypt as ſecretly as might be poſſible. He returned therefore to a certain Temple, where he had left divers of his followers; and the next day he came to Rhinocura, in which place he heard tidings of his brothers death. But afterwards Malchus repented himſelf of his ingratitude, and ſpeedily ſent after Herod, but he could not overtake him: for he had gotten far onward on his way, and was already arrived in poaſt near to Peluſium: where being denied his paſſage to Alexandria in thoſe ſhips that were there, he addreſſed himſelf to the Magiſtrates of the place, who highly reſpected and honoured him, and ſent him to the City where Cleopatra was; who enF tertained him kindly: yet notwithſtanding could ſhe not perſwade him to remain with her. Whereupon he repaired towards Rome (notwithſtanding the winter and thoſe grievous troubles that at the very ſame time afflicted Italy, as it was reported.) Embarking himſelf therefore to ſail into Pamphilia, he was toſſed with a moſt cruel ſtorme; ſo that with great danger at laſt he arrived in Rhodes, having been inforced in the tempeſt to caſt into the ſea a good part of his ſubſtance. There met he with Sappinas and Ptolomey two of his endeared friends. He found alſo that the city of Rhodes had ſuffered much miſery by Caſſius wars: and although his means were very ſcant, yet profited he them in what he might, and cauſed their walls to be repaired, notwithſtanding that by ſo doing, he greatly hindred himſelf. After that, he cauſed a little frigot to be built, and embarked himſelf with

CHAP. XXVI. H

Herod is made King of Iewry by the Romane Senate.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 23. al. 25. Antonius loved Herod, & hated Antigonus. Cæsar Augustus Herods friend.

ANtigonus hearing all those alterations that had befallen Herod, had compassion of his misery (bethinking himself of the estate and condition of great men, who are likewise subject to no lesse casualties) and the rather was he induced to do him good, both in remembrance of the friendship he had with Antipater his father, as also by reason of Herods promises of certain summes of money, if so be he were made King by his means, as he had been beforetime declared Tetrarch. But that which most moved him I hereunto, was the hatred which he bare to Antigonus, whom he accounted to be a mutinous man, and an enemy to the Romans fortune. On the other side, Cæsar was well inclined to succour him, both in regard of those armies which Antipater had brought into Egypt in his fathers service, as also because of the good hospitality and kindness that he had shewed him in all things; as in especial to gratifie Antonius, who was well affected towards Herod.

Herod admitted into the Senate, and declared king.

Whereupon the Senate being assembled, Messala and Atratinus brought forth Herod, and after they had praised him, and recited the benefits which the Romans had received by his father, and the great affection and good will which he bare to the people of Rome; they accused and declared Antigonus for the Romans enemy, not onely for his ancient crimes, but also for that in contempt of the Romans he had received the kingdome from the Parthians. K
Whilest the Senate was sore displeased at the report of these things, Antonius arose, and declared openly before them all, that in furtherance of the Parthian war, it were not amisse that Herod should be made King: which opinion of his was generally allowed, and finally ratified. The principall demonstration of the love and affection which Antonius bare unto Herod, was, that he not onely obtained him the kingdome, beyond all hope: for never thought he that the Romans would grant that dignity unto him, who were wont to reserve that honour to those of the kings blood; and therefore he intended to have demanded it for his wives brother Alexander, and nephew to Aristobulus by the fathers side, and to Hircanus by the mother (which Alexander, Herod afterward put to death, as it shall be declared in place convenient) but also for that within the term of seven dayes, he sent him out of Italy with the unexpected titles of his felicitie.

Herod intending the kingdome for his wives brother, enjoyeth the same himself.

Herod ascendeth the Capitoll with Antonius and Cæsar.

As soon as the Senate was risen, Antonius and Cæsar issued forth, leading Herod between L them, and being accompanied by the Consuls and other magistrates, went up into the capitol to do sacrifice, and to place there this decree the Senate had made as touching this matter. The first day of Herods reign Antonius feasted him; and after this sort was he established King in the hundreth eighty and fourth Olympiade, in the year wherein C. Domitius Calvinus twice Consul, and Caius Asinius Pollio were Consuls. Mean while Antigonus besieged those that were in the castle of Massada, who were plentifully furnished with all things necessary (except it were water) for which cause Joseph, Herods brother that was within, and two hundreth of his friends, had concluded to flie unto the Arabians: for that they understood that Malchus had repented himself of the fault he had committed against Herod. But whilest they M stood upon these terms, God powred down a huge rain on a certain night, that in short time filled their cisterns in such sort, as that they had no more necessity to flie; and from that time forward they waxed confident: and for that this abundance of water befel them by Gods providence, they made a sally upon their enemies, in which they charged Antigonus souldiers after such a manner, sometimes in open field, sometime by covert assault, that they slew a great number of them. At that time Ventidius a Roman Captain was sent into Syria to drive the Parthians from thence, and after their departure he arrived in Jewry, making shew that he would assist Joseph: but in effect all his pretence was to draw money from

CHAP. XXVII.

Herod returneth from Rome by ſea, and fighteth againſt Antigonus.

B AFter that Herod was come from Italy by ſea to Ptolemais, and that he had aſſembled no ſmall number of ſouldiers both ſtrangers and his own countrimen, he marched forward againſt Antigonus, and paſſed thorow Galilee. Silo and Ventidius alſo gave him aſſiſtance in this action, having received direction by Gellius from Antonius, that they ſhould aſſiſt Herod to recover his countrey. But Ventidius was employed in appeaſing the troubles that were raiſed in the Cities by the Parthians: and as touching Silo he kept in Judæa, having been corrupted by Antigonus. But the further that Herod daily marched into the countrey, the more and more increaſed his forces; and all Galilee (except a very few) ſubmitted themſelves unto him. Whileſt therefore he C marched forward toward Maſſada, (being urged thereunto in that he was to relieve his parents that were beſieged therein) the citie of Joppe would not grant him paſſage: for the Citizens thereof were his enemies: ſo that it behoved him firſt of all to ruinate the ſame, to the end he might leave no retreat or place of reſcous for his enemy on his back, if ſo be he made toward Jeruſalem. Upon which occaſion Silo laying hold, diſlodged his army and made thitherward: whom when the Jews did purſue, Herod ſallied out with a ſmall company and put them to flight, and ſaved Silo, notwithſtanding he fought very coldly and cowardly. Afterwards being ſeized of Joppe, he haſted onwards to deliver his friends that were beſieged in Maſſada; but part of the inhabitants ſubmitted themſelves unto him for the friendſhip they had born unto his father: another ſort of them, for the honour that they bare unto D him: the reſt admitted his government, in acknowledgement of thoſe benefits they had received from them both, but the greateſt part was thereunto moved by the hope they had conceived of their new elected King, and the confirmation of his government. Thus by theſe means was his army mightily increaſed.

Many ſubmit themſelves to Herod.

Whileſt thus he marched forward, Antigonus ſeized thoſe places that were fitteſt to lay ambuſhes in, or to fight at advantages by the way (notwithſtanding that by thoſe means and ſtratagems he did but ſmall or no hurt at all to his enemy;) ſo that Herod raiſed the ſiege, and diſcharged his friends out of the caſtle of Maſſada: and after he had taken the fort of E Reſſa, he approched Jeruſalem, being attended by Siloes army, and by divers Citizens of the City, who were afraid of his power. And when he had pitched his camp to the weſtward of the City, thoſe that kept the watch and guard on that ſide, ſhot their arrows and caſt ſtones againſt him: divers likewiſe trooped forth, and fought, hand to hand againſt thoſe that were planted there: For which cauſe firſt of all Herod cauſed proclamation to be made round about the walls, ſignifying unto them that he reſorted thither for the common profit of the people, and for the conſervation of the city, without intent of revenge or memory of any wrongs that his private enemies had offered him, promiſing his moſt free pardon to all thoſe whoſoever had hainouſly offended him. Hereunto Antignus made this anſwer (turning his ſpeech to Silo and the Romane ſouldiers) that contrary to all juſtice they gave the kingdome to Herod, who was a private man, and an Idumæan (that is to ſay, a half Jew) whereas it hath been a cuſtome to beſtow the ſame on them that are of the line of the F Prieſts. For albeit at that preſent they were diſpleaſed with him, for that he was ſeized of the kingdome by the means of the Parthians, and had reſolved with themſelves to diſpoſſeſs him; yet that there were divers others of that royal race, who might be made Kings according to the law, who have no ways miſdemeaned themſelves towards the Romans; and moreover there are Prieſts, who ſhould not be juſtly and uprightly dealt withal, if they ſhould be deprived of that honour which appertaineth unto them. Whileſt they debated the matter after this manner between them, and grew to hot and injurious taunts the one againſt the other, Antigonus commanded his men to aſſail thoſe that were near unto the wall: who ſhooting many arrows with great courage againſt them, drave them eaſily from the Tower they kept.

At that time Silon gave manifeſt proof that he had been corrupted by money: for he G ſuborned divers of his ſouldiers, who cried out that they had want of victuals, & demanded greater pay for their maintenance, and requeſted that they might be placed in ſome convenient garriſons to winter in, for that the places round about the Citie were deſolate; becauſe all neceſſaries for maintenance of life had been taken away and waſted by Antigonus ſouldiers. Thus was the whole army troubled; ſo that each of them prepared themſelves to diſlodg. But Herod importuned and cried out upon the Captains and ſouldiers that were under Silons charge, telling them that it concerned them not to abandon him, whom Ceſar, Antony and the Senate of Rome had ſent thither: That for his own part he would give order that they ſhould have abundance and foiſon of whatſoever they demanded; and incontinently departing from them (after he had preſented them with this requeſt) he deprived H Silon of all colour and pretext of flight: for he cauſed an incredible quantitie of victuals to be brought them; and commanded his friends that inhabited the confines of Samaria, to bring them corn, wine, oyl, cattel, and other ſuch proviſion from Iericho, to the end that from that time forward the ſouldiers might want nothing. Antigonus was not ignorant thereof; ſo that he incontinently ſent men throrowout the countrey, who might intercept and ſurprize the purveiours and victualers. Who following Antigons commandment, aſſembled a great number of ſouldiers near unto Iericho, and encamping in the mountains, eſpied and watched thoſe that brought the victuals. Mean-while Herod lay not ſtill, but took with him ten companies, five of Roman ſouldiers, and five of Iews, with whom he intermixed ſome forrain ſouldiers with ſome few horſmen, and came to Iericho; where I being arrived he ſeized the Town, which was abandoned by the inhabitants, of whom five hundreth with their wives and children were retired into the tops of the mountains, whom he took, and afterwards ſet at libertie: but the Roman ſouldiers, entring into their houſes, and finding them full of all ſorts of mooveables, they ſpoiled the ſame. And the King having left a garriſon in Jericho, returned to his own place, diſmiſſing the Romane army to go and winter in the countries lately ſurrendred unto him; namely, in Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria: Antigonus alſo purchaſed this favour at Silons hands by ſtore of bribes, that part of his army was lodged in Lydda, all which he did to curtie favour with Antony.

Whileſt thus the Romans lived in all abundance and bare no arms; Herod would not be K
ſtill, but ſent his brother Ioſeph into Idumæa, with one thouſand footmen, and four hundred horſe; and himſelf reſorted to Samaria, where his mother and his other parents kept, who beforetime were departed out of Maſſada. After this he went into Galilee to ſurprize certain caſtles which were held by Antigonus garriſons, and being arrived at Sephoris (during a great ſnow) after that Antigonus garriſons were departed out of the foreſaid caſtles, he found a great abundance of all ſorts of neceſſary munition. And there having notice of certain theeves, who inhabited in caves, he ſent a troop of horſemen, with three companies of footmen, againſt them: whom he commanded to do juſtice on thoſe robbers (now the place where they kept, was not farre from a borough called Arbela:) and fourty daies after, he himſelf with all his army reſorted thither. Now whereas the enemies iſſued out againſt him with a hardy reſolution, the left wing of his ſquadron retired and fainted; but he coming on L with his main battel put them to flight, who were already almoſt maſters of the field, and made thoſe of his followers that fled, to turn their faces, and to purſue their enemies as far as the ſtoud Jordan: who fled ſome of them be one way, ſome by another; ſo that he drew all Galilee under his ſubjection, except thoſe that inhabited and held the caves. He diſtributed money alſo amongſt his ſouldiers, and gave each ſouldier an hundred and fifty drachmes, and far more unto their Chieftains, and afterwards ſent them to winter in garriſons near at hand.

About this time Silon and his Captains, who had paſſed the winter in the ſaid garriſons, came unto him (for that Antigonus would no more furniſh them with victuals:) for he gave them maintenance for no more time then a moneth, commanding thoſe that dwelt round M about them, to ſpoil the countrey, and afterwards to retire themſelves into the mountains, to the end that the Romans might be deſtitute of neceſſary maintenance, and by that means might be conſumed with famine. Herod gave Pheroras his yongeſt brother the charge of that proviſion, commanding him to incloſe the fort of Alexandrion with a wall; who ſpeedily brought to paſs that the ſouldiers had all ſorts of neceſſaries at commandment: he reedified alſo the fort of Alexandrion which had been laid deſolate. About that time Antony ſojourned in Athens, and Ventidius was in Syria, who having ſent for Silon to accompany him againſt the Parthians, did firſt of all charge him to aſſiſt Herod in that warre: and afterwards

A afterwards to excite the provinciall confederates to further his warre. But Herod dismissing Silon and his company to follow their destinated wars with Ventidius, did in his own person lead out his souldiers against those theeves that lived in dens. Now these caves were scituate in the most highest and inaccessible mountains, impregnable through narrow paths, environed with sharp rocks, wherein the robbers inhabited secretly, with all their families, King Herod caused a certain number of coffers to be made, fastned to yron chains, which he caused to be let down by an engine from the top of the mountain (because it was neither possible by reason of the steepinesse of the hill to ascend the same from beneath, neither from above to creep downward against them.) These chests were filled with souldiers, armed with great hooks to draw these theeves unto them, and to break their necks headlong from
B the height to the bottome. But the use of these coffers was dangerous, for it was necessary to let them down an infinite depth into the caves, especially for that the theevs had necessarie munition among them: notwithstanding when they had gotten down, none of the theeves durst peep out of the mouthes of their caves, but fear constrained them to hold themselves quiet, but a certain souldier having girt his sword by his side, and taken hold of the chain with both his hands whereto the coffer was fastned, slid down as farre as the entry of the cave: and being displeased that no one issued out, he shot divers arrows at those that were within, and wounded them; and after that, with his hook he drew those unto him who resisted him, and tumbling them down headlong from the steepie rock: which done, he rushed in upon those that were within the cave, and slew many of them, and afterwards
C returned and rested himself in his coffer. Divers hearing the groans of those that were wounded, were surprised with fear and despair of their life, but the nights approach was the cause that the matter was not fully atchieved, and many of them (receiving notice of the Kings free pardon by a Herauld) submitted themselves. The next day they renewed and continued the same manner of fight, and divers issued out of their coffers to fight upon the outward entrances of the caves, into which they cast fire, which (for that there was great quantity of wood in the caves) did quickly burn. Within these caves there was a certain old man apprehended, with his wife and seven sonnes: who being required by them that he would suffer them to go and submit themselves to their enemies, took up the entry of the cave, and as his sonnes advanced themselves to issue out he slew them, untill such time as D he had massacred them all, and after them his wife; and finally, when he had cast their dead bodies down the rocks, he threw himself down headlong after them, preferring death before servitude. Yet before his death, he reviled Herod in bitter words, and upbraided him of his obscurity and ignoble race: and although Herod (who saw all that which had happened) stretched out his hand unto him and promised him pardon; yet would he not respect him; and by this means were all these caves entred, and the theeves therein taken.

Now when the King had established Ptolomey captain over the souldiers in that region, he retired himself into Samaria, with six hundreth horsemen, and three thousand footmen, with a resolution to fight with Antigonus, and to end their quarrell. But Ptolomey had but E very slender successe in his government: for they that before-time had troubled the countrey of Galilee, sallied out upon him, and overthrew him. After which execution they fled into the Marishes and unaccessible places, where they robbed and spoiled all the countrey. But Herod returning and setting upon them, punished them: for he slew some of them, and the rest were constrained to flie into strong places, where he besieging them and entring their fortresses perforce, slew the men, and destroyed their fortifications: and having brought this rebellion to an end, he condemned the cities to pay him the summe of one hundred talents. Mean while, Pacorus was slain in the war, and the Parthians were discomfited with him; which was the cause that Ventidius sent Macheras to succour Herod with two F legions and 1000. horse, & that by the commandment of Antonius. But Macheras was drawn by Antigonus, who corrupted him with money: and notwithstanding Herods contradiction & disswasion, yet resorted he unto him, alleadging that he did it to look into his actions. But Antigonus suspecting his sudden approach, entertained him not, but caused him to be darted at and driven thence, giving him to understand by his entertainment, what opinion he had of him, and how he was affected towards him: who at that time perceived plainly that Herod had given him good counsell, and that himself had misdone in misbeleeving his advice: for which cause he returned to the city Emaus, and slew all those Jews whom he met withall in the way, whether friends or enemies: so highly displeased was he at that which had happened. Herod sore moved hereat, came to Samaria, resolving with himself to poste unto Antonius to complain of these aggrievances; considering that he had no need of such associates, who did him more harm then his enemies; whereas of himself he was able to G make good his warre against Antigonus. But Macharus hasted after him, requiring him to stay, and to travel no further on that journey, or if he might not be delivered, he prayed him to leave his brother Joseph behind him, who might with them make warre against Antigonus.

By these perswasions and instant intreaties of Macharus, he was somewhat appeased: so that he left his brother Joseph behind him, with an army; charging him no way to hazard his fortune, or to fall at oddes with Macharas. As for himself he hasted toward Antony, who at that time besieged Samosata (a Citie scituate neer unto Euphrates) having with him an army of his associates, both horsemen and foormen. When Herod was arrived in Antioch, he found divers men assembled there, who were desirous to go and seek out Antony: but they durst not set forward on the way, for fear lest certain Barbarians should set upon them, and kill H them in their journey: these did Herod assure, and offered himself to be their guide upon the way. Now when they came to their second bait, some two daies journey off Samosata, the Barbarians laid an ambush for them, and had barred up the way with hurdles, and had likewise hidden certain horsemen thereabouts, who should lie in covert untill such time as the possengers had recovered the Plain. Now when the foremost were past, the ambush consisting of about some five hundreth horsemen, suddenly charged Herod who was in his rereward when as therefore they had broken the former ranks whom they had met, Herod with his troop that was about him, incontinently repulsed them; and after he had encouraged his followers and whetted them on to the fight, he wrought so much, that he made those that fled to turn their faces, and to fight, so that the Barbarians were put to the sword on all sides.
The King also pursued them so long, untill at last he recovered that which had been taken I by them, which was a certain number of sumpter-horses and slaves. But being charged afresh by others, and they in greater number then those who encountred him at first, he likewise (rallying his forces together) charged and overcame them; and killing divers of them, he secured the way to those that followed after, who all of them acknowledged him for their preserver and guide.

Herod was honourably entertained by Antonius and his host.

When he drew neer unto Samosata, Antony sent out his army in gooly array to meet and honour him, and withall to succour him, in that he had heard that the Barbarians had assailed him. As soon as he came to Antonys presence, he entertained him kindly; and after he had heard that which had befalne him in the way, he embraced him in admiration of his K vertue, and did him great honour, as to him whom a little before he had raised to a royal dignity. Not long after this, Antiochus surrendred the fort of Samosata to Antony, and upon this occasion the war was ended. Whereupon Antony committed the Province with the army to Sosius: and after he had commanded him to succour Herod, he departed into Egypt: Sosius therefore sent two legions of souldiers before into Judæa to succour Herod, and afterwards he followed with the rest of his army.

Sosius hath the army committed to his charge by Antonius, who departeth into Egypt.

In the mean while Joseph died in Jewry on this occasion that ensueth: For forgetting his brother Herods commandement, which he gave him at such time as he repaired to Antony, he took to him five companies of souldiers which Macharus had left him; and marching towards Jericho to gather in the fruits of the field, he pitched his tents upon the mountains:
And for that the Roman troops were but newly levied, & consisted of those men who were L untrained in the warres, and for the most part were gathered out of the countrey of Cœlosyria: the enemies having advertisement hereof, assailed and surprised him in certain places of disadvantage, where there was a hot skirmish between them, in which Joseph died fighting valiantly; and all his army was discomfited: for six companies of them were slain. After that the dead bodies were at Antigonus command, he cut off Josephs head, which Pheroras his brother ransomed for the price of fifty talents. Which done, the Galileans revolting from their Governours, drowned Herods partakers in the lake; so that divers commotions and troubles were raised in Jewry. Macharus he fortified the castle of Geth. This misfortune of Josephs was reported to the king, in a certain suburb of Antioch called Daphne, who before the ti- M dings, had already conceived some suspition and fear, grounded upon certain dreams, which gave him certain intelligence of his brothers death. Departing therfore from thence with all expedition, he arrived near to the mount Libanus, where he took about eight hundred men with him, and the Roman legion which he had, and from thence came to Ptolemais; from whence he departed with his army by night, and crossed Galilee with them. Whereupon the enemies came forth against him, and were overcome by him, and shut up in a fort, from whence they were departed but the day before; where Herod assailed them by break of day: But being unable to offer them any prejudice, by reason of the indisposition of the weather, he led his men into the villages neer adjoyning. But when Antonius

A second legion was come, and annexed to his forces; they that were within the fort were dismayed, and forsook the same by night. So that Herod marched with all diligence to Jericho, with an intent to revenge his brothers death; and being encamped near unto the same, he banquetted and entertained the Chieftains of his army; and after the feast was ended, and he had dismissed his company, he withdrew himself into his lodging. In which place it appeared, how much God loved the King: for the roof of the house where he had solemnized his feast, fell down without hurt to any one whomsoever: for no one was left within it. Whence it came to passe, that each one perswaded himself that Herod was beloved by God; considering he had avoided so great and unexpected a peril.

The year of the world, 3928. before Christs Nativitie, 36.

The house wherein Herod solemnized his feast, fell down when the guests, were gone without any mans detriment.

The next day, six thousand of enemies came down from the top of the mountaines to B fight with him, who affrighted the Romans, and their forlorn hope chased Herods souldiers with darts, and stones, who was himself also hurt in the thigh with an arrow. Antigonus sent a Captain to Samaria, whose name was Pappus, with some souldiers, intending thereby to signifie unto his enemies, that he had more men of war then he needed. Pappus drew near to Macheras the Roman Captain: and as touching Herod, he took five cities by force, and put some two thousand of them that were in garrison to the sword; and afterwards (having set the houses on fire) he went out to encounter Pappus; who was encampted in a borough called Isanas. Divers that came from Jericho and Jewry, submitted themselves to Herod, who drawing near the enemy (who marched forward with great hardinesse fought with him and overcame him, and being inflamed with a great desire he had to revenge his brothers death,
C he pursued them that fled, and slew them even within their borough. These houses were incontinently filled with men of war, and divers fled and hid themselves upon the tops thereof, who were at last taken; for the roofs of the houses were beaten down, and he saw that all were filled with souldiers, whereby divers were slain by stones that were darted at them from above, and afterwards cast and killed them by heaps; which was the most grievous spectacle of all those that had hapned in those wars, to see an infinite number of bodies hidden one under another amidst the roomes of the houses.

This exploit of Herod did very much abate the courage of his enemy, who hereafter expected far more worse fortunes at his hands: For a man might have seen them flie away in heaps: and had not a sudden and forcible tempest faln upon them, the triumphant army of D Herod had incontinently entred Jerusalem with assurance of victory, which had made a final end of all that war. For, Antigonus each day bethought him how to flie away, and to forsake the city. But for that it was already grown dark, Herod commanded his souldiers to refresh themselves; and for that he himself was weary, he entred into his lodging to bathe himself, in which place he overwent a mighty misfortune, from which he escaped by Gods providence. For (whereas he was naked and accompanied with one only servant to attend him) at such time as he bathed, ther were a certain number of armed enemies hidden in that lodging, who were fled thither for the fear they had: and during the time that Herod bathed, the first amongst them issued with his naked sword and got the door; and after him the second; and the third no lesse armed, without offending the King, for the fear that they had of his
E presence: and content to escape in their own persons, without the prejudice of other men. The next day he sent Pappus head to his bother Pheroras, who was slain by his own sword in revenge of the injury offered to Joseph. When the tempest was done, he departed from thence, and approached near to Ierusalem, and encamped near unto the city. This was about the third year since he was created King at Rome; and encamping himself in the places which was (as he thought) fittest for battery; he addressed himself towards the Temple side, resolving to batter and make breach in that place in like manner as Pompey had done before him. Having therefore erected three bulwarks in three places, he builded towers thereon by the assistance of many workmen: and by means of a great quantity of wood,
F which he caused to be cut down round about the place: and having pointed such men as were of ripe jugdement to oversee these works, he left his army well provided, and resorted to Samaria, to marry with the daughter of Alexander, who was Aristobulus son to whom he was betrothed, according as I have heretofore declared.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 26. al. 27.

Sosius and Herod lead a mighty army against Jerusalem.

AFter this marriage was solemnized, Sosius repaired thither through the countrey of Phœnicia, and having first of all sent his army thorow the continent, he himself also resorted thither with many as well footmen as horsemen: thither also repaired the King from Samaria, with no small army, to annex himself with the old bands: for he had about thirty thousand men. All these assembled themselves together near unto the walls of Jerusalem, and planted their siege nigh unto the wall of the City that extendeth towards H the Northward. The army contained eleven legions of footmen, with six thousand horsemen: besides the succours that came from Syria. Of this army there were two Generals: namely, Sosius who was sent by Antonius to succour Herod: and Herod himself, who made war for himself, with an intent that having dispossessed Antigonus (whom he had proclaimed enemy to Rome) he himself might be King in his place, according to the Senates decree. Those Jewes that were within the enclosure of the walls (that is to say, almost all the nation) resisted the Herodians with great courage and affection, vaunting and boasting much of the Temple of the Lord, and wishing all good hap an and successe to the people; namely, that God would deliver them from all dangers: and spoiling all provision without the City, that was either behoveful for the use of man and beast, by their secret thefts and excursions also they made the very besiegers destitute of relief and victuals. Which I inconvenience Herod so well prevented, that he forestalled their means of theft, and laid ambushes in place convenient to cut them off. As for victuals, he sent his footmen to fetch his provision from far; so that within a very little space they had aboundance of all that which was necessary in the campe. He erected also with no lesse carefulnesse three bulwarks, by the diligent labour of a great number of workmen: for it was summer time, and neither was the air incommodious, or negligence of the workmen such, but that they presently furnished and finished them. Afterwards having raised their engines upon them, they battered the wall, with as much violence and deligence as was possible: notwithstanding all this, they did no waies amate those that were within; who for their parts used all the cun- K ning that might be possible to defend themselves, and by divers sallies set fire upon the enemies engines; and burnt not onely those that were half made, but those that were wholly perfected: and when necessity drave them to handy stroks, they shewed no lesse valour then the Romanes courage; but they were inferiour unto them in skill and martial discipline. And when as the first wall was beaten down, they builded up a new, and countermined against those mines that were made by the enemy; so that they fought under ground hand to hand. Thus using despaire rather then courage, they sustained the war to the uttermost; yea, notwithstanding they were besieged by a great army, and pressed by famine and want of victuals: for the year wherein the siege was continued was the seventh, in which the earth was unmanured, which by us is called the year of rest. But finally twenty chosen souldiers first of all mounted upon the wall; and after them one of Sosius Centurions: for the L

first wall was taken in the fourtieth day after the siege, and the second on the fiftieth, and some galleries were burned, which were near unto the Temple: which (as Herod said) were burned by Antigonus, to bring him into more hatred among ahe Jews. When the outward part of the Temple, and the lower part of the City were taken, the Jews fled into the Temple, and into the higher town, for fear they had, lest the Romans should hinder them from offering their daily and ordinary sacrifices unto God: and they sent Embassadours to their enemies, to require that it might be lawful for them onely to bring in certain beasts to offer them for sacrifices. Which Herod their King granted them, hoping by this means that they would submit themselves and yeeld up the places. But perceiving that his opinion failed him M herein, and that they obstinately resisted him, to continue the soveraignty in Antigonus, he gave the assault, and took the City by force: where all things were incontinently filled with murthers, in that the Romans were displeased, because they had so long time continued the siege; and the Jews that were on Herods side, enforced them utterly to exterminate all those that were of the contrary party, so that continual slaughters ranged and raigned every where, both in porches, and in the houses whereinto they entred: Neither did the religious reverence of the Temple save those suppliants that resorted thither for safety, but that without all compassion both old and young were slaughtered: Neither did their murthering hand spare or refrain from women; nay not so much as from young infants. A the King beſought and requeſted them to forbear them, yet no man gave over, but all ſorts of perſons were murthered by them, without reſpect either of ſex or age. Antigonus inconſiderate of that eſtate wherein he had been, or the fortune and dyſaſter that at that preſent attended him, came down from the tower and humbled himſelf on his knees before Soſius feet; who having no compaſſion of the change of that eſtate wherein he ſaw him, outragiouſly ſcorned him, calling him Madam Antigona: yet left he him not without guard after the manner of a woman, but faſt bound for his further aſſurance. But Herod was buſied in diviſing how he might moderate his aſſociates and ſtrangers, after he had the upper hand over his enemies: For the ſtrangers ſwarmed into the City by heapes, and not onely into the Temple, but alſo into the Sanctuary. He therefore exhorted ſome, and threatned other ſome, and reſtrained the reſt by force of armes; and he was more troubled at that preſant in being B a Conquerour, then if he had been conquered: for that thoſe things that were not lawful to be ſeen, were beheld by prophane men. He prevented likewiſe the ſpoile of the City, as much as in him lay: Beſeeching Soſius moſt inſtantly, to preſerve it to the utmoſt, asking him if the Romanes would leave him King of a deſart, after they had voided the City of men and goods? Alleadging furthermore, that he eſteemed the government of the whole world of no value, in regard of the life of one of his Citizens. Soſius anſwered, that it was reaſon that the pilliage ſhould be given to the ſouldier, who had born the hazard of the ſiege: whereunto Herod anſwered, that he would ſatisfie every man out of his own treaſury: and by this means, he ranſomed the reſt of the city by fulfilling thoſe promiſes: For he gave
C many mighty gifts unto every one of the ſouldiers, and by proportion unto the Captaines: but above all, he royally rewarded Soſius; ſo that every one of them departed very rich in ſilver.

But Herod fearing leſt if Antigonus ſhould be kept by Antony, and ſent to Rome, D he ſhould debate his title with him before the Senate by proteſt that he was deſcended of the royal Line; whereas Herod was but a Plebeian and common perſon: and that although he had offended the Romanes, and thereby might not deſerve to be King; yet at leaſt his children, who were of the Princely Line, were not to be denied their title: Herod, I ſay, fearing theſe things, wrought ſo much by force of his money with Antony that he cauſed him to put Antigonus to death, ſo that at that time Herod was truly delivered from all his fear. Thus ended the eſtate of the Aſmoneans, after one hundred twenty and ſix years. This Family was famous both for their nobility, and alſo by reaſon of their Sacerdotal dignity, and for the noble actions and exploits, which their anceſtors had atchived for our nation; but they loſt their outhority through their mutual factions: which ſoveraignty was derived to Jeruſalem being taking by Soſius and Herod, Antigonus is healed by Antonies command: Herod maketh away all his chiefeſt friends.

The year of the world, 3930. before Chriſts Nativity, 34.

IN the former book I have declared how Soſius and Herod took the city of Jeruſalem by force, and with it Antigonus priſoner; now will we alſo declare that which hath ſubſequently followed: for after that Herod had obtained the abſolute government over the whole land of Judæa, he advanced all thoſe among the common people, who favoured his proceedings: as for thoſe who were oppoſed againſt him, there paſſed not a day wherein ſome one or other of them ſuffered not puniſhment. But amongſt the reſt, Pollio the Phariſee, and Sameas his Diſciple, were highly honoured by him: For during the time of the ſiege of Jeruſalem, they counſelled the inhabitants to receive and entertain Herod: for which cauſe he reſpected them accordingly. This Pollio in times paſt (when Herod was found guilty of death) foretold Hircanus and the reſt of the Iudges in way of exprobration, that being abſolved by them, he ſhould one day inflict puniſhment on them all. Which prediction God in proceſſe of time approved by the event: no ſooner therefore became he maſter of Ieruſalem, but he gathered together all the rich houſhold ſtuffe that was in the Palace; and furthermore, having ſpoiled the rich men of their goods, and by this means levied a great ſum of gold and ſilver, he ſent great preſents to Antony and his friends. Moreover, he condemned five and fourty of Antigonus principal and nobleſt favourites to death, ſetting ſtraight watch about their doors, that none of them might be carried out under colour of being dead. The dead bodies likewiſe were troden under foot: and all the gold, ſilver, or jewels that was to be found amongſt them, was carried to the King, and converted to his uſe, ſo that there was no end of theſe miſeries. For the covetouſneſſe of the Conquerour (whoſe greedy and thirſty deſire could hardly be quenched) laid hold on whatſoever was theirs. And for that it was the ſeventh year, it neceſſarily came to paſſe that the land was left

CHAP. II.

How Hircanus dismissed by the Parthians, returned unto Herod.

Phraates King of Parthia, understanding how nobly Hircanus was descended, who was brought prisoner unto him, entertained him graciously: and for this cause drew him out of prison, permitting him to converse in Babylon, in which place there were a great number of Jewes, who honoured Hircanus very much; and no lesse then their high Priest and King. The like also did all they of that nation inhabiting as farre as Euphrates, which did not a little content Hircanus. But after that he was advertised that Herod was possessed of the Kingdome; he transferred his hopes another way, being of his own nature tenderly affected toward his friends, expecting that one day Herod would requite him, for that he had delivered him from death whereunto he was condemned, and in danger likewise of the penalty and punishment. He began therefore to consult with the Jews as touching his journey, who in way of duty and love came to visit him, and who besought him, and importuned him to abide with them, offering him all service and honour; assuring him that he should in no lesse manner be respected among them, then their high Priest and King; yea, in far higher regard then he might any wayes be in his own countrey, by E reason of the maime he had in his body through Antigonus tyranny: alleading that Kings do not ordinarily call to their remembrance those pleasures that they have received in their infant fortunes, because that with their estates they change both their manners and inclinations. But notwithstanding all these or such like allegations, yet could not Hircanus be withdrawn from the desire he had to repair homeward. Herod also wrote unto him, that he should require Phraates and the Jews that inhabited his Kingdome, in no sort to envy his felicity, in that he should partake with him both in dignity and royalty, alleadging that the time was now come, wherein he might acknowledge the benefits he had received, by being heretofore nourished and preserved by him. With these letters he sent Samaralla likewise on an Embassage to Phraates furnished with great and rich presents, endeavouring by that means F to winne him, that he in no sort should hinder his gratulation and good intent towards one that had so highly deserved at his hands: yet were not his protestations answerable to his pretence. For insomuch as he governed not with that uprightnesse which became a just King, he feared least some alteration might befall him, according to his demerits: for which cause he sought to get Hircanus under his power, or at leastwise to dispatch him out of his life, which he afterwards performed. When as therefore Herod had perswaded the Parthian to dismisse Hircanus, and the Jews to furnish him with money sufficient to bear his expence in his journey, he received him with all honour. In common assemblies he gave him alwayes the higest place, and in the time of festivals, he made him alwayes sit down before him; and the more closely to deceive him, he called him brother, endeavouring himself by all means wholly wholly to extinguish in him all colour and cause of suspition of treachery: neither intermitted he any other stratagems, whereby in his opinion he might any wayes further or promote his cause; and yet by these means occasioned he no small sedition in his own family. For carefully providing lest any one among the nobility should be established high Priest, he sent to Babylon for a certain man of base condition, called Ananel, and gave him the Priesthood. For which cause Alexandra grew suddenly displeased, not being able to endure that outrage. This woman was Hircanus daughter, and Alexanders wife, who was King Aristobulus son, who had two children by her husband, the one wondrous beautiful, who was called Aristobulus: the other was Mariamme, who was likewise fair, and married to Herod. She was sore moved and highly displeased to see her son so much indignified, for that during his life another was called to the honour of high Preisthood: for which cause she wrote unto Cleopatra by the means of a certain Musitian, beseeching her to beg the high Priesthood at Antonius hands for her son. But for that Antonius made little reckoning of those suits, a certain friend of his called Gellius, who was come into Jewry about certain of his affairs, and who had seen Aristobulus, fell in love with him by reason of his beauty: and being abashed likewise at his great and goodly stature, and allured by Mariammes admirable beauty, he openly protested, that he accounted Alexandra a happy mother in her children: and devising to this effect with her, he perswaded her to send the pictures of her two children to Antonius for that if he should but behold them, he would refuse him in nothing, wherein he should request his friendship. Alexandra perswaded by these words, sent their pictures unto Antonius. Gellius also made the matter more wonderful, telling him that the children seemed rather to be ingendred of no mortal strain, but by some divine power, labouring as much as in him lay, that Antonius might be allured to affection them. Who supposing it to be a matter ill beseeming him to send for Mariamme, who was married to Herod, and desirous likewise to avoid Cleopatras suspitions, wrote unto Herod, that under some honest pretext he should send Alexandras son unto him (with this addition, if it might not seem troublesome unto him.) Which matter when Herod understood, he thought it no wayes incident to his security to send Aristobulus, (who was a fair young man, and little more at that time then fixteen years old, and so nobly born: considering that Antonius was at that present in such authority, that no one in Rome was in greater credit then he; and who besides that, was very much addicted to his pleasures, which he openly hunted after without fear of punishment in regard of his greatnesse and power. He therefore wrote him this answer, that if the young man should but onely depart out of the countrey, all the land would incontinently be filled with war and troubles, for that the Jewes pretended alteration in government, and sought to innovate by preferring a new King. When as therefore he had in this sort excused himself unto Antonius; he resolved to entertain both the younger Aristobulus and his mother Alexandra, with more respect. Moreover his wife Mariamme did continually importune him to give the Priesthood to her brother, alleadging that by that honour he might prevent the occasion of his travel. For which cause assembling his friends together in counsel, he grievously accused Alexandra before them, protesting that she secretly conspired against the kingdome, and that by the mediation of Cleopatra, she laboured to dispossesse him of the soveraignty, to the intent that her sons by Antonius meanes might govern in his stead. Which practice of hers was so wuch the more unjust, because she deprived her own daughter of that honour wherein she was inseated, and raised up troubles likewise in that Kingdome which he had conquered with great travel, and extreme danger: Yet notwithstanding that he willingly forgat that which was past, and forgave those wrongs she had urged him against him, and was ready notwithstanding to shew all kindnesse and courtesie both to her and hers. Furthermore, he gave the high Priesthood to young Aristobulus, alleadging that heretofore he had established Ananel in that place for no other respect, then for that Aristobulus was under years.

After that he had thus seriously and considerately discoursed in the presence of the Ladies, and consistory of his friends; Alexandra almost beside her self, not onely through the joy she had conceived by this unexpected good fortune, but also for the fear she had to be suspected, began to defend her self with tears and protestations, saying, that all whatsoever she had either practised or done, was to prefer her son unto the Priesthood whom she saw dishonoured: but as touching the kingdome, that she had never pretended, neither would (if so be she should be presented therewith) receive the same, thinking her self for the present sufficiently honoured, both for that she saw Aristobulus in that estate, for the assurance that all her progeny should receive, in that he was lifted up in dignity above the rest. Being therefore overcome by those merits, she excepted willingly the honour for her son,

CHAP. III.

Herod preferreth Ariſtobulus, his wife Mariammes brother, to the Prieſthood; B and afterwaads putteth him to death.

HEreupon Herod took away the Prieſthood inſtantly from Ananel, who was not that countrey-man born (as we have heretofore declared) but was born amongſt thoſe Jews that inhabit and were planted beyond Euphrates by the Aſſyrians. For divers thouſand Jews inhabit the countrey of Babylon, and from thence took he his Originall alſo, being otherwiſe of the race of the Prieſts, and intirely affected toward Herod for a long time before, with whom he had familiar acquaintance. He had preferred him to this honour at ſuch time as he was made King, and degraded him likewiſe to appeaſe the troubles of his family; demeaning himſelf herein contrary to the law of the Countrey: for C whereas any one hath once been inſtalled in that degree, he is never to be diſplaced. The firſt that tranſgreſſed this Ordinance, was Antiochus Epiphanes, who diſpoſſeſſed Joſuah, and preferred his brother Onias to his place. The ſecond was Ariſtobulus, who took it away from his brother Hircanus, and uſurped himſelf. Herod was the third, who gave the Prieſthood to Ariſtobulus, eſtabliſhing him in Ananels place before he was dead: and by this means ſuppoſing that he had found out a remedy to appeaſe the diſcords of his family, he notwithſtanding all this, lived not without ſuſpition what event would follow after this reconciliation: for he feared Alexandra, leſt demeaning her ſelf in ſuch ſort as before-time ſhe had done, ſhe ſhould ſeek occaſion hereafter to raiſe new troubles. He commanded her therefore to contain her ſelf within the royal Palace, and to do nothing of her own autho- D ritie. Beſides that he had appointed certain intelligencers, who ſhould diligently obſerve that nothing ſhould be done without his knowledge, no not concerning her particular expences and table. All which things exaſperated her hate, and increaſed the ſame againſt Herod, for being full of feminine pride, ſhe diſdained to ſee her ſelf thus wrongfully ſuſpected, deſiring rather to ſuffer any thing, then to be deprived of the liberty of free ſpeech; and under colour to be honoured, to live continually in ſervitude and fear. Whereupon ſhe ſent certain of her truſty friends to Cleopatra to complain and lament unto her the importable miſeries of her preſent eſtate, requiring her according to her power, to give ready and ſpeedy relief. Whereupon Cleopatra ſent her word, that both ſhe and her ſon ſhould reſort unto her E into Egypt with as great ſecreſie as might be poſſible. Upon which advice and the allowance thereof, ſhe practiſed this policie. She cauſed two coffins to be made, ſuch as men were wont to bury their dead in, in which ſhe hid her ſelf and her ſonne, commanding thoſe ſervants of hers that were privie to her deliberation to carry them out in the night time, and to bend their courſe directly towards the ſea, where there was a Bark in readineſſe prepared to ſhape their courſe and convoy them into Egypt. But Eſop one of her houſhold ſervants declared this enterprize of hers to Sabbion one of Alexandras friends, ſuppoſing that he had been made privie thereunto: who had no ſooner inkling thereof, but (for that beforetimes he was Herods enemy, by reaſon he was ſuſpected to have been one of thoſe that ſought to poyſon Antipater) he determined by diſcovery of this ſecret flight, to convert F Herods hate into aſſured friendſhip: and preſently diſcovered Alexandras ſecret enterprize to the King. Who diſſembling the matter untill it was upon the point of execution, ſurprized her at ſuch time as ſhe thought to flie, and yet notwithſtanding, he pardoned her that fault (in that he durſt not decree any puniſhment againſt her, though he could have found in his heart to have uſed ſeveritie) for that Cleopatra would not have contained her ſelf, had ſhe but had ſuch an occaſion offered her to expreſs her hatred againſt Herod. The yeer of the world, 3971. before Christs Nativity, 33. to follow all kind of pleasure and delight; yet did his envie incite him to hasten the execution of his will. Aristobulus was at that time some seventeen yeers old, who at such time as he approached the Altar to offer sacrifices, according to the law, apparelled in the high Priests ornaments to perform the ceremonies, he (who for amiable countenance and godly stature, surpassed the youngnesse and tendernesse of his yeers) expressing in his countenance the dignitie and nobilitie of his Race, drew the eyes and good affection of all the people unto him; so that they openly called to remembrance the noble actions of Aristobulus his grandfather. All the people therefore being surmounted by those their affections, and at that present time being all of them troubled with the joy they conceived, they brake out by little and little into happy acclamations, mixed with wishes and prayers: so that the good will the H people bare to Aristobulus, discovered it self openly, and they manifestly (although too hastily in such a kingdome) declared what evils they generally endured: For all which causes Herod concluded to execute that which he had heretofore complotted and conceited against Aristobulus. As soon therefore as the feast was over-passed, he sojourned in Jericho, where Alexandra entertained him. In that place he used Aristobulus with all kindnesse, to the end to draw him to some place, where he feared nothing, playing also with him, and counterfeiting to sport, after the fashion of the young men to gratifie him. Now for that the place where they disported themselves, was by nature too hot, they quickly wearied, left their sport, and went out together to take fresh aire, and recovering a pleasant shade under certain Arbours, and neer certain fish-pools, which were largely spread round about, they be- I held certain of their servants and friends that swom therein, with whom not long after, Aristobulus began to swim, being perswaded thereunto by Herod. Whereupon Herods confederates (who were deputed to execute the murther) laid hands on him and thrust him under the water pretending to duck him in sport, and never give him over, untill such time as they had stifled him in the water. This happened about the evening, and after this manner died

Now when this accident was reported to the women, all of them were suddenly devoured in tears, and transported with strange lamentations, which they spent over the dead body. All the citie also was marvelously amated, neither was there any private family that thought K not it self touched by this inconvenience, but imagined the losse in particular to concern himself and no other. But above all, when Alexandra had notice of this wicked deed, she was more passionate and perplexed then any other, being so much the more discomfited, for that she knew how all things had hapned. But the fear of a far greater mischief constrained

But she contained her self, to the end, that surviving (and living after her son, who was so traiterously and frudulently slain, and prolonging her own life without giving any suspicion or shadow, that she supposed her son to be thus cursedly murthered) she might with more oprortunitie expect the occa- L sion to revenge her self: For which cause, she dissembled all things, governed her greif, and made shew that she knew nothing of that which was either intended, or had hapned. But especially, he shewed his great mag- M nificence in the interring of his body, both in the furnishing and preparation of the Herse, as in the perfumes and other things thereunto belonging, in such sort, as the grief which the Ladies had conceived, was pacified after this manner of consolation.

CHAP. IIII.

The yeer of the world, 3971. before Christs Nativity, 33.

Cleopatra thirsting after the kingdome of Arabia and Jewry, laboureth to beg a part of them at Antonies hands.

BUt none of all these things could either move or mollifie Alexandra, but that dayly more and more she increased her sorrow, and in the heart of her tears kindled her wrath and heat with a desire of revenge. She therefore certified Cleopatra by her private letters of Herods Treasons, and her sons most miserable and untimely death: Cleopatra long before that time desirous to assist her, and having compassion of her misery, undertook the matter, and ceased not to incite Antony to revenge Aristobulus death, telling him that it was an unpardonable errour, that Herod being created King in such a state, whereunto he had no right, should be suffered to practice such conspiracies against the true and lawfull Kings. Antony perswaded by these her words (as soon as he came to Laodicea) sent for Herod to the end, that making his appearance he might answer that which might be objected against him, as touching Aristobulus death: for he disliked the act, notwithstanding, that Herod himself had attempted it. But although Herod was affraid of this accusation, and did not a little suspect Cleopatras displeasure (for that she ceased not continually to provoke Antony against him) yet obeyed he this commandement, and transported himself thither (the rather for that he durst not otherwise doe) notwithstanding, he left his Uncle Joseph behind him, committing the government both of the Kingdome and his private estate unto him, giving him secret instructions to kill Mariamme, if so be that Antony should happen to do him any mischief. For he loved her so extreamly by reason of her beauty, that he supposed himself injured, if after his decease she should be beloved by any other; and he openly declared that all that misery which befel him, proceeded from Antonies passion, and intire affection, and admiration of her beauty, whereof he had beforetime heard some report. As soon therefore as he had in this sort disposed his affairs, notwithstanding, he had little hope of good hap, yet repaired he to Antony.

Herod ready to repair unto Antony, commandeth Ioseph, to whose charge he committed the kingdome to kill his wife.

But Joseph governing that Kingdome that was committed to his hands, conversed divers times upon this occasion with Mariamme, and communicated oftentimes with her, not onely for publike profit sake, but also to do her that honour which so great a Princesse deserved. At such time therefore as he secretly devised with her, as touching the friendship and ardent affection which Herod bare unto her, his speeches were jeasted at after the manner of Ladies, but especially flouted at by Alexandra. For which cause Joseph, being over-forward to expresse the Kings good will towards her, proceeded so far, that he discovered the commandment that was given him; thereby to make manifest, that it was not possible for Herod to live without her, and that if any inconvenience should happen unto him, he would not in death also be dis-joyned from her. This discourse of Josephs was not interpreted by the Ladies, as a demonstration of his good will, but rather as a manifestation of Herods maligniti; who dying, desired also that they should perish, and interpreted that which he had spoken, as the testimony of his tyrannous and malicious heart. At that time there was a rumour spread in the Citie of Jerusalem by Herods maligners, that Antony had in such sort tormented him, that he was dead. Whereupon all those of the Kings house were troubled, and in especiall the Ladies; so that Alexandra incited Joseph to forsake the Palace, and take the Ladies, and to retire himself under the Ensignes of the Roman legion, who at that time were about the citie for the securitie of the Kingdome, under the conduct of the Tribune Julius, to the end first of all, that if any trouble should happen in the Kings house, they might be by this means in safetie, having the Romans to friend; and afterwards, for that they hoped that if Antony should see Mariamme, she might obtain all things at his hands whatsoever she desired, assuring him that he would restore the Kingdome unto her, and deprive her of nothing that concerned, or was answrable to her royal estate.

But whilest they were distracted with these deliberations, there came letters from Herod, contrary to some few mens report, and all mens expectation. For as soon as he came unto Antony he compassed his favour by his many presents, which he had brought with him to that intent from Jerusalem, and suddenly debating the matter with him, he appeased him in such sort, as he was no more displeased against him: and from that time forward, Cleopatras speeches were but coldly conceited of in regard of his so ample satisfaction. For Antony said, that there was no reason that a King should be answerable for that which he had done in his Kingdome; for that in so doing, he should no more be King: but that when the honour is once given him, he hath the authoritie likewise left him, to use his regall power. Urging further, that it concerned Cleopatra likewise her self, not to search too curiously into the affairs and government of kingdomes. Herod certified all this by his letters, and signified further what other honours he had received at Antonies hands in assemblies and feasts to which he invited him alwayes; notwithstanding, that Cleopatra seemed to be displeased therewith, detracting him; and being desirous to get the Kingdome of Jewry into her hands, strove by all means possible to put him to death: but that he had found Antony alwayes an upright man, and feared not henceforward that any evil should befall him: and returning presently upon this, he brought with him a more ample testimony of Antonies most assured affection, both in respect of his own Kingdome, as of his particular affairs. And as touching Cleopatra, she pretended not to seek any further then that which she had; because that Antony had given her Cœlosyria in stead of that which she had demanded, forbearing thence-forward to mention Jewry any more, because that Antony wholly rejected those suites.

After these letters came unto their hands, the trouble and disturbance wherein they were and the desire to retire unto the Romanes, as if Herod had been dead, was wholly extinguished. Yet was not this their resolution hidden from the King; but that Herod after he had brought Antony on his way (who at that time set forward in his wars against the Parthians) he returned into Jewry. Upon his arrival, his sister Salome, and his mother certified him exactly of Alexandras intent, and the determination of her friends. Salome likewise spake against Joseph her husband, and slandred him, objecting against him that he had Mariammes company. All which she spake through the malice she had long time conceived against him, for that in a certain debate Mariamme had in her rage despightfully hit them in the teeth with their obscure birth. Herod (who was alwaies inflamed with the earnest affection which he bare unto his wife Mariamme) was suddenly troubled hereat: and although jealousie pressed him forward, yet love restrained him and kept him from doing any thing rashly, through passion or affection: for which cause he called Mariamme aside, and demanded of her in secret, what familiar company she had kept with Joseph? She by solemn oaths, and by all possible allegations in her own defence appeased the King by little and little, and pacified his choler. For in such sort was he transported with the love that he bare unto his wife, that he believed she had sufficiently purged her self of those slanders, that had been inforced against her; yeelding her most hearty thanks for her honest affection towards him, and declaring unto her openly the great esteem and love that he bare unto her. Finally, (as it often falleth out amongst lovers) they fell to tears, and embraced each other with great affection: for that she gave him no credit, he endeavonred the more to draw her to belief. Whereupon Mariamme said unto him: It is not the act of a Lover to have given commandment, that if any thing should befall thee otherwayes then well with Antony, I should presently be done to death with thee; notwithstanding I have no wayes offended thee. No sooner were these words out of her mouth, but the King entred into a strange passion, and giving over his embraces, he cried out with a loud voice and tore his haire, saying, that he had a most evident proof that Joseph had committed adultery with her: for that he would not have discovered those things which had been spoken to him in secret, except they had greatly trusted the one the other: and in this emotion or rage of jealousie hardly contained he himself from killing his wife. But the force of love overcame him so much, that he bridled his rage, notwithstanding it were irksome and grivous unto him. Yet gave he order that Joseph should be slain, without either audience or justification of his innocency: and as touching Alexandra, who was the cause of all these troubles, he kept her prisoner.

About the same time there grew certain troubles and alterations in Syria: for that Cleopatra continually solicited and importuned Antony, and whetted on his displeasure against all, perswading him to remove all from their governments, and to bestow the same on her self. And for that Antony loved her extreamly, she was in great estimation and credit with him: and being in her own nature inclined to covetousnesse, she abstained from no kind of corrupt dealing and wickednesse. For knowing that the Kingdome should descend unto her brother, she caused him to be poysoned, when as he was but fifteen yeers old: as for her sister Arsinoe, she caused her to be slain by Antonies means at such time, as she made her prayers in the Temple of Diana in Ephesus. Moreover, in what place soever she understood that there was any hope to get money, whether it were in robbing of Temples, or in breaking open Sepulchres, she would be possessed thereof: neither was there any religious place so sacred, from whence she took not away the Ornaments. Furthermore, there was not any thing so prophane and interdicted, which she laid not hands on to satisfie her unbridled avarice. Neither

A ther was the whole world sufficient enough to content this magnificent Lady, who was made slave to her own desires; and her disordinate appetite was such, that all the riches in the world were not able to satisfie and fill the same. For this cause she incessantly importuned Antonius to take from others, to be liberall towards her: and therefore entring into Syria with him, she presently bethought her self how she might get it into her possession. For she caused Lysanias, Ptolemeys son to be put to death, objecting against him that he had private intelligence with the Parthians. She begged Jewry also at Antonius hands, and required him besides that, to dispossesse the Kings of Arabia. He was in such sort possessed by this woman, that he seemed not onely to be bewitched with her words, but also inchanted by her poysons, to obey her in whatsoever she thought meet: yet was he ashamed to commit so manifest an iniquitie, for fear lest being so far over-ruled by her, he should happen to offend in
B matters of more consequence. Lest therefore either by denying her, he should draw her to discontent; or by condescending to her demands, he should seem to be the wickedest man alive, he deducted a several portion of both their Dominions, and presented her with the same. He gave her likewise those Cities that are scituate between the floud Elutherius and Egypt, except Tyre and Sidon, which he knew to be free Cities of long continuance: although by earnest sollicitation she thought to be seized of these also.

C After that Cleopatra had obtained all these things, and had accompanied Antonius as far as Euphrates, who at that time went to make war in Armenia: she returned back again, and by the way visited Apamea and Damasco, and at last took her progresse into Jewry: where King Herod met with her, and assured that portion which had been given unto her in Arabia, with all the revenews of Jericho unto her. This countrey bringeth forth that balm, which of all other ointments is the most precious, and onely groweth in that place, and no other, to the bignesse of great Dates. Being arrived in that place, and grown inwardly familiar with Herod, she sought to allure and draw him to her lust, being of her self naturally addicted to such pleasures and intemperance; and haply also being somewhat touched with love, or rather (as it seemeth most likely) she in this sort laid the D foundation to intrap him, under colour to revenge her self of some outrage by that means. But in effect she generally manifested, that she was overcome by her desire and sensuall lust. But Herod was not over-kindly bent towards Cleopatra, knowing of long time how badly she was inclined towards all men; and at that time he conceived the greater hatred against her, because by that intemperance of hers she pretended to destroy him: and although that from the beginning he had rejected her sollicitations, yet determined he to revenge himself on her, if so be by these her subtill underminings she should prosecute and continue her subtil policies to betray him. He asked counsel also of his friends, whether having her in his possession, he should put her to death. For in so doing, all those should be delivered from divers
E evils, whom either in time past she had molested, or hereafter should bring in trouble. Moreover, that it should be profitable for Antonius also, whom without all doubt she would forsake, if any occasion or necessitie should enforce him to make trial of her friendship. But whilest he debated and discourted upon this resolution, his friends restrained and dissuaded him; assuring him that it was a great indignitie for him, who was a Prince of high thoughts and haughty resolutions, to cast himself into manifest perill, beseeching him to attempt nonothing rashly: For that Antonius would not endure the same, notwithstanding, it might be approved that it stood with his profit: nay, rather that by this means he should encrease his desire, for that by force and subtilie he might seem to have lost her. Further, that no one
F colour of excuse should be left him, in that she was the woman of greatest note and nobility of that time; and that whatsoever profit might redound unto him by her death, should be annexed with Antonius injurie. Whereby it most evidently appeared, how great and remediless damages would befall both to the Kingdome and the Kings family also; whereas nothing letted him by repulsing her unlawfull demand, to dispose all things for the present State with great discretion. By these and such like reasons and probable conjectures, they deterred and dissuaded him from adventuring upon his apparent danger, and attempting so hainous an act: so that contrariwise they induced him to offer Cleopatra many rich presents, and to conduct her onward on her way towards Egypt.

But Artaxias his elder son (who at that time had saved himself by flight) reigned in Armenia: whom Archelaus and Nero the Emperour drove out of his Kingdome, and placed his younger brother Tigranes in his room, as it shall be declared hereafter. As for the tributes of the countries which Herod was bound to pay unto Cleopatra, for the lands bestowed on her by Antonius, he without deceit justly paid them, supposing it to be very incident to his security, to continue himself in her good favour. As for the Arabians, they seeing that Herod had the levying of such a tribute, payed him for some little time two hundreth talents a yeer; but afterwards they grew slow and negligent in their payments, and scarcely satisfied the half, and that also very negligently.

CHAP. VI.

Herod maketh war with Aretas at the same time that Antonius is overthrown by Augustus Cæsar in the Actian war.

Aretas demeaning himself thus ungratefully, and refusing to doe that which in right he ought to perform; Herod made a shew to take armes against him, but deferred his revenge in regard of the contentions amongst the Romans. For at that time nought else was expected then the Actian warre (which fell in the hundreth, eighty and seventh Olympiade) in which Augustus Cæsar determined to trie his Title with Antonius for the Monarchie. In the mean while Herod, who had already for many yeers been Master of a peaceable and fruitfull Countrey, from whence he drew rich revenews and many forces, gathered divers companies of men with the greatest expedition that he might, to succour Antonius. But he by letters signified unto him, that he had no need of his assistants: notwithstanding, he commanded him to make a road upon the Arabian, whose perfidious dealing Antonius had not onely understood by Herod himself, but also by Cleopatras advertisements. For she very cunningly conceived, that it would redound unto her profit, if one of these two should overthrow the other. Herod according to these instructions from Antonius, returned back into his Countrey, and retained his Army alwayes ready about him, and incontinently with the same invaded Arabia, and with his forces both horsemen and footmen came directly to Diospolis, where the Arabians (having notice of his intended war against them) came out to meet him. In this place fought they a most cruell battell, wherein at last the Jews had the upper hand. After this, a great Army of Arabians assembled themselves at Cana, a certain place in Cœlosyria. Whereof when Herod was foreadvertised, he marched forth against them, accompanied with the greater part of his forces. As soon as he drew neer to Cana, he determined to incamp in that place, and after he had well fortified and entrenched his forces, to set on the enemy upon the first opportunitie: but whilest he imployed himself in the execution hereof, all the army of the Jews cried out, requiring him without delay, to leade them forward against the Arabians. And thus highly were they encouraged, both in respect of the confidence they had in the good administration and ordering of their army, as in regard of their forwardnesse, who had been actors in the former war, and partakers of the victory; so that they scarce gave their enemies leisure to settle themselves to their weapons. When as therefore Herod perceived that the heat and forwardnesse of the souldiers could hardly be appeased; he thought good to make use of the readinesse of his army, and arming himself, he marched formost; being seconded by his souldiers in battel array, with a souldier-like march. This sudden approach of his wonderfully abashed the Arabians: For although for a while they made head against them; yet perceiving their enemies full of heart, and themselves unable to resist them, divers of them retreated, and betook themselves to flight: so that all of them had been utterly defeated, had not Athenio endamaged Herod and the Jews. For he having the command of that army which Cleopatra had in that place; and besides that, bearing a privie grudge towards Herod, disposed his army in a readinesse, and expecting the event of the battel, resolved with himself to contain his forces if the Arabians overcame the Jews; and so if they had the worst (as indeed it came to passe) to set upon the Jews, who should be spent by that time; and surprizing them at unawares even in the height of their hope of good hap, to massacre and slaughter them with his fresh supplies. When as therefore the Jews had spent all their strength against their professed enemies, and expected nothing lesse then the assurance of the victory, he charged and overcame them who had retreated into certain rough & difficult places (whereunto their enemies were better accustomed then themselves) where being grievously wounded and ill intreated by the Arabians, who returned back and set upon them, divers of

From that time forward, Herod began to make certain incurſions and roades into Arabia, preying the countrey, and doing them much miſchief: He incamped himſelf likewiſe upon the mountains, forbearing to draw his whole forces into the field; notwithſtanding by his diligence and induſtry in travell, his labours were not fruitleſſe; but that prevailing in ſome exploits, he ſought out all means to aboliſh and put away

Of the Earthquake that hapned in Iewry.

AT ſuch time as Cæſar and Antony made triall of their titles in the Actian warre, and in the ſeventh yeer of the reign of King Herod, there hapned ſuch an earthquake in the countrey of Judæa, that never the like was ſeen in any other place: ſo that divers beaſts were ſlain thereby, and many men were overwhelmed with the ruines of their
C houſes, and periſhed to the number of ten thouſand. Onely the men of warre received no damage, becauſe they encamped in the open field. The Arabians hearing tidings hereof (which were farre greater by report, then they were in effect, by ſuch, who in favour of the Arabians, and hate of the Jews, reported the ſame) waxed proud: yea, ſo much was their courage increaſed hereof, as if all the Cities of Jewry had been already overthrown, and the men thereof extinguiſhed; and as if they had no adverſaries remaining alive to contradict them. For which cauſe laying hold of thoſe Embaſſadours of the Jews, who came unto them to intreat of peace in their deſperate eſtates, they ſlew them, and afterwards in the heat of their ſpleen, ſet upon their enemies campe. But the Jews not daring to expect or prevent their aſſault, for their preſent miſeries had dejected their mindes, ſeemed to neglect their Com-
D mon-weale, and in manner to deſpaire of their ſafety. Theſe thus affected did the King encourage, and called unto him their Captains, and (as much as in him lay) awaking and reviving their drooping ſpirits; and when he had reſtored thoſe of better hope, to more ſucceſſefull good hap, at length he attempted to ſpeak unto all the armie, who in the former overthrows, would yeeld no reſpect or allowance to perſwaſion. Theſe did he both comfort and exhort in ſuch manner, as followeth.

Besides, after she had wrought him by her sollicitation to cut off certain portions of the two Kingdomes to be given unto her, the matter was so handled by me, that by divers presents particularly bestowed upon him by my hands, I have obtained security for us both, and by disbursing two hundreth talents of mine own, and giving my word for two hundred more for others, for the revenewes of that very land which in times past was ours, and these now possesse and enjoy. Notwithstanding, reason it were in my opinion, that we that are Jews should not be tributaries, or give any portion of our countrey to any man; and if we must needs do it, it ill becometh us to pay it for these, who enjoy their lives by our means. It should not be reasonable for the Arabians, who after they had confessed with many plausible protestations and thanksgivings, that H they enjoy their libertie by our benefit, to have deprived and thrust us from our own, and to have unjustly dealt with us; yea even with us, I say, who were not their enemies, but rather on the contrary side their chiefest friends in the time of peace. And if fidelity should be respected even amongst those that are our most hated enemies, much more necessarily ought it to be observed by those that are friends. But these men set light thereby, who think nothing honest, but that which is annexed with lucre; and think no wrong unexcusable, ner impunitie injury, that hath but a shew of profit. Is there any question then, whether we should chastise these unjust men by a just warre? sith both God commandeth no lesse, and enjoyneth us alwayes to hate outrage, and revenge injustice, especially in that warre, which is not onely just, I but necessary? For that which both in the confession of the Grecians, and opinion of the Barbarians is most hatefull and hainous, this have they perpetrated in murthering our Embassadours.

For the Greeks say, that Embassadours are sacred and inviolable, and we our selves have received our wholsome and holiest precepts of the Law of God by Angels, that is, from his Heraulds and messengers: for this name can both bring God to mans knowledge, and reconcile enemy to enemy.

What impietie therefore is more unpardonable, then to put those Embassadours to death, who bring tidings of right and justice? or what prosperitie can they expect either in their warres or felicitie in their whole lives, after so hainous a crime? Truely I cannot imagine any:

With whomsoever justice is, there is God also.

But perhaps some man will say, that right and equitie is on our side; but that the greater number of men and meanes are with them: but this their speech is unworthy of my followers. K For with those, with whom justice is, with those also is God; and where God is, there neither wanteth multitude nor fortitude. But let us wade further, and weigh our own forces by themselves. In the first battell we had the victory: in the second, upon the first charge we put them to flight, and found them unable to make their partie good against us. Afterwards, when the victory was ours, behold, Athenio, not by lawfull warre, but by subtill treacherie assaulted us. But shall this be called their fortitude, or rather their fraud and second iniquitie? why therefore should we have lesse courage, who ought to have the greater confidence? or why should we fear them, who are alwaies inferiours, if they fight openly, and without fraud; and when they seem to overcome, they do it by unjustice?

Moreover, if any man suppose them to be valiant, this should the rather incite them more and L *more unto vertue; for it is no honour for a generous and noble minde to over come his inferiour, but to have meanes and might to conquer his superiour. And if any one be terrified by our domestick and homebred miseries, and by our late earthquake, first of all let him think with himself, that he erreth in that which deceiveth the Arabians, by supposing the same to be more grievous and terrible then indeed it was. And afterwards let him think, that it becometh them not to draw matter of fear from thence, whence the other took occasion of courage. For as touching themselves, they conceive not any hope thorow any good that is in themselves, but onely in the trust they have that we are already dejected by our calamities. But when they shall see us march forth against them, their courage will be weakned, and our confidence by this meanes shall be awakened, for that we are not at this time to encounter with desperate men: For neither are we over-*M much afflicted; neither (as some think) hath this miserie befallen us thorow Gods displeasure, but these are the casualties of fortune. And if by the will of God these things are come to passe, it is marvell if by the same will our calamitie cease not; and that our punishment should not satisfie his displeasure. But that this present warre is approved by him for just, he himself hath evidently declared. For whereas divers thorow the whole region, have been oppressed by the earthquake, none of you that bear armes have incurred any mischief; but all of you have been preserved, which is a manifest token of the of the will of God; and if your children and wives had generally followed the warres as you do, none of you should have been wanting. When as therefore you shall have bethought

A bethought your ſelves of theſe things, and moreover in regard that God hath at all times an eſpeciall care over you, fail not to purſue this injurious Nation with a juſt warre that neither reſpecteth the laws of friendſhip, nor keepeth the league of covenant; valiant in murthering ſacred Embaſſadours and abject and villanous, where things are to be attempted by valour. The yeare of the world, 3935. before Chriſts nativitie, 29.

Theſe perſwaſions of his did not a little encourage the Jews to the battell, and made them more forward then before. As for Herod, after he had offered ſacrifice, according to the cuſtome, he drew his army forth, and led them with great confidence againſt the Arabians, and paſſing Jordan, he encamped neer unto the enemy, with an intent to ſurpriſe a fort ſcituate between them both: making this account that it would further him much, either if upon the preſent he ſhould be drawn forth to fight, or if it concerned him to march onward, for that this place ſhould ſerve him to encamp in with more ſecuritie. The ſame reſolution alſo
B had the Arabians, for which cauſe they fell to skirmiſh in that place, wherein the firſt on both ſides that gave the charge, and afterwards ſome other followers were ſlain: ſo that thoſe of the Arabians ſide being overcome, betook them to retreat. This ſucceſſe of theirs bred no little hope in the Jewes, who ſeeing the enemies army addreſſed to attempt any thing rather then to fight, waxed the more hardy to aſſail the Arabian in his trenches, and beat him from his camp. They being forced by theſe aſſaults, drew forward to their defence in great diſorder, bringing neither courage nor hope of victory with them: yet notwithſtanding they defended themſelves, both in regard of their great number, as alſo in reſpect of that neceſſity whereunto they were inforced by the Jews. The skirmiſh on both ſides was hot, and
C divers on either party were put to the ſword: but in the end, the Arabians being put to the worſt, turned their backs. The ſlaughter was ſo great, that they not onely periſhed by their enemies ſwords, but they themſelves alſo murthered one another in the preſſe, and diſorderly flight, in which they were trodden under foot, and lay ſlaughtered in a manner by their own weapons. So that in that diſcomfiture there died ſome five thouſand: the reſt haſtily fled on the other ſide of the rampire: but being overpreſſed with want of victuals, and in eſpeciall with lack of water, they had not any ground or aſſurance to eſcape. After them poſted the Jews, and being unable to recover the fortreſſe with them, they begirt the camp with a ſiege, and ſhut up all the paſſages that no ſuccour could come unto them, and took from them all op-
D portunitie to eſcape, although they ſhould affect flight.

The Arabians are overcome by Herod.

When as therefore they ſaw themſelves reduced into ſuch extremity, they ſent Embaſſadours unto Herod, firſt of all to demand a truce: and afterwards for that they were oppreſſed with thirſt, to crave ſome remedie for their preſent neceſſities. But he neither reſpected the Embaſſadors, neither the proffered ranſome for the captives, nor any other whatſoever reaſonable demand, deſiring earneſtly to revenge himſelf of thoſe injurious treacheries they had practiſed againſt his Embaſſadors. Being therefore inforced by thirſt (which amongſt other plagues moſt grievouſly afflicted them) many of them forſook their trenches, and offered themſelves to bonds and to be led away captives; ſo that within five dayes ſpace four thouſand of them yeelded themſelves priſoners. On the ſixth day, all the reſt determined to E ſally out, and aſſail the enemy; rather making choice of aſſured death, then thus lingeringly and ignominiouſly to pine away. When as therefore they had all concluded hereupon, they incontinently brake out of their trenches, but like unapt ſouldiers for a skirmiſh, decayed not onely in body, but in minde; reputing their death for advantage, to eſcape thereby their extream misfortunes. For which cauſe upon the firſt onſet, about ſome ſeven thouſand of them were ſlain: and thus the fierceneſſe of this Nation being allayed by this overthrow, they ſubmitted themſelves to Herod, whom to their own ſorrow they had approved to be a valiant ſouldier.

The Arabians enforced by thirſt, require truce at Herods hands.

Herod conſtrained to repair unto Auguſtus Cæſar, putteth Hircanus to death.

HErod puffed up with his ſucceſſefull good fortune, returned back into his own countrey, having obtained great eſtimation and reputation by his valour and vertue. But at ſuch time as he ſuppoſed his ſtate to be moſt aſſured, he grew in danger both to loſe his dignity and life, by reaſon of that victory that Cæſar obtained againſt Antony in the Actian warre. For at that time he not onely ſuppoſed himſelf to be utterly overthrown, but both his friends and enemies that were round about about him loſt their hopes, for that it was unlikely that he ſhould eſcape unpuniſhed, who had been ſo inwardly united in friendſhip with Antony. Whereby it came to paſſe, that his friends in no ſort concealing their deſpair, and his enemies under their colourable and diſſembled griefs, covered their joy, promiſing themſelves thereafter a better and more pleaſing adminiſtration of the common-weal. Hereupon Herod perceiving, that except Hircanus, there was not any one of the blood royall alive, determined to cut him off, reſolving with himſelf, that if he hapned to eſcape the danger, that a man who at that time was more worthier the Kingdome then himſelf, ſhould not entermeddle amongſt his affairs: and if any misfortune ſhould behold him in regard of Cæſar, he deſired to diſpoſſeſſe Hircanus of the Kingdome, in regard of the envy which he bare him, for that he was the onely man who deſerved to be advanced to that dignitie. Whileſt thus he was tormented and travelled in his thoughts, he had an occaſion offered him by Hircanus own followers to execute his intention. For Hircanus being of a milde and gentle nature, during all his life-time forbare to entermeddle with ſtate affairs, committing all things to fortune, and contenting himſelf with whatſoever condition it pleaſed her to allot him.

The year of the world, 3935. before Chriſts nativity, 29.

Herod determineth to make away Hircanus.

Alexandra ſolliciteth Hircanus her father to require aſſiſtance at Malchus hands.

But Alexandra being an ambitious woman, and unable to conceal with modeſtie the hope ſhe conceived of change, ſollicited her father that he ſhould not any longer endure the ſubjection of Herod, who was the very ſcourge of their familie, but rather that he ſhould ſtand upon his own guard, and reſerve himſelf to his better hoped fortunes. She furthermore gave him counſell to write unto Malchus, who had the government of Arabia, requeſting him to grant him both protection and entertainment; for that if Herod ſhould chance to be cut off by Cæſars diſpleaſure, doubtleſſe the Kingdome would return unto him, both in regard of his nobilitie, as alſo of the peoples favour. Theſe perſwaſions of hers Hircanus at the firſt repulſed, but afterwards being overcome by the importunitie of the woman, who ceaſed not day and night to ſing the ſame ſong of future hope, and of Herods treaſons, he gave certain letters to a friend of his, written to the Arabian, wherein he required him to ſend him certain horſemen, who might conduct him to the Aſphaltite lake, which lieth diſtant from the confines of Jeruſalem ſome three hundreth furlongs. And therefore eſpecially committed he theſe letters to Doſithæus truſt, both for that he favoured Hircanus and his daughter, and ſeemed likely for divers cauſes to hate Herod: for he was Iosephs kinſman, who was ſlain by Herod; and not long before, certain of his brothers were ſlain amongſt others at Tyre by Antonies command: yet for none of theſe occaſions continued he faithfull to Hircanus. For he ſetting more by the preſent favour of the King that then reigned, then the reſt, diſcovered the letter unto the King: who firſt of all giviug him thanks, required one office of friendſhip more at his hands, which was, that folding up the letter, and ſealing it, he ſhould conveigh and deliver the ſame to Malchus, and return his anſwer, for that it meerly concerned him, if he knew his reſolution alſo. Which when Doſithæus had diligently performed, the Arabian returned this anſwer, that he was ready to entertain both himſelf and his whole family, and all thoſe Jews likewiſe which were of his faction, promiſing to ſend him a band of ſouldiers, who ſhould be able to conduct him ſafely thither, and ſhould be obedient to his command in all things. Now as ſoon as Herod was ſeized of theſe letters, he called for Hircanus, and demanded of him whether he had any confederacie with Malchus: who denied the ſame. But Herod proteſting and bringing forth his letter in an open aſſembly, commanded him afterwards to be put to death. Thus are theſe matters regiſtred in Herods commentaries: for by ſome are they delivered otherwiſe, namely, that he was executed, not for this crime which he had committed, but for ſome treaſons againſt the King. For they write to this effect, that Herod at a certain banquet (diſſembling his ſuſpition) demanded of Hircanus, whether he had received any letters from Malchus: and that he anſwered, that he had received letters, but ſuch as contained nothing elſe but officious ſalutations. Further, that another asked him, whether he had received any preſent therewithall: and when he had anſwered, that he had received nothing but four courſers for his ſaddle: the King wreſted this to a capitall offence of corruption and treaſon, and commanded him preſently to be led to death. Now that he died guiltleſſe, they alledge this for a moſt approved argument; namely, his gentle diſpoſition, who even in his youthfull yeers never gave ſigne or appearance of raſhneſſe, or pride, or ſignification of audaciouſneſſe, no not even then when he had the royall government in his hands, but in that freedome of authoritie, diſpoſed the moſt things by Antipaters advice. But at that time he was more then fourſcore yeers old, and knew that Herods eſtate was ſecured: and paſſing Euphrates alſo, and living on the other ſide of the river, he left ſuch as held him in great honour, & returned home into his own countrey, to the end he might live under Herods government. Whereby it is leſſe likely, that he would attempt any alteration, so farre different from his nature; so that all these things seem to be fained by Herod.

A Thus ended Hircanus life, after his variable and adverse fortunes, wherewith during all his life time he was afflicted. For at such time as his mother Alexandra lived, he was created high Priest of the Jews, and obtained that honour for the space of nine yeers: and after his mothers death, he had scarcely governed the Kingdome for the space of three moneths, but that he was expulsed by his brother Aristobulus; and afterwards restored by Pompeys assistance, and receiving all his former honours, he lived in full possession of them for the space of fourty yeers. After this he was once more distasted by Antigonus; and being maimed in his body, lived certain yeers in captivitie among the Parthians: from whence not long after he returned home; and though he had many things promised him by Herod, yet after so many alterations of fortune, he obtained nothing at his hands, and that which amongst all the rest

B is most of all to be lamented, as we have said, he was unjustly put to death, an innocent, and in his old age. For he was a lover of justice, and an observer of perpetuall modestie, and governed his Kingdome for the most part by other mens direction, being onely guiltie in himself of ignorance and the love of idleneſſe. Truly, Antipater and Herod by this mans goodneſſe obtained their so great riches: for which deserts of his, against all law and right, he was cruelly put to death.

But Herod after Hircanus death, addressed himself to performe his journey towards Cæsar: and having little hope of any good fortune, in regard of his friendship with Antonius, he grew desperately jealous of Alexandra, for fear lest she taking opportunitie of the time, should

C incite the people to rebell, and fill the Kingdome with domesticall sedition: for which cause, committing the government or the estate to his brother Pheroras, he left his mother Cypros, his sister, and all his Kindred in the castle of Massada, and commanded his brother, that if any misfortune should befall him, he should retain the Kingdome in his own hands and maintain it. As for his wife Mariamne, for that by reason of certain dislikes betwixt her, his mother, and sister, they might not live together, he left her with her mother in the castle of Alexandrion, and committed them to the custody of his Treasurer Ioseph, and Sohemus the Iturian, and with her the keeping of his Castles, both which had alwayes been his faithfull friends, and to whom in way of honour, he committed the custodie of these princely Ladies. But he gave them also this commandment, that if they should be certi-

D fied that any sinister mishap had befallen him, they should presently kill them both, and to the utmost of their power, continue the Kingdome in his children, and his brother Pheroras.

CHAP. X.

E After he had in this sort given order for all his affairs, he withdrew himself unto Rhodes, intending there to meet with Cæsar. And as soon as he arrived in that City, he took the Diadem from his head, and laid it apart, but as for his other princely ornaments, he changed them in no sort; and being admitted to Cæsars presence, he at that time gave a more ample testimony of the greatneſſe of his magnanimity and courage: for neither addressed he his speech to intreat his favour (according to the custome of suppliants) neither presented he any request, as if he had in any sort offended him, but gave account of all that which he had done, without concealing or mistrusting any thing.

Herod cometh to Cæsar, and declareth unto him what pleasures he had done Antony promising him no lesse duty and love, if so be he might be received into his favour.

F For he freely confessed before Cæsar, that he had intirely loved Antonius, and that to the utmost of his power he had done him service, to the end that he might obtain the soveraignty and monarchy, not by annexing his forces unto his, in that he was otherwise imployed in the Arabian warre, but in furnishing him both with wheat and money, and that this was the least office which it behoved him to perform towards Antonius; for that being once his professed friend, it behoved him not onely to imploy his best endeavours on his so princely benefactor, but also to hazard both his head and happinesse to deliver him from perils. All which (said he) I have not performed according as I ought to have done; yet notwithstanding I know, that at such time as he was overcome in the Actian battell, I did not alter my affection with his fortune: neither did I restrain my self; for although I befriended not Antonius with my presence and assistance in the Actian warre, yet at leastwise I assisted him with my counsell, certifying him that he had but one onely means left him for his security, and prevention of his utter ruine, which was, to put Cleopatra to death, for that by cutting her off, he might enjoy her eſtate, and might more eaſily obtain his peace, and G pacifie thy diſpleaſure againſt him. And for that he gave but ſlender regard to theſe mine admonitions by his own ſottiſhneſſe and indiſcretion, he hath hurt himſelf and profited you, becauſe, as I ſaid, he did not follow my counſell. Now therefore (O Cæſar*) in regard of the hate which you bear* unto Antony*, you condemne my friendſhip alſo. I will not deny that which I have done; neither am* I afraid freely and publikely to proteſt how much I have loved him: but if without regard of per-ſons, you conſider how kindly I am affected towards my benefactors, and how reſolute and conſtant a friend I am, and how mindfull of kindneſſe, the effect of that which I have done, may make me known unto thee. For if the name be onely changed, the friendſhip notwithſtanding may remain, and deſerve a due praiſe.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. Cæſar confirmeth Herods authority.

By theſe words (which were manifeſt teſtimonies of his reſolute and noble courage) he ſo H inwardly indeared himſelf unto Cæſar, who was a magnificent and worthy Monarch, that he converted this his accuſation into an occaſion to winne and work him to be his friend: for which cauſe Cæſar, ſetting the Diademe upon his head, exhorted him that he ſhould no leſſe reſpect his friendſhip, then he had in former time Antonies: and withall did him much honour; certifying him moreover, that Capidius had written unto him, how much Herod had aſſiſted him in his warres that he had with the Monarchs of Syria. Herod ſeeing that he was thus entertained, and that contrary to his expectation, the Kingdome was more ſurely confirmed unto him, then beforetime, both by Cæſars bounty, and alſo by the decree of the Senate, which he had practiſed to obtain for his greater aſſurance, accompanied Cæſar as farre I as Ægypt, preſenting both himſelf and his friends with many rich gifts, beyond the proportion of his eſtate: endeavouring by theſe means both to winne their favours, and to ſhew alſo the greatneſſe of his courage; requiring moreover at Cæſars hands, that Alexander, who was one of Antonies deareſt friends, might not be ſought out to be puniſhed: yet notwithſtanding he could not obtain the ſame, by reaſon of an oath that Cæſar had paſt before he ſollicited him. That done, he returned back again into Jewry, with more greater honour and aſſurance, then before; whereby he ſtrook them with wonderfull amazement, who expected his contrary ſucceſſe, as if by Gods eſpeciall providence he alwayes over-went his dangers, to his great honour. Incontinently therefore, he prepared himſelf to entertain Cæſar, who returned out of Syria to take his journey into Ægypt, and received him at Ptole- K mais, with all royall honour, and gave his army preſents with all abundance of munition: ſo that he was accounted for one of Cæſars moſt affectionate friends, and rode about with him, at ſuch time as he took the view of his army: he entertained him alſo and his friends with one hundred and fifty men, adorned with moſt rich and ſumptuous apparrell. And for that they were to paſſe thorow a countrey, wherein there was great ſcarcity of water, he furniſhed them both with water and wine; ſo that they needed neither of them. He gave Cæſar alſo eight hundreth talents, and ſo royally ſatisfied he all men, that they confeſſed themſelves to have had farre greater entertainment, then the revenews and profits of his Kingdome could affoord them. By which means he gave the more ample teſtimonie of his forward friendſhip, and free affection to deſerve well: and making uſe of the opportunitie of the time, he obtained the reputation of a Prince of an heroick and noble ſpirit; ſo that he was held inferior unto no man, for the good entertainment that he gave to the chiefeſt Romans in their L return out of Ægypt.

Herod entertaineth both Cæſar and his army very heroically.

Herod giveth Cæſar eight hundreth talents.

CHAP. IX.

Herod being incenſed by falſe accuſations, putteth his wife Mariamme to death.

Mariamme & Alexandra diſpleaſed with Herod.

BUt as ſoon as he he returned into his Kingdome, he found all his houſhold troubled, and both his wife Mariamme and her mother Alexandra grievouſly diſpleaſed with him. For they ſuppoſed (and not without cauſe) that they were not ſhut M up in that Caſtle for their ſecurities ſake, but as it were in a priſon; ſo that, in as much as they neither might make uſe of other mens, nor enjoy their own goods, they were highly diſcontented. Mariamme alſo ſuppoſed that her husband did but diſſemble his love, rather for his own profit and commodity, then for any intire affection he bare towards her. But nothing more grieved her, then that ſhe had not any hope to live after him, if ſo be he ſhould happen to die, eſpecially for the order he had left concerning her: neither could ſhe ever forget what commandment before that time he had left with Ioſeph; ſo that by all means poſſible, ſhe laboured to win the affections of thoſe that had the charge of her, and

especially Sohemus, knowing very well that her safety depended wholly on his hands. Who in the beginning behaved himself very wisely and faithfully, containing himself very circumspectly within the bounds of his commission; but after these Ladies had with pretty presents and feminine flatteries mollified and wrought him by little and little, at last he blabbed out all that which the King had commanded him; especially, for that he hoped not that he should return with the same power and authority, which before he had: and for that cause he thought thus in himself, that without incurring any danger in regard of Herod, he might greatly gratifie the Ladies; who in all likelihood should not be deprived of that dignity wherein they were at that time; but would return them the like kindnesse when Mariamme should be Queen, or next unto the King. Furthermore, he hoped, that if Herod also should return with all things answerable to his desires, that he would perform nothing without his wifes consent; or upbraid him with the act, if she contradicted: for he knew too well that the King loved her in such sort, as it was impossible to equal or expresse his affections; and for these causes he disclosed the trust that was committed unto him. But Mariamme was very sore displeased to hear that there was no end of her miseries, but they were altogether united and tied to the dangers of Herod; and she oftentimes wished that he might never more return again in safety, supposing that her life with him should be very intolerable: all which she afterwards dissembled not, but openly confessed that which afflicted her with discontent. For when as Herod beyond all expectation arrived in his countrey, being adorned with mighty fortune, he first of all, as it became him, certified his wife of his good tidings and happy successe, whom onely amongst all other his friends and wives, he embraced and saluted, for the pleasing conversation and affection that was in her. But she, whilest he repeated unto her these fortunate events of his affairs, rather entertained the same with a displeasant attention, then applauding joy: and these affections of hers likewise she could not conceale. For at such time as he folded his armes about her neck, she unfolded her sorrow in her sighes; so simple and unfeigned were her affections; and seemed rather to be displeased then appeased by his narrations. Whereupon Herod was sore troubled, perceiving these things not onely suspected, but also fully manifest: but above all things he was distracted, when he considered the incredible and apparent hatred that his wife had conceived against him, which in such sort incensed him, that he could not resist the love that had attainted him, so that he neither could continue in wrath, nor listen long to peace; and being unresolved in himself, he now was attempted by this; straight distracted by a contrary affection: so much was his mind travelled between love and hatred, that when as oftentimes he desired to punish the womans pride, his heart by loves mediation failed him in the enterprize. For nothing did more torment him then this fear, lest executing his displeasure against her, he should by this means more grievously wound himself, through the desire he bare unto his deceased delight. Whilest thus he was sweltered and devoured in his passions, and conceived sinister opinions against Mariamme his wife; Salome his sister; and his mother having an inkling of his discontents, thought that they had gotten a fit opportunity to expresse and execute their hatred towards Mariamme: for which cause they conferred with Herod, and whetted his spleen and displeasure with variety of slanders, sufficient at one assault to engender hatred, and kindle his jealousie against her. To these reproaches of theirs, he lent no unwilling ears; yet had he not the heart to attempt any thing against his wife, or to give free credit to their report; notwithstanding his displeasure increased and was inflamed more and more against her, for that neither she could colour her cares and discontents, nor he contain himself from exchanging his love into hatred: and perhaps at that time he had published some fatal doom against her, had not a happy messenger brought him word, that Anthony and Cleopatra being dead, Cæsar was become Lord of Egypt: for which cause hasting forward to meet and entertain him, he left his family in that present estate. Upon his departure, he recommended Mariamme to Sohemus, giving him great thanks for the care he had had of her, and granted him in way of gratuity a part of Jewry to govern.

When Herod was arrived in Egypt, and had friendly and familiarly conferred with Cæsar, he was highly honoured by him: for Cæsar gave him those four hundreth Frenchmen that were of Cleopatra's guard; and restored that part of his Countrey unto him again, which was taken away and spoiled by her. He annexed also unto his kingdome Gadara, Hippon, and Samaria, and on the Sea costs the Cities of Gaza, Anthedon, Joppe, with the tower of Straton: which when he had obtained, he grew more mighty then before: and after he had accompanied Cæsar as farre as Antioch, he returned into his own countrey. Upon his arrival, he found that fortune which was favourable unto him abroad, too froward at home, especially in regard of his wife, in whose affection beforetime he seemed to be most happy.

For he was as inwardly touched with the lawfull love of Mariamme, as any other of whom the Hiſtories make report; and as touching her, ſhe was both chaſte and faithful unto him; yet had ſhe a certain womanly imperfection and natural frowardneſſe, which was the cauſe that ſhe preſumed too much upon the intire affection wherewith her husband was intangled; ſo that without regard of his perſon, who had power and authority over others, ſhe entertained him oftentimes very outragiouſly: All which he endured patiently, without any ſhew of diſcontent. But Mariamme upbraided and publickly reproached both the Kings mother and ſiſter, telling them that they were but abjectly and baſely born. G

Whereupon there grew a great enmity and unrecoverable hatred between the Ladies; and from thence alſo there aroſe an occaſion of greater accuſations and calumniation then before. Theſe ſuſpitions were nouriſhed amongſt them, for the ſpace of one whole year after Herods return from Cæſar; and finally this long contrived and fore-imagined hatred at laſt brake out violently upon this occaſion that enſueth: When as about mid-day the King had withdrawn himſelf into his chamber to take his reſt, he called Mariamme unto him to ſport with her, being incited thereunto by the great affection that he bare unto her. Upon this his command ſhe came in unto him; yet would ſhe not lie with him, nor entertain his courtings with friendly acceptance, but upbraided him bitterly with her fathers and brothers death. The King took theſe reproachfull words in very evil part, and was almoſt ready to ſtrike her: but his ſiſter hearing a greater ſtir and noiſe within then was uſual, ſent in the Butler, who long before that time was ſuborned by her, whom ſhe commanded to tell the King, that Mariamme had prepared a drink for him to incite and quicken him unto love; willing him that if the King ſhould be moved thereat, and ſhould demand what he meant, he ſhould certifie him, that Mariamme having prepar'd a poyſon for his grace, had dealt with him to deliver it to his Majeſty. Charging him moreover, that if the King in hearing him ſpeak of this potion, ſhould ſeem to be moved therewith, that then he ſhould proceed no further in his diſcourſe. He therefore (being in this manner before-hand inſtructed what he ought to do) at that very inſtant was ſent to diſcover his treachery unto the King; for which cauſe with a ſober and ſtayed countenance he entred in unto him, being ſeriouſly and well prepared to diſcourſe, and told him that Mariamme had bribed him to preſent his Majeſty with an amorous cup of drink. Now when he perceived that the King was troubled with theſe words, he proſecuted his diſcourſe, alleadging that the potion was a certain medicine which Mariamme had given him, the vertue whereof he knew not, which he had received according as he had told him, knowing that it concerned both his own ſecurity, and the Kings ſafety. H I K

Herod, who before this was highly diſpleaſed, hearing theſe words, was ſo much the more incenſed: for which cauſe he preſently commanded Mariammes moſt faithfull ſervant to be examined by torments, as concerning the poiſon, ſuppoſing that it was impoſſible for her to undertake any thing whatſoever, without his privity. He being tried and tormented after this cruel manner, confeſſed nothing of that for which he was tortured; but declared unto the King, that the hatred which his wife had conceived againſt him, proceeded from certain words that Sohemus had told her. Scarcely had he finiſhed theſe words, but that the King cryed out with a loud voice, ſaying, that Sohemus, who before time had been moſt faithful both to him and his kingdome, would not have declared theſe his privy commands, except there had been ſome more inward familiarity and ſecrecy betwixt him and Mariamme: for which cauſe he preſently commanded his Miniſters to lay hands on Sohemus, and to put him to death. As for his wife, he drew her to her tryal, and to this effect he aſſembled his moſt familiar friends, before whom he began to accuſe her with great ſpight and ſpleen, as touching theſe potions and poyſons aforeſaid; wherein he uſed intemperate and unſeemly ſpeeches, and ſuch as for their bitterneſſe did ill become him in cauſe of juſtice; ſo that in the end, the aſſiſtants, ſeeing the butt and bent of his deſire, pronounced ſentence of death againſt her: which being paſt, both he, and all other the aſſiſtants were of this opinion, that ſhe ſhould not ſo ſpeedily be executed, but that ſhe ſhould be kept cloſe priſoner in ſome ſure place in the Palace. But by Salomes ſolicitations Herod was incited to haſten her death, for that ſhe alleadged that the King ought to fear, leſt ſome ſedition ſhould be raiſed amongſt the people, if he ſhould keep her alive in priſon. And by this means Mariamme was led unto her death. L M

Alexandra her mother conſidering the eſtate of the time, and fearing no leſſe miſchief from Herods hands, then her daughter was aſſured of; ſhe undecently changed her mind, and abjectedly laid aſide her former courage and magnanimity. For intending to make it known, that ſhe was neither party nor privy to thoſe crimes, wherewith Mariamme was charged, ſhe went out to meet her daughter, and entertained her injuriouſly, proteſting publickly

A likey that ſhee was a wicked woman, and ungratefull towards her husband; and that ſhe well deſerved the puniſhment that was adjudged her, for that ſhe durſt be ſo bold to attempt ſo hainous a fact, neglecting to requite her husbands entire love, with her unfained loyalty. Whileſt thus diſhoneſtly ſhe counterfeited her diſpleaſure, and was ready to pull Mariamme by the hair, the aſſiſtants according to her deſart, condemned her generally for her ſhamefull hypocriſie: but ſhe that was led to be puniſhed, convicted her ſelf by her milde behaviour. For firſt of all, ſhe gave her no anſwer, neither was any wayes altered by her reproaches; neither would ſo much as caſt her eye upon her; making it appear that ſhe diſcreetly concealed and covered her mothers imperfections, and was aggrieved that ſhe had ſo openly ſhewed ſo great indignity: expreſſing for her own part a conſtant behaviour,
B and going to her death without change of colour, ſo that thoſe that beheld her, perceived in her a kind of manifeſt courage and nobility, even in her utmoſt extremity. Thus dyed Mariamme, having been a woman that excelled both in continence and courage: notwithſtanding that ſhe defaulted ſome what in affability and impatience of nature: for the reſt of her parts, ſhe was an admirable and pleaſing beautie, and of ſuch a carriage in thoſe companies wherein ſhe was entertained, that it was impoſſible to expreſſe the ſame, in that ſhe ſurpaſſed all thoſe of her time; which was the principall cauſe that ſhe lived not graciouſly and contentedly with the King. For being entertained by him, who intirely loved her, and from whom ſhe received nothing that might diſcontent her, ſhe preſumed upon a great and intemperate liberty in her diſcourſe. Shee digeſted alſo the loſſe of her friends very
C hardly, according as in open tearmes ſhe made it known unto the King; whereby alſo it came to paſſe, that both Herods mother, and ſiſter, and himſelf likewiſe grew at oddes with her, and in eſpeciall her Husband, from whom onely ſhe expected no hard meaſure.

Alexandra undecently ſtriveth to acquit her ſelf of Mariammes Treaſon.

After her death the King began more powerfully to be inflamed in his affections; who beforetimes, as we have declared, was already miſerably diſtracted. For neither did he love after the common manner of married folk: but whereas almoſt even unto madneſſe he nouriſhed this his deſire, he could not be induced by the two unbridled manners of his wife to allay the heat of his affection, but that daily more and more by doting on her, he increaſed the ſame. And all that time eſpecially he ſuppoſed that God was diſpleaſed with him for the death of Mariamme his wife. Oftentimes did he invocate her name, and more often
D undecently lamented he her. And notwithſtanding he deviſed all kind of delights and ſports that might be imagined, by preparing banquets, and inviting gueſts with Princely hoſpitalitie, to paſſe away the time; yet all thoſe profited him nothing, for which cauſe he gave over the charge and adminiſtration of his kingdome. And in ſuch ſort was he overwhelmed with grief, that oftentimes he commanded his Miniſters to call his wife Mariamme, as if as yet ſhe had been alive. Whileſt thus he was affected; there befell a peſtilence within the City, that conſumed a great ſort of the people, and the better part of the nobility, and each man interpreted that this puniſhment was inflicted by God upon men, for the unjuſt death of the Queen. Thus the Kings diſcontents being by this meanes increaſed, he at laſt hid himſelf in a ſolitary wilderneſſe, under pretext of hunting; where E afflicting himſelf inceſſantly, at laſt he fell into a moſt grievous ſickneſſe. This diſeaſe of his was an inflamation or pain in the neck: he ſeemed alſo in ſome ſort to rave and wax mad; neither could any remidies relieve him of his agony: but when as the ſickneſſe ſeemed rather to increaſe, all men at laſt grew almoſt deſperate of his recovery. For which cauſe his Phyſician, partly in reſpect of the contumacy of his diſeaſe, party, becauſe in ſo great a danger there was not any free election of dyet, they gave him leave to taſte whatſoever beſt pleaſed his appetite; committing the uncertain event of his health to the hands of fortune.

Herods miſerable eſtate, and moan after the death of his wife.

A plague invadeth Jeruſalem.

Herod falleth grievouſly ſick.

Whileſt thus he ſojourned in Samaria, which now is called Sebaſte, Alexandra inhabiting at that time in Jeruſalem, having notice of this his eſtate, ſought to reduce all the ſtrong
F fortreſſes that were within the City, under her ſubjection: the one of which abutted upon the Temple; the other was ſcituate within the City: for they that are Lords of theſe, keep all the reſt of the nation under their awe; becauſe that without theſe, neither the uſual and daily ſacrifices may be performed; neither may the Jews live without ſuch ſacrifices and oblations, who had rather loſe their lives then contemn their religion. Shee therefore laboured thoſe that had the government thereof, to ſurrender them up to her and Herods children begotten of her daughter Mariamme, for fear leſt he being dead, they ſhould be ſeized by others: and if it ſhould fortune him to recover his health, in the mean while they might be kept and held by no man more ſecurely, then ſuch as were his domeſtical friends. This ſuite and ſollicitation of hers was but coldly conceited of: and the Captains who at other times shewed themselves alwaies faithful, at that time were the rather far more G constant in their duty, both for that they hated Alexandra, as also for that they thought it a great offence to despair of the health of their Prince. For these were the Kings old friends and one of them was Herods own nephew, whose name was Achiabus. For which cause they sent present messengers unto him to certifie him of Alexandras intent: who having heard these news, presently commanded her to be slain: and at length overcoming his sickness, he grew so badly affected both in body and mind, that he waxed hatefull unto all men; so that all those who offended him and for how little cause soever, were readily sought for to be punished. In this his intemperance he imbrued his hands in the blood of divers of his inward friends, as Costabarus, Lysimachus, Antipater, surnamed Gadias, and Dositheus, for this occasion that ensueth. Costabarus was an Idumæan, and one of the greatest account amongst H his countrey-men, who was descended from the Priests of Coze, whom the Idumæans esteem for a god. Now after that Hircanus had drawn the pollicy of the Idumæans to the reformed customes of the Jews, Herod was made King of the Jews, and appointed Costabarus to be Governour in Idumæa and Gaza, giving him Salome his sister to wife, after he had put Joseph to death, to whom she had been married beforetime, as we have heretofore declared. Costabarus seeing himself in this estate beyond his expectation, grew more elate and proud then his good fortune required, and in a little time forgot himself so farre, that he thought himself dishonoured, if he should perform that which Herod commanded him, and scorned that the Idumæans should be under the Jews subjection, notwithstanding they had received their manner of government from them. He therefore sent messengers unto Cleopatra, gi- I ving her to understand, that Idumæa had alwaies been under her ancestors subjection; and for that cause she ought upon just cause to demand and begge that countrey at Antonius hands, and that in respect of himself he was ready to become her servant. All which he practised not to gratifie Cleopatra in any sort whatsoever, but to the intent that if Herod fortunes should be any waies weakned, he might more easily by this means both enlarge and obtain the Kingdome of Idumæa. And with these fooliſh hopes was he transported, in regard of his birth and riches, which he had heaped together by such dishonest means as he continually practised, as he that intended no small matters. But notwithstanding Cleopatras often and earnest petition to obtain his soveraignty: yet could she not obtain it at Antonius hands. When Herod had notice of these convert and cunning practices, he was ready K to kill Costabarus. But upon the earnest supplications of his sister and her mother, he dismissed and pardoned him; yet held him alwaies in suspition, by reason of this his practice. Not long after it hapned, that Salome fell at debate with Costabarus, for which cause she sent a libel of divorce to her husband, notwithstanding it were against the laws and ordinary customes of the Jews. For according to our ordinances, it is onely lawful for the husband to do the same; and as touching the wife, notwithstanding she were separated, yet it is not lawful for her to marry again, except her husband first give her licence. But Salome without respect of the laws of the countrey, grounding her self too much upon her own authority, forsook her husband: saying, that she separated her self from her husband, by reason of the great L friendship which she bare unto her brother, for that she had received some notice that Costabarus practised some innovation with Antipater, Lysimachus ond Dositheus. And this accusation of her confirmed she by Babas children, whom he had already kept with him in all security for the space of twelve years. All which was true, and at that time beyond all mens expectation wonderfully troubled Herod, as soon as he heard it. For as touching Babas sonnes, he had heretofore resolved to cut them off, for that they had been alwayes badly affected towards him and all his enterprizes; but all that time he had let them passe, because by continuance they were grown out of his remembrance. Now the cause of this enmity and hatred which he bare towards them, was gathered from this ground; at such time M as Antigonus enjoyed the soveraignty, and Herod besieged the City of Jerusalem with an army: now those incommodities and necessities that ordinarily happen unto those that are besieged, were the cause that divers acknowledge Herod, and fixed their hopes upon him. But Babas sons being in authority, and besides that, attended by a great number of men, persevered in their faithful observation of Antigonus, and blamed Herod continually, encouraging the inhabitants to continue the kingdome in those to whom it appertained by descent: and they themselves followed that course, which in their opinion was most profitable for the Common-weal. But after that the Citie was surprized by Herod, and he grew master of the estate, Costabarus, who was appointed to keep the Citie gates, and to lie in wait that none of those who were accused to have forsaken the Kings side, should escape, knowing that the sons of Babas were greatly esteemed and honoured among the people

A people, and foreseeing that their safetie might be no small furtherance to himself, if at any time there might befortune any alteration, he discharged and hid them within his own possessions: and notwithstanding that at that time he had protested to Herod by an oath, that he knew not what was become of them; yet though suspected of perjury, he concealed them. And afterwards when the King had by Proclamation promised a reward to him that should discover them, and sought for them by all means, neither then also would he confesse the fact. For being affraid lest he should be punished for his first deniall he continued through concealment, being not onely now driven thereunto by friendship, but also by necessity.

Now when the King had notice hereof by his sisters report, he sent certain messengers
B to the place where they were hidden, and slew them, and all those that were partakers of the same crime; so that no one of Hircanus kindred was now left alive; but all of them being slain, who excelled in nobility and dignity, he did what himself listed without any contradiction or controulement: for which cause he by little and little forsook the ceremonies and ordinances of his country, and corrupted the decrees an institutions of their ancestors, which he ought to have kept inviolable, by his new and strange inventions. In whose time there was a very great change and alteration of the ancient and good manner of living; for all fell from bad to worse: and the politike order, whereby the people ought to be governed and kept within compasse of their duty, went to decay. For first of all, he ordained
C certain wrastlings from five yeers to five yeers, in honour of Cæsar; and builded a Theater for that purpose within Jerusalem. He erected also a most huge Amphitheater within the Plain, which were two piles worthy the reguard and beholding, by reason of the sumptuousnesse thereof; but wholly estranged from the fashions of the Iews. For neither the use, nor the presentation of these spectacles, hath ever been practised or taught by our ancestors: yet was it his pleasure to ennoble this assembly, to the end it might be continued from five to five yeers, and this proclaimed he publikely in the countries round about him, and to this spectacle assembled he all the nations. The wrastlers also and all that which concerned their exercise, were sought out from all corners of the world, under the hope to obtain the proposed palm and victory; and all the most excellent in those exercises that were to be found, were invited to that assembly. For he proposed most huge rewards, not
D onely to those that exercised wrastling, but also to those who are called Musicians, and to all sorts of players on instruments, labouring to his utmost power, that all the most famous in those professions should be assistant in those pastimes. He appointed also a reward of great value for such as ran upon the chariots of three, four or of one horse; and all that which was both sumptuous and magnificent to behold, for every one was most carefully provided in that he strove to have the honour of a most magnificent preparation for his games. The Theater was hung all about with Cæsars titles, and the trophees of those nations, which were overcome by him, altogether set out and shining with gold and silver. As for the instruments thereof, there wanted neither furniture, costly vestments, or precious stones. Thither also were drawn certain savage beasts, as Lions and other wild bests, which were
E worthy to be placed in this famous shew, being admirable both for their force and rarenesse of nature, who fought the one with the other, and against such men likewise who were condemned to die: whereby the strangers conceived, together with the admiration of his expence an uncomparable and unaccustomed pleasure. But his countrey-men interpreted this thing for a manifest corruption of those disciplines and manners which beforetime they had entertained, and honoured amongst them. For it was an act most manifestly impious, to hazard men against wlid beasts, to delight the eyes of other men: It was also a matter as impious, to change and prophane the ordinances of the countrey, for forrain exercises: But the most hated of all these were the Trophees: for in that they were certain images attired in armour, the use and veneration whereof were forbidden by our lawes, this displeased and grie-F ved them more then any thing whatsoever: neither was Herod ignorant of those troubles, which they procured. But he thought it to be a matter of danger to attempt the same for the present by force; and for that cause he familiarly debated the same with some few of them, and discoursed unto them his occasions, to the end to rid them of their superstition, although herein he profited nothing. For all of them with one consent, cried out against the indignity which they saw him commit: telling him that although all other things were to be tolerated; yet the Trophees, which were images of men, were unsupportable because they were unusuall in their countrey. Herod perceiving that they were discontented, and that they would not be easily wrought upon, except they had some contentment, he called the most worthiest men amongst them, and led them into the Theater, demanding of them

Notwithſtanding, there were ſome of theſe that perſiſted in the indignity they conceived in thoſe accuſtomed exerciſes, ſuppoſing that the corruption of their ancient diſcipline was an inducement to their grievous calamities; and they imagined that it rather concerned them to undertake all dangers, then to endure any alteration in their policy, by permitting that Herod ſhould introduce new and H

For this cauſe there were ten men amongſt them, who bound themſelves by oath to hazard all extremities, and to this intent they hid certain ſhort ſwords under their garments: amongſt theſe there was one that was blind, who urged and egged on by the ſtrangeneſſe of thoſe things which he had heard, not for that he was of ability to execute any thing with his hand, but to teſtifie that he was ready to ſuffer with the reſt, if any misfortune ſhould befall them, by his example the reſt of them were no a little confirmed: Theſe having mutually undertaken this their reſolution, repaired to the Theater under hope that Herod ſhould not eſcape them, for that they intended to aſſail him unawares: at leaſtwiſe if they failed of him, their hope was to fall foul on ſome of his favourites and followers, accounting this to be ſome ſolace in their expected death, if in regard of their violated reli- I

But one of thoſe intelligencers that Herod had ſent abroad to pry and ſearch into ſuch like actions, having diſcovered all this their conſpiracy, ſignified the ſame unto the King, at ſuch time as he was ready to enter into the Theater. He knowing full well what hatred was continually hatched againſt him, betook himſelf to his Palace, and ſent for the conſpirators by their names: who being apprehended in the fact, and knowing that there was no way for them to eſcape, reſolved to endure their preſent misfortunes with a valiant courage: for being no waies diſmaied, with a conſtant countenance they drew out their

Now when with great confidence they had alleadged theſe things for their juſtification they were led away by the Kings Miniſters to be ſlaughtered by divers ſorts of torments. Not long after this, that intelligencer who had betrayed them, growing hatefull in all mens eyes, was ſlain by certain men, and chopt in pieces with their ſwords, and afterwards caſt unto the dogs in ſight and preſence of many men. Yet did no man diſcover this act, untill after long and weariſome inquiſitions made by Herod, it was wrought out of certain poor women (who were privy to the fact) with divers torments. Then were all the actors of that murther L

Which when the King perceived, he reſiſted their indeavours with all diligence, leſt haply through theſe alterations in affaires, the people ſhould be drawn to an open rebellion. Whereas therefore he had two ſtrong caſtles within the City, one wherein his palace was, another called Antonia, that adjoyned neer unto the Temple, fortified by

And for the whole Nation he builded a Fort, M

He builded alſo a Fort in Galilee, which was called Gabala in a large Plain, whereby courſe he kept his horſemen. Beſides theſe, he builded the Fort of Eſthmonites in the countrey of Peræa on the other ſide Jordan.

Now when he had fitly diſpoſed all theſe Caſtles through his whole countrey, for the ſecuritie and ſafetie of his kingdome, the matter of rebellion was taken from the common people, who upon every light cauſe are ſubject to commotions, in that he had prepared a remedy againſt all privy conſpiracies, by planting ſuch forces alwayes neer at hand, who might prevent and pacifie all alterations upon their originall. He therefore changed the name thereof, and called it Sebaſte, and diſtributed the lands that confined the City among the inhabitants of the ſame (which was by nature a fruitful and goodly countrey) to the intent that within a little ſpace they might inrich themſelves. He invironed the City alſo with a ſtrong wall, being aſſiſted by the natural ſtrength and ſteepineſſe of the place: and beſides the whole circuit, he included ſo much ground, that it was no wayes inferiour to any of the famous Cities;
B for it contained the circuit of twenty furlongs or ſtadia. And in the midſt there of there was a ſacred place, containing a furlong and a half, wonderfully adorned; in which there was a Temple builded, famous both for beauty and bigneſſe. And as for the other parts of the City, he decked them with all ſorts of ornaments. And ſeeing how nearly it concerned him to provide for the ſecurity of his perſon in this walled City, he erected a Fortreſſe for himſelf. And as touching the beautie thereof, his intent was that it ſhould remain for a monument to poſterity, of his magnificence and liberality.

CHAP. XII.

A famine invaded the land of Judæa.

C THat very year, which was the thirteenth year of Herods raign, very great calamities hapned in that countrey) either through Gods diſpleaſure, or for that the revolution of time would have it ſo.) For firſt of all, there were ſuch continual droughts, that by reaſon thereof the earth grew barren, and produced not thoſe fruits, which of it ſelf it was accuſtomed to bear. And after this, the ordinary courſe of mens dyets being altered by reaſon of the want of corn, the want of ſuſtenance was accompanied with a bodily ſickneſſe (for that by cuſtome theſe two plagues do ordinarily entertain one another:) For this made the plague and ſickneſſe more vehement, for that
D the ſick in this great penury, could neither have care of themſelves as was expedient, nor get convenient nouriſhment for preſervation of life: And many died daily; and thoſe alſo that remained alive were in deſpair, becauſe they could not relieve their want and neceſſities, what diligence ſoever they uſed. For which cauſe, after the old fruits of that year were wholly conſumed, and all the reſt of their ſtore was utterly ſpent, there appeared not any means whereupon they might hope; namely, for that the miſery increaſed more then was expected; yea and extended it ſelf beyond that year: ſo that they had nothing remaining by them, and the ſeeds they ſowed at that time mouldred away, and the earth for all their labours afforded them to intereſt. The neceſſitie therefore being thus great, conſtrained men to ſearch out many new inventions to maintain their life: and the King likewiſe was in no leſſe perplexity, in that he was deprived of thoſe ordinary revenues which he re-
E ceived by the fruits of the earth; and the rather, for that he had ſpent his money in repairing his Cities, according as before this we have declared: and in ſuch ſort were all things waſted by divers calamities, that a man could conceive no hope of remedy. Beſides this, the people grew in hatred of their King, for that it is their cuſtome ordinarily to accuſe their Governors, as if they were the authors of all their evils. Yet did the King bethink himſelf how he might remedy theſe inconveniences, but hardly could he find the means, for that their neighbors had no means to ſell them victuals, becauſe they were no leſſe afflicted then themſelves: & although he might have recovered ſome little means for a great ſum of money, yet wanted he it alſo to defray the charges: notwithſtanding in that he knew, that it behooved
F him to imply his uttermoſt indeavours in yeelding a general remedy to ſuch and ſo violent an oppreſſion, he melted down all thoſe movables he had either of gold or ſilver within his Palace, & ſpared nothing either for the matter, the excellency, or the faſhion; no not ſo much as the veſſels wherein he was ordinarily ſerved. This money ſent he into Egypt, where at that time under Cæſar, Petronius held the government. This man being Herods friend, in that he deſired the ſafety of his ſubjects, at ſuch time as divers of them retired themſelves unto him, by reaſon of that their neceſſitie, he permitted them to buy up corn; and aſſiſted them in all things, both in their bargains, and in their carriages; ſo that the greater or the whole ſum of their ſuccours was attributed to him. But after their return, Herod wrought ſo much, that the care that was taken by him, did not onely change the affections of thoſe, which beforetime were his enemies, but beſides all this, he purchaſed great praiſe and commendation for his liberalitie and ſingular providence. For firſt of all he diſtributed a certaine quantitie of of corn to all those, who were not able of themselves to supply their own wants, using herein both great care and diligence. After this, for that there were a great number of such, who in regard of their age, or some other infirmity, were unable to prepare their victuals, he took order for their relief, and appointed them certain Bakers, who should furnish them with bread, both sufficient and meet for their sustenance. He gave order also, that they should not passe the winter disfurnished of cloathing, but provided for such as were naked sufficient raiment, considering that the sheep were partly dead, and partly devoured, and that there was no wool to set them awork, or other stuffe to make garments of. Now after he had furnished his subjects with these things, he thought good also to shew kindnesse to the neighbouring cities, and stored the Syrians with seed-corne to sowe their lands; which yeelded him no little profit: for the earth incontinently gave him a large and plentiful tribute for that she had received: so that all of them had abundance of victuals; and as soon as the harvest was ready, he sent fifty thousand men into that countrey which he had relieved: and by this means he with all diligence restored his afflicted Kingdome, and comforted his neighbours, who were oppressed with the like calamity. For there was not any man in necessity, that according to his quality was not assisted and succoured. G H

The villages likewise and the cities, and those of the common sort who entertained great households, and were in want, having their recourse unto him, received that which they had need of; so that to reckon up all the corn which he gave unto those, who were not his subjects, it appeareth that he employed ten thousand Cores of wheat: now the Core containeth ten Athenian bushes: and within the compasse of his Realme he imployed eighty thousand: which care of his, and discreetly imployed favour, wrought so much in the hearts of the Jews, and was so highly renowned amongst other nations, that the ancient hatred which they had conceived against him, for that he had altered certain customes of their Kingdome, was wholly forgotten, and he was supposed by them to have made a sufficient recompence, by the diligence he had shewed in assisting them in their necessities; and no lesse either grace or glory obtained he among strangers: so that by these miseries the Kings honour was not a little magnified, and whatsoever damage he received at home, so much honour and reputation atchieved he abroad. For whereas in strangers necessities he had shewed himself so full of magnanimity, each man did not respect what he had been before, but such as they lately found him to be. I

About the same time also he sent Cæsar certain supplies, namely, five hundred chosen men of his guard, whom Ellius Gallus led into the wars in Arabia, and had often use of them in his most dangerous attempts. When as therefore his Kingdom was restored to his former felicity, he builded a royal Palace in the higher part of the city, furnished with many large buildings, and decked with gold and marble seats; so as they might receive a great number of men: he named also each room of the house according to their several names, and called one the lodging of Cæsar, and another of Agrippa. After this, being intangled with love, he married a wife, lest he should be distracted by vain desires; and the cause of this his new marriage was this: There was amongst those that dwelt in Jerusalem a certaine citizen called Simon, the son of Bœthas the Alexandrine, who was a Priest, and one of the chiefest in nobility amongst them: this man had a daughter, the faireſt and comliest creature of that age, whose beauty renowned by the common voice, it came to passe, that with her fame Herod at one time entertained a good affection towards her, and afterwards obtaining the sight of her, he grew in love with her; yet would not use his authority, lest he should seem to behave himself, tyrannically, but chose rather to accept her for his betrothed wife. Whereas therefore Simon seemed unworthy his affinite, and yet too worthy to be blasted by contempt, he made election of a convenient means to obtain the fulnesse of his desire, which was, to raise both Simon and his to higher dignities. For which cause he presently deposed the high Priest Iesus the son of Phabetes, and established Simon in his place; and that done, he contracted affinite with him. After the marriage was consummate, he builded a new castle in that place wherein he had overcome the Jews, upon the time and incontinently after the overthrow of Antigonus, and when he had taken upon him the government. Herod removeth Jesus from his Priesthood, and placeth Simon in his room, and marrieth his daughter.

This place is distant from Jerusalem some sixty furlongs or stades, strong by nature, and fit for defence and good fortification. For near unto the same there is a certain steepy hill made by Art, after the manner of a round dug, environed with round towers, with a steepy ascent of two hundred steps cut out of hewed stone. Within the same there are divers places builded with great and sumptuous workmanship, made both for defence and delight. At the foot of this hill there are two houses worthy the sight, for divers their singularities, and namely, by reason of those conduits of water, which although they spring not in that place,

A place, yet not withstanding are they brought from far with great coſt and expence. The Plaine that adjoyneth upon it, is all full of buildings after the manner of a City, and the top of the Caſtle commandeth all the Plaine. As ſoon as therefore he had diſpoſed all his affairs, according to his hearts deſire, he poſſeſſed the Kingdome in great quietneſſe, for that he made his ſubjects obedient unto him, both by fear, in ſhewing himſelf inexorable when it concerned him to puniſh; and by liberality, whereby he provided for their publike neceſſities: he therefore took an eſpecial care of himſelf, as if the life and ſafety of his perſon had been the ſecurity of his people. He behaved himſelf officiouſly and favourably towards all forraign cities; he entertained the Princes by preſents, which according to his occaſions he ſent unto them, to inſinuate himſelf into their favours, being in his own nature
B magnificent and fit to govern: ſo that all his fortunes increaſed, and all things fell out happily according to his hearts deſire. True it is, that the care which he imployed in honouring Cæſar and other mighty Magiſtrates of Rome, cauſed him to outſtrip his cuſtomes, and to falſifie divers ordinances of his countrey, in building cities, and erecting Temples in honour of them, although he builded them not in the land of Jury; for the Jewes would not have endured it, becauſe we are forbidden to honour images and figures, formed according to the likeneſſe of a man, as the Greeks are accuſtomed to do, but he did this in the countrey and forrain cities, and excuſed himſelf to the Jews; ſaying, that he did it not of his own head, but performed that according to the charge and commandment which he had from
C others, who were greater then himſelf: and in the mean-while gratified Cæſar and the Romanes, in that he reſpected their honour more then he did the ordinances of his countrey: although in all things he had reſpect to his particular advantage, and determined with himſelf to leave behind him after his death, large and ample teſtimonies of his power and greatneſſe, which was the cauſe that he builded cities with great charge and expence.

CHAP. XIII.

The building of the citie Cæſarea.

D WHen as therefore he had found out a fit and convenient place upon the Sea-coaſt, to build a city on, which of long time had been called the tower of Straton, he both magnificently deſigned and ſet down the module and forme thereof, and made many ſumptuous buildings, both of royal places, and of other private lodgings, not builded after a ſlight manner, or of weak and fading matter, but of marble-ſtone. But the greateſt and buſieſt work of all, was the haven which he made exempt and free from ſtormes and tempeſts, that in greatneſſe reſembled that of Piræus, and was ſo ſpacious, that it was able to receive many great ſhips into the road, and had divers rooms and ware-houſes to lay up the merchandize therein. And the more admirable was this
E pile, becauſe the ſtuffe that was fit to finiſh this ſo great work, was not gathered or gotten in that place, but muſt needs be brought from another place, upon great charge and expence. This city is ſeated in Phœnicia upon the coaſt, in the way to Egypt, between Joppa and Dora, certain villages ſcituate upon the Sea-coaſts, unfit either for landing or harbour, by reaſon of the Affrick wind, that driving the ſand of the Sea upon the ſhore, giveth not any quiet road unto the ſhips, but that the Merchants are enforced for a long time to ride at anchor. To correct this incommodity of the place, he made the circuit round about the port ſo ſpacious, that it was able to receive a great Fleet: and he caſt down to the bottom thereof, which was about ſome twenty fathoms deep, certain huge ſtones, that for the moſt part were fifty foot long, eight foot broad, and nine foot high, ſome more and ſome leſſe. The F pile that was erected upon this to affront the Sea, was a pane of two hundred foot, the half whereof was oppoſed againſt the waves to break the fury of the ſtream, and for this cauſe was called in the Greek tongue Procymation, that is to ſay, Before flood: The other half ſerved as a foundation to bear up a wall of ſtone fortified with divers towers, the chiefeſt whereof was a fair pile of building, which was called Druſus, in memory of Druſus, Cæſars ſon in law, who died very young: yet had alſo divers retreats or hoſtries in the ſame, into which the Mariners were received and lodged.

The deſent being hard by, incompaſſed all the port like a round plat form, that ſerved for a pleaſant walking place for whomſoever liſted. The entrance and mouth of the haven was toward the north, which is a wind that of all other moſt purifieth and cleanſeth. The ſupporter and ſtrength of all the circuit on the left hand upon the entrance to the port, was an ample & huge tower to faſten it the more ſtrongly; and on the right hand, were two huge pillers of ſtone, more higher then the tower that ſtood oppoſite againſt them, erected and faſtened together, together. All round about the haven there were certain buildings, abutting one upon another of poliſhed marble, and in the midſt there was a little hillock, on which there was a certain monument placed in honour of Cæſar, which preſented it ſelf to their ſight who ſailed to the port, in which there were the figures of the city of Rome and of Cæſar. This City alſo was called Cæſarea, as much to be wondred at for the matter whereof it was built, as for the Art whereby it was erected: and no leſſe cunning was there ſhewed in the vaults and conduits under ground, then in thoſe buildings that were about them: ſome of them were conveyed toward the port, and diſcharged themſelves into the ſea by certain compaſſed ſpaces: but there was one that went athwarts, that comprehended all the reſt, to the end that thereby the rain-water, and the cleanſings of the City might be conveyed into the ſea, and that when the ſea ſhould flow, it might waſh and cleanſe all the City. G

The Theater and Amphitheater.

He erected alſo a Theater of ſtone, and behind the ſame to the Southward, and Amphitheater, that was able to receive a great number of men, and ſo pleaſantly and fitly ſcituated, that from the ſame a man might diſcover the ſea. This City was finiſhed at the end of twelve years, during which time, the King was neither wearied by intending the work, nor negligent in furniſhing the neceſſary charges. After this, perceiving that the City of Sebaſta was already inhabited alſo, he reſolved to ſend his two ſons Alexander and Ariſtobulus to Rome, to preſent them unto the Emperour Cæſar, who no ſooner reſorted thither, but they were lodged in Pollios houſe, who amongſt all the reſt was an intire friend of Herods. They might have lien alſo at Cæſars houſe, who entertained them with as great familiaritie and kindneſſe, as might be poſſible, and gave Herod licence in like manner to confirme the kingdome in one of his children, which ſoever beſt liked him, annexing to his government, the countries of Trachona, Baranea and Auranita for the occaſion which enſueth. A certain man called Zenodorus, had hired Lyſanias demaines or Lordſhip: and not contenting himſelf with thoſe revenews which he gathered, but deſirous to gather more, he lived upon ſpoiles and robberies in Trachona, which is a countrey, the inhabitants whereof commonly live by pillage and ſpoile, which they purchaſe from the Citizens and Merchants of Damaſco. And ſo far was Zenodorus from prohibiting theſe robberies, that he himſelf alſo was partaker of the booty: ſo that the nations neighbouring round about, ſeeing themſelves thus abuſed, ſought for remedy at Varus hands who was their Governour, requiring him to certifie Cæſar, of Zenodorus wrongs and out rages. Which when he underſtood, he commanded that ſuch lawleſſe ryoters ſhould be puniſhed, and that the countrey ſhould be added unto the juriſdiction of Herod, to the intent, that by his vigilancy the inhabitants of Trachona ſhould no more moleſt their neighbours. For it was hard to reſtrain them, conſidering that they were accuſtomed and traded in ſuch theft, and could not live otherwaies. For they neither had towns nor lands, neither heritages nor any poſſeſſions, but onely certain retraits and caves under ground, and lived pell mell like beaſts: and having made abundant proviſion of water and victuals, they might eaſily endure war a long time, and maintaine themſelves in their caves, when their enemies aſſailed them without. Zenodorus liveth by ſpoil.

The doors of theſe dens were ſo narrow, that they could be entred but by one at once: but within it was incredible ſpacious and large: the upper part thereof was not ſteepy, but plaine, and in form of a ſmooth earth: for the whole place naturally conſiſteth of a ſharpe and ragged rock, with a hard and difficult paſſage thereon, unleſſe a man be guided thorow the paths. For the way was not direct and ſtraight, but full of windles and many turnings. At ſuch time as they wanted opportunity to ſpoil their neighbours, they robbed one another; and omitted no kind of wickneſſe. Herod having received the gift of this countrey at Cæſars hands, reſorted thither under the conduct of certain guides that knew the wayes, and having brought their power and proling to an end, he left the neighbour nations in aſſured peace. But Zenodorus being partly whetted on with envy, partly incited by the grief which he conceived through the loſſe of his poſſeſſions, reſorted to Rome to accuſe Herod; yet could affect nothing of that which he intended. Agrippa is ſent into Aſia.

When Agrippa was ſent into Aſia by Cæſar to govern the Provinces beyond the ſeas, Herod, becauſe he was his very friend and familiar, went to ſalute him at Mitylene where he wintered, for that he was one of his inward friends, and afterwards returned into Jewry. But certain Gadareans came unto Agrippa with an intent to accuſe Herod: but he ſent them, bound unto the King, and vouchſafed them no audience. On the other ſide, the Auranites who of long time hated Herods government, ſtirred up commotions, & laboured to draw the countrey into rebellion, and that upon a juſt ground, as it ſeemed, at that time: for Zenodorus deſpairing of his affairs, went and ſold them a certain part of the Lordſhip in Aurenita (which was comprehended within Cæſars donation to Herod) for the ſumme of fifty talents of

A of yearly revenue, wherewith they grew diſcontented, for that they were unjuſtly deprived of their eſtates: and hereupon they made often incurſions, endeavouring themſelves ſometimes to recover the ſame by force; and otherwhile contending for the right of their poſſeſſion by courſe of juſtice. They drew alſo unto them certain needy ſouldiers; who according to the cuſtome of wretched men, expected their better fortunes by change and innovation: which though Herod knew, and could have providently prevented them, yet exhorted he them to maintain their titles rather by good means then open violence, being loth to give any occaſion of new trouble or diſquiet. At length in the ſeventeenth year of his reign, Cæſar came into Syria: upon whoſe arrival divers of the Gadareans began to exclaim againſt Herod, accuſing him of his ſeverity and tyranny: which accuſation they the rather attempted, becauſe they were chiefly incited thereunto by the inſtigations and falſe ſuggeſtions of Zenodorus, who bound himſelf by an oath, that he would never give over, un-
B till that delivering them from Herods tyranny, they were reduced under Cæſars protection. The Gadareans, perſwaded by theſe his proteſtations, began to continue their exclamations, and that ſomewhat the more audaciouſly, for that they perceived that they lived as yet unpuniſhed whom Agrippa had delivered into Herods hands: for Herod had ſet them at liberty without any puniſhment, notwithſtanding that in regard of his own ſubjects he was inexorable as ever man was; and moſt patient in induring thoſe injuries that were offered him by ſtrangers, whom he alwaies diſmiſſed without revenge. When as therefore they accuſed him of violence and rapine, and for violating and raſing down their Temples, Herod being nothing diſmaied thereat, preſented himſelf before the Emperour to juſtifie his actions. But
C Cæſar entertained him very kindly, and diminiſhed nothing of the good affection which he bare unto him, notwithſtanding all the uproares and inſolent tumults of the people. Thus was the firſt day ſpent in audience of their complaints, and in thoſe daies that followed there were no further objections to be heard of: for the Gadareans perceiving both Cæſars diſpoſition and the inclination of his Councel, and fearing (as it was moſt likely) to be delivered into Herods hands, the next night after ſome of them ſlew themſelves; other ſome for fear of torments brake their own necks; and ſome of them alſo drowned themſelves in the river. And thus whereas they ſeemed to fo re-judge themſelves, Cæſar preſently abſolved Herod.

D And this felicity of his, was ſeconded with another of ſmall conſequence. For Zenodorus having his bowels broken through an extream flux of blood, finiſhed his life at Antioch in Syria. Whereupon Cæſar gave Herod his Countrey, which was a large and ample ſigniory, and was ſituate between Trachonita and Galilee, containing Ulatha, Paneas, and the countries thereabouts. He made him one of the Governours of Syria alſo, commanding them to execute nothing without his advice. At this time attained he to the height of all worldly felicity; For whereas within the huge and ample Romane Empire all things were diſpoſed by Cæſar and Agrippa, Cæſar honoured no man more then Herod next to Agrippa; and Agrippa reſpected him above all men next to Cæſar. Whereupon he grew to be ſo confident, that he begged a Tetrarchy at Cæſars hands, for his brother Pheroras: on whom he beſtowed one hundreth talents of his revenue out of his own kingdome, to the intent that if he ſhould hap-

Ulatha, Paneas, and other regions are given to Herod. Herod highly eſteemed by Cæſar, and Cæſar maketh Pheroras a Tetrarch.

As ſoon as therefore he had conducted Cæſar as farre as the Sea, upon his return he builded a goodly Temple of white marble in honour of his name, in the countrey which belonged to Zenodorus, near to a place which is called Panion, which is a goodly cave in the heart of a mountain, and a place of great pleaſure, under which there is a wide pool of immeaſurable depth, which is full of ſtanding water, and the upper part of the mountain is very high. From under this cave ſpring the fountain heads of the flood Jordan. This place of it ſelf ſo famous and delightful, was choſen out by Herod, and adorned alſo with a Temple which he built in honour of Cæſar. At that time alſo he releaſed the third part of thoſe tributes which his ſubjects paid unto him, to the end (as he ſaid) that he might relieve his ſubjects af-
F ter the penury they had endured. But the truth of his intention was, that he did it to that end to win their favours, who were ſiniſterly affected towards him. For they had conceived an hatred againſt him, becauſe all piety was in a manner aboliſhed, and the ordinances of the countrey in a ſort diſanulled by the means of thoſe temples, which he had built, and each man privily muttered with bitterneſſe againſt him; ſo that well nigh they were addreſſed to mutiny. But Herod with great diſcretion prevented the ſame, and cut off all occaſions of inſurrection, commanding every one to intend his labour; forbidding them to make any aſſemblies in the city, or to talk one with another under colour of walking abroad for pleaſure or feaſts ſake. Moreover, he had ſent out certain Intelligencers to diſcover all that which was done, appointing grievous punishments for those that misliked, or maligned his government. For divers of them were led unto the Castle of Hircania, some openly, some privately; where they were no sooner imprisoned, but they were put to death; and both in the city and in the countrey, there were certain men appointed to take note of all such that used any assemblies upon any occasion whatsoever. And so inwardly was he tormented with their dislikes, that as it is reported of him, he took upon him the habit of a private man, and thrust himself in the night time into the company of the people, to understand and gather what they thought of his government; and those whom he found to be untractable and obstinate, and would not be conformed to his will, he dispatched them by one means or other, binding the rest of the people by an oath to serve him faithfully, and constrained them to keep the oath they had sworn, and to acknowledge his soveraignty: whereunto divers through the fear they conceived, easily condescended. But they who had a more greater courage, and were discontented to see themselves constrained, he cut them short by all the means that he might. He required also an oath of divers of those sectaries, who followed the Pharisees Pollio and Sameas: and notwithstanding they denied to take the oath, yet he did not punish them as he did the other for their refusal, in respect and reverence of Pollio their master. From this rigour also were they exempt, who amongst us are called Esseans, which is a sort of men that live after that manner that Pythagoras did among the Grecians, of whom I have more expressely discoursed in another place.

Herod bindeth the people by an oath.

Herod excuseth the Pharisees from swearing for Pollio's and Sameas sakes.

The Esseans not much unlike the Pythagorists.

At this present I think it not a matter to be overslipt, neither estranged from the aime of my history, to report for what cause the King had so religious an opinion of those men. There was a certain Essean called Manahem, who in his sect was accounted an upright and just man, and one that had obtained from God the knowledge of things to come. He seeing Herod one day at such time as he was very young and went to school, saluted him and called him King of the Jews. Herod supposing that Manahem knew him not, or that he mocked him, reproved him sharply for that his speech, saying, that he acknowledged himself to be one of the common sort. Manahem smiling, hit him gently with his hand upon the back, and said unto him, Thou shalt be King, and shalt have a happy reign. For such is Gods pleasure; and at that time remember thy self of the words that Manahem spake unto thee, which shall serve for a testimony to put thee in mind of thy mutable estate. For it becommeth thee nothing more, then by justice, piety, and equity, to winne the hearts of thy subjects: yet know I by revelation from God, that thou wilt not follow these instructions; for thou shalt forget and neglect both divine and humane laws, though in other respects thou shalt be most fortunate, and purchase eternal glory. Yet shalt thou not escape Gods hands: for he shall chastise thee in the latter time of thy life with a grievous punishment.

Manahem foretelleth Herods government.

At that time Herod gave small regard to those his words, in that he had no hope that any such thing should happen: but not long after, as soon as he had obtained the Kingdome to the fulnesse of his felicity, he in the greatnesse of his power sent for Manahem, and asked him how long he should reign. But he returned him a doubtful answer. Which when Herod perceived, he asked him anew if he should reign ten years. Whereunto Manahem answered, and twenty, and thirty, without setting him down any prefixed terme. Herod contenting himself herewith, embraced Manahem, and gave him licence to depart, and continued his affections towards the Esseans for his sake. I have thought good to register these things, notwithstanding they may seem uncredible, to declare that divers of our nation have had communication with GOD by reason of their holinesse.

Herod questioneth with Manahem about the continuance of his kingdome, and loveth the Esseans for his sake.

CHAP. XIIII.

Herod buildeth a new Temple in Jerusalem, after he had pulled down the old.

IN the eighteenth year of his reign, Herod, after he had finished these many and admirable actions, conceited in his mind no mean, but a mighty project, which was to re-edifie Gods Temple of greater bigneſſe and answerable height, hoping that this work which was the most admirable of all those he had undertaken (as indeed it was) in being finished, would eternize his memory. But fearing lest the people, in regard of the greatnesse of the enterprize, would be hardly drawn thereunto, he determined to sound their intents by his discourse, and for that cause assembling them together, he spake after this manner:

Hedio & Rufinus chap. 14. al. 11.

Herod intendeth to reedifie Gods Temple.

Herod certifieth the people that he will reedifie the Temple.

Men and brethren, I hold it to be a matter both vain and superfluous, to recount unto you what things I have performed, during the time of my government. For they have been of that

A "that nature, that they have returned me but little honour; and your ſelf great profit and "ſecuritie. For you your ſelves know, that in thoſe adverſities that have befallen you, I have "been no wayes negligent in that which concerned your profit; and in thoſe buildings I "have erected by Gods aſſiſtance, I have not ſo much regarded my ſelf, as that which con- "cerneth you all: and my hope is by the will of God, that I have brought the eſtate of the "Jews to that degree of felicitie, that they never had or expected before this time. As for "that which I have particularly exploited in the heart of the Countrey, and in the Cities "which I have augmented, as well with ornament and beautie, as with a number of inhabi- "tants; ſince you your ſelves know, I think it a ridiculous matter to reduce them to your "memory. But I muſt at this time aſſure you that the deſign which I will preſently enter- B "prize, is far more holy and more excellent then may be performed by us. For our prede- "ceſſors, after they were returned from the captivitie of Babylon, builded a Temple in Ho- "nour of our great and mightie God, which in height wanted ſixty cubits of that which "Solomon firſt built: yet ought we not to object as a blame, or aſcribe this action to any impi- "etie in our anceſtors. For the Temple was not at their diſpoſition, but the meaſure of their "building was ſet them down by Cyrus and Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, to whom and their "ſucceſſours, they have firſt of all been ſlaves, as after their time they have been under the "ſubjection of the Macedonians: ſo that they had not the means and opportunity to raiſe this "religious Monument, according to his firſt pattern, to that requiſite and convenient height. "But ſince at this preſent by Gods permiſſion, I have obtained the kingdom; and that for a C "long time hitherto we have enjoyed a happy peace; and that neither money nor great reve- "news are wanting; and that which is our greateſt good, we are made happie by the favour of "the Romans, who in a ſort are the Lords of the whole world, and in effect are our entire "friends: I will enforce my ſelf to repair that defect, which hapned in times paſt through the "miſeries, and weak means of our noble predeceſſors, reſolving with my ſelf to perfect that "which is requiſite for the ſervice of God, in acknowledgement of the benefits whith I have "received from him, by whoſe mercy and means I have obtained my kingdome.

This ſudden and unexpected ſpeech of Herods filled all mens ears with wonder, and hearts with expectation, in that he ſeemed to promiſe ſuch a thing, as was beyond their hope, and as they thought farre greater then his power: and that which moſt diſtracted them was, for D that they had conceived a fear, leſt after he had pulled down the old, he ſhould not be of abilitie to erect a new. For which cauſe his counſell ſeemed to be dangerous, and attempt over difficult. But the King perceiving with what doubts they were detained, encouraged them, promiſing in no ſort to deface the old Temple, before all that was prepared and po- liſhed which was requiſite for the building of the new. And in this he kept his word. For he appointed a thouſand chariots to draw ſtones unto the place, and choſe out amongſt the reſt ten thouſand cunning and expert workmen. He apparelled alſo at his own charge one thou- ſand Prieſts in their accuſtomed Veſtments, whereof ſome gave the Maſons inſtructions how they ſhould work, and the reſt aſſiſted the Carpenters. This done, after he had fitly and readily performed and prepared all things requiſite, he cauſed them to fall to their building. E As ſoon as therefore the former foundations were taken away, and other meer new were planted in their place, the Temple was erected upon them, in length one hundred cubits, and twentie cubits in height, above thoſe hundred cubits which the former contained, which twentie cubits were in ſome ſort ſcantled, after that by ſucceſſion of time the foundations began to be ſetled, and during Neroes reign our countrey-men had thought to have raiſed it to the firſt height. The building was of white and ſtrong marble ſtones, which were each of them twentie and five cubits long, eight cubits high, and about ſome twelve cubits broad. All the ſtructure of the ſame was made after the manner of a Princely Palace on all ſides, and the middle part thereof was higher then the reſt: ſo that it might eaſily be diſcovered by the inhabitants of the countrey many furlongs off; and eſpecially it was moſt apparant and F ſubject to their ſight, who dwelt oppoſite againſt it, or repaired unto the Citie. The doors thereof and their tranſomes were correſpondent to the reſt of the magnificence of the Tem- ple, garniſhed with divers tapeſtries, and azured flowers, which inveſted and adorned the pillars: under whoſe chapters a golden Vine ſpread it ſelf on each ſide, repleniſhed with many goodly cluſters of Grapes hanging down; which was an admirable work to behold, both in reſpect of the greatneſs, as alſo for the workmanſhip and matter whereof it was made. He encompaſſed all the Temple with moſt goodly galleries and porches correſpondent to the magnificence of the ſame, and ſurpaſſing thoſe in times paſt for the coſt; ſo that never any man before him ſo magnificently adorned the Temple. Two of which were underprop- ped with very ſtrong walls, whoſe workmanſhip was ſo exquiſite, as it is incredible to be reported amongst men. There was a stony rising or hillock, and very streight and high, the top whereof towards the Eastermost part of the Citie was somewhat smooth and upright. The first that encompassed it with a wall, was Solomon our King, who by Gods favour and the mediation and labour of divers workmen, did first of all build the higher part: Herod also invested the lower part thereof with another wall; under which to the Southward there lieth a most deep valley. This wall was made of huge stones, close fastned the one unto the other with Lead, shutting all within his enclosure, and extending it self very deep; so that the greatnesse and height of this four square building was an incredible thing to be imagined. The greatnesse of the stones appeared in the Front, but on the inside they were fastned together with clapses of Iron, which fortified and strengthned the building for ever against all injuries of times. This work having been thus continued to the top, and the void space between the wall and the rising hillock filling up the floor above, was made plain and equal. The whole circuit of the Tower contained about four stades or furlongs, a stade or furlong in length to every pane from angle to angle. On the inside and neer unto the top there was another wall of stone extended along the Eastern side, having a double porch of equall greatnesse with that of the wall, and placed in the midst of the Temple, and openeth right upon the gates thereof, which the Kings beforetime had adorned. Round about the Temple were planted those spoils which were taken from the Barbarians, which King Herod had placed there, with all those spoils which he had taken from the Arabians. In a corner on the North side there stood a very strong and defenced Fortresse, builded by the Asmonians, who were Herods predecessours, and had been both Kings and high Priests, and had imposed a name on that Tower which was Baris, in which they kept the Priestly Vesture, wherewith the high Priest was wont to be adorned at that time onely when he was to offer sacrifice. King Herod kept the same in that place, and there remained it after his death, untill the time of Tiberius Cæsar: under whom Vitellius governour of Syria came unto Jerusalem; where he was entertained by all the people with as great magnificence as was possible: and being desirous to acknowledge the favours that he had received at their hands, being requested by them that they might have the keeping of the high Priests Ornaments, he wrote unto Tiberius Cæsar to grant them that favour; and till the death of King Agrippa, the Jews had the same in their possession. But after that Agrippa was dead, Cassius Longinus that governed Syria, and Cuspius Fadus Lieutenant of Judæa, commanded the Iews to return the same into the Fortresse Antonia, saying, that the Romans ought to be Lords thereof, as they had been in times past. For which cause the Jews sent Embassadours to Claudius Cæsar, to request his favour therein, who arriving at Rome, found the young King Agrippa there, who besought the Emperour that it might be lawfull for him to have the keeping of the habit: who commanded Vitellius the Governour of Syria, to deliver it into his hands. Beforetime it was kept under the seal of the high Priest, and the custody of the Treasurers, and on the Eve of a certain solemne Feast, the Treasurers went up to the Captain, who kept the Fortresse for the Romans, and after they had opened their seal, they took the habit: and after the Feast was past, they returned it back again unto the same place, and shut it up under the same seal in the presence of the Captain. All which we have thought good to lay open, to make the diversitie known that was used in that care.

After that Herod had in this sort builded this strong Tower for the security and guard of the Temple, he called it Antonia, for the love of Antonius his friend, and one of the chiefest men in Rome. In the Western part of this porch, there were four gates, whereof the one opened upon the Kings Palace, to which there was a direct way thorow the midst of the valley; the two others led unto the suburbs: and the fourth opened upon the rest of the City, and gave open passage unto the same, by the means of a number of stairs, by which men might descend to the foot of the valley; and from thence there was an ascent by other stairs to ascend upwards. For the Citie was scituate neer unto the Temple, after the manner of a Theater; and was bended to the Southward by a deep valley. As touching the fourth side turned toward the South, it had likewise certain gates in the midst thereof; and upon the same there was a triple gallery very royal and Princely, the length whereof extended from the orientall valley as farre as the Western. For it was impossible to extend it any further. This work was one of the most famous pieces that was ever seen under the Sunne: For the depth of the valley was so great, that it was impossible for a man to see the bottome if he looked downward from the higher part: and notwithstanding, on the same he erected this porch of so great a height, that but to look from the top thereof, and to consider the depth as well of the Valley as the height of the Porch, it would make a man giddie, and his eye could not pierce unto the immeasurable bottome of the same. It had in length foure ranks of

A of pillars oppoſed the one right over againſt the other (for the fourth pane of the wall was fortified with a wall of hewen ſtone) the thickneſſe of the pillars was ſuch, that it was as much as three men could fadome; holding one another by the hand, and the length was of twentie and ſeven foot, with a double baſe at the bottome. The whole number of them was one hundred, ſixtie and two, and they had Chapters engraven and damaskt with Corinthian work. All this building was ſo huge, that it moved admiration in thoſe that beheld the ſame. Betwixt theſe four rancks there were three porches, whereof two were on either ſide, containing in bredth each of them thirty foot, and in length a ſtade or furlong: and more then fiftie foot in height. That in the midſt was in bredth once and half as much as theſe two; and in height twice as much. For it ſurpaſſed the reſt by far. The floor was made of
B goodly planks, engraven with divers figures; and the roof thereof was far higher then any of the reſt, in which certain huge beams were morteiſed, on which there were certain pillars builded, united and annexed ſo fitly together, that it is a matter incredible to thoſe that have not ſeen the ſame, and admirable to him that beholdeth it. Such was the faſhion of the circuit of the firſt porch. In the midſt, and not far off from the other, ſtood the ſecond; whereunto there was an aſcent made with few ſteps. It was incloſed with a ſeparation of ſtone, with an inſcription, forbidding any ſtranger to enter the ſame upon pain of death. This inward porch both to the ſouthward and to the northward had three gates, in rank equidiſtant the one from the other; and toward the eaſtward had one great gate, by which thoſe men entered, who were cleanſed with their wives. For beyond that place it was not lawfull for the women to have acceſſe. But the third inward ſpace was onely acceſſible by the Prieſts. In it was the C Temple, & before the ſame the Altar, on which they were wont to offer burnt ſacrifices unto God. But Herod durſt not enter the interiour ſanctuary, from whence prophane men were excluded by the law: but by the mediation of the Prieſts he intended the ſtructure and building of the inward porch, and finiſhing in eight years ſpace the reſt of the edifice, at length alſo he finiſhed the Temple it ſelf by the endeavours of the ſame Prieſts within the term of one year and ſix moneths. By which means the people were repleniſhed with the fulneſſe of joy, and every one gave thanks unto God for that the whole work was finiſhed ſo ſpeedily, and wiſhed all happineſſe to the King for his coſt and diligence in the execution and finiſhing thereof: and they celebrated a great feaſt in honour of the reſtauration of the Temple. Then did the King offer up three hundreth oxen unto God, and the reſt of them
D each one according to his abilitie offered ſo many ſacrifices, as that ſcarely they may be comprehended in number, for their multitude exceeded their eſtimate.

About the very time of the celebration of this feaſt, in the honour of the reedification of the Temple, the Kings day of Coronation fell out, which he was wont to ſolemnize every yeer with great joy: and for this two-fold occaſion the ſolemnitie and joy was far more ſumptuous and compleat. The King alſo cauſed a conduit of water to be made, and conveighed by pipes under ground, drawing it from the Caſtle Antonia unto the Oriental gate of the Temple; neer to which he builded another Tower alſo, to the end, that by the conduits he might aſcend privily unto the Temple, if happily the people ſhould practiſe any in-
E ſurrections againſt his royaltie. It is reported that during the building of this Temple, it never rained by day time, but onely by night, to the intent the work might not be interrupted: and our predeceſſours have teſtified no leſſe unto us. Neither is this thing incredible, if we attentively conſider thoſe other effects of Gods providence. Hitherto concerning the reedification of the Temple.

Nicolo & Rufinus, chap. 1. Herod made a new law that wall-breakers should be sold into bondage out of the Kingdome.

The punishment of theft according to the law of Moses. Exod. 1. 22. Deut. 12. 15.

Herod sailed into Italy, and brought home his sons from Rome.

Amongst the rest of the affairs of the Common-wealth, the King thought it behoved him to redresse and hinder private injuries, both in the citie and countrey: for which purpose he made a new law unlike to the former, that it should be lawfull for such as were wall-breakers, to be sold for slaves out of the limits of his Kingdome: which Law did not seem so much to intend the punishment of malefactors, as the dissolution of his own countrey customes. For to serve forrain Nations, who lived not after the manner of the Jews, and to do whatsoever they commanded them, was more prejudiciall unto Religion then unto the parties convicted of that fact. Wherefore it was sufficiently already in the old ancient lawes provided for the punishment of such people, to wit, that a thief should restore four times as much as he stole: which if he was not able to do, that then he was to be sold; not unto strangers, nor into perpetuall bondage, but onely for seven yeers: at which time he should again be set free. So that the common people did interpret this new Law to set down an unjust punishment, and rather to favour of tyrannie, then of Princely dignitie, and to be enacted not without contempt of their ancient laws: so that for this cause all men spake very ill of the King. L M

At the same time Herod sailed into Italy to salute Cæsar, and to see his children living at Rome. Where, Cæsar receiving him very courteously, permitted him to take his sons home with him, as being now sufficiently instructed in the liberall Arts. Who returning into their countrey, were joyfully received of all their country-men, both for that they were of comely stature,

A ſtature, and of courteous conditions; and in their very behaviour did ſhew that they came of Kingly linage. Which things moved Salome and the reſt, by whoſe falſe accuſations their mother Marim was oppreſſed, to envie them; fearing their puiſſance, and verily perſwading themſelves that they would be revengers of their mothers injuries. So taking hereby occaſion, they began alſo falſely to accuſe them, as miſliking their father, who had cauſed their mother to be ſlain; and as though they had an averſion from him, whoſe hands were imbrued in their mothers bloud. For they well perceived that by ſuch calumniation they might draw them into hatred, and avert their fathers good will from them. Yet did they not carry theſe their inventions to the Kings ears, but contented themſelves to bruit them
B abroad amongſt the common people; which ſo in the end coming to his hearing, would cauſe in him ſuch enmitie and hatred againſt his ſons, as that it would overcome in him all naturall affection.

How Herod gave wives unto Alexander and Ariſtobulus.

BUt the King as yet miſtruſting nothing, moved with a fatherly care over them, had them in ſuch eſtimation as reaſon did require, and for that they were now come unto mans eſtate, he married them both: and unto Ariſtobulus he gave Bernice the daughter of Salome; and unto Alexander, Glaphyra the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappa-
C docia. Which done, underſtanding that Marcus Agrippa was returned out of Italy into Aſia, he went unto him thither, and invited him into his Kingdome, requeſting him to accept of his friends entertainment. Which Agrippa yeelding unto, Herod omitted nothing that might delight him: for he received him in his Cities newly built, ſhewing him the fair houſes and goodly edifices, entertaining him and the reſt of his friends and followers with all ſorts of delights, pomp and magnificence, as well at Sebaſte, as at the haven of Cæſarea, and in the Caſtles he built, to wit, Alexandrium, Herodium, and Hircania. He brought him to Jeruſalem, where all the people met him apparelled in ſuch goodly and brave attire, as they were accuſtomed to adorn themſelves withall, when as they celebrate their feſtivals, and with many joyfull acclamations received and ſaluted him.
D Agrippa offered a hundred head of fat Oxen to God, and feaſted all the people; and although he would willingly have made a longer abode there, yet winter drawing nigh, fearing rempeſtuous weather, he was forced to ſail away with all ſpeed into Ionia, both he and his friends being honoured with very great preſents.

Herod married his ſon Ariſtobulus to Bernice, Salomes daughter, and Alexander to Glaphyra the daughter of the King of Cappadocia.

CHAP. III.

How Herod ſailed unto Agrippa.

E HErod having paſt the winter at home, and hearing that Agrippa was now with an Army minded to goe to Boſphorus, the Spring time being now at hand, he ſailed unto him again, and taking his courſe by Rhodes and Cous, he came towards Lesbus, thinking there to finde Agrippa: but by a contrarie winde he was driven from thence, and forced a while to ſtay at Chius; where many privately coming to ſalute him, he rewarded them with Princely rewards: and perceiving that the Citie gate deſtroyed in the warres againſt Mithridates, was not yet repaired, but lay ſtill ruinated for want of money to repair it, he gave them ſo much money as largely ſufficed to reſtore it to the former beautie and bigneſſe; exhorting them with all expedition to re-edifie and adorn the Citie as it was in times paſt. At laſt the winde changeing, he ſayled firſt to Mitylene, and then to Byzantium; and there underſtanding that Agrippa had alreadie paſt the Rocks of F Cyanes, he followed him with all ſpeed, and overtook him at Synope a Citie of Pontus. who contrarie to Agrippa's expectation arrived there with his Navie: Herods coming was very gratefull to Agrippa, and with eſpeciall affection they embraced one another. It was an evident ſigne of friendſhip, that the King omitting his own private buſineſſe, would now come unto him in ſo convenient a time. Wherefore Herod ſtill abode with him in the Armie, alwayes preſent either to aſſiſt him with Counſell, or to bear part of the labour with him. He was alſo preſent with him at ſuch times as he meant to be merrie being his onely Counſellour in difficult matters, for the benevolence he bare unto him, and alſo in all his mirth, as being one whom he honoured. Agrippa having diſpatcht the buſineſſe in Pontus for which he came, it pleaſed him not to return by Sea, but to go by Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the greater Phrygia, and ſo they came by land to Epheſus: and there taking Herod ſailed unto Agrippa to Chius, and gave a great ſum of money to re-edifie the porch.

Herod found Agrippa at Synope a citie of Pontus and was by him honourably entertained.

Agrippa went by land to Epheſus.

ſhip they came to Samos. And in all that whole journey, almoſt in every citie he gratified Herod, at his intreatie relieving many of their neceſſities. And Herod did in the way help many with money that wanted, and ſpent much upon his gueſts: and moreover if any one had any ſuit unto Agrippa, Herod was the onely man that might obtain his ſuit for him. And although Agrippa alſo was both nobly minded and eaſily intreated to grant all ſuch things as were not prejudicial to any man; yet was it a matter of no ſmall moment and importance in King Herod, to incite him to uſe beneficence, being even of his own accord forward enough to put the ſame in practiſe. For firſt of all he reconciled Agrippa being angry againſt the Ilienſians, and himſelf paid the money that the people of Chius were indebted unto Ceſars receivers, obtaining for them an immunitie: and he alſo aſſiſted and pleaſured others in whatſoever they needed. CHAP. IV.

How the Jews of Jonia accuſed thoſe Countrey-men for offering to take from them their priviledges granted unto them by the Romans.

The Jews of Ionia complain unto Agrippa of the injuries offered them by thoſe countrey-men.

Nicholaus did make a ſpeech unto Agrippa in the behalf of the Jews.

WHen they came into Ionia, a great multitude of the Jews inhabiting that countrey being gathered together, expected him to ſpeak unto him; and finding opportunitie, they complained unto him of the wrongs that thoſe country-men offered them, not permitting them to live according unto their laws; and that upon feſtivall dayes they pulled and haled them before their Tribunal: and that they would not permit them to ſend ſacred money unto Jeruſalem, and that they compelled them to do publick buſineſſe, and to ſpend the holy money in thoſe affairs, contrary to the priviledges granted unto them by the Romans. Herod laboured to have the Jews complaints heard by Agrippa, and willed one of his friends and followers called Nicholaus, to plead the Jews cauſe: who made a ſpeech unto Agrippa, ſitting with the reſt of the Romans nobilitie, and other Kings and Princes, in their behalf after this manner: I

Moſt worthy Agrippa, true it is, that all men that ſuffer injurie, are conſtrained to flie for redreſſe to the higher Powers, and we, over and above, hope to obtain our ſuit. For we ask nothing but that which your beneficence hath already granted, and that which they endeavour to take from us that are, as we alſo are; your ſubjects. And although that your benefit beſtowed upon us was great, yet are we worthie ſtill to enjoy it, onely for that you your ſelf judged us worthie thereof. And ſuppoſe it was a ſmall matter, it is a diſcredit for you not to grant ſo ſmall a trifle. Wherefore it is evident, that the injurie done unto us, doth alſo redound unto you, whoſe Decrees thoſe that have injured us, fear not to contemne, and to diſannull your beneficence towards us. For if any one ſhould ask any of them whether they had rather loſe their lives, then be deprived of their Countrey Lawes, Rites, Sacrifices, and Feſtivities, wherewith they honour their gods; I know well they would rather endure any calamitie, then to be forced to forſake their Countrey Cuſtomes. For many warres ariſe onely for defence of Religion: and the greateſt reward and content that we reap by this happie peace, which through your means we enjoy, is this, That we are everie one permitted to live according to the Cuſtome of his Countrey, and to continue in pietie. Wherefore they endeavour to take from others that, which by no means they would permit to be taken from themſelves: as who would ſay, it was not as great an offence to hinder other mens Pietie and Devotion, as neglect their own. Let us conſider whether there be any Cittie or Nation, that doth not account their felicitie to be ſcituate in your Dominion, and the power of the Romans? Or is there any that deſireth your Honour and Power to decay and be of no force? Truely, none that is wiſe: for there is none, whom either publickly, or privately, it concerneth not: but theſe people endeavouring to take from us your libertie, do alſo as it were deprive themſelves of all benefits which they have received at your hands, which are infinite. For what a benefit is it, that whereas other Nations living under the Dominion of rigorous Kings conſtituted over them; theſe do onely obey the Romanes, and live in happie peace and tranquilitie? But as for our affairs, were no man troubleſome unto us, yet are they not ſuch as deſerve to be envied. For enjoying the common felicitie, which others your ſubjects doe, we deſire nothing of high eſtimate or worth, but onely requeſt that we may live according to the Religion of our Countrey, which of it ſelfe is not to be envied at, but may be profitable for them that permit it. For God doth alwayes love them, who honour him, and them who doe not hinder his honour. What is there in our Religion offenſive to any man? nay, what is there that is not according to all Pietie and Juſtice; whereby all things continue and are preſerved? For neither do we conceal what life we follow, nor the labours and exerciſe we uſe, but reſting the K L M

These are the injuries that theſe people by violence offer us; they ſacrilegiouſly take from us the money dedicated to God: they impoſe tributes upon us, who are free: they upon feſtivall daies force us to their tribunals, to law and other prophane buſineſſe, without any neceſsitie, but onely in contumely and diſgrace of our religion, which they know well in the mean*

For this onely argument had been ſufficient to have declared that we did not obtaine ſuch favour without deſert, and requeſt thee now to confirme the ſame, of whom we might juſtly hope for new benefits, ſeeing ſuch friendſhip and familiarity between thee and our King. For we have underſtood by our nation that dwell in Judæa, how many offerings thou diddeſt there ſacrifice unto our god, and with what vows thou honouredſt him: how thou feaſtedſt the people, and was't delighted in that mutuall hoſpitalitie. All which are as it were an argument of the friendſhip confirmed between ſo great a Roman Prince, and the nation of the Jews, even in* Herods houſe. By all theſe, we

Now no one of the Greeks offered to oppoſe himſelf againſt that which Nicholaus did ſpeak: for this was no contention to a Judge concerning their right, but onely a deprecation and ſupplication to avoid injurie. Neither did they denie it: onely thus they excuſed themſelves, that the Jews dwelling amongſt them, were troubleſome unto them. But the Jews ſhewed themſelves to be free citizens, and to live according to their religion and laws of their countrey, without any mans moleſtation or injury. Wherefore Agrippa underſtanding that they were wronged, anſwered thus; that he would not onely gratifie them for his friend Herods ſake, but alſo for that they ſeemed to him to demand a reaſonable matter. Wherefore though

F they had demanded a greater thing of him, he would have granted them whatſoever he might, without prejudicing the people of Rome. And now ſeeing they onely demand of him that which already the Romans had granted unto them, he would ratifie & confirm unto them the benefit which they had already received at the Romans hands, & provide that hence forth no man ſhould moleſt them for living according to the inſtitution and ordinances of their countrey. Having thus ſpoken, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly. Then Herod ariſing thanked him in all their names. And then after mutuall embracing one another, they departed, taking their leaves from Lesbus.

THe King having a proſperous winde, within a few daies after arrived at Cæſarea; and from thence he went to Jeruſalem, and calling together all the people, as well the citizens as alſo the countrey people there preſent, there he told them the cauſe of his journey, & how he had obtained immunities for the Jews living in Aſia, that they might converſe there among the Gentiles, without moleſtation. Then he recounted unto them, what felicitie they had received and enjoyed by his reign, ſeeing that his greateſt care was ſo to provide for his ſubjects, that they might want nothing. And to gratifie them the more, he told H them, that he would freely remit the fourth part of the taxes and tribute they were to pay for the yeer paſt. ther, to labour all waies poſſible not to leave any alive, that might revenge her death, who died, not deſerving it. And ſhe wanted no occeſion, for that it ſeemed the young men were not very well affected towards their father, partly for the memory of their mothers death, and partly alſo for that they deſired the Kingdome. So that they upbraiding Salome and Pheroras, did renew their old hatred againſt them, who daily practiſed, by all means they could, to overthrow them: the young men alſo hated them, but not with like hatred that they were hated of them. For they for their ingenuous manners and noble race diſſembled not their anger, but with laviſh tongues declared their mindes. But

Alexander and Ariſtobulus being by Salome and Pheroras drawn into bad words, are by them accuſed to their father Herod.

Salome and Pheroras contrariwiſe enviouſly and craftily prepared themſelves a way by ca- K lumniations, alwaies provoking the magnanimous ſpirits of theſe young men, whoſe fierceneſſe might ſoon bring them into ſuſpicion with their father, to the intent that he might gather hereby, that they wanted not will to revenge their mothers death, yea even with their own hands, foraſmuch as they were not aſhamed to be the children of ſuch a mother, and would contend that ſhe was unjuſtly put to death. And now all the whole city talked of them, every one pitying the young mens ſimplicity: Salome not ceaſing to gather by their own ſpeeches probable arguments of ſuſpicion, that they did not onely take their mothers death impatiently, but alſo raging like young men, did both bewaile her death, and their own caſe, who were compel'd to live with the murtherers of their unfortunate mother, and as it were contaminate themſelves with living amongſt them. And the abſence of the King greatly increaſed this their diſſenſion; who being returned, and having made a ſpeech L unto the people, he preſently was admoniſhed both by Pheroras and Salome his ſiſter, that he was in great danger, by reaſon of the two young men, who did openly boaſt that they would be revenged of them that killed their mother: feining moreover, that they were incouraged, for that they hoped that Archelaus King of Cappadocia would help them, to accuſe their father unto Cæſar. Herod hearing this, was greatly troubled; and ſo much the more, for that he heard the ſame alſo reported unto him by others: And hereby he was put in memory of that which was paſt, how that for the diſſenſion of his houſe he could not long enjoy his friends and deareſt wife. And as it were foreſeeing by that that was paſt what would en-

ſue, and fearing ſome greater calamitie would befall him, he was altogether amazed. And M truely as abroad he was moſt fortunate above all hope; ſo at home he was moſt unhappy and infortunate beyond mens opinion: So that one may well doubt whether his fortunate ſucceſſe abroad did countervaile his misfortunes at home; or whether it had been more expedient for him to have had neither the one nor the other, but to have had onely a common and ordinary favour at fortunes hands. Deliberating thus with himſelf, he thought it good to call unto the Court another ſonne of his, whom he begat when he was a private man, and to grace him with honours, and to oppoſe him againſt the other two brethren, to the end, to bring down and repreſſe their fierce and haughty mindes: (this ſon of his was called Antipater) not minded (which after overcome by affection he did) to make him ſole heir of all,

but

A but thinking thereby to bridle Mariammes children, and to diminish their arrogancy by letting them see that it was not needfull to keep the inheritance of so flourishing a Kingdome onely for them: wherefore he introduced Antipater, one opposed against them, that thereby the young men laying their pride a side, might shew themselves more tractable to their father: and so now he thought he had by this means provided for the safety of these young men. But it fell out farre otherwise then he expected; for the young men esteemed this fact as an injurie done unto them: And Antipater was of that nature, that having gotten promotion contrary to his expectation, he did endeavour all waies possible to be in greater account with his father then to two young men, who was now through false accusations alienated from them, and every day (as he also desired) ready to beleeve any thing that might incense him against them.

Antipater inciteth his father against his brothers.

B Wherefore this was all his labour: yet had he an especiall care not to be thought an accuser of his brethren, but he used others of his accomplices, whom the King nothing suspected; who for the trust the King put in them, might also have better credit given unto their words. For now this man had many followers and favourers, as it were gaping after preferment by his means, who with a kinde of counterfeit good will made a shew of love and good will towards Herod. And being many in number and trusty one to another, the young men were every day entrapped more and more: for many times they shed tears for very grief of the contumelies and injuries that they suffered; and many times they mentioned their mother, and complained unto those whom they thought to be their friends of their father, as one that dealt not well with them: all which Antipaters partakers maliciously noting, and adding

C thereunto something of their own invention, they did presently tell it unto Herod; and so did nourish the dissention of his house. For the King being moved hereat, and purposing to humble Mariammes children, did daily increase and augment Antipaters honour, and at his entreaties at last brought his mother into the Court; and many times writing secretly unto Cæsar in favour of Antipater, he especially commended him in particular unto him: and being to saile to salute Agrippa, who was now to depart out of Asia having governed that province ten yeers, he onely took with him Antipater of all his sonnes, whom also he committed unto Agrippa with many gifts, to goe with him to Rome, and to be brought in to favour with Cæsar; so that now all things seemed to be done, as it were by this mans beck, and the young men to be already dis-inherited.

CHAP. VII.

How Antipater living at Rome, Herod brought Alexander and his brothers thither, and accused them before Cæsar.

THis journey did greatly advantage Antipater, and increase his honour and preeminence above his brethren: for he became famous at Rome, being by his fathers letters commended unto all his friends there: yet this was a great grief unto him, that he could not dayly calumniate his brethren; for he feared lest his fathers mind should Antipater was honoured at Rome.

E change, and so he should affect Mariammes children most. This was his dayly cogitation: but though he were absent, yet he ceased not by letters to incite his father against them, as having care of his safety; but indeed for that he thereby through his bad practices hoped to obtain the Kingdome: so that he so increased Herods wrath against them, that he now was become a deadly enemy unto the young men. But endeavouring to resist this affection, and fearing rashly in his anger to commit any thing to prejudice them, he determined to saile again to Rome, and there accuse his sons before Cæsar, lest he being led away through indignation and displeasure conceived against the young men, should seem to cast off all love and fatherly affection towards them. And repairing to Rome, and not finding Cæsar there, he followed him unto Aquileia: and coming to speech of him, and requesting him to Antipater when he was present incited his father against his brethren by lies, and being absent, he did the same by letters.

Herod sailed to Rome, and followed Cæsar to Aquileia.

F take notice of his misfortunes, he presented his two sons, and accused them before Cæsar of insolencie, and for having attempted to poyson him, complaining their hatred to be gone so far, that now by any wicked and execrable way whatsoever they sought their fathers Kingdome; notwithstanding that Cæsar had given him full power and libertie to leave the Kingdome to him, whom he found most dutifull and obedient unto him. And that they thought thereby they might not gain the Kingdome, yet they could be contented with their fathers death, and that they sought it with danger of their own lives, and that this horrible and detestable hatred was now rooted in their hearts. And that he having long endured this calamitie; was now forced to open it unto Cæsar, and trouble his ears with these complaints. And spake after this manner: Have I deserved this at their hands? what wrong have I done them? or how can they think it reason, that I who have exposed my self to so many dangers, and undergone so difficult labours for a long time to obtain the Kingdome, should not peacably enjoy the same, and suffer me to be Lord of mine own dominion, and permit me the libertie to leave it unto him who shall deserve such honour in the best performance of a son-like dutie? So that the beholders hereof seeing piety so rewarded, might hereby be the more incited thereunto, especially seeing that without violating the law of nature, it is not lawfull to think any such thought: for no man can affect his fathers Kingdom, but he doth also desire his fathers death, seeing that it is not permitted men to succeed those in the Kingdome who are yet alive. He alleadged moreover, that for his part he had had a care that they should want nothing convenient for a kinde father to provide for princely children, neither ornaments, nor followers, nor delights: that also he had provided for them wives of noble race, and had married one of them unto his sisters daughter; and the other unto Archelaus his daughter King of Cappadocia: and which was the greatest matter of all, he had not used the authoritie of a father against them after these their enterprizes, but brought them unto Cæsar their common benefactor; and that forsaking his own right of a father who had been injured, or of a King, against whom treason had been wrought, he was now content to debate his matter with them before such a Judge, as well knew how to decide the thing in question according to right and equitie: yet requested he him that the offence of theirs might not be left unpunished, nor he forced to lead the rest of his life still in perpetuall fear: seeing that it was expedient that they should never see light again after such haynous offences, and to escape unpunished, after the violating of all laws of God and nature. Herod having with a vehement voice objected these accusations against his sons before Cæsar; the young men were not able to abstain from tears whilest he was yet speaking, and having ended his speech, they wholly resolved into tears: not for that they were guilty of those impieties laid unto their charge, but for that they were accused by their father, against whom it was not decent to speak freely for themselves, nor expedient to refuse to defend their own cause. Wherein they remained doubtfull what to doe, moving the auditors to pitie them by their tears and lamentations, and carefull withall lest it should be thought that their guilty conscience did so trouble them, that they were not able to speak in their own defence, seeing that indeed it was their want of skill and tender yeers, by reason whereof they were so amazed. Which also Cæsar well perceived, and all that were present were so moved to compassion, that neither their father, who was their accuser, could long refrain from being moved hereat to compassion.

Alias, chap. 9. Alexander and Aristobulus move all that were present, even their father and accuser to tears and compassion.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Alexanders defence, and how the two brethren were reconciled unto their father Herod.

THen the young men perceiving both their father and Cæsar to relent, and they that were present partly to pity them, partly to shed tears of compassion: the one of them named Alexander, who was the elder, framing his speech unto his father, began thus to purge himself of the crimes objected against them.

Alexander speaketh in his own, and his brothers defence.

My father, how well and friendly minded thou art towards us, this present judgement declareth: for hadst thou determined any heavy sentence against us, thou wouldest not have brought us before him, who is the preserver of us all: for thou mightest being a King, or for thy authoritie over us as a father, have punished us for our offence according to thy power; but in that thou hast brought us to Rome, and made Cæsar our Judge, it is an argument that thou seekest to save us: for no man brings any one to the Temple whom he purposeth to destroy: which greatly aggravateth our cause, who doe censure our selves unworthy to live, rather then to incurre an opinion of impiety committed against thee such a father. How far more expedient is it to die guiltlesse, then to live suspected of such offences? Wherefore, if truth be our patrone, we shall be happy either by thy own judgement, or for that we have escaped danger: but if calumniations doe prevaile against us, it is superfluous and to no purpose that we live. For what good would it doe us, if we live in continuall suspicion? It is a probable accusation to accuse our yeers, as having affected the Kingdome; and our unfortunate mothers calamity maketh it seeme more probable. But consider I beseech thee, if the same crime may not as well be framed against any one whomsoever, as against us. For any King having children by a wife that is now dead, may if it please him suspect them, as practising treason against him their father. But suspicion is not sufficient to prove a man impious and guilty: wherefore bring any one forth that can tell any argument of this crime by us to have been attempted, which may adde credit to this calumniation;

Can

A Can any man ſhew that poyſon was prepared by us for you; or that we conſpired with any; or that we corrupted any ſervants with money and gifts; or that we writ any letters againſt thee? yet may calumniation faine every one of theſe upon no occaſion. It is a grievous matter for diſcord to be in a Princes Court; and the hope of dominion, which your Majeſty affirmed to be the reward of piety, doth often impell mens mindes unto hainous offences. But although it be moſt certain that we cannot be convicted of any crime; yet how can we clear our ſelves from accuſations forged againſt us, before them that will not hear us? But did we ſpeak ſome inſolent words; yet were they not againſt thee, O my father (for that had been impietie) but againſt them who tell all they heare. We bewailed our mothers misfortunes. It is true: but not becauſe ſhe is dead, but becauſe after her death ſhe is evill ſpoken of by thoſe, who ought not to doe it. We affect the Kingdome of our father, he being yet alive. Wherein? Is not that purpoſe of ours vain and frivolous, we B having already been graced with Kingly honours? And ſuppoſe we were not; yet might we hope for them. But could we expect them by killing of thee, whom both earth and ſeas would diſdain after ſo execrable an offence? Or could we have expected that the loyaltie of thy ſubjects, and the laws of our nation would have permitted us, having gotten the Kingdome by murthering our father; to have enjoyed the ſame, and entred into the holy Temple, which thou didſt repaire? Or ſuppoſe we deſpiſed them all; yet could any one that murthered thee eſcape, Cæſar being living? Thy children by thee begotten are not ſo impious nor fooliſh, though more infortunate then thy eſtate requires. And ſeeing thou haſt nothing to accuſe us of, or nothing to prove any accuſation laid unto our charge, how canſt thou be perſwaded that we are guilty of ſuch inhumane acts? Is it becauſe our mother was put to death? But her death ought rather to have made us more wary then inſolent and raſh. We could ſpeak more in our own defence, then this, but what need is it to excuſe that which was C never done? Wherefore we beſeech Cæſar (who is Lord of all, and now our Judge) onely this, that if thou canſt, O my father, put away out of thy minde all ſuſpicion of us, to ſuffer us to live hereafter, how unhappy and unfortunate ſoever: for what is more miſerable then to be raſhly accuſed without cauſe? But if thou canſt not, we living, live without fear of us, let us die condemned by our own cenſure. For our lives are not ſo dear unto us, that we deſire to keep them to his moleſtation that beſtowed them upon us.

Cæſar with theſe words, though before not greatly crediting ſuch accuſations and ſlanders laid againſt them, was now more moved to beleeve that they were guiltleſſe; and the rather, for that fixing his eyes upon Herod, he perceived him alſo to be much moved, and all that were preſent were ſorrowfull for the young men: ſo that all courtiers preſent thought hard- D ly of the King, for the abſurd and frivolous accuſation framed againſt them; and the flower of their age, wherein they were now endangered, moved all mens mindes what they could to aſſiſt them: And much more were they incited, after that Alexander had ingenuouſly refuted his fathers accuſations, the accuſed remaining ſtill in the ſame habit and place, and for grief fixing their eies upon the ground. At laſt ſome hope appeared, ſo that the King himſelf ſeemed to need ſome excuſe, for having ſo raſhly accuſed his ſonnes, without any certain proof of his accuſations. At laſt, Cæſar having a while deliberated with himſelf, pronounced that the young men were innocent, and guiltleſſe of the crimes laid unto their charge: yet herein they were culpable, in that they had ſo behaved themſelves, that they gave their fa- E ther occaſion herein to ſuſpect them. And as for Herod, he requeſted him to lay aſide all ſuſpicion, and to be reconciled to his children. For it was unjuſtly done of him to beleeve ſuch forged accuſations againſt thoſe whom he had begotten, and that one might recompenſe another in time to come for their former offences, and renew the good will between them in times paſt, if to aboliſh all ſuſpicions, either did hereafter ſhew himſelf more friendly to other then before. Cæſar having thus admoniſhed the young men they prepared themſelves to intreat their fathers wonted favour: he not expecting ſo long, came and embraced each of them one after another, they weeping exceedingly; and all thoſe that were preſent, both ſervants and others did the like.

All men doe pity the young men.

Cæſar pronounceth the young men herein to have offended, that they gave occaſion of ſuſpicion, and he exhorteth the father to be reconciled to his children.

Herod is reconciled to his children.

Then giving humble thanks unto Cæſar, they departed together: and Antipater with them, F counterfeiting himſelf to congratulate their good hap, for that they were now reconciled unto his father. Within a few daies after, Herod gave Cæſar three hundreth talents, who was now beſtowing his gifts and preſents at Rome, and exerciſing his liberalitie upon the people. And Cæſar again beſtowed upon him halfe of the revenues out of the mines of the mettall in Cyprus; and the other halfe unto the overſeer thereof; and gracing him otherwiſe alſo, he gave him leave to chuſe which of his ſonnes he pleaſed for to ſucceed him in his Kingdome; or if he had rather to diſtribute it amongſt them all: which Herod preſently would have done, but Cæſar would not permit him, affirming, that during his life he ſhould keep

After this, Herod returned again into Judæa, in whoſe abſence the Trachonites that were no ſmall part of his Kingdome, were revolted yet by the induſtry of the Captains he left to overſee all in his abſence, they were conquered again, and forced to doe as they were commanded. As Herod and his ſonnes were ſailing towards home, arriving at Eleuſa a Citie of Cilicia, which is now called Sabaſte, he found Archelaus there, who was King of Cappadocia. Archelaus did courteouſly entertain Herod, and was very joyfull that his ſonnes and he were made friends, and that Alexander his ſonne in law had ſo well cleered himſelf and his brother of the crimes laid unto their charge. And ſo each one beſtowing upon the other princely gifts, they departed taking their leave one of the other. After this, Herod being newly returned into Judæa, and calling the people together into the Temple, told them all that had paſt in his abſence from them, and the courteſie of Cæſar: and told them alſo of other affairs that he thought meet for them to know; and turning the latter end of his ſpeech unto his ſonnes, and exhorting the courtiers and common people to concord, he told them that his ſonnes ſhould reign after him, and firſt of all Antipater: and after him his ſonnes that he had by Mariamme, Alexander and Ariſtobulus; in the mean time every one of them ſhould honour him as King and Lord, notwithſtanding his old age, which for long experience was the fitter to govern, ſeeing there was nothing in him wanting to keep both his ſubjects and children in their obedience; and that the ſouldiers alſo if they onely reſpected him, ſhould live in all happineſſe and felicitie without moleſtation. Having thus ſpoken, he diſmiſſed the people; ſome thinking he had ſpoken according to equitie; others thinking clean contrary: For having now as it were cauſed an emulation amongſt his children, there was as it were already a ſhew of ſome mutation. CHAP. IX.

The yeer of the world, 3957. before Chriſts Nativitie. 7.

ABout this time Cæſarea was finiſhed, the tenth yeer after it was begun to be built, the 28. yeer of Herods reign, in the 192. Olympiade. In the dedication hereof, K there was great pompe and ſumptuous preparations: for all muſicians were brought thither to ſtrive one with another, who was moſt excellent in their art; and champions that wraſtled being naked and anointed with oyle: there was alſo a great many that fought with ſwords, and a great number of ſavage beaſts; and all things elſe that at ſuch times were uſed, and in account, either at Rome or in other countries. Theſe ſports were alſo conſecrated unto Cæſar, and were to be renewed every fifth yeer. All this proviſion the King at his own coſt and charges provided to be brought from any place whatſoever, to ſhew the greatneſſe of his magnificence. Iulia, Cæſars wife alſo beſtowed much of her own to the furniſhing hereof, and ſent many precious things out of Italy; ſo that the worth of them all amounted unto five hundreth talents. And a great company being gathered together to behold theſe ſports, he received all Embaſſadours ſent unto him from other na- L tions, to thank him for the benefits he had beſtowed on them; and he lodged, feaſted and ſported them: and being all day long amongſt the people to ſee thoſe ſports, at night he received them with banquets, and ſhewing them his magnificence; and gained great praiſe and commendations for a worthy King. For, he in all things ſo provided, that the laſt was more pleaſing and gratefull then the firſt, and cauſed him to be more admired. And it is reported that Cæſar himſelf and Agrippa often did ſay, that Herods magnanimyty was greater then his preſent revenues could bear, and that he well deſerved an Empire, as big as all Syria and Egypt. Theſe ſports being ended, he builded another town in a field, called Caparſaba, chuſing for it a watery ſoyle fit for plants: the Citie was compaſſed with a river; M and he alſo planted round about it a wood full of moſt goodly trees. This town he called Antipatris; after his fathers name Antipater. After which he alſo builded a caſtle about Jericho, called after his mothers name, Cypron which was very ſtrongly defenced, and adorned within with rare and ſumptuous edifices. And not forgetting his brother, he dedicated unto him moſt goodly buildings: for firſt he built a tower as bigge as Pharo in the city, in remembrance of his dead brother, and called it by his name Phaſælus, which alſo was the ſtrongeſt hold and defence in all the citie. After this, he builded a town neer unto the vally of Jericho, as one goes towards the north, whereby the fields that before almoſt lay deſart, were now tilled and inhabited by the townſmen; ſo that of them it was named Phaſælus field.

It were hard to recount all his liberality in particular shewed both unto the Cities of Syria and Grecia, and all other places whereſoever he came: for he helped many either by building publick places; or if there were any new works begun, and not finiſhed for want of monie, by giving them monie to finiſh them; the chiefeſt among all which were, that he builded at his own coſt and charge the Temple of Apollo at Rhodes; and gave them many talents of ſilver to build their ſhips. He alſo builded the greateſt part of the publick houſes and places in the citie by Actium, which Cæſar built for the Nicopolitanes there inhabiting, and that with his own proper coſt and charges. He alſo for the Antiochians inhabiting the greateſt citie of Syria, builded porches on each ſide of the greater ſtreet, that goeth quite thorow the midſt of the citie, and doth as it were part it into two; and the ſtreet it
B ſelf that lay open, he paved with poliſhed ſtone; which work was as great a commoditie to the inhabitants, as a beautie unto their Citie. He alſo helped to maintain the ſports at Olympus with yearly revenews, that now for want of maintenance began to decay: ſo that by his means there were more ſolemn ſacrifices, and all things more ſumptuous to pleaſe them that came to behold them: for which his liberalitie he was declared perpetual maſter and maintainer of thoſe ſports. It is admirable to ſee in one man ſuch diverſitie of minds: for on the one ſide if we reſpect his liberalitie and beneficence towards all men, we muſt needs ſay, he was of a moſt free and bountiful nature; contrariwiſe, if we conſider the injuries and crueltie he ſhewed againſt his ſubjects and deareſt friends, we muſt confeſſe him to have been a hard man, and intractable, and who paſſed all bounds of modeſtie; ſo that we would
C think him to have been of two contrarie diſpoſitions. But I am otherwiſe perſwaded, and think that both theſe did proceed from one matter: for becauſe he thirſted after glorie and honour, and wholly applied himſelf thereunto, he became liberal whereſoever he was, in hope either to reap preſent thanks for his labour, or a future remembrance. Wherefore ſpending above his revenewes for this matter, he was forced to be chargeable unto his ſubjects: for it was neceſſary that he that ſo laviſhly beſtowed ſuch huge ſums of money upon others, ſhould ſome where get it, though with evil means. Laſtly, ſeeing himſelf for ſuch like injuries hated of his ſubjects, he thought it a hard matter to get their good wills: which he could do no waies elſe, but by remitting the tribute they paid him. Wherefore he abuſed the hatred of his people for his own commoditie: for if any one of them did not
D tolerate that ſlaverie wherein they lived, or did endeavour to ſhake off the yoke of his dominion, againſt ſuch he uſed a marvellous crueltie; and outraged them no leſſe, then as if they had been his enemies, neither reſpecting friendſhip nor kindred; for that he deſired alone to be honoured of all men. And how greedy of honour he was, we may gueſſe by the honours he did unto Cæſar, Agrippa, and others of their friends: for he deſired to be an example to his ſubjects, that as he himſelf honoured men better then himſelf: ſo they ſhould all honour him likewiſe: thereby declaring what thing he did naturally moſt deſire. But the Jews religion doth not permit them licence to honour Potentates, who of neceſſitie ought to have greater care and reſpect of right and equitie, then of ſuch officiouſneſſe toward ſuperiours: for it was diſprofit enough unto the Jews, that they could not with ſtatues and
E Temples obtain the Kings favour, and with like flatteries ſatisfie the fond appetites of a vainglorious man. And this ſeemeth to me to be the reaſon that Herod was unjuſt, and hard towards his friends, and to thoſe whom he made partakers of his counſels and enterprizes; and frank and bountiful towards ſtrangers.

Of the Embaſſage of the Cyrenian and Aſian Jews unto Cæſar.

F THe Aſian and Cyrenian Iewes were greatly afflicted by the Citizens of thoſe countries, who having had the ſame priviledges granted unto them by the ancient Kings that the Citizens had, were now greatly injured by the Greeks: as though they carried money out of the countrie, and were prejudicial unto the reſt of the inhabitants. And the Greeks making no end of theſe their injuries, they were conſtrained by Embaſſadours to complain of them unto Cæſar: who wrote unto everie Province, that it was his pleaſure that the Iewes ſhould enjoy like priviledges with the other inhabitants of the countrie. The copie of which writing we have here ſet down, that it may the better appear how the Roman Emperours of ancient times were affected unto our Nation.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 10. The Jews of Aſia and Cyrene being afflicted by the inhabitants there ſend an Embaſſage to Cæſar, and do obtain of him immunitie.

Cæsar Augustus Pont. Max. Trib. potestatis, thus decreeth. For as much as the Nation of the Jews hath alwaies been trusty unto the Romans, not onely at this day, but also in all former ages, and especially in the time of our father Cæsar the Emperour, under Hircanus their high Priest: I have ordained, that according to the common sentence of the Senate, they shall live after their countrey laws, under which they lived in the time of Hircanus the high Priest of God: and that their Temple shall retain the right of a sanctuary, and that it shall be lawful for them to send votive money unto Jerusalem by certain persons; and that they shall not be compelled to appear before any Judge upon their Sabbath dayes, or the day before their Sabbaths, after nine of the clock upon the preparation day. And if any one be known to steal the holy books, or holy money laid up in their places appointed for religion, he shall be guilty of sacriledge: and his goods shall be confiscate unto the treasurie of the people of Rome. I also decree for the good will I bear unto all men, that their memorial or request offered unto me by C. Marcus Censorinus, shall together with this my edict be published in that famous place, which all Asia hath dedicated unto my name, to wit, Argyra. And if any shall be so hardy as to do contrary to our decree, he shall be punished extraordinarily. This was engraven in a pillar in Cæsars Temple. Cæsar wisheth health unto Norbanus Flaccus. Let it be lawful for all Jews whersoever living, to carry their sacred money unto Jerusalem, according to their ancient custome, and that no man should forbid them so to do: and this did Cæsar write in favour of the Jews.

Agrippa writ unto the Rulers of Ephesus, in the Jews behalf, and to Syllanus and the Magistrates of Cyrene.

Agrippa also wrote in the Jews behalf, as followeth: Agrippa wisheth health unto the Magistrates, Senate, and people of Ephesus: I will that the Jews living in Asia keep their sacred money, which according to the custome of their countrey, they are wont to send unto Jerusalem: and if any one shall steal their holy money, that the same person, if he flie to a Sanctuary, shall be violently taken away from thence, as a sacriledgious person, and delivered unto the Jews to be punished. He also wrote unto Syllanus the Magistrate, that the Jewes might not be constrained upon their Sabbaths to appear before a Judg. M. Agrippa wisheth health to the Cyrenian Magistrates and Senate. The Jews inhabiting amongst you, for whom Augustus hath alreay written unto Flavius the President of Libya, and unto other Magistrates of that province, are not to be hindred from sending their holy money to Jerusalem, as their custome is: and they have now complained unto me, that they are molested by the false accusations of some bad people, and forbidden to do it under pretence of a certain tribute, which notwithstanding they are not to pay. Wherefore I command that they may be permitted to live after their custome, and free from all such matters: and if in any of your Cities any sacred money of theirs be intercepted, that by certain persons which you know to be fit for that purpose, ye make choice of them, to send it again unto the Jews. Item C. Norbanus Flaccus proconsul: Health unto the Magistrates of Sardinia: Cæsar hath written unto me, commanding that no man hinder the Jews, according to their custome, to send sacred money unto Jerusalem: wherefore I also write unto you of the same, that you may not be ignorant both of my will and Cæsars also. Moreover, Julius Antonius proconsul did also write to this effect: Health unto the Magistrates, Senate and people of Ephesus. The Jews of Asia in the Ides of February, I sitting in the judicial seat at Ephesus, signified unto me that Cæsar Augustus and Agrippa have permitted them to use their countrey customes; and every one, according as he thinketh good, to contribute his first fruits for religion sake, to be carried without let or hinderance unto the Temple of the most mighty God: and they desired me to ratifie by my consent, that which they had already granted them by the above named Emperours. Wherefore I would have you to know, that I also, according unto Cæsars and Agrippas decrees and ordinances, do permit and grant them also to do all things they please, according to their countrey customes, forbidding any man to hinder them therein.

I have thought good to annex these decrees, for that I know that these my writings will come unto the Grecians hands, that I may shew them, that in former ages we were so esteemed of the publick Magistrates, that none were permitted to hinder us from using our countrey rites and ceremonies, and that by their consent we worshipped God in our own religion which I do inculcate the oftner, that I may move strange and forrain nations, and take away their hatred conceived against us, which is without all reasonable cause. For no nation doth alwaies use the same customes, but almost whole towns among them do sometimes alter and differ from the rest; yet is justice equallie to be destributed unto all men; which is most profitable, as well to the Greeks as to other barbarous nations, which is greatly observed in our laws; which if we follow and violate not, are able to make all nations love us. Wherfore we request all men not to despise us, for that we differ from them in religion; but favour us in

A in that we follow vertue. For this is common to all nations, and without this, mans life cannot ſtand. But I will now return unto my hiſtory.

CHAP. XI.

How Herod, having need of money, opened Davids Sepulchre.

HErod ſpending laviſhly much and many ſums of money, both at home and abroad, hearing that Hircanus who reigned before him, opened Davids Sepulchre, and took out of it three thouſand talents of ſilver and that there was left B yet far more, able to defray any great charges whatſoever, he long time purpoſed to do the like. And at this time in the night ſeaſon accompanied onely with his moſt truſty friends, being very wary that none of the people ſhould know of it, he entred into the Sepulchre; but he found no money there, as Hircanus did; but he took from thence a great company of precious attires and ornamens of Gold, whereby he was inticed to make a more diligent ſearch: and he ſent two of his company for the nonce into the inner part of the Sepulchre, where the bodies of Solomon and David were intombed; who were there loſt, and as it is reported, fire came out of thoſe ſecret places and conſumed them. Whereat Herod being terrified, departed out of it; and moved with religion to make ſatisfaction he builded a moſt ſumptuous monument of white marble, at the entrance into C the Sepulchre: of which building Nicholaus alſo a writer of that time, maketh mention; but he ſpeaketh not how they went into the Sepulchre of David, thinking that therein he ſhould not keep decorum, if he ſhould make mention thereof. Wherein he followed this accuſtomed order: for his writings were to come to the ears of the King yet living, wherein he did onely curry favour, mentioning onely that, that might redound unto the Kings credit: ſo that many of his open and wicked pranks, he did either colour under ſome other pretence, or elſe all waies poſſible he endeavoureth to hide them. For he doth as it were tell a tale of Herods cruelty againſt Mariamme and his ſonnes; as though he did thereby deſerve credit and praiſe, accuſing her of adultery, and them as Traitors unto their father: and this he doth D clean through his works, too much extolling the Kings good deeds, and too diligently excuſing his bad deeds and iniquities. But as I have ſaid, we muſt pardon him, who did not ſo much write to leave a memory of things done unto after ages, as to gratifie and pleaſe his King. But I, who come of the linage of the Aſmonian Kings, and execute the office of a Prieſt, account it a ſhame to lie: and do intend truly to recount the hiſtory of all things that were acted and done, yet with a reverence of the poſterity of that King, who do alſo now bear ſway and rule; yet with their pardon and leave, having a greater care to the verity of our hiſtory, then to them.

The deſire of gold.

Joſeph came of the Prieſtly line of the Aſmonians.

A diſcord in Herods houſe.

After the Sepulchre was thus violated, Herods houſe began to decay, whether revenge lighting upon that part which was already ſcarce ſound, or whether by meer chance ſuch calamitie at that time befel him, as might juſtly be thought the reward of impiety. For E there was a diſcord in the Court not unlike to civill wars, every one ſtriving againſt other with hatred and forged accuſations: but eſpecially Antipaters politick practice againſt his brethren was to be noted, who intangled them by other mens forged accuſations, himſelf oftentimes ſeemed to take upon him their defence, that making a ſhew of good will unto them, he might ſecretly oppreſſe them the ſooner; and he did ſo craftily circumvent his father, that his father deemed him to be his onely conſerver. Wherefore the king commended Ptolomeus his procurator unto Antipater his ſonne, and did communicate all his ſecrets unto his mother, ſo that all things were done according as they pleaſed, and they made him diſpleaſed with thoſe, againſt whom they knew the kings diſpleaſure might redound unto their profit.

Antipaters craſty plotting againſt his brethren.

F But Mariammes children did every day ſtomach the matter more and more, diſdaining to give place unto their inferiour: and for their nobility not enduring to be removed from their places, and not to keep their indignity alſo, their wives did the like, and Alexanders wife Glaphyra who was the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia, did greatly envy and diſdain Salome, and ſhe alſo her again, both for the love that ſhe bare unto her husband, and for that ſhe diſdained (as women are wont) that her daughter married unto Ariſtobulus, ſhould be in equall honour with her. Pheroras alſo the King brother had a hand in this other contention about a private cauſe of ſuſpicion and hatred. For he fell ſo farre in love with one of his maides, that he refuſed the Kings daughter offered unto him, rather making choice of his maid. Herod took this in very ill part, ſeeing his brother (who had received ſo many benefits at his hands, and was almoſt his fellow in his kingdome by his means) not to ſhew the like brotherly affection to him again as he then ought, and himself to be an unhappy brother. And seeing he could not diſſwade him from that madneſſe, he married his daughter unto Phaſælus his ſon: and afterward thinking that now his brothers mind towards his maid was ſatisfied, he complaining of his injurious dealing, in repulſing his daughter, offered unto him to wife, he now offered him another of his daughters named Cypros. Then Ptolomeus adviſed Pheroras not ſtill to contemn his brothers offer, and perſiſt in ſuch folly; telling him it was meer folly therefore to incur the Kings diſpleaſure and hatred, and loſſe of tranquillitie. Pheroras underſtanding this counſel profitable for him, having been once before injuriouſly accuſed, and obtained pardon at the Kings hands; ſent away his maid, by whom he now had a ſon, and promiſed the King to marry this his other daughter, and appointed the thireeenth day after to celebrate his marriage; making a ſolemn oath unto the King, never after that time to uſe the company of that woman whom he had put away. The time appointed being expired, he fell ſo far in love with the former woman, that he would not ſtand to his promiſe, but again accompanied with his miad.

Then Herod not able any longer to contain himſelf, uſed many ſpeeches, whereby he evidently ſhewed his mind to be alienated from his brother. And there were many who taking hereat oppertunity; did by forged calumniations encreaſe his alienation: ſo that now there was no day nor hour paſt, wherein he did not ſtill hear ſome new alterations and ſtirs amongſt his deareſt friends; whom nature willed to combine themſelves to maintain concord and amity. For Salome being now offended at Mariammes children, did not permit her daughter married unto Ariſtobulus, one of the young men, to enjoy mutual love and comfort of her husband, enticing her to bewray her husbands ſecret talke; and if ſhe heard any ſmall occaſions of offence (as often it falleth out) ſhe ſhould the more aggravate them with ſuſpicions, whereby ſhe alſo learned all their ſecrets, and made the young woman hate her husband. And ſhe to pleaſe her mother, recounted how that often when her husband and Alexander were alone, that then they were wont to talke of Marriamme their mother, and uſe reproachful words againſt their father; and threatning, that if they ever did obtain the Kingdome, they would make the ſons of the King, whom he had by other wives, notaries and town clarks, and ſo they might reape profit of their learning which they now ſtudied for: and whenſoever they ſaw any of the Kings wives wear any of Mariammes apparel, that then they vowed inſtead of that attire, to cloath them with ſackcloth and ſhut them up where they ſhould never ſee Sun. Salome preſently told all this to the King: who though he were much grieved hereat, yet he choſe rather to ſeek to amend it, then to puniſh them: for he was greatly incited againſt then by ſuſpicion, and every day waxing worſe and worſe, at laſt he believed all the reports of any whomſoever. But he then contented onely ſharpely to chide his ſons, and pacified with their excuſes and anſwers, he for that time was quiet.

But preſently the miſchief was again ſet on foot: for Pheroras the Kings brother, meeting Alexander, who (as we have ſaid) was Glaphyra her husband, who was daughter to Archelaus, he told him that he heard by Salome, that Herod was far in love with Glaphyra, ſo that he could not ſhake off this affection. The young man hearing this, became jealous, and was in a great rage; and now what honour ſoever or gifts Herod for the love of his ſon gave her, Alexander did interpret it in the worſt ſenſe, being now made jealous by that which he had heard of Pheroras; and not able to put up ſuch injuries as he thought; he went unto his father, & with tears recounted unto him what Pheroras had told him. But Herod was hereat the more enflamed, not enduring himſelf falſly to be accuſed of ſo ſhameful a fact, inveighing againſt the great malice of his friends, who for his great good turns he did them, ſo rewarded him. And preſently ſending for Pheroras, very ſharpely began to chide him, ſaying: O moſt impious that liveth amongſt men! art thou become ſo ungrateful, either to ſpeak or think ſuch a matter of us? Thinkeſt thou that I do not perceive thy drift; that thou ſpakeſt not theſe words unto my ſon to diſcredit me, but alſo to the intent by this means thou mighteſt work ſome treaſon againſt me, and cauſe me to be poiſoned? For who but a good ſon, as this is, would ſuffer his father, ſuſpected for ſuch a matter, to live, and not to be revenged of him for ſuch offence? Whether doſt thou think that thou didſt put theſe ſpeeches into his mind, or by them a ſword into his hand to kill his father withal? or what was thy intent, ſeeing thou hateſt both him and his brother; and onely counterfeiting good will toward me, to belie me, and to report that of me, that without impiety could not be thought: get thee hence, thou wretched imp, ſeeing thou haſt thus abuſed thy brother, who hath well deſerved at thy hands; and do as thou wilt all thy life time, my ſelf will endeavour to be better unto my children, then I have been; and neither will I puniſh them as they deſerve, but I will

Herod greatly moved againſt Pheroras, for affirming that he was in love with Glaphyra

A will honour them above their merits. The King having discharged his choler against his brother Pheroras, and he being taken in a manifest fault, answered, that that report was first devised by Salome, of whom he heard it: which she (being then present) hearing, began to exclaime, saying, it was not her devise, and that they all laboured to make the King hate her, and put her to death, being one who did especially wish him well; and what in her lay, seeking his safetie, and that now he was in danger of more treason then ever before: for (said she) I was the onely cause that you did put away the woman, whom you so doated after, perswading you to marry the Kings daughter: and this is the cause that you hate me. With these speeches tearing her hair, and striking her brest, she made a shew of B innocency: but this her gesture was a colour to hide her bad intent. So Pheroras was left in great perplexitie, not knowing what to say or do; and finding no pretence to excuse his fact: for on the one side he confessed, that he told it unto Alexander and on the other, he could not make Herod believe, that he heard it of Salome. This contention endured a good while: at last the King being wearied, sent away his brother and his sister: and greatly commending his sons moderate mind, and that he had given him intelligence of those speeches, very late in the night, he went to supper.

The year of the world, 3957. before Christs nativitie, 7.

Salome excuseth her self.

After this contention, Salome was hardly thought of, because she was judged to be the author of this ill report, and the Kings wives wished evil unto her, because they knew her to be of strange qualities and hard to please, and so variable, that according to the time, one
C while she would professe friendship, and presently after hatred. Wherefore they still had something to inform Herod of against her, taking occasion hapning by chance, which was this: There was a King of the Arabians, named Obodas, a sloathful man, and one given to idlenesse: and there was one Syllæus that did govern all his affairs; this man was a crafty fellow, and in the prime of his youth, and very beautiful. This Syllæus coming unto Herod about some businesse, and viewing Salome, who then sate at supper with him, began to set his mind upon her: and finding she was a widow, he entred into talke with her: and she finding her brother now not so friendly unto her as before he had been, and also intangled with the beauty of this young man, did not greatly deny to marry him; and many feasts
D being made at that time, they shewed evident signs of their mutual consent, and love one unto another. The Kings wives told the King of this in scoffing sort. Herod herewith not contented, demanded of Pheroras how the matter stood, and willed him at supper time to note if he could espie any tokens of familiaritie betwixt them: and Pheroras told him that by signs and mutual viewing one another, they sufficiently shewed their intents. After this the Arabian being suspected, departed into his own countrey. But two or three moneths after he came again into Judæa onely for this purpose, and talked with Herod touching this matter, requesting him to let Salome be his wife: affirming that that affinitie would be profitable unto him for the traffick between his people and the Arabians, whose Prince he was to be, and did already enjoy a great part of the dominion. Herod told all this unto his sister, and asked her if she would marry him; and she answered, she would. Then they requested that E Syllæus should become a Jew in religion, or else it was not lawful for him to marry her. He would not condescend hereunto, affirming that he should be stoned to death by his people, if he did it; and so he departed without obtaining his purpose. From that time forth, Pheroras, and especially the Kings wives accused Salome of intemperancie, affirming that she had had the company of the Arabian. Now Herod determined to marry his daughter unto Salomes son, whom Pheroras refused for the love of his maid, which son of Salomes was her eldest that she had by Costabarus; and that to shew his good will toward Salome his sister. But he was disswaded by Pheroras, who told him that the young man would never love such a father in law, because of his fathers death, perswading him rather to marry her to his eldest F son, who was to succeed him in his Tetrarchy, which he easily perswaded the King unto, and so obtained pardon for his former offence. Wherefore the spousals being changed, the maid was married unto the young man, who had a hundred talents in dowry with her, more then otherwise should have been given with her.

The effect of calumniation.

Syllæus the Arabian desiring Salome to wife, was denied.

Herod married his daughter to Pheroas son.

But all this while this dissension of Herods house did not cease, but rather increased, he having a shameful beginning, and coming to a sorrowful end. Herod had three Eunuches, whom he greatly esteemed for their beautie: one of them was his butler; the other his cook; and the third his chamberlain: whom also he was wont to employ in serious affairs of his Kingdome. Some one or other informed the King, that these three Eunuches were corrupted by his son Alexander with great sums of money, and being upon tortures examined if they had accompanied with him, they confessed all: yet they affirmed that they knew no practice of his attempted against his father. But their torments being increased by Antipaters favourites, they were forced to confesse that Alexander secretly hated his father, and he exhorted them to forsake Herod, who was now good for nothing; who dissembled his age by painting his face to make himself seem younger then he was, and colouring his head and beard black, which were already grown very white through age: but rather set their minds upon him, who would in despight of his father enjoy his kingdome due unto him, and that then he would advance them to the highest honours of the kingdom: for he had not onely title unto it by his birth, but also was now prepared likewise to invade it; and that he had many of the Captains, of the souldiers, and many of the Kings friends on his side, who were prepared to do or endure any thing for his sake. G

Herod hearing this, fear and anger did invade him, by reason that his sons words seemed both contumelious and threatning: and being for both these causes in a rage, he feared some greater matter to be put in practice against him, which he could not suddenly, and having so little warning avoid; and not daring to make open inquiry, he set secret spies awork, to tell him how all matters stood, himself now mistrusting all men, and accounting it his securitie to mistrust all, even them that deserved it not: and not moderating his suspicious mind, now whosoever was the neerest unto him, was the most suspected, as of most power to injure him. As for others, that were but onely named by his spies, he presently esteemed it his safety to put them to death. Then they of his household, every one being carefull to save himself, were one turned against another, every one deeming it his own safetie to prevent others, by accusing them unto Herod: which done, presently they incited other mens envy against him, and every one of them to desire such measure as they had measured unto others: and thus they also revenged their private quarrels; and presently after, they themselves were taken and did by other mens means suffer the like, being entrapped in the same trap they set for their enemies. For the King did quickly repent himself, because he had put very many to death, who were not convicted: yet for all that, he was not hereby admonished to beware of the like hereafter; but on his repentance for their death, raged so far, as to cause him to inflict the same punishment upon the accusers, which he had done upon them. So great trouble and fear then fell upon all the whole Court. He then commanded many of his deerest friends, and them especially whose fidelitie he had beforetimes experienced, not to come in his sight, nor within his court gates. For he did now shake off the friendship between Andromachus and Gemellus and himself, who were his ancient friends, and oftentimes had gone Embassadours for him, and alwaies been of his counsel, and had been tutors unto his children, in whom he had alwaies reposed more trust then in any others: the one of them, for that his son Demetrius was familiar with Alexander; and Gemellus, for that he knew him to wish well unto Alexander: for he was one of them who had brought him up, and had aboad with him at his being at Rome. And no doubt but he had censured them with some more heavy sentence, had it not been that they were so eminent persons. Wherefore at that time he was contented to have banished them, and deprived them of all their authority, to the end, that having disgraced these good men, he might the more freely play the Tyrant. Antipater was the cause of all this mischief, who from the first time that he perceived his father to be fearful and suspicious, still after that joyned with him as counseller, and as it were increased his rage and cruelty; and then he galantly played his part, endeavouring, that whosoever would resist him, should be made away. Wherefore Andromachus and the rest of his friends being now banished the Court; the King presently tortured all that he imagined any way to favour Alexander, to see if they were guilty, or if they knew of any treason to be practised against him: but they knowing nothing to inform him of, died amidst their torments. Where he so much more tortued others, for that contrary to his opinion, he found not so much as an evil thought against him; Antipater craftily interpreting it, that they had rather in torments conceal the truth, then to shew themselves not trusty to their masters and friends: wherefore many being taken, he caused them to be tortured to get something out of some of them. At last one amongst the rest, not able to endure those torments imposed, upon him, said; that he had often heard Alexander say, so often as any one commended his goodly stature, or skilful shooting, and the rest of his vertues, that these qualities nature bestowed upon him rather then other benefits; for his father for envy hereat was offended: so that when he talked with him, he did upon purpose draw his body together, lest his father should perceive the taleneſſe of his stature; and that when he went a hunting with him, he upon purpose did misse the mark he could have hit, because he knew his father could not endure that he should be commended. And whilest these words were considered, and pondred, and his torments intermitted, he again accused Alexander to have conspired with his brother Aristobulus, to kill his father when he was hunting, and then to flie with speed unto Rome, H I K L M

Many were tortured and examined for Alexanders cause.

A Rome, and begge the kindgome of Cæsar. There were also found some of this young mans letters written unto his brother, complaining of the injurious dealing of his father, who had given certain grounds unto Antipater, the yearly revenwes whereof amounted unto two hundred talents. Then Herod thinking himself to have probability enough, his former suspition was now confirmed, and so he took Alexander and cast him in prison: and again he began to rage, notwithstanding that himself did scarcely believe the informations against him: neither could he himself devise any cause wherefore they should seek to work treason against him. And those complaints seemed childish: neither was it probable that having openly killed his father, he would afterwards have gone to Rome. Wherefore endeavouring to find some stronger argument of his sons impiety, and because he would not be thought rashly to have committed his son to prison, he caused the most noble and eminent of all B Alexanders well-willers to be tortured, and they confessing n o such matter as he expected, he put them to death.

The year of the world, 3957. before Christs Nativity, 7.

Alexander being in prison, his freinds were tortured.

One accused Alexander to have sent letters to Rome against his father.

Whilest thus all the Court did resound with fear, torments, and contentions, a certain man accused Alexander to have sent letters to his friends at Rome, to intreat them to cause him to be sent for by Cæsar thither, that he might accuse his father of certain conspiracies against Cæsar, and how he more esteemed the friendship of Mithridates King of the Parthians, then the friendship of the Romans; affirming also, that he had poyson ready prepared at Ascalon. Herod hearing this, was comforted by the Parasites about him, as having not done any thing rashly; and so he gave now full credit unto all: yet the poyson was diligently C sought for, but could not be found. Alexander being now oppressed with this calamity, he yet took courage, and because he would more incite his fathers displeasure against him, he did not deny it: perhaps meaning to make his father ashamed of himself, forgiving credit so easily unto forged tales; or at least, if he could not effect that, entangle all the Court and him too in calamity and misery: Which that he might the better do, he writ four little books, and sent them unto his father, telling him that it was needlesse to use any more torments, for indeed treason was intended against him, and that Pheroras and his most trusty friends were herein conspirators: And that in the night time Salome came secretly unto him, and as it were forced him to lie with her; and that all of them aymed at this mark, to have him made away, that so they might enjoy their wished liberty. He also accused Ptolomeus D and Sapinnius of this conspiracie, who were more faithful unto their King, then all others: so that now these men, who before were most friendly one to another, began like mad men to rage one against another: and punishment so hastily pursued every one, that they had no leisure given them to speak in their own defence: neither was their punishment deferred till their cause was tried, and the truth known, that some were bound and imprisoned, others som presently put to death, other laughed in their sleeves to see rhat day, yet discontented for that any delay was used for their punishment: so that the Kings Court was now greatly defaced with sorrow and heavinesse, wherewith the wonted felicitie thereof was destroyed. Herod himself amidst these calamities, could not but be weary of his life, who not daring to trust himself in any bodies hand, he was tormented with a daily and hourly fear of some E untimely death, that would befall him: and many times perswaded himself, that he did see his sons before him with a drawn sword ready to kill him; and this was his cogitation night and day, so that herewith he almost ran mad.

Alexander confesseth the treason, and who had a hand in it.

Herod was so troubled with the contention in his house, that he was weary of his life.

CHAP. XII.

WHilest Herod was thus troubled in his mind, Archelaus King of Cappado- F cia careful for his daughter, and the young man his son in law, and pitying his friend Herod entangled in such calamities; he thought it his duty to make a journey unto him. And finding him so affected as it was reported unto him before his comming, he thought it an unfit way to argue him of too much credulitie and rashnesse; perceiving that thereby he would be rather exasperated, so much the more labouring to excuse himself. Wherefore Archelaus devised another way to appease these troubles. Wherefore he counterfeited indignation against the young man, approving all the Kings actions for good; affirming that he would break the band of wedlock between his daughter and Alexander, and that if she knew of the conspiracy, and did not inform the King thereof, himself would punish her. Then Herod, contrary to his expectation, seeing Archelaus so angry for the offence committed against him, began to remit his anger: and now with just confide-consideration weighing what he had done, by little and little, he began to have a fatherly affection, and to be hereby moved to compassion; yet so oft as any one sought to excuse the young man, he grew to be very angry thereat: but when Archelaus also began to accuse him, then Herods heart relented, and he with tears besought Archelaus not to yeeld too much to anger, nor for the young mans offence break off the marriage. Then Archelaus perceiving him to relent, began to turn the matter against Herods friends, as the causers of all this mischief, who had corrupted the young man, who of himself was void of malice; and especially he aggravated the matter against Pheroras the Kings brother. Pheroras having now incured the Kings displeasure, perceived that none could so soon reconcile him unto the King, as Archelaus; wherefore clothed in black, and making other signs as though he despaired of his life, he went unto him; who did not deny to help him what he could: yet he told him that it was no easie matter for him to pacifie the King so highly offended, perswading him rather himself to go unto the King his brother, and crave pardon of him; confessing himself to have been cause of all this mischief; by which confession of his the Kings wrath would be greatly appeased, and so he also should have better occasion to entreat for him. Pheroras followed his counsel, which fell out happily for them both: for the young man, contrary to any ones expectation, was freed from all his troubles, and Archelaus made Pheroras and Herod friends; and he himself having now gotten great friendship of the King in those his adverse and troublous times of his, he returned joyfully into Cappadocia, being rewarded with rich gifts, and being accounted of as Herods chiefest friend. They also agreed amongst themselves, that Herod should go to Rome, because he had already written unto Cæsar, concerning this matter: and they both went together unto Antiochia, and there Herod reconciled Titus the President of Syria unto Archelaus and so he returned into Judæa.

CHAP. XIII.

How the Trachonites revolted.

WHilest Herod going to Rome was absent from his kingdome, the Arabian wars began, hereby taking an occasion: The inhabitants of Trachon, whose countrie Cæsar taking from Zenodorus gave it unto Herod, being forbidden and hindred from stealing, were now forced to frame themselves to live like husband-men in more civilitie then before: but this kind of life pleased them not; neither did their countrey yeeld fruits worth their labours; yet at first Herod compelling them thereunto, they abstained from injuring the inhabitants bordering upon them, which did greatly redound unto Herods credit, by whose diligence they were brought unto it. But when Herod was sailed into Italy to accuse Alexander, and to commend Antipater unto Cæsar, the Trachonites hearing a bruit of his death, revolted and turned to their accustomed robberies: Yet were they at that time again subdued in the Kings absence by the captains that he left at home; and fourteen of the chiefest of the theeves amongst them being taken the rest terrified by their example left their own countrey, and fled into Arabia, where Syllæus received them, in revenge that he could not obtain Salome for his wife: and receiving of him a strong hold to dwell in, they did not onely make incursions, and rob and spoil the borders of Judæa, but also of Cœlosyria, and drave away the preys they got, into the place allotted them, Syllæus protecting them and their villanies. Herod returning from Rome, found that his people were greatly endamaged by these theeves: and seeing he could not subdue them, by reason the Arabians did protect them, not enduring that injury, and entering into Trachon, he killed all their families: whereby they were so much the more enraged against his countrey, for they had a law amongst them, whereby they were commanded to revenge the death of their families, and so contemning all dangers, they came and wasted all Herods countrey with continuall incursions. Then the King complained hereof unto Saturninus and Volumnius then Presidents sent thither by Cæsar; requesting that he might have the theeves to punish them. They hearing this news, with as much speed as they might, gathered their forces together, and making themselves stronger then they were before, with sudden incursions wasted all where they came, destroying both the fields and villages, and killing all they could find; so that now this resembled a war, rather then a robbery: for now they were a thousand in number. Wherefore Herod required these theeves and robbers to be delivered unto him, and required the debt that Obodas ought him, for Herod had lent Obodas threescore talents, and sent them unto him by Syllæus, and now the time was expired wherein the money was to be repayed. But Syllæus, who had taken all the rule from Obodas, & himself now governed all, denyed that those theeves were in Arabia, and deferred the payment of the monie: so that

But there was no one Arabian that either had fled unto Herod for any offence committed, nor for any other cause: but the Arabians were convicted to receive the theeves that fled from Herod.

How Herod went into Arabia with an army.

B WHen the day was come that was appointed, Syllæus not minded to stand unto the agreement made, went in the mean time to Rome; But Herod exacted his money, and the theeves to be restored unto him, Saturninus and Volumnius permitting him with force of armes to persecute those obstinate people: so he levying an army, went into Arabia, in three dayes space going as far as ordinarily men are wont to march in seven, and coming unto the Castle wherein the theeves kept, at the first onset he took it and destroyed it, being called Repta, and did no other harme unto the inhabitants. And a captain of the Arabians, named Nacebus, came to succour the theeves, and so fought with Herods army, in which battel a few of Herods men were slain, but of the Arabians were C slain five and twenty, with their General, and the rest were put to flight. Being thus revenged upon the theeves, he led three thousand Idumæans into Trachon to keep the inhabitants from robbing, and sent letters unto the Romane Governours, who abode in Phœnicia, that he had onely used the authority which they gave him against the rebellious Arabians that resisted him, and nothing else: which afterward also, they making enquiry, they found true.

Herod by the permission of Saturninus and Volumninus, entred into Arabia with an army, and destroyed the Castle called Repta.

How Syllæus accused Herod unto Cæsar.

D BUt then were messengers hastily sent unto Syllæus at Rome, and informed him otherwise, aggravating every thing according to their fashion. Syllæus being new before insinuated into Cæsars acquaintance, by chance was then also about the Palace; and hearing these news, he presently changed his apparel, and clothing himself in black, he went in this manner unto Cæsar, informing him how Arabia was afflicted with wars, and that the whole Kingdome was wasted by Herod, who had entred into the countrey with an army, and with tears complained that that 2000. and 500. of the Arabian nobility were slain, and amongst them his friend and kinsman Nacebus, and great riches were taken away, which were laid up at Repta, and that all this was done in contempt of Obodes who had no army ready, nor a fit Captain for his forces, he being not there, Syllæus having E thus spoken, adding moreover, that he would not have come to Rome, but that he was perswaded that Cæsar would have had a care of the common peace, and tranquillity of his subjects, and that had he been at home, Herod to his cost should have violated that peace: Cæsar hereat was greatly moved, and enquired of some of Herods friends, who were then present, and of certain men that were lately come out of Syria also, whether Herod had led an army out of the limits of his own Kingdome. Which they not denying, and Cæsar not vouchsafing to hear the cause why, his displeasure against Herod was greatly increased, so that he writ threatning letters unto him; telling him that hitherto he had used him as a friend, but hereafter he would use him as a subject; which also Syllæus signified unto the Arabians. By F which letters of his they were made proud, and would neither render unto him the theeves that were escaped, nor restore the money he lent their King; nor pay him rent for the pasture ground that they hired of him; boulstering themselves herewith, that the King had offended Cæsar. Moveover, the Trachonites hearing this, rebelled against the garrison of the Idumæans; and joyning with the Arabian theeves, who wasted their countrey, not so much respecting their own gain as their revenge and particular profit, they did many mischiefs, and exercised great cruelty against them. Herod did put up all injuries, and durst not once mutter, Cæsar being offended at him; for the which cause he was not so couragious nor valiant as before. For first of all, Cæsar would not admit his Embassadours, whom he sent to plead his cause before Cæsar, and Herod again sending other Embassadours, Cæsar sent them back again, their businesse undone.

Syllæus accused Herod unto Cæsar.

The Arabians and Trachonites, understanding that Cæsar was offended with Herod rejoyce thereat.

Wherefore Herod being in this perplexity, greatly feared Syllæus, who being now at Rome did

did easily perswade Cæsar any thing; for that Cæsar was now very credulous; and Syllæus G aimed at some greater matter. For Obodas dying, Eneas succeeded him in the Kingdome of Arabia, changing his name, called himself Aretas: whom Syllæus: by forged calumniati-ons did seek to depose from the crown, and usurp the kingdome unto himself, giving great sums of monie unto the courtiers, and promising great sums unto Cæsar; whom he now perceived to be angrie against Aretas, for that without his consent he presumed to take upon him the government of the kingdome. But at last he also sent letters and gifts unto Cæsar, and amongst the rest a crown of gold worth many talents, and in those letters he accused Syllæus, who as an impious and disloyal servant had poysoned his King Obodas; in whose life-time he had also invaded the govenment of the kingdome, committing adulterie with H the Arabians wives, getting together other mens money, thereby to obtain the kingdome.
Cæsar would not permit these Embassadors to have audience; but refusing their gifts, suffered them to depart without obtaining that they came for. In the mean time the affairs of Judæa and Arabia every day became worse and worse, every one seeking to trouble the estate of both Kingdomes, and no man endeavouring to quiet them. For the King of Arabia was not yet established in his Kingdome, and therefore could not controul his subjects. And Herod feared that if he did defend himself, he should so much the more incite Cæsar against him; and so was forced to put up all injuries that were done unto him: and finding no end of his miseries, he finally determined to send again to Rome Embassadors, to see if by the help of his friends, Cæsar might be perswaded to think better of him, and so committed that Embassage unto Nicholaus of Damasco, and sent him to Rome. I

Of Eurycles his calumniations against Herods sons.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 11. al. 17.

AT this time the dissention of Herods house was much increased; and although at all other times his Court was never void of suspition, which is a pernitious evil to Kings and Princes, yet at that time especially this mischief was in his principal vigor and force. For one Eurycles a Lacedemonian and a noble man of his countrie, but having a turbulent wit given over to flatterie and pleasure, yet cunningly dissembling both vices, coming unto Herod and given him gifts, and receiving greater gifts at his hands, K was by him courteously entertained; and familiarlie conversing with him, brought it so to passe that he was received amongst his especial friends. This Eurycles lodged at Antipaters house; being also familiar with Alexander for their often meeting one another: for he said that Archelaus King of Cappadocia and himself was great friends, and therefore he counterfeited himself to reverence Glaphyra very much; and all men judging him indifferent unto all parties, he diligently noted whatsoever past, and every word that was spoken, seeking by all means he could, matter to gratifie others carrying of tales; and with such flattering fair speeches he insinuated himself into every mans friendship, that he seemed as Alexanders sole trusty friend, and to use other men as it behoved a friend. L And by this his deceit, he so insinuated himself into Alexanders favour, that the young man thought him to be his onely friend, unto whom he might impart his secrets; so that Alexander opened unto him his grief, for that his father was something alienated from him, and recounted unto him his mothers misfortune, and that Antipater had now gotten all authoritie and dignitie from him and his brother, and was the onely man that could do all; and that these injuries were no longer tolerable, their father being now incited against them, that now he would neither admit them unto his counsels, nor banquets. And he committed his griefs (as he then thought) into his friends bosom. But Eurycles told Antipater all, affirming that though it nothing concerned him, yet he could not but speak of it for the greatnesse of the danger then imminent, willing him to beware of Alexander, who did not stick M openly to shew what mind he bare, but did as it were manifestly shew that he desired to make away his father. Which done, he received of Antipater most rich gifts, as pledges of his good will towards him; and finally he was by him perswaded to relate his news himself unto Herod. The King lent a greedy ear whilest he recounted Alexanders malice; and was so moved with the circumstances of his speeches, that he conceived a deadly hatred against his son, which also without further delay he did make manifest: for he rewarded Eurycles for his pains with fifty talents. Which he having received, went unto Archelaus, and talking and speaking well of Alexander, recounted unto him in what stead he had stood him in reconciling him unto his father: and receiving of him also a sum of money, he departed before his malice was discovered; and returned into his countrey, and using the like shifts

Eurycles by craft got money of Archelaus.

A there also, he was finally by his countrey-men banished from Lacedemonia. Furthermore, Herod not content now, as before he was, to hear onely that which was told him of Alexander and Aristobulus, did now himself also conceive a proper hatred against them, himself observing all things, and making diligent enquiry though no man accused them, and permitting all men to speak what they list against them. And amongst the rest, Evagrus of Cous had conspired with Alexander, and he seemed now to hear no talk more willingly then this, and such like. But then greater misfortunes then all the rest befell the young men; false accusations never ceasing to be forged against them, and every one as it were, striving to accuse them of some crime or other unto the King, pretending the care they bare of his safety.

Hegesip. & Ruffinus, chap 10. Herod doth give care unto the accusers of Alexander and Aristobulus.

B Herod had two champions, Iucundus and Tyrannus; both acceptable and gratefull unto him, for their strength and tall stature and bigness of body: these two for some offence were banished the Court, and received into Alexanders service, and placed amongst his stipendary horsemen, and for that they were very active, he bestowed many gifts and much money upon them. Whereat the King presently conceiving suspition, began to torture them, and after many torments they confessed that Alexander had hired them to kill Herod as he was a hunting wilde beasts: for so it might easily be bruited abroad, that he falling off his horse, fell upon his own lance, and so was slain: which once before had almost happened unto him. They also declared unto him, that certain gold was hidden and buried in the stable: and they also accused Herods chief Huntsman, that at Alexanders command he had given Alexanders servants the kings lances and his armour.

Iucundus and Tyrannus confesse that Alexander did allicite them to kill Herod as he was a hunting.

C After them the Prefect of the castle of Alexandrium, was taken and examined upon tortures, and it was objected against him, that he promised to receive them into the Castle, and to deliver unto them the kings treasure there. But he denying it, his own sonne affirmed all to be true, and brought forth letters to testifie the same, resembling Alexanders hand written to this effect: So soon as by Gods assistance we have done that which we intend to do, we will presently come unto you: be carefull therefore, that according to your promise you do receive us into your Castle. Herod having had a view of these Letters, did now without any hesitation believe, that indeed some treacherous practise was plotted against him by his sonnes. But Alexander affirmed,

How Alexander writ unto the captain of Alexandrium to receive him.

D that Diophantus the scribe had counterfeited his hand, and that the Letter was Antipaters devise. For Diophantus was accounted cunning in such matters, and afterward being taken with the like, he was therefore put to death. And the king produced them that had been tortured at Jericho before the people to accuse his sonnes, where they were stoned to death, and the people hereat moved, would also have killed Alexander and Aristobulus, with the same death. But Herod, by the means of Ptolomeus and Pheroras did restrain them, and commanded the young men to be cast into prison, and there to be kept so streight that no man was admitted unto them; but many spies were set, who should narrowly mark all their actions and words; and now they were accounted as condemned men, both by other mens opinions, and also by their own. One of them; to wit, Aristobulus, for grief inviting his aunt, and mother in law to compassionate his present calamity, and to hate him that was the author hereof, Diophantus the scribe doth counterfeit other mans hands.

Alexander and Aristobulus are imprisoned: and Aristobulus warneth his mother in law.

E affirmed that she also was in great danger, being accused, in hope to marry with Syllaus, to have signified unto him by Letters all that past in Herods Court. Which words the woman presently came and recounted unto her brother Herod. The king no longer able to bridle his fury, commanded them both to be bound and kept in severall places one from another and each of them to write what they had plotted against their father: and being thus commanded, they wrote that they neither prepared treason, nor yet thought of any treason against him, onely they purposed to flie, because they perceived that they could no longer live here, because they were so suspected and in continuall care. At that time a Prince of Cappadocia came Embassadour from Archelaus, named Mela, who was one of the greatest

And that he requested that Tyrannus and the rest might have been better examined; but Antipater prevented that, who by his own forged rumours spread amongst the people, did cause them to hasten their deaths. Which being said, Herod commanded both him and Mela to be led unto Glaphyra, that she might be asked whether she were any way privy to the conspiracy against Herod: and coming unto her, the woman seeing her husband bound, presently tore her hair, and being amazed, with great compassion, cried out amain. miserable sight, could neither speak nor do the Kings command. At last Ptolomeus, to whose charge Alexander was committed, willing him to speak whether his wife was privy to his intent: he answered, How could it be otherwise, who is dearer unto me then mine own life, being mother of her and my children? then she answered, crying out aloud, that she was privy to nothing that was any harm; yet (quoth she) if it will avail you any thing, or help to save your life, I am ready to tell any lie whatsoever seeing I must die, and will deny nothing you would have me to say. Alexander answered, Neither did I purpose any impiety against my father as some suppose, who ought not to think so: neither dost thou know of any one: this thou knowest, that thou and I purposed to flie unto Archelaus thy father, and that he promised to conveigh us to Rome; which she also affirmed. G

Archelaus excuseth himself to Herod. Cæsar and Herod made friends.

Herod now thinking that Archelaus was convicted of evill will towards him, delivered letters unto Olympus and Volumnius, commanding them in the way as they went, to passe by Eleusa a town of Cilicia, and deliver certain letters unto Archelaus himself to the same effect; and that from thence they should go to Rome, and if so be when they came there they found that Cæsar had been reconciled unto him by Nicholaus his means, that then they should also deliver certain letters unto him, declaring all that was past between him and his sonnes, and the proofs alleadged to convince the young men. Archelaus writ again unto Herod, that indeed he would have entertained the young men, for fear that any greater mischance should befall them or their father, by reason of the suspicion against them; yet was he not minded to send them to Cæsar, nor to have confirmed them in any malicious course. The messengers coming to Rome, found Cæsar reconciled to Herod, and delivered the letters unto him. For Nicholaus his embassage was to this effect: So soon as he came unto Rome and had entred the Palace, beside the charge he had given him, he did also undertake to accuse Syllæus. For he perceived the Arabians at variance amongst themselves, and that some of them had declared all Syllæus his bad practises, and that by his means and procurement many of Obodas kinsmen were murthered, as his adversaries manifestly proved, by certain of his letters which they intercepted. H I

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 12. al. 8. Nicholaus accuseth Syllæus, and excuseth Herod.

Now Nicholaus desirous to reconcile Herod unto Cæsar, omitted not this occasion by chance offered him; for he well knew that if he began with the Kings defence, he should then find a hard and heavy Judge against him; but if he began to accuse Syllæus, he should find also fit occasion to plead his Kings cause. Wherefore Nicholaus taking upon him to prove the accusation against him at the day appointed, he accompanied with the king Aretas Embassadours, accused Syllæus as a murtherer of his Lord and King, and many other Arabians, and that he had borrowed much money to trouble the peace of the Common-wealth; and that he had corrupted many women, and honest matrons both at Rome and in Arabia. He added hereunto a most grievous crime, to wit, that he by his lies and false reports had deceived Cæsar, whom in all things he had misinformed concerning that which Herod had done. Which when he once mentioned, Cæsar commanded him to omit the rest; and onely to recount the matter concerning Herod, whether Herod did not enter into Arabia with an army, and did slay two thousand and five hundreth men, and carry away captives and robbe and spoil the countrey? Nicholaus answered, that to these demands himself was able to answer, that Herod did none of these, or at least very little hereof; which he did recount; and that he did not deserve any displeasure. Cæsar, contrary to his expectation, hearing this, began to give diligent eare to what Nicholaus said: and hereupon Nicholaus recounted unto Cæsar, how Herod had lent five hundreth talents, and that he had a writing in pawn, wherein he was permitted after the day appointed, if then it were not repayed him again, to prey upon all the whole counrrey, and satisfie himself: and that this was no hostile invasion, but according to law and equity, a requiring of his right and debt due unto him. And that this was not rashly done, though by the writing he was so permitted to do, but by the consent of Saturninus and Volumnius Presidents of Syria, in whose presence Syllæus swore by Cæsars good fortune at Berytum, that within thirty daies after both the debt and also certain fugitives from the King, should be restored unto him, and that Syllæus performed none of these: and so Herod went again unto the Presidents, and they permitted him to go and take pledges for his money; and that so by their permission he went into Arabia. And this (quoth he) is the warre that his adversaries have so tragically exaggerated, and yet (quoth he) how can it be called a warre? seeing that it was done by the consent of the Presidents, and that by covenant after perjury, wherewith both other gods and also Cæsars name was violated. It now (quoth he) remaineth that I speak something concerning the captives. There were fourtie theeves of Trachon, and afterward more that fled from Herod for fear of punishment, and fled unto Arabia, whom Syllæus protected and succoured to the injury of all men, K L M

A and gave them ground to inhabit; and was partaker of their preys; notwithstanding that by his foresaid oath, he was bound to restore them, together with the borrowed money; neither can he name any man beside them taken in Arabia, and carried away captive, and some of them also escaped. This his forged tale concerning the captives being thus refuted, hear, O Soveraign Cæsar, the lying invention, which to provoke thee to wrath, himself devised. For I am well able to affirm this, that when the Arabian army assaulted us, and one or two of our men were slain, then at last Herod forced to make resistance, he slew Nacebus, and with him five and twenty, and no more: for every one of which Syllæus falsly recounted unto Cæsar a hundred, and so told him that two thousand and five hundred were slain. Cæsar hereat greatly moved with an angry countenance looking upon Syllæus, he asked him how many Arabians were slain in the fight? He amazed and knowing not what to reply, answered, that he erred in the number. Presently Cæsar commanded the writings to be read, containing the conditions B betwen them, and the writings of the Presidents, and the letters of the Cities containing the complaints of the robberies. And so the matter was brought to passe, that Cæsar was reconciled unto Herod, and condemned Syllæus to die; and repenting himself to have written so threatning letters unto Herod, he objected that also unto Syllæus, affirming, that by his false informations he had caused him to passe the limits of friendship, in using his friend so hardly. And so he sent Syllæus into his countrey, that after he had satisfied his creditors, he might be punished according to the sentence. But he still continued angry with Aretas for that without his authority he had usurped the crown and kingdome, and he was minded also to bestow Arabia upon Herod: but the letters which Herod sent him changed his mind. For C Olympus and Volumnius, so soon as they understood that Cæsars wrath towards Herod was pacified, presently they delivered unto him the letters as they were commanded: wherein were contained the arguments whereby his sonnes were convicted of treason against him. Which Cæsar having read, he thought it not convenient to trouble the old man (unfortunate with his sonnes) with another Kingdome; and so he admitted Aretas Ambassadours: and chiding them that their King had rashly usurped the Kingdome without his authority and knowledge, not expecting his pleasure, he received their gifts, and confirmed him in the kingdome by his authority. This done, being now reconciled unto Herod, he writ unto him that he was sorrowfull for him, that had such children; and that he should, if they had attempted D any treason against him, punish them as men that sought to murther their father: for he gave him free and full authority, but if they onely attempted to flie, he should also be sufficed with a lesse punishment. Wherefore he counselled him to call a Consistory at Berytum; and together with the Romane Presidents, and Archelaus King of Cappadocia, and the rest of his friends, and the nobility thereabout, according as they should advise him so to do. And this was the effect of Cæsars letters.

E HErod receiving this letter, rejoyced above measure, both for that he had again obtained Cæsars favour; and also for that Cæsar had given him full authority to do what he pleased unto his sonnes. And yet I know not how it came to passe, that he who in his prosperity was a hard father, yet did shew himself not rash in putting his sonnes to death: and now his estate being better then it was, and he recovering his wonted assurance, he now began a new hatred. Wherefore by letters he called together all those whom Cæsar appointed, onely Archelaus excepted, either for that he hated the man, or else for that he feared he would have withstood that his purpose: and when they were all come together, as well the Presidents as the rest who were called out of divers cities, he would not bring his sonnes into the councel, but kept them in a village of the Si- F donians, named Platan, not farre distant from the City, to the intent, that if they were called for, he might bring them forth. Then Herod himself alone entring into the councel before an hundred and fifty men there assembled for that purpose, began to accuse his sonnes before them, and used a speech not onely pitiful for his own calamities, but also little becoming a father. For he was very vehement and unheedy in inveighing against their offence; neither did he sufficiently expresse his mind, shewing many signes of fury, and anger; neither did he deliver in writing any proofs of the accusations unto the Judges: but undecently himself alleadged there the father against the sonne, himself also reading before them certain letters written by them, wherein was contained no impiety nor treason, but onely a consultation to flie away, and certain hard speeches whereby they shewed themselves offended.

Yet he came unto them, not for that they were to judge his ſonnes, who were taken in a manifeſt crime, but that by this occaſion they might adde their ſuffrages to the juſt indignation of a father offended, and that they might leave an example unto all poſterity, that ſuch treaſons ought not to be left unpuniſhed. The King having thus ſpoken, and not permitting the young men to be brought unto their anſwer, all ſeeing what the King intended, and that there was now no hope to reconcile the young men unto their father, or ſave their lives, they all confirmed his authority. And firſt of all Saturninus, one that had been Conſul, and had been graced with many honours, pronounced an indifferent ſentence, limited with circumſtances, to wit, that he condemned Herods ſonnes, yet not to die: for (quoth he) my ſelf have ſonnes, and I would not adde this calamity to Herods misfortune paſt. After him alſo his three ſonnes, who were their fathers Legates, pronounced the ſame ſentence. But Volumnius pronounced that they had deſerved death, who were ſo impious towards their father; whoſe ſentence after him the moſt part followed: ſo that it ſeemed that they were now ordeined to be put to death. Preſently Herod carried them with him to Tyre, where he met Nicholaus, who was now there arrived, returning from Rome: unto whom the King firſt recounting what was done at Berytum, he asked of him, what his friends at Rome thought of his ſonnes? He anſwered that they judged the young mens intents impious, and that they alſo judged that they ought to be bound and impriſoned, and then after due conſideration, if it were ſo thought expedient, to be put to death, leſt the King might be thought rather to have given place unto his choler then unto reaſon, yet if it might ſo pleaſe him, they thought it beſt to acquit them, leſt otherwiſe he do that which hereafter he may repent when it is too late. And this was the opinion of moſt of his friends at Rome. Then the King along time pondred theſe his words, and made no reply, but commanded him to ſail a long in his company. At his arrival in Cæſarea all men were careful what ſhould become of his ſonnes, expecting an end of that tragedy, for they greatly feared that by reaſon of the old diſcord he would now cut them off; yet notwithſtanding they were ſorrowful for them: yet it was dangerous either to ſpeak raſhly, or to hear any thing ſpoken freely concerning them, but in their hearts compaſſionating them, they concealed their griefes. Onely one amongſt all the reſt, an ancient ſouldier of the Kings named Tyro, others diſſembling their grief, ſpake freely what he thought: this Tyro had a ſonne of Alexanders age, and beloved of him, whom Alexander much accounted of. This fellow many times amidſt the multitudes exclaimed, that truth and equity was now baniſhed from out of the world. and that in their ſtead, malice and untruth reigned: whereby there was ſuch a miſt and a fog cauſed over the whole world, that no man could ſee his own errors. This his free ſpeech, though it was not without danger, yet all men hereat were moved; for that he had ſome reaſon to ſhew his fortitude in ſo dangerous a time, and every one was willing to hear his ſpeech: and though themſelves for fear were ſilent, yet did they not reprehend him for ſpeaking freely. For the expectation of the event of ſo great miſchief was able to have wreſted from every one of them words of commiſeration. Tyro with great audacity alſo came unto the King, and beſought him that he might talk with him alone: which the King granting, he uſed theſe words with great lamentation: I can no longer, O my King, ſuppreſſe this my grief, which cauſeth me ſo boldly to ſpeak, though with my own peril; yet if it pleaſe thee, my King, that which I intend to ſpeak ſhall be for thine advantage.

Where now, my Lord, are thy wits? where is that thy couragious mind ever hitherto able to match all difficult buſineſſes whatſoever? how hapneth it that thou haſt ſo few friends and kindred? for I account not them kinſmen or friends, that permit ſuch wickedneſſe and hatred in thy Court, which erſt was moſt happy and fortunate. And what art thou unto thy ſelf? wilt thou not look and ſee what is done? wilt thou put to death the two young men born unto thee by the Queen thy wife, who abound in all vertue, and commit thy ſelf now in thy old age unto one onely ſonne, who nouriſheth impious hopes and deſignes? and to thy kindred who by thy own cenſure have often deſerved death? Doeſt thou not perceive that the people keeping themſelves quiet and ſtill; do both condemne the errour of thy friends, and alſo pity and compaſſionate the two young men? Moreover, all thy ſouldiers and the Captains themſelves have compaſſion on them, and curſe the authors of this unfortunate calamity.

The

A The King at first took these words of Tyro in good part, as being admonished of the perfidious dealing of them about him, and his own calamitie. But Tyro immodestly and souldier-like urging the King, and for his own simplicity not able to discern what fitted that time, the King at last thought this rather a turbulent upbraiding him, then a friendly admonition: and asking who those Captains and Souldiers were, he commanded them all, and Tyro also to be bound and kept in prison. Then one Tripho the Kings Barber, taking hereat occasion, told the King that Tyro had often sollicited him, as he shav'd the King, to cut his throat with his razor, promising him for recompence great rewards, and that he should be one of Alexanders chief friends. Having spoken these words, the King commanded him to be apprehended, and the Barber, and Tyro and his son to be tortured. Tyro his son seeing his father in most miserable

B torments, and that he still persisted in them (and by the kings displeasure, conjecturing that there was no hope of life) told them that tortured his father, that he would confesse all the truth, conditionally that his father and himself might be no more tormented: and having his request granted, he told them that it was agreed, that Tyro with his own hand should have killed the King: for he could get opportunitie to come unto the King when no man else was with him, and so he would kill him, and for Alexanders sake endure any torments whatsoever. This spoken, he delivered himself and his father from further tortures: but it is uncertain whether the tale he told was true, or whether he devised it to free them both from torments. Then Herod now laying all doubt aside (if before he were in any) thought what death his sons should die, and leaving no place to repentance and mercy, he hastned to exe-

C cute his purpose: and producing 300. Captains, and Tyro and his son, and the Barber his accuser, he accused them all before the people, and the people throwing any thing that came to their hands at them, they slew them every one. And Alexander and Aristobulus was carried unto Sebaste, and there by their fathers command were strangled: and their bodies carried by night into the Castle Alexandrium, where their grandfather by their mothers side, and many of their Progenitors lay buried. But perhaps some will nothing marvel, that a hatred so long a breeding should in the end so prevail, that it overcame natural affection. But one may justly doubt whether the fault were in the young men, who exasperated by a hard father so long time, fell into such hatred of him: or whether it is to be imputed unto his unkindness and immoderate desire of honour and rule, who could not abide any to be his equal, but ra-

D ther chusing to do all at his own pleasure: Or rather unto fortune, whose power the wisest living is not able to resist. Wherefore I am perswaded, Fortune hath predestinated all humane actions so, that they must have a necessary event. And this inevitable force we call fate or fatal destinie, for that there is nothing which it effecteth not. But it sufficeth briefly to have touched this high matter, which is of it self very difficult, which attributeth something unto our actions, and examineth the causes of the variety of our actions, which speculation is already comprized in the two volumes of our Law. Furthermore, touching the young mens fault, we may accuse their youthful arrogancy, and their free King-like pride, who did give too great ear to their fathers accusers, and for that they were unjust searchers into his life and actions, and that they maliciously suspected him, and could not rule their tongues: but

E hereby gave double occasion unto their adversaries, and matter unto those tale-bearers that sought to get the Kings favour. But their fathers shameful fault cannot be excused, who suffered himself so to be over-ruled with passion, that he put them to death that were begotten of his own body, without any proof or argument of the crimes laid unto their charge: yea, two young men of excellent feature of body, not onely beloved of their own nation, but also of strangers not slothful in hunting, and commendable in military affairs, and eloquent in civil discourses. For in all these things they were excellent, and especially Alexander the eldest of them. It had been enough for him, suppose he had condemned them, either to have kept them in perpetual prison, or banished them into some far Countrey; seeing that he was assured of the Roman power, under whose protection he neither needed to have feared invasion, nor secret Treason against him. For so soon to put them to death, onely to satisfie his

F own furious will, what else doth it betoken, but onely an impious liberty casting off all fatherly humanity and kindnes? especially seeing that he was aged, whose yeers could neither plead ignorance, nor that he was deceived. For neither was he the more excused by the delay he used: nay, it had been less offence, if amazed with some sudden news, he had been incited to so hainous an offence; but after so long delay and deliberation at last to effect such a matter, betokens a bloody mind and obdurate in wickednesse, as he well shewed himself afterward to have, not sparing the rest, whom before he held most dear: who though they were lesse to be pitied in that they justly suffered, yet was it an argument of his like crueltie, in that he abstained not from their deaths also: but we will speak hereof hereafter.

CHAP. I.

Of Antipaters malice, who was Herods ſonne.

The yeer of the world, 3961. before Chriſts Nativity, 3.

AFter that Antipater had made away his brothers through the extreme impietie and unbridled furie, wherewith Herod their father was inceníed and whetted againſt them; yet incontinently obtained he not that which undoubtedly he hoped for. For being delivered and diſcharged of that fear he conceived, leſt his brethren ſhould be partakers with him in the Kingdome, he found a difficult and dangerous matter for himſelfe to finde the means how he might obtain the Kingdome: ſo ſtrange and hainous a hatred had all the Nation conceived againſt him. On the other ſide, in ſhewing himſelf proud and loftie, he more and more whetted and increaſed that hatred which the ſouldiers had fore-conceived againſt him, in whom notwithſtanding, the ſecuritie of the Kingdom conſiſted, if it ſhould fortune ſo to fall out that the people ſhould attempt any alteration. All which miſchiefs were begotten by his own ſins, and the unnaturall murther of his brothers. Nevertheleſſe, he governed the Kingdome with his father, living in no leſſe authoritie then himſelf: Herod alſo repoſed more confidence in him even in thoſe things, for which he was worthy to loſe his head. For the King conceived that in confirmation of his good affection towards him, Antipater had accuſed his brethren, as under reſolution to continue his father in ſecuritie, and not for any hatred he bore as well unto them, as to his father; though indeed he hated them for his fathers ſake. being tranſported with fury. But all theſe were but as ſo many ſubtil ſtratagems to inſinuate himſelf into Herods counſels and favours: and theſe did he craftily make uſe of, to cut off the occaſion leſt any ſhould prevent or accuſe him of that which he pretended to do, and that Herod might be deprived of all means and manner of relief, if ſo be Antipater ſhould bend his forces againſt him. For the Treaſon he complotted againſt his brothers, proceeded from the hatered he bare unto his father: but at that time he was the more egged on to proſecute his intended purpoſes, without any delay or procraſtination. For if Herod ſhould happen to die, it was a matter moſt aſſured that the kingdom ſhould be his; and ſhould his life continue any longer time, and

A the practice Antipater went about ſhould be diſcovered, ſeeing himſelf invironed with theſe dangers, he ſhould be inforced to make his father his enemy. For which cauſe he uſed very great bounty and liberality to all thoſe that were about his father: and through the great largeſſe he beſtowed upon them, he ſtrangled and extinguiſhed that hatred which all of them bare unto him: and above all things he continued himſelf in credit with thoſe friends which Herod had at Rome, by ſending them divers preſents, and namely to Saturninus, who was Governor of Syria. He hoped alſo by bribes and rewards to draw his fathers brother into his faction, and to corrupt the Kings ſiſter alſo, who was married to one of the Kings moſt eſteemed friends in Court. Furthermore, he was a ſubtil and politike man in entertaining thoſe men with colourable and cloaking ſhew of friendſhip, with whom he converſed, and to draw himſelf into credit with them: contrariwiſe, he was ſufficiently practiſed to diſſem-
B ble his malice and diſcontents, which he had conceived againſt any man. Notwithſtanding all this, he could not deceive Salome his aunt, who of long time before had ſounded his inclination, and who was not ſo ſimple as to ſuffer her ſelf to be deceived; but had already by all cunning means that might be, prevented his malice, although ſhe had a daughter married unto his uncle, by the mothers ſide. This daughter was firſt of all wedded to Ariſtobulus, and afterwards by Antipaters means eſpouſed to his uncle. For Callaas her husbands ſonne had married the other. But neither could this affinity colour the matter ſo much, but that his malice was diſcovered; neither could that former conſanguinity extinguiſh the deſerved hatred conceived againſt him. Herod conſtrained Salome (who through amorous paſſion had
C thought to have married her ſelf to Syllæus the Arabian) to marry vvith Alexas, and that by the mediation and perſwaſion of Julia Cæſars wife, who adviſed Salome not to refuſe that marriage, for fear leſt he ſhould prove her utter enemy; for that Herod had made an oath, that if Salome condeſcended not to marry Alexas, he would never make account of her: For which cauſe ſhe followed Julias advice, who was Cæſars wife, and counſelled her alſo to her profit and preferment.

Antipater ſpared no coſt to winne his fathers friends.

Antipater could not deceive his aunt.

Herod compelleth Salome to marry Alexas.

At the ſame time Herod ſent his daughter to King Archelaus, who had been married to Alexander, preſenting him a dowrie out of his own treaſury, leſt there ſhould any difference ariſe between them, and he himſelf moſt carefully brought up his ſonnes children. For Alexander had two ſonnes by Glaphyra, and Ariſtobulus begat on Bernice, Salomes daughter, three D ſonnes and two daughters. Theſe ſometimes would be preſent and commend unto his friends, and bewailing the misfortune of his ſonnes, would beſeech God that no ſuch ill fortune might befall their children, but rather that they might increaſe in vertue, and acknowledge their education and bringing up, with all dutifull reſpects unto their parents. He provided them alſo each of them with a wife, at ſuch time as they were ready for marriage, namely, the daughter of Pheroras for the eldeſt of Alexanders ſonnes; and the daughter of Antipater for Ariſtobulus eldeſt ſonne: and one of Ariſtobulus daughters was married to Antipaters ſonne; and the other he eſpouſed to Herod his own ſonne, whom he had begotten of the daughter of the High Prieſt. For it is lawful in our Countrey, and according to our cuſtome, to have divers wives at one time. The King procured theſe marriages through the
E compaſſion he had of thoſe Orphelins, thinking by theſe mutuall alliances to cauſe Antipater to be their friend. But Antipater conceived no leſſe hatred toward the children, then he had done malice towards their father. for the care that Herod had of them, increaſed his hatred, in that he pretended to be the greateſt among the brethren; and he eſpecially feared leſt when they ſhould grow to mans eſtate, they would reſiſt his power, being aſſiſted by king Archelaus, as his ſonnes in law; and Pheroras who was a Tetrarch ſhould do the like, for that he had married his ſonne to Alexanders daughter. And ſo much the more was he incited, becauſe all the people had compaſſion of theſe Orphans, and had conceived a hatred againſt him, who never ceaſed to expreſſe his malice againſt his brethren. He therefore devited all F the means that were poſſible to diſanull the decrees which his father had reſolved upon to this effect, being very loath that they ſhould ever live to be partners with him in the kingdome. So that at laſt Herod condeſcendeth to Antipaters demand, which was, that he might marry Ariſtobulus daughter, and his ſonne he eſpouſed to Pheroras daughter: and thus were the promiſed and forementioned marriages wholly cut off; yea, even againſt Herods former decree. At that time Herod had nine wives, namely, Antipaters mother, the High Prieſts daughter, by whom he had a ſonne that bare his name, and a daughter of his brothers, and a couſin of his own, by whom he had no children. He had another wife alſo, that by nation was a Samaritane, by whom he had two ſonnes, Antipas, and Archelaus, and a daughter called Olympias, who was afterwards married to Joſeph the Kings couſin. As for Archelaus and Antipas, they were brought up at Rome, with a certain private friend of his. Moreover, he

As touching his eldest daughters, Alexanders sisters by the mothers side, whom Pheroras had refused to take in marriage, he matcht the one with Antipater his sisters son, and the other he wedded to Phasaelus his brothers son, and this was Herods progeny.

CHAP. II.

Of Zamaris the Babylonian Jew.

Herod buildeth a Castle in the region of the Trachonites, and maketh Zamaris the Jew that came from Babylon Governour thereof.

After this, intending to assure his estate in the countrey of Trachonite, he resolved to build a borough of the bigness of a City in the midst of the countrey, as well to warrantize his countrey, as to be in better readiness to repulse his enemies, and to repulse them with more expedition. And having intelligence that a certain Jew was come from Babylon with five hundreth Archers on horseback, and about one hundred of his kinsmen, and had adventured to passe Euphrates, and was in the countrey adjoyning to Antioch near unto Daphne in Syria, where Saturnine General of the Roman army had given him a Castle, called Valatha, to inhabit, he sent for him and his followers, promising to give him both Lands and Lordships in the Signiory of Batanea, which confineth on Trachonite, intending that he should make head against those that would assail him, and promising him that both his land and his Souldiers should be exempt from all tributes, and payments of customes. This Babylonian Jew was induced by these offers of his to come, and take possession of the place, where he builded a borough, called Bathyra. This man opposing himself against the Trachonites, defended them of the countrey, and those Jewes that came from Babylon to Jerusalem to offer sacrifice, from all incursions and robberies of the Trachonites: and divers that observed the Religion of the Jews, resorted unto him from all places, so that this countrey was very well peopled, by reason of the enfranchisement of the tribute, which continued during Herods life-time.

But Philip, who succeeded him, exacted afterward some small tribute of them, and that but for a little while. But Agrippa the great, and his son of the same name, vexed them very grievously with taxations; yet permitted them to enjoy their liberty, whose successours the Romans imposed many grievous tributes upon them, yet continued their freedome, of whom hereafter we will more particularly and largely discourse in due place, and in processe of my history. Now this Jew Zamaris, to whom Herod had given the possession of his countrey, died, after he had lived vertuously, and left a vertuous off-spring behind him, amongst whom was Jacim renowned for his dexterity on horseback, who with his troop of horse was of the King of Babylons guard. This Jacim died when he was very old, and left his son Philip to succeed him, a man valiant in arms, and addicted to all sorts of vertue, as much as any one that hath been renowned in writing: for which cause King Agrippa loved him, and put his trust in him, and committed the trust and training of his Souldiers unto him, who led them also forth if any occasion of service was proffered.

CHAP. III.

Antipater conspireth against Herod.

Hegesippus, lib. 1. cap. 3.

Whilest the estate and affaires of Herod were thus disposed, all mens eyes were fixed upon Antipater, after that Herod had permitted him to intend his particular profit. This permission was granted him under the hope that his father had, that he would behave himself faithfully, and affectionately towards him: but he abused his authority more audaciously then could be expected; for he traiterously coloured his conceived malice, and easily drew his father to believe him in whatsoever he said. He was feared by all men, not onely for his force and authority, but for his subtilties and policies. But above all the rest Pheroras respected him most, and was in like manner as greatly esteemed by him. For Antipater had circumvented him by the means of certain women, who favoured his faction: for Pheroras was commanded by his wife, his mother and sister in law, notwithstanding that he hated them, by reason of the outrage they had offered to his daughters who were virgins; nevertheless he was enforced to dissemble all things, because he could do nothing but that they were alwaies round about him, and had such mastery of his affairs, that they wrought him to perform whatsoever they pleased. To these likewise was Antipater nearly

A tied, both of himſelf and by his mother: for theſe four women were of one mind and affection in all things, and ſpake as it were by one mouth: yet was Pheroras at ods with Antipater upon ſome ſlight miſlikes, and ſhe that wrought this debate betwixt them, was the Kings ſiſter, who had of long time eſpied all their drifts, knowing well, that their mutual friendſhip tended to the overthrow of Herod; neither refuſed ſhe to expreſſe what her opinion was therein. And they knowing well that the King diſliked this their inward familiarity, and that he was privie to that which they pretended, which was his utter ruine, reſolved between themſelves to refrain their publick familiarity, and to make a ſhew that they were at ods one with another: to which intent they reproached one another, eſpecially at ſuch time as they were either in Herods preſence, or there was any one with them, who (as they thought) would certifie him thereof. But in ſecret they intermitted not their accuſtomed B friendſhip, and continued their intercourſes with more privie affability; and ſuch was their ordinary demeanour and behaviour: yet was not Salome ignorant hereof, neither when they firſt deviſed this drift, neither afterwards when they put it in execution: for ſhe diligently noted all things, and aggravated the ſame in their reports to her brother, whom ſhe informed of their ſecret aſſemblies and banquetting, urging their ſecret conſultations, which (as we ſaid) had no other iſſue but his ruine, except upon their diſcovery he ſought to repreſſe them in time. Further, that for the preſent they behaved themſelves like enemies in outward ſhew, and all their ſpeeches tended to diſgrace one another; but that in ſecret they were friends, and that in private they entertained their amity, and promiſed each other their mutual aſſiſtance to ſtrengthen themſelves againſt thoſe to whom they were loath their friendſhip C ſhould be diſcovered. Theſe things obſerved, ſhe with all diligence ſignified the ſame unto her brother, who of himſelf already had many probabilities thereof. But he durſt not make ſhew thereof, becauſe he knew that his ſiſter was a woman too much addicted to reproachfull accuſation. There was amongſt the Jewes a ſect of people that were called Phariſees, who were too much addicted to ſelf opinion, and boaſted themſelves to be the exacteſt obſervers of the law in all the countrey, to whom theſe women were very much addicted, as to thoſe who were much beloved of God, as in outward appearance they made ſhew for. Theſe were ſuch as durſt oppoſe themſelves againſt Kings, full of fraud, arrogancy, and rebellion, preſuming to raiſe warre upon their motions, and to rebel and offend their Princes at their pleaſures: whereas therefore all the nation of the Jews had ſworn to be faithful to Caſar, and D to the eſtate of the King; theſe onely refuſed to take oath, and of this ſect there were to the number of 6000. For which cauſe the King having impoſed an amercement upon them, Pheroras wife paid it for them; for which cauſe they pretending to gratifie her, and being eſteemed for ſuch as were skilful in foretelling ſuch things as were to come, by reaſon of their often communication with God, foretold her that God had decreed to bring the kingdome of Herod and his poſterity to an end, and would bring to paſſe that the crown ſhould deſcend to Pheroras and his ſons. Salome had got an inkling hereof, and had told Herod no leſſe: and how they likewiſe corrupted every one of his Courtiers; for which cauſe he put thoſe to death amongſt the Phariſees, who were the principal authors of this advice, and with them alſo the Eunuch Bagoas, and Carus who was his darling, and one of the goodlieſt men of that E time. He afterwards cut off all thoſe amongſt his houſhold ſervants, who were of the Phariſees faction: For Bagoas was bewitched with that hope by them, that he ſuffered himſelf to be called the father and benefactor of the King, who ſhould be eſtabliſhed according to their prediction, and have the Government of all things, and ſhould be ſtrengthened by marriages, and deſcent of his lawful and natural children.

But after that Herod had puniſhed thoſe amongſt the Phariſees, who were convicted to have been of the conſpiracie, he aſſembled a Councel of his friends, before whom he accuſed Pheroras wife, and ripped up the outrages that were done unto his daughters, as it hath been declared, aſcribing the ſame to the pride of this woman, objecting it for a crime againſt her, for thereby ſhe had injured his honour. Beſides this, he accuſed her that ſhe had of ſet F purpoſe ſtirr'd up mutinies, and by all means poſſible both in word and in effect, contrary to all law of nature, ſhe ſtirred up debate betwixt him and his brother; and that the fine that he had impoſed upon his adverſaries, was ſatisfied at her charge: ſo that no jot of that conſpiracy was contrived without her privity and conſent. For which cauſes (ſaid he) brother Pheroras, it ſhall not be amiſſe for you of your own accord to drive ſuch a wretched woman from you, before you be requeſted, and the ſentence be pronounced againſt her, otherwiſe ſhe will be the cauſe to kindle a warre betwixt you and me. For if at this preſent you will continue the friendſhip and brotherhood betwixt you and me, ſeparate your ſelf from her: in ſo doing I will account you for my brother, and you ſhall loſe nothing by the affection which I bear unto you. For the bond of brotherly love cannot continue safe and unviolate, unlesse you put her away. Now although Pheroras was moved with the importance and weight of this discourse; yet said he, that for the love he bare unto his wife, he would forget nothing of that duty which consanguanitie required at his hands in regard of his brother: but that he had rather die then live without her company, whom he loved more dearly then his life. Herod, although he took this answer of his brothers for a most grievous injury, yet forbare he to discover his displeasure towards him: he onely forbade Antipater and his mother, and in like manner Pheroras, to frequent the one with the other any more. He commanded the women likewise that they should give over their familiar entertainments the one with the other, which all of them promised to perform. Yet this notwithstanding upon fit opportunities and occasions, they visited one another, and Antipater and Pheroras feasted one another by night. CHAP. IV.

Herod sendeth Antipater unto Cæsar.

ANtipater suspecting his fathers dislikes, and fearing lest his hatred should by increase bring him into hazard, he wrote unto his friends in Rome, requiring them to write their letters unto Herod, requesting him to send Antipater unto Cæsar, with all expedition as was possible. Which being brought to passe, Herod sent him thither with divers royal presents, and gave him his testament and will with him; wherein he had bequeathed the Kingdome to Antipater. And if it should happen that Antipater should die before him, then bequeathed he the same to his son Herod, whom he had by the High Priests daughter. About the same time Syllæus the Arabian repaired to Rome, notwithstanding he had neglected those things that Cæsar had given him in charge. Him did Antipater accuse before Cæsar, for the same defaults wherewith he was charged by Nicholaus. Syllæus also was accused by Aretas, for murthering divers of the best account in the City of Petra, contrary to his mind: amongst the which was Sohemus (a man of much vertue and honour) and Phabatus, Cæsars servant; of which crimes Syllæus was accused upon that occasion which ensueth: There was a certain man of Corinthus, who was one of the Kings guard, and such a one as he put very great trust in: him did Lyllæus perswade by store of money and bribes, to kill Herod; which he promised to perform. Phabatus made privie to Lyllæus mind, he presently told it to the King, who caused him to be apprehended and tortured; who confessed the whole matter, he laid hands also on two Arabians, perswaded by this Corinthians confession; one of which was a man of command in his Countrey, and the other was Syllæus chiefest friend. They being examined, confessed that they came thither to solicite and egge forward with many exhortations the Corinthian to execute the murther, and to assist him if he stood in need of them. Which being fully approved by Herod before Saturnine, he sent them to Rome, there more amply to be proceeded against, and so to be punished.

CHAP. V.

Pheroras death.

HErod perceiving that his brother Pheroras did constantly continue his affection towards his wife, he commanded him to retire himself into his own dominion: whereupon he willingly departed to his Tetrarchy, protesting by many solemn oathes, that he would never more return into the City, unlesse he were assured that Herod was dead. Not long after it hapned, that the King falling sick, he was sent for to receive certain secret instructions, as from the mouth of a dying man; but Pheroras would not obey him in regard of his oath. This notwithstanding, Herod dealt more kindly with him, and continued his love and affection towards him: for he came unto Pheroras as soon as he heard of his first sickness, and being ur ent for also; and after he was deceased, he sent his body to Jerusalem, and honourably intombed him in that place, and grievously lamented his death. This was the beginning of Antipaters mis-haps, who at that time was departed to Rome. For it was Gods pleasure that at last he should be punished for the murther of his brethren. This matter will I discourse of at large, that it may serve for an example unto many Kings, how they ought to practise and follow vertue in all their actions.

An oath solemnly observed.

Pheroras in his sickness is visited by Herod and being dead is honourably buried by him.

Pheroras wife is accused, and Herod is advertised of Antipaters conspiracies.

AFter Pheroras death, two of his freemen, who were Taphnites by birth, and such as Pheroras in his lifetime both only trusted, and dearely loved, came unto Herod, requiring him not to suffer his brothers death to passe unpunished, but to make diligent enquirie of that unfortunate unexpected misadventure. Herod lent a willing eare to their suite, perceiving that the matters they importuned him in, were likely and very credible. Whereupon they told him, that Pheroras, the day before his unexpected sickneſſe, had supt with his wife, and that having received an unaccustomed poyson with his meat, he was dead. That this poison had been brought thither by a woman of Arabia, who in her speech protested that it was some potion to increase love, but in effect it was to bring Pheroras to his end. For the women of Arabia amongst all others are skilfull in poisons, and are great sorcerers, and she that was charged with this fact, was esteemed a great friend and favourer of Syllæus best beloved. That Pheroras mother and his wives sister went into those quarters upon purpose to buy that poyson, and returned back, and brought this woman with them the day before the supper. The King moved by these words of theirs, tortured both those maid-servants of theirs, who were their bond-women; as also certain other of their free servants. Now when the fact could not be extorted, by reason that none of them confessed the same; at length, she that was last of all put to her triall, overcome by the pains she endured, said nought else, but that she prayed God that Antipaters mother might feel the like torments, sith she was the cause of all these mischiefs which they endured.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 5. Pheroras freemen accuse his wife for poysoning him.

Herod torturech the Ladies bond-women, and foundeth out Antipaters and their secrets.

These words of hers made Herod the more eager and inquisitive, so that by force of tortures he wrought out all the secrets of these women, their banquets, their secret assemblies, and those very words that Herod had spoken apart betwixt his son and himself, which had been reported unto the women, that Pheroras entertained: namely, that he would give him one hundred talents, provided he would use no conference with Pheroras. Moreover, they reckoned up the hatred that Antipater bare unto his father, the complaints that he made unto his mother, of the too long life and continuance of his father: for that in regard of himself he was already waxen old; so that although the Kingdom should fall into his hands presently, yet could he receive but very little contentment thereby. Moreover, he alledged, that divers brothers and brothers children were brought up together with him, so that he might not securely hope for any thing, for that already if he should fortune to die, the Kingdome was to descend not to his sonne, but to his brother: besides this, he was accustomed to accuse the King of divers cruelties committed by him, and of that murther which he executed upon the persons of his children. That for fear left he should practise his tyranny against those that remained, Antipater had found out the device to be summoned to Rome, and Pheroras withdrew himself into his Tetrarchy.

These words, which as he knew had reference to that which his sister had often informed him of, were not by him held incredible; so that being prest with the malice of Antipater, he sequestred Doris his mother from his presence, spoyling her before her departure of all her jewels which were valued at many talents: and from that time forward he shewed himself more favourable towards those women of Pheroras household. But nothing did more whet Herods displeasure against Antipater, then did a certain Samaritan, who was also called Antipater, who had the ordering of the affairs of Antipater the Kings sonne. For he being brought in question and tortured, declared among other things, that Antipater had mixed a mortal poyson, and delivered the same to Pheroras his uncle, commanding him to practise the Kings death in his absence, and by that means least suspected. That this poyson was brought out of Egypt by one called Antiphilus, Antipaters friend. That it was sent to Pheroras by one called Theudion, Antipaters mothers brother. That this poyson was kept by Pheroras wife, and was committed by her husband to her custody. She being examined by the King hereupon, confessed no lesse, and hastning forth as if she intended to fetch the same, she cast her self down headlong from the top of the house: yet did she not murther herself, because she fell upon her feet. Now after she was recovered out of her swoun, and the King had promised all securitie both to her self and her family, if so be she would discover the truth; and contrariwise threatned her with extreme torments, if she obstinately continued in concealing these Treasons, she sware she would discover all things according as they were acted, and as many men thought at that time, she told nothing but the truth. That poyson (said she) G was brought by Antiphilus out of Egypt, and bought there by the means of a brother of his, who was a Physician. After this, Theudion brought it to our house: and I having received it from Pheroras hands, kept the same, but bought by your son Antipater to poyson you that are his father. Now therefore after that my husband fell sick, and you in kindnesse came to visit and comfort him, he being moved with compassion, and conquered by your brotherly kindnesse; by your good affection and loving care in giving order for his health, called me unto him, and said: O wife Antipater hath circumvented me, whilest by his pestilent counsels and poysoning practices he desireth to cut off his father, and deprive me of a kinde brother. Now therefore, sith as I perceive there is no part of my brothers loving and naturall affection diminished towards me, wherewith he was wont to entertain me, and that my lateſt houre of life H approacheth, God forbid, that being ready to sleep with my forefathers, I should present them with a ghost solid and sweltered in my brothers bloud: Dispatch therefore, and burn this poyson before mine eyes. Hereupon said she, I presently brought it forth according as my husband commanded me, and burnt the greatest part of the poyson, and the rest I reserved, that if after my husbands death your grace should use me unkindly, it might serve me to escape those extremities that would betide me.

Pheroras wife confesseth that she hath the poyson, and casts her self down headlong from the roof.

After she had spoken thus, she brought forth before them the poyson, and the boxe wherein it was kept. After her, another of Antipholus brothers, and the mother to them both, confessed no lesse, being constrained thereunto by force and violence of torture, and acknowledged the box. The Kings wife also, who was the daughter of the high Priest, was accused for cofederacie and concealement of all these treasons. For which cause Herod put I her away from him, and razed his sonnes name out of his testament, wherein he had bequeathem him the kingdome after his decease. He displaced also his father in law Simon the son of Boethus from the Priesthood, and placed Matthias the son of Theophilus, who was born in Jerusalem, in his stead. In the mean space Bathillus, Antipaters freeman returned from Rome; who being tortured, confessed that he brought a poyson with him to deliver it to Antipaters mother, and Pheroras, to the end that if the first poison were not effectuall enough to dispatch the King, they might make use of this other, to cut him off speedily. There came letters also to Herods hands from his friends in Rome, written and devised by Antipaters means, to accuse Archelaus and Philip, for very often they had refreshed the memory of Alexander and Aristobulus death, contrived by their father; and for that they lamented the miserable K fate of them, who were innocently betrayed, and that now also they themselves were called back into their countrey for no other cause, but upon their arrivall to be made partakers of their brothers miserable destiny. These things did Antipaters friends certifie Herod of, in that by many and mighty presents he wrought them thereunto. He himself also wrote unto his father colourably, after a manner excusing the young men, and imputing their words unto their indiscretion and young years. Mean-while, he busied himself in accusing Syllæus, and courted the chiefest Romans, buying divers ornaments and jewels to present them with, to the value of two hundreth talents. And it is to be wondred at, that so great matters being brought on foot against him, seven moneths at least before his return into the countrey of Judæa, that no inkling thereof came unto his ears. But the cause partly was, the diligent L search and watch that was kept upon the high waies, and partly the hatred that all men had conceived against Antipater. For there was not any that would put themselves in hazard to procure his security.

CHAP. VII.

Antipater is condemned and cast into prison.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 6. Herod writeth friendly letters to Antipater, and calleth him home from Rome.

Herod concealing his displeasure, answered Antipater his sons letters (wherein he M gave him to understand, that as soon as he had dispatched his affairs as it behoved him, he should return) charging him to hasten homeward, for fear least during his absence, some unexpected inconvenience might betide him. He likewise after a temperate manner, complained unto him of his mother, promising notwithstanding to remit the fault upon his return, and by all means he made shew unto him of much kindnesse, fearing lest he, apprehending any suspicion, should defer to hasten his return homeward, and lingring too long at Rome, should contrive some trayterous stratageme, to the prejudice of himself, and the overthrow of his kingdome. These letters did Antipater receive in Cilicia, and already had he received others at Tarentum, by whom he understood of Pheroras his

A uncles death, whereat he was ſore grieved; not for the love he bare to Pheroras, but for that he died before he had murthered his father, according as he had promiſed him. As ſoon as he came to Celenderis a City of Cilicia, he grew doubtfull whether he ſhould return or no, and grievouſly was he diſtracted by his mothers diſgraces, who was baniſhed from the Court. Sundry alſo were the opinions of his friends in this behalfe: for ſome of them counſelled him to ſtay and expect the event of theſe troubles in ſome place: otherſome, on the other ſide, adviſed him to delay no longer his return into his countrey, for that upon his arrival he might eaſily ſatisfie all thoſe objections and accuſations that were inforced againſt him, becauſe his accuſers had nought elſe to ſtrengthen their cauſe with, but his abſence. This latter advice liked him beſt; ſo that he betook himſelf to ſea, and at laſt arrived in the Port of Sebaſte, ſo called, and builded by Herod, to his great charge in honour of Cæſar.

Celenderis in Cilicia.

Sebaſte a haven builded by Herod in honour of Cæſar.

And now already it manifeſtly appeared that Antipater was upon his downfal: For no man
B came out to ſalute him, no man entertained him, as they did upon his departure, when as all of them accompanied him with prayers and happy acclamations: but contrariwiſe they boldly and openly ſpake againſt him and bitterly curſed him, telling him that he was juſtly puniſhed for the wickedneſſe he had committed againſt his brothers.

Antipater upon his return is ſaluted by no man.

About the ſame time Quintilius Varus, who was ſent to ſucceed Saturnine in the government of Syria, was at Jeruſalem, and drew thither at that inſtant upon Herods requeſt, to aſſiſt him with his counſels in his preſent and weighty occaſions: now whileſt theſe two ſate and conſulted together, Antipater came in before any man expected him, and in that purple garment and royaltie that he was accuſtomed to uſe, entered the Palace. The guard of the C gates ſuffered him to enter in, but they excluded all thoſe that were with him. This firſt of all affrighted and appaled his ſpirits, in that he already perceived into what calamity he was fallen; and now alſo when he drew near his father, he thruſt him from him, accuſing him of the murther of his brethren, and reproaching him with that intent he had to poyſon him, telling him that the next day Varus ſhould both hear and judge all his miſdemeanours.

He altogether amated at the greatneſſe of that unexpected miſchief, which he both heard and ſaw, departed preſently from them wholly amazed, and in the way met with his mother and his wife (which was Antigonus daughter, who had been King of the Jews before Herod) by whom he was advertiſed of all that which had hapned, and for that cauſe more di-D ligently prepared himſelf for his tryal. The next day Varus and Herod ſate in judgement, accompanied by their friends on both ſides; thither alſo were cited the Kings kindred and his ſiſter Salome, and certain others, who could diſcover his ſecret practices: ſome of which had been tortured, and namely Antipaters mothers ſervants, who a little before his arrival, had been apprehended with a letter to this effect: That he ſhould take heed that he returned not into the countrey, becauſe his father was made privy to all his practices, and that for the preſent he had no other refuge but onely to Cæſar, and to take care likewiſe leſt he ſhould fall into his fathers hands.

Hereupon Antipater humbling himſelf on his knees before the king his father, beſought him not to condemn him before his cauſe were heard, but to ſuſpend his judgement untill
E ſuch time as he had heard his juſtifications. But Herod after he had commanded him to withdraw himſelf into the midſt of the Court and aſſembly, deplored his infelicity in begetting ſuch children, and bewailed his miſhap, that in his old age he was reſerved for an Antipater. After this he reckoned up the cares he had ſpent in their education and inſtitution, and how bountifully he had beſtowed upon him as much riches as he required: he furthermore alleadged, that none of all theſe favours could preſerve him from falling into the lapſe of the loſſe of his life by their policy, to the intent that they might injuriouſly poſſeſſe the kingdome, before either the law of nature, or the will of their father, or their own rights could challenge the ſame. But above all the reſt, he wondred at Antipater, with what hope
F he could poſſibly be puffed up to attempt ſo audacious and wicked an enterprize. For by his Teſtament he had made him the heir of his kingdome, and in his lifetime alſo had made him equall partaker of his dignity, glory and power: that he received annually fifty talents of revenue, and to furniſh his voyage for Rome had three hundred talents given him. Moreover, he accuſed him for his ſlanderous accuſations againſt his murthered and ſlaughtered brothers: who if they had been wicked, why did he imitate them? but if they were innocent, why without cauſe produced he his ſlanderous accuſations againſt thoſe, who were his naturall brethren? For in his own reſpect he had never found any thing againſt them, but by his report: neither had he given ſentence againſt them, but by Antipaters advice, who for the preſent were abſolved by him, becauſe he was become the heir of their parricide. In uttering Antipaters anſwer to his fathers objection.

But Antipater turning himſelf towards his father, began to juſtifie himſelf, urging the ſame teſtimonies, and favours that his father had ſhewed unto him, and the honours he had received at his hands, which he would never have ſhewed him, if he had been unworthy of the " ſame, and had not by his vertue deſerved theſe favours. He alleadged alſo, that by his ver-
" tue he had prevented all that which might have hapned, and that where the cauſe required
" his labour or diligence, he diſpatched all things with his own induſtry, that it was unlikely " that he, who had delivered his father from thoſe treaſons, which were intended againſt him H
" by other men, ſhould himſelf attempt the like: and as farre from probability that he ſhould
" go about to extinguiſh that vertue (whereof even untill that day he had given teſtimony)
" to the end that alwaies hereafter he might be defamed for ſuch an indignity. For long be" fore this time he was named and intituled to ſucceed him, and to enjoy thoſe very honours
" whereof already he partook no ſmall part; whereby he proteſted that it was unlikely, that " he, who might enjoy the halfe of all that his father had, in all ſecurity, vertue and honour,
" ſhould deſire the whole with infamy and danger; yea and with incertitude to obtain the " ſame; conſidering in eſpeciall, that the puniſhment which had befallen his brothers (whom " he had both diſcloſed and accuſed at ſuch time as they were hidden) was procured by him,
" who, if he had liſted, might have concealed them in ſecret, and whoſe wickedneſſe toward I
" their father (after it was approved) he himſelf had revenged upon them: neither (as he ſaid)
" repented he himſelf of that which he had done: for that action of his might be an argument " to approve how incoruptly he loved his father. And as touching that which he had dealt in
" at Rome, Cæſar himſelf was witneſſe thereof, who could be no more deceived then God him-
" ſelf: whereof thoſe letters bore record, which were written by him; which in equity ſhould
" be of no leſſe force, then the ſlanders of thoſe who ſought to ſet them at oddes: the moſt part " of which objections and reproaches had been complotted and deviſed by his enemies, who " have had the leiſure to purſue the ſame during his abſence, which they could not have per" formed in his preſence. Finally, he avowed, that all thoſe confeſſions were falſe which were " extorted by torture, in that it ordinarily falleth out, that ſuch as are put to the tryal, confeſſe K
" many things by force of torment that are untrue, to ſatisfie them that put them thereto:
" briefly without all favour, he offered himſelf to the rack in juſtification of his innocency. Up" on theſe his proteſtations, all the councel and aſſiſtants were confounded. For all of them had " great compaſſion of Antipater, who was wholly drowned in his tears; ſo that his very enemies
" began to pity him. And Herod himſelf made it appear, that he ſeemed in ſome ſort to be al" tered in his opinion: notwithſtanding he endeavoured to conceal the ſame.

Nicholas Damaſcene proſecuteth the Kings accuſation.

But Nicholaus, according as he was requeſted, proſecuted that accuſation which the King had begun, urging all things to the uttermoſt, and producing all the witneſſes, and thoſe manifeſt proofes, that were gathered from their examinations that were tortured. In eſpecial, he amply diſcourſed of the Kings vertue, which he had fatherly expreſſed in the education L " and inſtruction of his children; for which he had been ſo unkindly and unnaturally requited.
" Moreover, that his firſt childrens fooliſh raſhneſſe was not ſo much to be wondred at, for that " being young, they had been corrupted by the malice of their counſellers, and had blotted
" out of their hearts all the laws of nature, rather through ambition of rule, then deſire of " riches. But that Antipaters boldneſſe was both wonderful and wicked, who more cruel then " the cruelleſt beaſts (who towards their benefactors acknowledge each good turn) was no" thing mollified by his fathers ſo great indulgence; not terrified by his brothers calamity,
" but muſt needs emulate them in their cruelty. And thou thy ſelf (ſaid he) O Antipater, wert
" the Judge of their attempted treaſons, by thy inquiſition they were indicted, thou didſt ex" ecute the juſtice againſt them being convicted. Neither do we diſallow that thou didſt M " proſecute them with juſt indignation, but rather admire thee for that thou imitateſt their in" temperance: and we eaſily gather that thoſe acts of thine were not attempted for thy fathers
" ſecurity, but intended for thy brothers overthrow, that by deteſting their malice, thou " mighteſt inſinuate thy ſelf into the allowance and good liking of their father and thine, that " afterwards thou mighteſt more cunningly and ſecurely bring him to his end, which at length
" thou haſt attempted to perform. For whileſt thou adjudgeſt thy guilty brothers to death,
" and ſpareſt their confederates, thou makeſt it manifeſt in all mens eies, that thou art in good " liking with them, whoſe aſſiſtance thou mighteſt hereafter uſe in oppreſſing thy father.

Thou

A "Thou haſt therefore taken a double pleaſure worthy thy manners; the one openly as if re-
"joycing and glorying, that by thy brothers death thou haſt atchieved a matter of honour:
"the other ſecretly, with endeavouring by greater wickedneſſe but more ſecret fraud, to "make an end of thy father; the revenger of whoſe injuries thou pretendeſt to be. For if "thou hadſt truly deteſted their malice, thou hadſt never eſteemed the ſame to be worthy of "thy imitation; for thou hadſt not cut them off for committing ſuch capitall offences, as "were anſwerable unto thine, but for that they had a more juſt & rightful title to ſucceed in
"the kingdome then thou haſt. And thou haſt thought good to mix the murther of thy father "with the ſlaughtered bodies of thy brothers, for fear leſt thou ſhouldeſt be ſuddenly convin-B "ced in thy conſpiracies againſt them, and to the end that the puniſhment that thou well de-"ſerveſt to ſuffer, ſhould light upon thy infortunate father, projecting with your ſelf ſuch a "paricide, and ſo rare and hainous a murther, that to this day the like thereof hath not been "heard of amongſt men. For thou being his ſonne haſt practiſed theſe treaſons, not onely a-"gainſt thy father, but againſt him that loved thee above meaſure, and did thee good beyond
"hope, with whom thou haſt actuall participation of the government of the kingdome, and
"who had appointed thee his heir in the ſame, being no waies hindred, either for the preſent,

"were not ſufficient to ſatisfie thy hatred. And now after ſo many men and women, ſlaves & D "free-men tortured for thy cauſe, after the open & manifeſt teſtimonies of thy parties in the "conſpiracy, thou art ſo impudent, as yet to contradict the truth: and thou that lately hopedſt
"to deprive thy father of his life, doeſt now as much as in thee lieth, endeavour to aboliſh that "law that was inſtituted againſt malefactors in thy kind, herewithall Varus equity, and all "whatſoever juſtice is in the world. Doeſt thou therefore accuſe them of falſehood, who were "examined in torments, to the end thou mighteſt endanger their credit, who were the pre-
"ſervers of thy fathers life: ſhall we beleeve thee more then them in their torments: wilt thou
"not (O Varus) deliver the King from the injuries of thoſe, who are his own fleſh and blood?
"wilt thou not put this wicked beaſt to death, who hath murthered his brothers, to pretend a "love towards his father, and who hath at laſt been diſcovered to be the moſt mortall enemie E "of them all, to the intent that at one inſtant he might eſtabliſh the Kingdome in himſelf?
"Thou knoweſt that Patricide is no private crime, but a publick injury to life and nature,

Patricide that publike injury of life and nature.

After theſe ſpeeches, he annexed certain points as touching Antipaters mother, which through feminine frailty hath been blabbed out by her, to wit that ſhe had asked counſell of ſoothſaiers and diviners, to whom the Kingdome ſhould befall: and that ſhe had offered ſacrifices, and made prayers for the death of the King. And moreover, he declared what laſcivious pranks Antipater had plaied with Pheroras women, in banquetting and amorous
F and wanton dalliances. The informations likewiſe that were preſented by ſuch as were tortured, with ſundrie teſtimonies of divers men, ſome ſuborned; the other found out to be incontinently produced and confirmed. For each man ſeeing that Antipater was expoſed to the accuſations of thoſe men, who had the government in their hands, and that the good fortune that had long time accompanied him, had openly delivered him into the hands of his enemies, they manifeſtly diſcovered the inſatiable hatred which they had conceived againſt him, whereas beforetime the fear that they had of him inforced them to be ſilent: yet was he not ſo much burdened with other mens hatreds, as with his own wickedneſſe, namely, his deadly hatred againſt his father, his breach of amity againſt his brethren, whereby he filled the Kings houſhold with ſeditions and murthers, of ſome complotted, and acted by other ſome; neither giving place to hatred according to juſtice, nor to amity according to good affection, but according as it might ſtand with his profit. Which for that divers men perceived long before that time, they judged of events according as they had reaſon, and the rather becauſe that being void of hatred, they ſpake but their opinions. And whereas heretofore they had cried with a loud voice againſt him, at ſuch time as they were ſhut up; at this time when they were deprived of their fear, they declared all things, that they knew. And whereas there were divers produced of the miſchiefs committed by him, yet ſeemed there nothing to be fained, for that the accuſers neither ſpake in favour of the King, neither concealed any thing for fear of perill, but condemned all Antipaters wicked actions, and judged him worthy of death and puniſhment, not ſo much for his fathers ſecurity as of his own demerit. Neither did they onely accuſe him, who were by juſtice tied thereunto, but divers voluntary witneſſes alſo brought in their evidence; ſo that although he was a very cunning diſſembler, and colourer of his lies, and moſt impudent in their aſſertions, yet durſt he not once open his mouth or mutter againſt the ſame.

Antipater accuſed by all men.

As ſoon as Nicholas had finiſhed his diſcourſe and accuſations, Varus commanded Antipater to anſwer thoſe crimes that were objected againſt him, if he had any thing to alleadge, that he was not guilty of thoſe forfeits or hainous crimes that were laid unto his charge. For of himſelf he deſired nothing more, and knew well that Herod his father deſired no leſſe, then that he ſhould juſtifie himſelf, and maintain his innocency. But he humbling himſelf upon his face, and lowly bending his body to the ground, beſought God, who was the ſearcher of all hearts, to approve his innocency by ſome eminent ſign, how he had never attempted any thing to his fathers prejudice. For this is the cuſtome of all wicked men, that as often as they attempt any hainous act, they engage themſelves in all wickedneſſe, without any reſpect of Gods juſtice, & when as by their miſdeeds, they are fallen into perill, then call they God to their mindes, by whoſe invocation and teſtimony they deſire to be delivered, making a ſhew that they commit all things to his determination. The like whereof in this time hapned in Antipater: who, whereas beforetime he diſpoſed all his actions in ſuch ſort, as if there had been no God that had the overſway of humane affairs; at ſuch time as juſtice overtook him, and he was diſfurniſhed of the benefit of the law, had his recourſe to Gods power, alleadging that he was reſerved by God to this end, that he might diligently intend his fathers ſafetie. Hereupon Varus, when as by often queſtionings he could wreſt nothing from him, but that he onely cried upon God, ſeeing that otherwiſe there would be no end of theſe debates, he commanded the poyſon to be brought forth before them all, that he might make experience of what force it was: which being preſently brought unto him, and miniſtred to one that was condemned to die, it preſently killed the man. Which done he aroſe and departed out of the councell, and the next day went unto Antioch, where for the moſt part he was wont to have his reſidence, for that it was the chief city of the Aſſyrians. But Herod preſently commanded his ſon to be put in bonds, no man knowing what talk had been between him and Varus upon his departure, but all mens opinion was that the King did nothing in impriſoning him, but by his counſell. When as therefore he had faſt bound him, he ſent unto Cæſar, and wrote his letters unto him, as touching Antipater, ſending certain appointed meſſengers, who by word of mouth might certifie him of his curſed treaſons.

Varus giveth Antipater licenſe to juſtifie himſelf. Antipater ſtriveth by his proteſtations, and invocations of God to juſtifie himſelf.

The poyſon is miniſtred to a condemned man, and it killeth him. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 7.

Herod impriſoned his ſon, and ſent Embaſſadours to Cæſar to certifie his abuſes.

At the very ſame time there was a letter intercepted, ſent by Antiphilus to Antipater, which Antiphilus remained in Egypt: which letter being opened by the King, was written to this effect: I have ſent you Acmes Letter, hazarding thereby mine own life: for you know that I am in danger of the diſpleaſure of two mightie Families, if I ſhould be diſcovered. As for your ſelf, bethink you well of your affairs in this reſpect. Such were the Contents of this Letter. The King made diligent ſearch for others alſo, but he could find none: for Antiphilus ſervant, who had brought that which was read, denied that he had any other. But while the King was in this doubt, one of his ſervants and friends perceived that the inſide of the meſſengers under-coat was newly ſewed: for he had two garments the one upon the other, and conjecturing that the Letters might be hid in the fould thereof, as indeed they were, he ripped the ſame, and found them. The tenour whereof was this: Acme to Antipater, Health: I have written the Letters to your father, according as you gave me inſtructions, and I have counterfeited the Copy of my Letter, as if it had been ſent by Salome my miſtris. I aſſure my ſelf that when he hath read the ſame, he will puniſh Salome as one that hath practiſed treaſon againſt him. But that letter that was ſuppoſed to have been written by Salome to Acme, was of Antipaters invention, and written in Salomes name, according to his invention, and in Acmes ſtyle. The Contents were theſe: Acme to King Herod, Health: Whereas I have an eſpecial

A care, that nothing be concealed from thee that concerneth thy ſecurity, having found a letter of Salomes written againſt thee unto my Lady, I have not without danger taken the copy thereof, and ſent it unto you, in which ſhe required that ſhe might have licence to marry Syllæus. Teare this copy, leſt through the knowledge of the ſame, I grow in danger of my life. Now in that which ſhe had written to Antipater, ſhe had diſcovered that ſhe had written theſe words to Herod, according to that commandement he had given her, as if Salome had conſpired to work ſome treaſon againſt him. She ſent alſo the copy of thoſe counterfeit letters in the name of Salome, and ſent them unto her miſtris to work treaſon. The year of the world, 3962. before the nativity of Chriſt, 2. Acmes letters to Herod.

This Acme was a Jew born, and chambermaid to Iulia, Cæſars wife, and did that which is
B above written for the love which ſhe bare to Antipater, whom he had hired by great ſums of money, to the end, that ſhe ſhould aſſiſt him to execute the miſchief, which he practiſed againſt his father and againſt his aunt. Herod made almoſt deſperate by the great miſchiefes of Antipater, was ſtirred up on the ſudden to ſhorten his daies, for that he was the onely means that ſtirred up theſe great tempeſts of ſedition in his kingdome, and who not onely practiſed againſt his father and his aunt, but againſt his ſiſter alſo; and had in like ſort corrupted Cæſars family. Salome alſo incenſed him the more, beating her breſts and offering her ſelfe to all deaths, if any ſuch like matter might be duely proved againſt her. For which cauſe Herod ſent for Antipater, commanding him to ſpeak freely all that which he had to ſay without fear. But he having not one word to anſwer for his defence, Herod ſaid unto him:
C Since that on all ſides thou art convicted, and ſurprized in thy wickedneſſe, delay not, but diſcover thoſe that are of thy confederacy. Whereupon he laid all the fault upon Antiphilus and named none other. At that time Herod being wounded by extream grief, would have ſent Antipater to Rome unto Cæſar, that he might receive his judgement from him, but afterwards he feared leſt by the intereſt of his friends he ſhould eſcape the danger, for which cauſe he kept him bound and fettered in priſon, as he had done before: And in the mean while ſent certain meſſengers with letters to Cæſar, to accuſe his ſon, and to declare wherein Acme had been his confederate, producing the copy of the letters. Herods ſickneſſe and the ſedition amongſt the Iews.

MEan-while Herod fell ſick, and made his Will, and appointed his youngeſt ſonne to ſucceed him in the Kingdome, for that through Antipaters inſtigations he had conceived a hatred againſt Archelaus and Philip. He ſent alſo 1000. talents unto Cæſar, and 500. to his wife, and to his children, friends and freemen. He beſtowed alſo money, rents, and lands upon his own children: he gave his ſiſter Salome an am-
E ple poſſeſſion, for that ſhe had alwaies perſevered in loving him, and had never offended him. And having loſt all hope of recovery, for that he was about 70. yeers old, he became very tutchie and froward in whatſoever his affairs. The cauſe hereof was, that opinion he had conceived, that he waxed contemptible, and that the whole nation took pleaſure in thoſe miſ-haps which befortuned him: which ſome of thoſe who were favoured by the people, made him the rather believe upon this occaſion which enſueth: Amongſt thoſe that were moſt learned amongſt the Jews, Iudas the ſon of Sariphæus, and Matthias the ſon of Margalothus, the moſt excellent interpreters of the laws and ordinances of the countrey (and for this cauſe were in greateſt eſtimation among the people, by reaſon that they inſtructed and
F trained up the youth; for all thoſe that deſired to obtain vertue, ſpent all their time with them) underſtanding that the Kings ſickneſſe was dangerous, they incenſed the younger ſort, counſelling them to overthrow all thoſe works that the King had cauſed to be made, contrary to the law and cuſtome of the countrey; to the end, that they fighting for piety, might obtain the reward that attendeth the ſame. For in that the King had enterpriſed and done, many things contrary to the law, divers unaccuſtomed miſeries had befallen him, and namely that ſickneſſe wherewith he was detained. For Herod had done divers things contrary to the ancient law; againſt which Iudas and Matthias exclaimed openly. For he had erected over the portall of the great Temple, an Eagle of gold of great value. Now the law prohibiteth that they, who pretend to live according to the ſame, ſhould in any ſort erect an image, or repreſent any figures of living creatures whatſoever. For this cauſe theſe doctors counſelled them to pull down that Eagle: telling them, that although the matter ſeem P. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. to want no perill, yet ought they rather to prefer an honeſt death before a pleaſant life, if ſo be it be employed for the defence of their countrey laws and religion. For in ſo doing, they ſhould obtain immortall praiſe for the preſent, and a memorable and eternall glory in time to come; neither that they ſhould protract the execution thereof for fear of danger, ſince death was a thing that might not be avoided; ſo that ſince by the generall courſe of nature, they muſt needs die, it ſhould become them bravely to forſake their lives with praiſe and honour in imbracing vertue. For to die in the execution of ſome noble exploit (which cannot be atchieved without hazard of danger) their children ſhould be richly rewarded with the fruits thereof, and their other parents that ſhould outlive them (of what ſex ſoever ſhould reap the fruits of that glory which was honorably atchieved by them. In theſe or ſuch like words encouraged they the young men.

Contempt of death.

About that time there was a rumour ſpred, that the King was dead, wdich gave very great furtherance to the Doctors reſolution. For at high noon they went up into the Temple; they pulled and hewed down the Eagle with their axes, in the ſight and aſſembly of a great number of people that were in the Temple. Now when the tydings hereof came unto the ears of the Kings Captain, he fearing leſt ſome further and more fatall tumult might be raiſed, drew out a ſtrong company of ſouldiers with him, to repulſe thoſe that were aſſembled to hew down the Eagle: and charging the rude and diſarmed multitude, who were gathered together, he eaſily ſlew and diſperſed the moſt; as for thoſe fourty young men that valiantly addreſſed themſelves to reſiſt, he apprehended them, and with them the authors of ſedition Iudas and Matthias, who thought ſcorn to ſubmit themſelves, and led them to the King; who demanding of them how they durſt deface the ſacred image? they anſwered, that long before that time they had reſolved it, and that now according as they had reſolved, they had like valiant men performed the ſame. For we (ſaid they) maintain the honour of God and the doctrine of our law, whereof we are diſciples: neither ought you to admire that with contempt of your ordinances we have preferred the laws of our forefathers, which Moſes hath left us in writing, according as he was ſuggeſted and taught them by God: neither do we refuſe any death or puniſhment which thou ſhalt inflict upon us, being aſſured in our conſciences, that we ſuffer not for our impiety, but piety ſake. Thus ſpake they all of them, continuing the like conſtant boldneſſe in their anſwers, as they had ſhewed in their actions, being alſo ready, conſtantly to endure any puniſhment for that which they had attempted. Hereupon the King commanded them to be bound, and ſent them to Jericho: then calling before him thoſe principall Jews, who had the government under him; and being brought into their aſſembly upon his pallat, by reaſon of his weakneſſe, he recited unto them the numberleſſe travels he had endured for their ſakes: in like manner, how upon his great charges he had repaired and reedified the Temple: whereas the Aſmoneans for the ſpace of 125. yeers wherein they reigned, could not perform ſuch a building in the honour of God. Moreover, he ſignified unto them, how he had adorned the ſame with precious gifts. For which he hoped that after his death his memory and glory ſhould ſurvive. After this, he expoſtulated with them for what cauſe they abſtained not from offering him that outrage during his life time? And why at noon daies and in the ſight of all the people, they had laid hands on thoſe preſents which he had dedicated unto God, and had taken thoſe things away violently which though in words they appertained to him, yet in the effect if the act were wel examined, they had taken from God. The Governours ſuſpecting his cruelty, and fearing leſt his unbridled paſſion ſhould urge him further, by which means they might be aſſured of ſome ſevere puniſhment, anſwered him: that thoſe things were not done by their conſents, and that in their opinion the injurie ought not to be let ſlip without puniſhment. At that time Herod ſhewed himſelf more favourable towards the reſt, but he cauſed Matthias to be deprived of the Prieſthood, as one in part who had been the cauſe of that which had hapned; in his place ſubſtituted Iozar one of his wives brethren. During the Prieſthood of this Matthias it happened alſo, that another high Prieſt was elected that very day, wherein the Jews did uſually celebrate their faſt. For Matthias the night before the day of the faſt, ſeemed in his dream to have had the company of his wife; and whereas for this cauſe he was unfit to offer the diuine ſacrifice, he had Ioſeph the ſonne of Ellemus, appointed him to be his aſſiſter and ſubſtitute by reaſon of his alliance. Herod therefore depoſed Matthias: and as touching the other Matthias, who had moved this trouble, both he and his companions were by his commandement conſumed with fire.

The young men pulling down the golden Eagle, hew it in pieces with their axes.

Matthias deprived of the Archprieſthood by Antipas Herods ſonne.

This very night the moon was eclipſed, and Herods ſickneſſe grew more vehement. For God puniſhed thoſe ſinnes which he had committed. For he was inflamed with a lent or ſlow fire, which to the outward ſenſe ſeemed not ſo vehement, but inwardly ſearched & afflicted all

A all his entrails: he had alſo a ravenous and unnatural appe ite to his meat, which might no waies be ſatisfied. Beſides that, he had an ulcer in his bowels with a ſtrange and furious collick. His feet were ſwoln with moiſt and ſhining flegme, and his ſtomach was no leſſe affected alſo. His members rotted and were full of crauling worms, with a filthy and no leſſe troubleſome Priapiſme, accompanied with an intolerable ſtench: beſides all this, he had a ſtrong convulſion of his nerves, and ſhortneſſe of breath. For which cauſe it was a General opinion amongſt holy men, and ſuch as had the knowledge of prophecy, that the King was thus puniſhed for his infinite impieties and ſins committed againſt the Magiſtie of God. And although he was tormented with an unſupportable ſickneſſe, yet had he hope to eſcape: and for that cauſe he ſent for Phyſicians from all places, and refuſed none of thoſe remedies

He therefore paſt over Jordan and went into the hot baths of Calliroes, the waters whereof are potable, beſides other vertues they have againſt all other kind of ſickneſſe: this water diſchargeth it ſelf into the lake called Aſphaltite. Being there, it was thought good by his Phyſicians, that he ſhould refreſh himſelf in thoſe waters: There being ſet by them into a bathing tub filled with oyl, he waxed ſo ſick, that they held him for dead. Whereupon all his houſhold ſervants wept and grievouſly lamented; and all his familiar friends cried out and bewailing him, with their great noiſe cauſed him to come to himſelf: and ſeeing himſelf wholly out of hope to eſcape, he gave order that there ſhould a diſtribution be made to every ſouldier the ſum of fifty drachmes,

C Jericho, where a melancholy humour poſſeſſed him, which made him unſociable, and diſpleaſed againſt all men; ſo that ſeeing that he muſt needs die, he bethought him of this facinorous action that followeth. For the nobleſt men amongſt the nation of the Iews, reſorting unto him from all parts (upon his commandment under the expreſs penalty of loſſe of life, to whoſoever ſhould neglect the ſame) the King ſhewed himſelf to be diſpleaſed, as well againſt thoſe whom he thought guilty, as againſt them who had given him no occaſion of diſcontent. For he cauſed them to be ſhut up in a place called the Hippodrome, which was the tilt-yard to run horſes in, and ſent for his ſiſter Saleme, and Alexas her husband, telling them that his end was at hand, for that his griefs did inceſſantly torment him: which as he ſaid, he ought to bear patiently, becauſe it was an end that ſhould happen to all men. But that Herod commandeth that the nobleſt of the Jews ſhould be ſlain after his death.

D which moſt grieved him was, that he ſaw himſelf deprived of thoſe mournings and lamentations, which a King deſerved. For he was not to ſeek of the Jews affections, neither how his death was deſired and longed for by them, ſince that in his life time they preſumed ſo far as to revolt, and diſhonour and deface thoſe gifts, which he had beſtowed upon the Common-weal. It therefore behoved them to afford him ſome ſolace in that his bitter anguiſh, for that if they refuſed not to perfom that which he had contrived in his mind, the lamentation of his death ſhould be magnificent, and as great as any King ever had: and the pleaſure and laughter that might accompany his death, ſhould be abated by their ſorrow, who ſhould unfainedly lament for the whole nation. He therefore willed them, that at ſuch time as he ſhould give up the ghoſt, they ſhould cauſe the Hippodrome to be invironed by

E his ſouldiers, as yet unadvertiſed of his death (which he would not have publiſhed before this execution were ended) and to command them to ſhoot their arrows at thoſe that were ſhut up therein. And that when they had ſlain them all after this manner, they ſhould make him triumph and rejoyce in a double joy; firſt, for that in his death his commandement ſhould be ratified by effect: ſecondly, for that he ſhould be honoured by a memorable lamentation. Thus weeping, he beſought his kinſfolk for the love they bare unto him, and for the faith they bare unto God, that they ſhould not ſuffer him to die fruſtrate of this laſt honour: and they proteſted that they would not tranſgreſſe any point of this his commandement. Hereby a man may conjecture what his nature was, who took pleaſure in theſe above-named impieties, and who through the deſire he had of long life, hath after this ſort

F dealt with thoſe of his blood: and it may be conjectured by theſe his laſt commandements; that he had nothing in him that ſavoured any humanity: for that departing out of the world, he had ſuch a mind, that all the nation and all ſuch as were moſt affectionate towards him; ſhould be driven to ſorrow and deſolation; commanding that in every houſe one ſhould be ſlain, yea ſuch as had not in any ſort offended him, and were not accuſed of any miſdeed committed againſt any other: whereas they that have any vertue, finding themſelves at that ſtate, have been accuſtomed to lay aſide the hatred which they have before time born unto their enemies.

Letters are sent from Rome, that Acme was executed by Cæsars command, and that he had authority to use Antipater at his pleasure.

WHileſt he delivered theſe inſtructions to his kindred, he received letters from thoſe Embaſſadours which he had ſent from Rome unto Cæſar: the effect whereof was, that Acme was put to death by Cæſars command, who was diſpleaſed with her for that ſhe had been of Antipaters conſpiracy, who was remitted to Herods pleaſure like a King and father to uſe him, as beſt pleaſed him; either to exile to baniſh him; or if it ſo pleaſed him, to put him to death. Herod receiving theſe news, recovered his ſpirits a little through the pleaſure he received in the contents of thoſe letters, both of Acmes death, as of the power that was granted him to puniſh his ſon. But being aſſailed afreſh with grievous dolours, and urged with a deſire to eat, he called for an apple and a knife: for before-time he was accuſtomed to pare his apples himſelf, and to cut a little; and afterwards to eat it: when as therefore he had gotten hold of the knife, he looked round about him, determining to give himſelf a mortall wound therewith, and had ſurely done it, had not Achiabus his nephew haſtily ſtept within him, and ſtaid his hand, and called for aſſiſtance. At that time the ſorrow and lamentation was renewed in all the Palace, as if the King had been already dead: and Antipater certainly beleiving that his father was departed, began to hope (and confirmed no leſſe in his words) that being delivered out of priſon, he ſhould obtain the poſſeſſion of the kingdome without any difficultie: and deviſed with the Jaylour as touching his deliverance, offering him great preſents both in hand and hereafter, as if there had been no other queſtion but of that. But ſo farre was the Jaylour from obeying that which Antipater demanded, that he went and certified the king what his intent was, and what offers he made him. Herod who had already conceived a ſiniſter opinion of his ſonne, hearing what the Jaylour had ſaid, began to exclaime, and to beat his head, although he was at the uttermoſt gaſpe: and lifting himſelf up upon his elbows, he commanded that one of his guard ſhould preſently haſt and kill him; and that done, he ſhould be buried in the Caſtle of Hircanion without any honour.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 10.

AFter this, having changed his mind, he made a new Teſtament. For he appointed Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee and of Peræa, whereas before that he had inſtituted him for his ſucceſſour in the Kingdome. He created Archelaus King; he gave the Provinces of Gaulonites, Trachonites, Batanea and Paneade to Philip his ſonne, and Archelaus brother by the mothers ſide, to be Tetrarch over thoſe places. He gave his ſiſter Salome, Iamnia, Azot and Phaſelis, with fifty thouſand crowns of gold. He provided alſo for his other kinſmen, all whom he left rich in money, which he gave them, and revenews which he aſſigned them. He gave Cæſar, ten milions of drachmes in ſilver, amounting to the ſumme of eleven hundreth thouſand francs, beſides a great quantity of gold & ſilver plate, and of precious moveables. To Iulia Cæſars wife, and to certain others, he bequeathed five millions of drachmes, amounting to five hundreth and fifty thouſand francs, or thereabout. After he had in this manner diſpoſed all things, ſome five daies after he had cauſed Antipater to be executed, he departed this life: having reigned after Antigonus death, for the ſpace of thirty and four years, and thirty and ſeven yeers after he was elected and approved King by the Romans: a man without reſpect cruell, and ſevere towards all men; ſlave to his wrath; Lord of the lawes: yet ſo favoured by fortune, as no man more, for from a private man he became a King, and being invironed with many perils, he alwaies happily eſcaped, and he lived alſo a very long time. And as touching his family and children, in this alſo in his own opinion was he happy, in that he overcame his enemies and adverſaries: but in my opinion, he was moſt unfortunate.

Herods mutable & ſtrange fortune.

But before the Kings death was thorowly known, Salome and Alexas diſcharged thoſe that were locked up in the Hippodrome, and ſent every one of them home unto his own houſe, telling them that the king commanded them to depart and follow their houſhold affairs, and till their land: wherein they performed a moſt noble action, and benefited the whole nation with an eſpeciall good turn. After the Kings death was bruted abroad, Salome and Alexas cauſed all the men of warre to be aſſembled in the Amphitheater in Jericho, and

A first of all they caused Herods letters to be read, which were addressed to the souldiers, in which he gave them thanks for the fidelity and good will which they had expressed towards him, praying them to continue the same to Archelaus his son, whom he had appointed to be their King after him. That done, Ptolomey, to whom the King had committed the custodie of his seal, recited his testament, which was to take no effect, except that Cæsar approved the same. Thereupon all of them began to applaud and honour Archelaus for their King. The men of war flocked about him in troups, accompanied with their Captains, promising him to serve him with no lesse will and affection, then they had done his father, praying God to yeeld him his assistance.

B At that time also the Kings hearse was prepared, and Archelaus gave order that his obsequies should be most royally performed, and bestowed all the furniture that was requisite for that funeral and Princely interment. He was carried out in a gilded litter, distinguished with divers precious stones, the cover thereof was of azure colour. The dead bodie was apparelled in a purple raiment, having a Diadem upon his head, over which there was set a crown of gold, and a scepter was couched in his right hand. About this litter marched a great number of his children and kinsfolk; and after them followed the men of war, disposed in bands and troups, according to the manners of every nation. The first of these were the Archers of his guard: after them went the Thracians: and lastly, marched the Germans, and Galatians; all of them in their warlike abiliments and discipline. After them followed all

C the army, marching in order in like manner as when they were addressed to battel, each one under his Corporal and Captain. Next these followed five hundred of his houshold servants, bearing perfumes, and all these in this equipage marched to the castle Herodion, distant some eight stades or furlongs off. For there was he intombed, according to the tenour of his testament. Thus died Herod. Archelaus continued his mourning for seven dayes space in honour of his father. (For the law of the countrey ordaineth no lesse.) And after he had feasted the people, and laid aside his mourning apparel, he ascended up into the Temple. All the way as he went, all the people with shouts and acclamations, cryed, God save the King; and with prayers and praises honoured him to their uttermost, and he being con-

"He gave them "thanks also, for that they had blotted out of their remembrance the injuries that his fa- "ther had done unto them; protesting in his own behalf, that he would inforce himself to "requite their kindnesse, with an intire affection. He likewise told them, that for the present "he accepted not the stile of King, because the honour was bequethed him with this con- "dition, that Cæsar should ratifie his fathers testament. For this cause, although the soul- "diers that were in Iericho inforced themselves to set the Diadem upon his head, yet would "he not accept that uncertain honour, because it was not resolved whether Cæsar, who was "the principal party in the gift, would grant him the government or no.

E He alleadged likewise, that if his affairs succeeded according to his desire, he would not, according as his honour commanded him, forget their love, or leave their good affection unrequited. And that in the mean-while, he would enforce himself by all means to further those things that concerned them, and entertain them with more kindnesse then his father had done. But they according as it is the custome of the common people, thinking that those that enter into such dignities, declare and open their minds at the first day, the more Archelaus spake kindly and courteously unto them, the more they applauded him, and presented him with divers petitions, for certain grants and donations from him. Some of them cried out unto him, that he should cut off some part of their taxes and tallages, which they

Others instantly urged him to cut off those tributes which had been imposed by him upon bargains and sales, which was to pay the half of the bargain. Whereunto Archelaus did not in any sort contradict, striving to the uttermost of his power to please the people, for that he knew full well that their good affection would be no small advantage toward him in the confirmation of his kingdome. That done, he sacrificed unto God, and afterward fell to banquetting and entertainment of his friends.

Hegesippus & Rufinus, chap. 12. al. 13.

The seditious people bewail Matthias, and those that were executed with them.

MEan-while, certain men among the Iews that were desirous of innovation, in their private conventicles bewailed Matthias and his confederates, whom Herod had put to death, and condemned for razing and defacing the golden Eagle: for that incontinently after their decease, they had neither been publickly honoured nor lamented for, by reason of the fear hat the people had conceived of Herod. For which cause at that time they required with lamentations and great cryes, that their obsequies might be solemnized; and as if the dead bodies had received some contentation by their tears and tempest of exclaims, they uttered many hainous and disgraceful speeches against Herod; and assembling themselves together, they required Archelaus to do them justice against those, that during Herods life were in authority; and especially they demanded, that the high Priest, who was advanced by his father, should be deposed, and that another more lawful and upright might be placed in his stead, to offer and exercise the high Priests place. Now, though Archelaus was sore displeased at these their violent proceedings; yet notwithstanding, he conformed himself to their good likings, in that he was with all expedition to repair unto Rome, to understand and attend Cæsars pleasure. He therefore called for the General of his Army, willing him to perswade them not to seek a revenge for those men, who were dead, notwithstanding they were their friends; because whatsoever was done, was done according to law; and that no inquiry might be made thereof, except to the great prejudice of his reputation, and hazard of his estate, in regard of the uncertainty of the time: that it was more expedient for him to study for the maintenance of peace, untill such time as being established in the Kingdome by Cæsars consent, he should return back again unto them, and that then he would consult with them for the common profit, according to their just demands, wishing them for the present to contain themselves, and to take heed lest they stirred up sedition.

They would be revenged on Herods friends and would depose the high Priest.

The year of the world, 3964. after Christs nativity, 2.

When he had thus instructed his General, he sent him unto them. But they cried out with a loud voice, and would not suffer him to speak: but for fear of danger and death, they put him to silence. And if any other were so forward as to speak unto them, and perswade them to some moderation, and to alter their sinister resolutions, he was also in dander: for that they had this perswasion, that all things ought rather to be ordred according to their pleasures, then by the authority of their superiours: supposing that although during Herods lifetime they had been deprived of their deareſt friends, it should be now a matter unworthy their courages, after his death to be cut off from their priviledges to demand their revenge. For they were transported with their own opinions, and held all that for lawful and upright which was in any sort conformable to their pleasures, without foreseeing the danger that might happen thereby: so much were they pleased to be revenged on those, whom they reputed to be their enemies. Now, whereas divers were sent by Archelaus, to consult with them; and divers came unto them, not as messengers from him, but as freinds and lovers of peace, of their own motion, with an intent to pacifie them, they would not permit any of them to speak, and through their rage there arose a great tumult, which had grown to a further extremity, if a greater number of people had joyned themselves with them.

At that time fell the feast of unleavened bread, which is called Pascha, which is a memorial of their deliverance out of Egypt, at which time all men do most willingly present their sacrifices, & a greater number of beasts are slain at that feast, then at any other time. To this solemnity also an infinite number of people assembled from all parts to honour God: whereby the seditious (supposing that they had gotten fit oppertunity) lamented Judas and Matthias, who were the Expositors of the Law, and kept themselves within the Temple, whither they had gathered good store of victuals, which they were not ashamed impudently to beg for. But Archelaus, fearing lest their rage should produce some more grievous effect of mischief, sent out a band of armed men, with a Captain, and a Regiment of a thousand men, to represse their head long fury, before the rest of the people were infected with their follies; and to bring them likewise unto him, whom they found to be the forwardest in that commotion. Against those the seditious cried out, with great clamours, and incensed the people against them, so that all of them rushed in upon the men of war and slew divers of them. The rest of them escaped with their Captain, yet not without divers wounds. That done, they which were within the Temple, returned again to their divine service.

Now

A Now Archelaus ſuppoſing that his whole fortune was endangered, except he repreſſed the rage of the multitude, he ſent out all his footmen with a certain number of horſemen, to prevent leſt they that were without ſhould yeeld aſſiſtance to thoſe, who had taken up their lodging in the Temple, and to put thoſe to the ſword, who having eſcaped the violence of the footmen, ſuppoſed themſelves to be in ſecurity. Theſe horſemen ſlew about three thouſand men, the reſt retired themſelves into the mountains that were near adjoyning. Hereupon Archelaus made proclamation, that each one ſhould repair unto his own houſe. For which cauſe they departed and abandoned the feaſt, for fear of greater miſchief; notwithſtanding they had ſpleen enough, as it is the ordinary cuſtome of the ignorant multi-

After this, Archelaus accompanied with his mother, betook himſelf to ſea, and led with him Nicholas and Ptolomey, with divers other his friends, committing the government of all his houſhold and kingdome to his brother Philip: with him alſo departed Salome, Herods ſiſter, leading with her her children. There went alſo divers other of his kindred who ſaid that they would all of them labour for Archelaus, that he might obtain the Kingdome, but in effect it was to contradict him with all his power: and in eſpecial, to urge that againſt him with great vehemency, that was done in the Temple. Sabinus, Cæſars Viceroy in Syria, poſting into Jewry to take charge of Herods money, met with Archelaus in Cæſarea. But Varus arriving in the mean-while, detained him from finiſhing that voyage; for Archelaus
C had ſent for him to come thither by Ptolomey, and Sabinus willing to do Varus a pleaſure, would not ſeize the fortreſſe of Jewry; neither ſealed up Herods treaſures, but left them in Archelaus poſſeſſion, untill ſuch time as Cæſar had given order for the eſtate; and after he had made this promiſe, he ſtayed in Cæſarea.

After Archelaus had ſet ſail towards Rome, and Varus was departed for Antioch; Sabinus went to Ieruſalem, where he ſeized the Kings Palace: and calling before him the Kings Agents, and the Captains of his garriſons, he required them to deliver up their Caſtles into his hands. But they, according as Archelaus had commanded them, continued the poſſeſſion in their accuſtomed manner, according to the Kings direction, pretending to keep the D ſame in Cæſars behalf. At the ſame time, Antipas, Herods ſon travelled to Rome likewiſe, under the hope to be elected King, in regard of Salomes promiſes; and for that he better deſerved the ſame then Archelaus, conſidering that in the firſt teſtament, which ſhould be of more force then the later, he had been appointed King. He led his mother alſo with him, and Ptolomey the brother of Nicholas, who had been one of Herods, moſt eſteemed friends, and was well affected to further and ſet forward his title. But eſpecially he was ſtirred up to ſeek the Kingdome by Ireneus, a man very eloquent, and to whoſe charge in regard of his ſufficiency, the affairs of the kingdome had been committed. For which cauſe, although he were perſwaded to give over the kingdome unto his elder brother, who was confirmed in the kingdome by his fathers teſtament, yet would he not give ear thereunto. But Antipas no
E ſooner arrived in Rome, but all kinſfolks revolted from Archelaus, unto him, not ſo much for the love they bare him, as for hatred they had conceived againſt Archelaus; and above all, for the deſire they had to recover their liberty, and to draw themſelves under a Roman governour. For they thought that if there were any contradiction, that Antipas, for whom they endeavoured to procure the royalty, ſhould be more profitable unto them then Archelaus. Sabinus alſo by his letters accuſed Archelaus to Cæſar: but Archelaus by Ptolomy exhibited unto Cæſar a ſupplication containing his right and title to the kingdome, his fathers teſtaments, and the account of the money which Herod his father had ſealed up, together with his ring, and expected the iſſue.

Sabinus repaireth to Ieruſalem, with an intent to ſeize Herods treaſures and caſtles.

But when he had read theſe letters, and thoſe which Varus and Sabinus had ſent him, and F underſtood what ſums of money he had left, and what the annual revenew was, and how Antipas challenged the Kingdome, and appropriated it to himſelf, according as his letters made mention: he aſſembled all his friends to have their advice thereupon. Amongſt them was Caius the ſon of Agrippa and his daughter Iulia, adopted by him, whom he cauſed to ſit in the chiefeſt place: which done, he commanded the aſſiſtants to ſpeak what they would touching this matter. At that Antipater, Salomes ſon, a man very eloquent, and a great adverſary to Archelaus; ſpake firſt, ſaying, "That it was a mockery for him at that time to ſpeak "of the Kingdome, conſidering that before Cæſar had granted it him, he had already ſeized the forces of the ſtate when as upon a feaſtival day he had ſlain ſo many: who although they "had deſerved that puniſhment, yet ought the juſtice therof to have been reſerved to a law-"full power, and not to have been uſurped by him, either being King with Cæſars prejudice; "whoſe authority he had condemned; or by being a private man, which was a greater over-

"Moreover, he objected againſt him, that of his own authority he had changed certaine
"chieftains of the army, and that he had ſeated himſelf in the royal throne, and like a King "had determined certain cauſes, and had granted certain demands of the people: finally,
"that he had left nothing undone, which he might have performed, had Cæſar confirmed

"miſſed by him, and divers other acts, partly true, partly probable in regard of the ambi"tion of young men, who deſirous to govern, do ordinarily commit ſuch things: beſides this,
"his neglect in mourning for his father, and withal, his rare banquets all night long at that "very time his father died; whereat the people began to mutine, ſeeing the ſmall regard he "had of his fathers death, from whom he had received ſo great goods and honours. How all
"the day long he made a ſhew of his ſorrow and tears in his pavillion, but all the night
"took pleaſures like a King; and being ſuch, if Cæſar ſhould grant him the kingdome, he I "would behave himſelf no leſſe unkindly towards him, then he had done towards his moſt

"preſence to the intent to obtain the kingdome by his conſent, whereas already he had be"haved himſelf no otherwiſe then if he had already been eſtabliſhed King by his authori"ty. But moſt of all he exaggerated the ſlaughter he had committed in the Temple, and "the impiety perpetrated ſo near to the feaſt of Eaſter, at which time divers both ſtrangers
"and citizens had been ſlaughtered after the manner of ſacrifices, and the Temple filled "with carcaſſes, not by a ſtranger, but by him, who under the colour of religion deſireth the "government of the Kingdome, to the end he might ſatisfie the unjuſtice of his nature, in "exerciſing each way his tyranny towards al men: for which cauſe his father never thought
"nor ever dreamt to ſubſtitute him King in his place. For he knew both his life and diſpo- I
"ſition, and by his former teſtament (and that of greateſt force) had ordained his adverſary
"Antipater to be King. For he had been allotted the kingdome by his father, not when his "mind was dead before his body, but when both his judgement was ſound, and his body
"in health. Yea, although at that time Archelaus father had ſuch a conceit of him, as in his "later teſtament and bequeſt he pretendeth; yet that he had alteady declared what kind of "King he was like to be, who contemned Cæſars authority in confirming the kingdome, and "being as yet a private man, doubted not to murther the citizens in the Temple. This ſaid, "Antipater (to give greater credit to his words, bringing divers of his kindred as witneſſes
"of that he had ſaid) ended his Oration.

Nich las excuſeth Archelaus. "Whereupon Nicholas aroſe, and alleaged in Archelaus behalf as touching the ſlaughter,
"that it was to be imputed to their impiety, who could not be reſtrained from their tumults
"and uprores, before Archelaus was enforced to appeaſe them by force; alleadging that K
"they were ſo much the more guilty, for that they had not onely exerciſed their malice, but
"alſo had enforced others to attempt ſo hainous a revenge againſt them: for their inſolency
"ſeemed in appearance to concern Archelaus, yet in a ſort their contumacy pertained to Ca-
"ſars ruin. For thoſe that had been ſent by him to appeaſe and redreſſe their ſedition, were "againſt all law and right charged and ſlain by them, without reſpect of God, or regard of "the ſolemn feaſt: whoſe defence Antipater was not aſhamed of, without reſpect of equity, "ſo that he might ſatisfie that hatred which he bare unto Archelaus. That therefore it was "their fault, who firſt of all abſtained not from injury but whetted thoſe ſwords,
"which were drawn in maintenance of the peace, againſt their own boſomes. He enforced
"all other things alſo, whereof they had accuſed Archelaus, againſt themſelves, ſaying that "none of theſe things were done without their conſents: and that the offence was not ſo M
"grievous, as they intended it ſhould be eſteemed, to the end they might diſcredit Arche-
"laus. So great a deſire was in them to hurt their kinſman, a man both well reſpected, and "affected by his father, as alſo kind and officious towards them in all things that concerned "them. As for the teſtament, that it was made by the King when he was in perfect eſtate of "mind and body, and of greater force then the former, becauſe the authority and confir"mation thereof was aſcribed to Cæſar the Soveraign of the world.

"Further, that Cæſar would not imitate them in that wrong they did unto Herod, who (being "during his life-time bountifully graced by him, by many benefits) do now after his death,
"go about to violate his laſt and trueſt teſtament: but that rather like a friend and confede"rate he would confirm his will, who like his faithful and ſworn welwiller had committed
"all things to his truſt. For that there muſt needs be a great difference between their malice "and Cæſars vertue and faith, which was renowned thorow the whole world. For which

A "cause he would not judge his decree to be inconsiderately past, who left his succession to "his well-deserving son, and referred all things to his trust. For that it was unlikely that he "should erre in the choice of his successour, who had so discreetly submitted all things to "Cæsars judgment. After this matter Nicholas also finished his discourse. Hereupon Cæsar courteously raised Archelaus, who lay prostrate and humbled before his feet, telling him that he was most worthy to be King, by giving an apparant testimony, that he was constant in his resolutions, pretending that he would do nothing but that which should be answerable to Herods testament, and Archelaus profit; and seeing the young man was confirmed in some hope with this his promise, he determined nothing more for that time: but dismissing the counsel, he debated with himself, whether he should ratifie the Kingdome to Ar-
B chelaus onely, or divide it amongst Herods kindred, especially since all men had need of his assistance.

CHAP. XII.

The Jews mutiny against Sabinus, and how Varus punisheth the author of the sedition.

BUt before Cæsar had determined any thing certainly in this behalf, Marthalce, Archelaus mother died of a sickness, and Varus the President of the Jews in Syria, had sent letters, which certified the Emperour of the rebellion of the Jews. For after Archelaus departure, all the nation were in an uprore. To pacifie which, Varus resorted thither, and punished the authors of the same: and after he had in this sort appeased all
C things, he retuned to Antioch, leaving a Regiment of souldiers in Jerusalem to restrain the factious innovations amongst the Iews: yet prevailed he nothing by this his policy. For as soon as Varus was departed, Sabinus, who intended Cæsars affairs, remaining in that place, grievously burthened the Jews, trusting to that power that was left him, and supposing that he was already enabled to withstand the multitude. For he armed divers souldiers, and made use of them to oppresse the Jews, and to provoke them to sedition. For he inforced himself to surprize their fortresses, and forcibly to make search after the Kings treasures, for his private lucre and covetousnesse sake. When as therefore the feast of Whitsontide was come (which is one of our feastivals) divers thousands from all parts repaired to Jerusalem,
D not onely for religion sake, but also for despite and hatred they had conceived against those violences and injuries, which Sabinus had offered them. And not onely were those of Judæa grievously offended (but divers also resorted out of Galilee and Idumæa, from Jericho and the cities scituate on the other side of Jordan, desiring all of them to be revenged on Sabinus. And dividing their camp into three bands after this manner, and one part of them took up the Hippodrome, and of the other two the one seized the southern quarter of the Temple, & the other the eastern, and the third which was in the Hippodrome, were planted to the westward, where the Kings Palace stood; and thus prepared they all things that were necessary to set upon the Romans whom they had besieged on all sides. At that time Sabinus fearing their number, and resolution, who were resolved either to die or to overcome, sent present letters unto Varus, requiring him with all expedition to send him a supply, because the regi-
E ment that was left by him, was in great danger; and must needs utterly perish without his speedy rescous: as for himself he withdrew into the tower and dungeon of the castle Phasælus, which was a fortresse which was builded and so called in honour of Herods brother, who was slain by the Parthians; and from the top thereof made a sign to the Romans, that they should sally out upon the Jews; being afraid to trust himself to his own friends, and supposing that the rest ought to expose their lives to danger in maintenance of his safety. The Romans having made this sally, there arose a desperate skirmish, wherein the Romans divers wayes had the upper hand; yet were not the Jews any wayes discomforted, notwithstanding they had lost many men, but wheeled about so long, till at last they seized the outward galleries,
F and those that incompassed the Temple, and in that place there was a hot assault; for they flung down stones with their hands & slings, and there were certain archers mixed amongst them; who in that they had recovered a place of advantage, grievously gauled the Romans which were below, in that they had no means to avoid their shot, but were in such sort exposed thereunto, as their enemies had the better. And with this disadvantage fought the Romans a long time, till at length sore aggrieved at this their present indignity, they secretly fired the galleries and porches, without any discovery of those that were therin: which fire brought thither by many, and fed with such matter, as would speedily flame, incontinently took hold of the roof, because the roof was covered with pitch and wax, & gilded upon the wax; so that these great and excellent buildings were burnt down to nothing in a moment, and they that were resorted thither, were all of them consumed before they were aware.

For ſome of them fell with the roof of the galleries; otherſom ſhot at and ſlain by thoſe that ſtood round about; otherſom deſpairing of their lives, and amazed at the miſchief, either caſt themſelves into the fire, or ſlew themſelves with their own ſwords; & all thoſe that retired under hope to ſave themſelves by that way they aſcended, were encountred by the Romans, who ſlew them all in that they were diſcouraged and diſarmed, though furiouſly deſperate: ſo that not one of them that aſcended the porches eſcaped with his life. Afterward the Romans thruſting forward one another by thoſe wayes, where the fire was ſlaked, entred the treaſure houſe where the ſacred money was kept, by which means a great part thereof was ſtolne away by the ſouldiers, and Sabinus to all mens knowledge carried away four hundred talents. But the Jews being afflicted with a double calamity, firſt of all with the loſſe of their friends in that fight; and laſtly, with the ſpoil of the treaſury; yet aſſembled they a troop of the moſt valianteſt ſouldiers, and beſieged the place, threatning to burn the ſame, with Sabinus and all other the Romans that were therein, except they ſpeedily departed; and in ſo doing, they promiſed both them and Sabinus all aſſurance and ſecurity: whereby it came to paſſe, that divers of them that were in the palace, iſſued out and ſubmitted themſelves unto them. But Rufus and Gratus having three thouſand of thoſe valiant ſouldiers under their charge, who had ſerved Herod, joyned themſelves with the Romans. The like did thoſe horſemen which followed Rufus, who in like manner ſubmitted themſelves to their diriction: yet for all this, the Jews continued and intended their ſiege, undermining the wals, and exhorting their adverſaries to depart, and not to exempt them of their liberty, which they had long time enjoyed under their predeceſſours. Sabinus was willing to depart from thence with his ſouldiers; yet durſt he not truſt them in regard of their former attempt, and he ſuſpected overmuch the over-liberal offer his enemies had made him: but neglected the ſame, becauſe he expected Varus.

At the ſame time infinite other troubles were raiſed in divers other places of Judæa, according as each man either was increaſed with a deſire of gain, or a will to revenge. For 2000 men of war (who had ſometime ſerved under Herod, and being at that time caſhired, lived at home) aſſembling themſelves together aſſailed thoſe of the Kings faction, who made head againſt them, under the conduct of Herods nepew Aciabus: who never daring to encounter them in a place of eaqual advantage, in that they were old ſouldiers, & well exerciſed in war, defended himſelf, in that he held and kept himſelf as near as he could in the mountains and places of advantage. Moreover, Judas the ſon of Ezechias the archthief, whom Herod overcame with ſo much difficulty, at Sephoris a city of Gallilee, gathering unto him a band of deſperate men, made incurſions upon the Kings dominions. And having taken all thoſe arms and weapons, which he might recover in that place, he armed from the firſt to the laſt all thoſe ſouldiers that were with him: he took away all that money which was reſerved for the King, in that place: and affrighting the inhabitants round about him, he ſpoiled all thoſe with whomſoever he met, aſpiring to the Kingdome, and affecting the ſame, not by lawful means, of which he was unskilful, but by a liberty to do injury.

Whileſt theſe troubles ranged in every place, Simon alſo, who had been one of Herods ſervants, and both for his ſhape, ſtature & ſtrength, was eſteemed amongſt all men, undertook the Kingdom: and being attended by a mighty army, and proclaimed King by them, who were a wicked and unbridled multitude, and perſweding himſelf that he was worthy to be King above any other, he firſt of all ſet fire on the palace in Iericho, and ſpoiled all that which was therein. He burnt alſo divers other royal palaces belonging to the King, which were in divers places of the countrey, giving them free licence, who were his followers in the action, to bear away the prey that remained; and far more licentious pranks had he played, had not his practiſes been ſpeedily and wiſely prevented. For Gratus, who with the Kings ſouldiers had coupled himſelf with the Romans, and gathered all the forces that he had, went out againſt this Simon. And after a fierce battel, they on the other ſide of Jordan, were put to flight, and fighting rather under courage then military diſcipline, they were overcome. And whileſt Simon traverſing a valley ſought to ſave himſelf by flight, Gratus met with him, and cut off his head.

About the ſame time alſo, the royal palace of Amatha, that was faſt by Jordon, was burnt by men of as bad diſpoſition as Simon was. And thus thorow the whole nation reigned this raging rebellion, for that the countrey had no King, who by his vertue might govern and moderate the people, for that the ſtrangers, who were ſent to repreſſe theſe mutinies did rather incenſe them through their violence and avarice. For a certain obſcure and baſe man (neither eſteemed for vertue, nor worthy regard for his riches, but being a ſhepheard utterly unknown beforetime, and onely famous for his huge ſtature and ſtrength) called Athronges,

The Iews almoſt engaged in rebellion.

Athronges ſtrong in body and goodly in ſtature, attempteth royal dignitie.

A was ſo audacious to aſpire to royal dignity, and took pleaſure to offer violence, ſetting light by his life, and expoſing himſelf to all hazards for the onely unbridled affection he bare to ſoveraigntie. He had foure brothers of as goodly ſtature as himſelf, who were eſteemed for men of valour and execution, whereby they imagined they had the means offered them to occupie the Kingdome. Each one of theſe had the command over a Company. For a great company of people reſorted dayly unto them; the charge of whom was committed unto his brethren, at ſuch time as any occaſion of warre was offered, and he in the mean while wearing the Diadem on his head, ordered, counſelled and commanded all things. The power of this Gallant endured a long time, who was not called King for nought: for he B diſpoſed all things according to his own pleaſure, and both he and his brethren were fleſht with the ſlaughter of the Romanes, and thoſe of the Kings ſide, whom he hated alike; theſe, by reaſon of the inſolence they had uſed during Herods life-time: the other, in regard of thoſe injuries, which lately they ſuppoſed themſelves to have received by them. This hatred of theirs dayly increaſed more and more, and there was no man that could eſcape their hands, both in reſpect of the gain they ſought, as for the cuſtome they had to ſhed bloud. They therefore at that time ſet upon the Romans, and ſurprized them on the ſudden neer to Emmaus, at ſuch time as they carried victuals and munition unto their camp, and having encloſed the Centurion Arius with fourtie of their moſt valiant footmen, they ſhot him thorow with their darts. The reſt that expected nothing leſſe then life, were ſaved by Gratus, who came in upon them with the Kings ſouldiers: whereupon leaving the dead bo- C dies, they retired. Continuing their warre after this manner a long time, according as occaſion was offered, they had done much miſchief to the Romans, and farre more injurie to the Nation of the Jewes. Finally, they were ſurprized; the one man in an encountrie betwixt them and Gratus, the other in fighting againſt Ptolomey. The eldeſt was taken by Archelaus, and the laſt being diſmayed with the accidents, and ſeeing no means to eſcape (for beſides his other miſhaps, his ſouldiers were afflicted with ſickneſſe) he with the reſt upon Archelaus faith and oath ſubmitted himſelf unto him. But this was done ſome little while after.

Athronges and his brethren taken.

At this time was all Judæa full of robberies, and as many ſeditious aſſemblies as drew together, ſo many Kings were there elected, who were raiſed to the utter ruine of the Com- D mon-weal. Amongſt the reſt, the Romans were they that ſmarted leaſt, but the murthers were executed againſt thoſe that were out of the countrey. But Varus underſtanding by Sabinus letters, in what dangers they were, and fearing the utter overthrow of his third Legion, he took with him the two other (for to the uttermoſt, in Syria there were but three) and with the aſſiſtance of the Kings and Tetrarchs he haſted into Jewry to relieve thoſe that were beſieged, commanding thoſe that were ſent out before he diſlodged, to meet him at Ptolemais, and paſſing by the citie of the Berythians, he received a thouſand, and five hundreth ſouldiers at their hands, to attend him in his warre. Aretas alſo, who was Lord of Petra, drawing himſelf into confederacy with the Romans in regard of that hatred he bare towards Herod, ſent him horſemen and footmen. When all theſe forces were aſſembled at Ptolemais, he de- E livered a part thereof to his ſon, and one of his friends; commanding them to make warre upon the Galileans, who bordered upon that Citie; who entring that Region, and putting all thoſe to flight, whoſoever durſt make head againſt him, he took Sephoris, and ſelling the inhabitants under the ſpeare, he conſumed the Citie with fire. Varus himſelf marching towards Samaria with his Army, violenced not the Citie, in that he knew it was free from the contagion of the ſeditious, but he pitched his camp in a certain Village, which was Ptolomies poſſeſſion called Arus. The ſame did the Arabians burn, revenging themſelves on Herods friend for his ſake, and marching onward, the Arabians ſpoiled alſo another Village called Sampho, and for that it was ſtrongly fortified burned the ſame. Beſides, in that journey nothing eſcaped their hands, but they put all to fire and ſword. For both Emmaus was burned by Varus command; and in revenge of his ſouldiers that were ſlain in that place, it was left F deſolate and void of inhabitants. From thence drawing neer to Jeruſalem, thoſe Jews that beſieged the legion of that ſide, upon the ſudden view and approach of the army of the Romans, fearfully fled, giving over that ſiege which they intended. But thoſe Jews of Jeruſalem, being grievouſly reproved by Varus, alledged in there excuſe, that the people in regard of the feaſt were aſſembled in that place, and that the war was not begun by their conſent, but undertaken by their boldneſſe who reſorted thither from divers places, and that they were ſo farre off from aſſayling the Romans, as they rather ſeemed to be beſieged by them. And long before this, Joſeph, King Herods nephew, Gratus and Rufus, with their ſouldiers were gone out to meet Varus, and thoſe Romans that had ſuſtained the ſiege, had done no leſſe.

The punishmen of the conspirators

But as touching Sabinus, he would not appear in Varus presence, by stealing away privily out of the Citie, he fled unto the seaward. Then Varus sending a part of his army thorow the whole region, sought out the authors of this sedition, and those that were noted men in the action; some of which, who were most guiltie, were punished: the rest were delivered. Now of those that were punished for this occasion, there were about two thousand crucified; and that done, seeing that this army stood him in little stead, he dismissed them. For divers disorders and outrages, contrary to Varus expresse command, were acted by his souldiers, who sought after nothing more then to encrease their means by other mens miseries. And hearing that ten thousand Jews were assembled together, he hasted apprehended them: but they not daring to hazard their fortune in a fight with him, by Achiabus advice submitted themselves. But Varus having pardoned the people for that their rebellion, sent all those that were the ring-leaders thereof to Cæsar, who discharged divers of them. But he chastised certain of Herods allies, and such as bare arms with them: for that neither in regard of kindred, nor respect of justice, they had abstained from rebellious insurrection. After that Varus had in this sort appeased all the troubles in Jewry, and left the first legion in garrison in Ierusalem, he returned to Antioch.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap 16. al. 17.

But Archelaus was crossed in Rome by another occurrent that arose upon this occasion: Certain Embassadors of the Iews resorted thither by Varus permission, requiring that it might be lawful for them to live according to their own laws: these presented themselves to the number of fifty, and were backt by eight thousand Iews that inhabited the Citie. And when as Cæsar had assembled the councel of his friends, and chiefest citizens in Apollo's Temple, which he had builded to his mighty charge, thither resorted the Embassadors, who were followed by a troup of Iews; and Archelaus also attended by his friends. But the Kings kindred neither stood by Archelaus in regard of the hate they bare him, and yet disdained they to assist the Embassadors, for that they were ashamed in Cæsars presence to oppose themselves against their neerest friend and kinsman. Philip also was present at that time, who by Varus perswasion resorted thither out of Syria, especially to the intent to plead for his brother, to whom Varus wished all good fortune: besides that, hoping not a little, that if the Iewes should obtain the libertie to live according to their Lawes, it might come to passe, that the Kingdome being divided amongst Herods children, he might also light on some part thereof.

The embassage of the Jews to Rome, and Archelaus the Embassadors of the Jews appear before Cæsar. Philip, Herods son.

The Embassadors of the Jews tip up Herods and Archelus iniquities.

After therefore the Embassadors of the Jewes had obtained Licence to propose their demands, pretending with themselves wholly to extinguish the Royaltie: they began to rip up Herods disgraces, alleadging how onely in name he had been a King, whereas otherwise he had used all the tyrannous practices that the wickedest person could have invented toward the destruction of his Nation; and that not content with these, he had of his own head practized and invented new. Neither that it needed them to reckon up how many he had deprived of life, when as the estate of those that were alive was farre more desperate; whom he not onely affrighted with perpetuall terrour and severitie, but also with injurious hands had not abstained from their goods. By which means it came to passe, that he not onely builded, but beautified forrain Cities inhabited by forrain Nations, to the end he might the rather utterly spoile those by exaction, which were scituated and seated in his own Countrey: and that he enforced his Nation to extreme povertie, which he received in most happy estate, whilest he spoyled those Nobles of theie estates, who upon weak probabilities were condemned to die, or granting them life, deprived them of their possessions, Furthermore, whereas yeerly Tributes were imposed on every one; yet severally was the ravenous and covetous desires of his Friends and Courtiers to be satisfied, yea, and of his servants also, who had the authoritie to exact these things, that by this means they might redeem their injurious vexations. As for the deflouring of Virgins, and the scornfull betraying of a Matrons chastitie, they covered them under silence, for that it is a great comfort to those that suffer such outrage, if their disgraces be but known to a few. In briefe, that Herod had in no other sort governed, then as if the government of them had been committed to a most savage beast. For which cause, whereas in times past that Nation had been afflicted with many calamities and murthers, yet that there is no example extant amongst their Monuments of antiquitie, that may be compared with their present calamitie under Herod. For which cause upon just respects they had with one consent named Archelaus their King, supposing that whatsoever King might befall them, he would alwayes demean himself more affably then Herod had done; and that to honour Archelaus they had mourned with him for his father, to gratifie him in other things, to the intent they might tie his good affection unto them: But he without delay, and all at once had made manifest to the whole Nation, what opinion they were to conceive of him, notwithstanding that as yet he was not confirmed King (for that it lay in Cæsars hands,

A hands to bequeath, yea or no) and as if he had been afraid, leſt he ſhould aſſuredly be acknowledged for his fathers ſonne, he had ſhewed an example of his vertue, moderation and good government, that he would uſe towards his ſubjects, by the firſt act which he hath committed, not onely againſt God, but alſo againſt men. For in the Temple it ſelf he hath cauſed three thouſand of his own Countrey-men to be ſlain. And how can he chuſe but be juſtly hated, who beſides his other cruelties, objecteth againſt us the crime of Rebellion and mutiny? The effect of their requeſt therefore was this, that they might not any more be governed by a King, nor any ſuch like government, but that they might be annexed unto Syria, and ſubmit themſelves unto their Governours that ſhould be ſent thither: That in ſo doing it ſhould truely appear whether they were ſeditious, and addicted to changes, or whether they would live in peace at ſuch time as they

B had favourable Governours. After the Jewes had ſpoken to this effect, Nicholas diſcharged the Kings of thoſe accuſations that were objected againſt them, and namely, Herod, who (as he ſaid) had never been accuſed all his life-time; and that it was no reaſon, that they who juſtly accuſed him, might have cauſed him to be puniſhed during his life-time, ſhould now addreſſe their accuſations againſt him after he was dead. And as touching thoſe things that were objected concerning Archelaus actions, it ought to be imputed to their inſolence, for that ingaging themſelves in matters contrary to Law, and having begun to murther thoſe who ſought to appeaſe the tumult, they accuſed ſuch as had kept them in obedience. Beſides this, he objected againſt them, that they were addicted to alterations, and took pleaſure to ſtir up ſeditions, for that they knew not what thing it was to obey Juſtice and the Lawes, and

C that there was no Nation in the world ſo head-ſtrong as that of the Jews; for that they would have the upper-hand over all. Thus ſpake Nicholas.

Cæſar confirms Herods Teſtament, and appointeth his children to be his ſucceſſours.

D WHen Cæſar had heard theſe things, he diſmiſſed the Aſſembly. But ſome few dayes after, he deſirous to make an end of this matter; declared Archelaus not King, but Lord of half that government that appertained to Herod, promiſing him to beſtow a royal dignitie upon him, if ſo be he behaved himſelf vertuouſly, according, as it became him. As for the other, moity, he divided it between two, giving a ſeveral part thereof to each of Herods ſons, Philip and Antipas, who debated with his brother Archelaus for the whole kingdom. The ſame Antipas alſo had the Countrey on the other ſide of Jordan, and Galilee, with two hundreth talents of annual revenew. As for Philip, he had Bathanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and part of the Palace that was called by Zenodorus name, with one hundred talents. As for Archelaus, he had Idumæa, Judæa and Samaria, which were diſcharged of the fourth part of the tributes by Cæſar, for that they had joyned themſelves with the reſt of the people during the time of the ſedition. Beſides that, Archelaus had the E tower of Straton, Sebaſte, Joppe and Jereſalem. For Gaza, Gadara and Hippon were cities of Greece which Cæſar had diſmembred, and adjoyned to Syria. Archelaus had five hundreth talents of yeerly rent out of his countrey. This was the patrimony divided among Herods ſonnes. As for Salome, beſides that which her brother had given her in his Will, which were the Cities of Jamnia, Azot, Phaſælis, and half a million of ſilver money, Cæſar granted her a royall houſe in Aſcalon; ſo as ſhe received, in the whole, ſixty talents of the annual revenew and had her houſe allotted her within the dominion of Archelaus. All other of Herods kindred received that which was bequeathed unto them by his teſtament. Two of his daughters that were unmarried, were endowed by Cæſar with a quarter of a million of ſilver money which he gave them, beſide their fathers portion, and they were married to Pheroras ſonnes. Of the counterfeit Alexander.

Hedio & Ruf. finus, chap. 18. Alias, chap. 17.

The false Alexander.

AFter these things were in this sort disposed by Cæsar, a young man and a Jew born, brought up in the Citie of Sidon, by a certain Roman Libertine, intruded himself into Herods kindred, for that all those that beheld him, reported he resembled Alexander, Herods sonne, who was slain by him; and by this means, he began to aspire unto the Kingdome: whereupon calling to him a companion, who was his own Countrey-man, and a long beaten Courtier, and his crafts-master, and fit to execute any dangerous or desperate actions, he by his instructions fained himself to be that Alexander, Herods sonne, who was delivered from death, by the means of a certain friend, who had the charge to see him executed: who executing others in their steads, delivered both him and his brother Aristobulus, and that they were both escaped in this manner. Being puffed up by these toyes, he failed not to deceive other men; and as soon as he came to Creet, as many Jews soever as he fell in conference with, he perswaded them no lesse; and getting much money at their hands, he sayled into the Ile of Melos, where he gathered a great summe of money under pretext that he was of the Kings bloud. And now hoping that he should recover his fathers kingdome, and that he should remunerate those who were beneficiall unto him, he hasted towards Rome, accompanied with his friends in great pomp. And being arived at Puteol, he there also was entertained with no less favour by those Jewes whom he deceived by his colourable title; and divers others, who had been Herods friends and familiars came unto him, and entertained them as their King. The cause hereof was the naturall disposition of men, who take pleasure in false reports, together with the report of his resemblance. For they that had frequented very familiarly with Alexander, held it for a matter most assured, tha the was the man, an none other, and affirmed unto others upon their oaths that it was he; so that this rumour at last came to Rome. And all the Jews that dwelt there came forth to meet him, saying, That it was Gods handy-work, that he was after that sort preserved beyond all mens expectation: and they greatly rejoyced in his mother Mariammes behalf, from whom he was descended; and he was carried in a Litter thorow the streets with all the apparel of a King, the charge whereof was defraied by those who were his friends. He was attended with a great multitude of men, and honoured with great applause, as it ordinarily falleth out at such time as beyond all expectation any one is found to have been miraculously preserved. When this news was brought to Cæsars eares, he gave small credit thereunto, perswading himself that it was a hard matter to deceive Herod in a cause of so great importance: notwithstanding, conforming himself in some sort to the opinions of men, he sent a certain free-man of his called Celadus, who had very familiarly conversed with Alexander and Aristobulus during their infancy, giving him in charge to bring Alexander unto him, to the end he might see him; which he did, and was never the wiser in discovering him. This notwithstanding, Cæsar was not fully deceived. For, although he resembled him somewhat, yet was not he so neerly like him, that he could deceive those who narrowly observed him. For this counterfeit Alexander had hard hands, in that he had been accustomed to labour, which the true Alexander could not have in regard of his tender and delicate education: and contrariwise, this man was of a rough skinne and hard flesh. Cæsar therefore discovering the treachery both of the counterfeit scholler & lying master, and how they accorded in their confident justifications, he enquired of them what was become of Aristobulus who was secretly hidden with him, and for what cause he presented not himself to enjoy the honour that appertained to those, who were so nobly descended? It was answered him, that he remained in the Ile of Cyprus, for fear of dangers, to which they are exposed who sail by sea, to the end that if any misfortune should befal him, all Mariammes race should not be extinguished, but that at leastwise Aristobulus might be left alive. Whilest he avowed these things, and the author of the fable justified no lesse, Cæsar drawing the young man aside, said unto him:

The false Alexander cometh to Rome.

The false Alexander cannot deceive Cæsar.

My friend, if thou wilt not deceive me, thou shalt have this recompence, that thou shalt not be punished. Tell me therefore what thou art, and who hath emboldned thee to practice this fraud: for this malice is so great that it surpasseth thine age: whereupon being unable to conceal the truth, he discovered the treacherie to Cæsar, how and by whom it was contrived. At that time Cæsar being loath to falsifie his promise that he had past to this false Alexander, and seeing that in times past he had travelled with his hands, he caused him to be enrowled among the number of his Saylors to row, and caused the other that induced him to this fraud, to be put to death,

Archelaus is accuſed anew, and afterwards baniſhed and ſent into Vienna.

B After that Archelaus had taken poſſeſſion of that Soveraigntie that was allotted him, he came into Judæa, where he depoſed Joazar the ſonne of Boethus from the high Prieſthood, accuſing him to have favoured the ſeditious, and eſtabliſhed Eleazar his brother in his place. After this he re-edified the Palace in Jericho, and ſumptuouſly adorned it, drawing away the half of thoſe waters which ſerved the borough of Neara: and conveighing them thorow a field which he had planted with Palm-trees; he builded a borough in that place, which he named Archelais, and contrary to the lawes of his Countrey, he married Glaphyra, Archelaus daughter, who had been his brother Alexanders wife, by whom alſo he had divers children, notwithſtanding, the law of the Jews forbiddeth a man to marry his brothers wife. Neither did Eleazar enjoy the Prieſthood any long time: but during his life time, Jeſus the ſon of Sias was ſubſtituted in his place.

C The tenth yeer of Archelaus government, the chiefeſt governours among the Jews and Samaritans, unable any longer to endure his crueltie and tyranny, accuſed him before Cæſar, and eſpecially after they had underſtood that he had tranſgreſſed Cæſars command, who had charged him to behave himſelf graciouſly towards them. Which when Cæſar underſtood, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and cauſed Archelaus Agent to be called before him, who was then at Rome, and ſent for Archelaus alſo: and eſteeming it too baſe an indignitie for him to write unto him, Go (ſaid he) unto him with all expedition, and bring him unto me without delay. He poſting forward with all diligence, at length arrived in Judæa, where he found Archelaus banquetting with his friends, and having certified him of Cæſars pleaſure, he incited him to haſten onward of his way. As ſoon as he came to Rome, after that Cæſar had heard certain of his accuſers and in his juſtifications, he baniſhed him, and confined him

But before Archelaus was ſent for to Rome, he reported unto his friends this dream which enſueth: Him thought that he ſaw ten ears full of Wheat, and very ripe, which the Oxen browzed upon, and as ſoon as he awoke, he conceived an opinion that his viſion preſaged ſome greater matter. For which cauſe he ſent for certain ſooth-ſayers, who made it their profeſſion to interpret dreams. Now whileſt they were debating one with another (for they differed from the moſt part in their expoſition) a certain man called Simon an Eſſean, having firſt of all obtained ſecuritie and licenſe to ſpeak, ſaid that the viſion pretended, that a great alteration ſhould befall in Archelaus eſtate, to his utter diſgrace. For the Oxen ſignified afflictions, in reſpect that thoſe kinde of creatures doe ordinarily travel; and as touching the change of eſtate, it was ſignified by this, in that the earth being laboured by

E the travel of the Oxen, retained not the ſame eſtate: and as touching the ten ears of corn, they ſignified the like number of yeers. And therefore when as one ſummer ſhould be overpaſt, that then the time of Archelaus ſoveraigntie ſhould be at an end. Thus interpreted he this dream.

And the fifth day after the viſion thereof, Archelaus his Factor by Cæſars commandment came into Jewry to ſummon him to Rome. Some ſuch like matter happened to Glaphyra his wife alſo, the daughter of King Archelaus: ſhe (as we have ſaid) married Alexander, Herods ſonne, when ſhe was a maid, and brother to this Archelaus; who being ſlain by his father, ſhe was married the ſecond time to Juba King of Mauritania: and he alſo being dead, ſhe living with her father in Coppadocia, was married to Archelaus, who put away Mariamme

She living with Archelaus, was encountred with ſuch a dream: She thought that ſhe ſaw Alexander faſt by her, who cheriſhing and embracing her, checked her, ſaying, Glaphyra, Thou approveſt the truth of that Proverb, which ſaith, women have no loyaltie. For having given me thy faith, and married with me at ſuch time as thou wert a virgin, and born children by me, thou haſt forgotten and neglected my love, thorow the deſire thou haſt had to be married the ſecond time. Neither waſt thou contented to have done me this wrong, but haſt taken unto thee likewiſe a third huſband lewdly and impudently intruding thy ſelf into my family; and being married with Archelaus, thou art content to admit my brother for thy husband. will not forget the love that I have born thee, but will deliver thee from him, who hath done thee this reproach, by retaining thee for my own, as heretofore thou hast been. After that she had told this vision to certain women that were his familiars, she died very shortly after, which accident I have thought good to register in this place, in that I was to entreat of those Kings; and otherwise the matter seemeth to be a signal example, containing a most certain argument of the immortality of souls, and Gods providence. And if any one deem these things incredible, let him reserve his opinion to himself, and no wayes contradict those, who by such events are incited to the study of vertue. Now when the government of Archelaus was annexed to Syria, Cyrenius, who had been Consull, was sent by Cæsar to tax Syria, and to dispose of Archelaus house.

Cyrenius is sent by Cæsar into Syria.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 1. Cyrenius is sent by Cæsar into Syria to execute justice in that place. Coponius Prætect of Judæa. The taxation of the people of the Jews.

Cyrenius the Roman Senator having executed all degrees, offices, and dignities, untill such time as he obtained the Consulship (a man of great reckoning and estimation) was sent into Syria by Cæsars direction, to do justice among the people, and to sess and tax each mans goods: with him was sent Coponius a Captain of a company of horsemen, who was appointed to have the commandment of all Jewry. Cyrenius therefore came into Judæa, which was already annexed unto Syria, to tax the goods of the inhabitants thereof, and to confiscate Archelaus substance. And although at the first the Jews thought but hardly of this description, yet notwithstanding without contradiction they submitted themselves, being perswaded thereunto by the counsell of the high Priest Joazar the sonne of Boethus, by whose advice they suffered themselves to be taxed without contradiction. But after this there arose a certain Jew called Judas the Gaulanite, born in the Town of Galama, who having a certain man called Sadoc the Pharisee confederate with him, laboured to stirre up the people to Rebellion: alleadging that the description was no other thing, but a manifest confession of their servitude, exhorting all the Nation to maintain their libertie; and putting them in hope that they thereby should happily establish their estates, and enjoy their goods with securitie: and besides this,

Moreover, that God would not affoord them a more aſſured way to ſettle their fortunes then by this means, namely, if they would employ themſelves in the execution of their deſignes, and if having conceived in their mindes haughty and noble attempts, they forbore not to finiſh the ſame, notwithſtanding the execution coſt them their lives. Theſe ſpeeches of theirs were entertained by the people with great pleaſure, and by the ſame they were the more comfirmed and heartned to rebellion. So that there was no kinde of evill which theſe men ſet not abroach, yea the whole nation was repleniſhed with ſuch miſeries, that it is impoſſible to recount them: for the wars therein continued with ſuch fury, that it was impoſſible to reſtrain the violence thereof; ſo that they neither ſpared friends, nor reſpected enemies, but were wholly given
B over to the ſpoile. There reigned nothing but robberies and murthers of noble perſonages, who entertained one another under pretence to eſtabliſh the eſtate of the Common-weale, but in effect for their private profit ſake, whereby the cities were repleniſhed with ſeditions and murthers, in which the inhabitants ſlaughtered one another, after a ſtrange manner of fury, and deſire they had not to ſpare any that was of their contrary faction. They were afflicted with forrain enemies and famine; yet none of theſe could pacifie their fury, but that they furiouſly razed Cities, ſhed innocent bloud, till at length the horrible miſchief took ſuch a head, that they conſumed the Temple of God, and burned all the beautifull buildings. So dangerous a thing is it to change the cuſtomes and manners of a countrey. For Iudas and Sadoc having introduced and raiſed a fourth ſect, and tying the Sectaries to their command,
C filled the whole Common-weale for the preſent with many troubles, and produced the roots of theſe miſchiefs, which afterwards branched abroad from this unaccuſtomed ſect. For which cauſe I think it not amiſſe to diſcourſe briefly of theſe Sectaries opinions, whereby ſo many evils have fallen upon our nation.

CHAP. II.

How many, and what ſects there were among the Jewes.

D THere were three ſects among the Jews, of long continuance and antiquitie: that of the Eſſeans; that of the Sadduces; and that of thoſe who were called Phariſees. Of theſe have we ſpoken in our ſecond book, of the warres of the Jews; and yet now I think it not amiſſe to ſpeak ſomewhat of them in this place alſo. The Phariſees uſe a very auſtere and ſtrict kinde of life, and addict not themſelves to any delicacie, but diligently follow that which their reaſon induceth them unto. They honour their elders, neither dare they reply, or reproach them for their admonitions. They attribute all things unto fate, and yet they take not an aſſent of will from man; ſuppoſing that God tempereth all things in ſuch ſort, that by his ordinance and mans will all things are performed good or evill. They beleeve alſo that the ſoules of men are immortall; and that under the earth they receive judgement of honour or diſgrace, accordings as they have addicted themſelves
E to vertue or vice in their life times: the one to live in perpetuall priſon; the other to riſe again very ſhortly. For which cauſe they are in great eſtimation among the people; and all that which appertaineth to the ſervice of God, whether they be prayers or ſacrifices, all things are done according as they give direction. So ample a teſtimony yeeld the Cities of their wiſedome, temperance and honeſt life. But the Sadduces are of that opinion, that the ſouls of men periſh with their bodies. They obſerve no other thing but that which is in the law, and hold it a vertue to diſpute with their maſters, as touching the decrees of their ſect. Their opinion is entertained by very few, yet ſuch, who for the moſt part are men of the beſt reckoning; yet entermeddle they not in any caſe with any affairs: and when they are advanced to any honours, either with their own good liking, or with conſtraint; they are en-
F forced to allow of that which the Phariſees ſhall propoſe, otherwiſe the common people will not endure them. The Eſſeans attribute unto God the government and diſpoſition of all things. They ſay that the ſoules of men are immortall, and all the uttermoſt of their indeavour and delight is to maintain juſtice and equitie. They ſend their offerings unto the temple, yet ſacrifice they not with other men, by reaſon they uſe more ſacred and different ceremonies: for which cauſe they are ſecluded out of the common Temple, and ſacrifice apart. Otherwiſe, they are men of moſt reconciled behaviour, and ſuch as are wholly addicted to trimming and labouring their fields. They have one cuſtome which is worthy admiration, and ſuch a one as is not to be found amongſt any other, either Greeks or Barbarians, that make any reckoning of vertue, which they have not practiſed for a little while, but even from all antiquitie; which is, that they poſſeſſe their goods in common: neither doth the richeſt amongſt them make more uſe of his poſſeſſions then he that hath leaſt of all. They are at leaſt foure thouſand in number, who neither have wives nor ſlaves; ſuppoſing that women are the occaſion of injuſtice, and that ſlaves doe ariſe my mutinies: and living apart by themſelves, they ſerve one another; and chooſe out certain upright men among their Prieſts to gather the fruits and revenews of their lands, to the end they may be ſuſtained and nouriſhed thereby: In a word, they follow the ſame courſe of life that they doe, who are called Pliſti among the Danes. The fourth ſect was founded by Judas of Galilee, which accordeth altogether and in all things with the Phariſees, but that they are extremely zealous of their libertie, acknowledging but one onely God, Lord and Maſter of all things, and had rather both themſelves with their deareſt children and kinsfolk endure the moſt grievous and bitter torments that may be imagined, then call any mortall man their Lord. Of which conſtancie of theirs I forbear to diſcourſe any further at this time, for that it is ſufficiently known unto divers, who have been eye-witneſſes thereof: neither fear I leſt any one ſhould ſuppoſe thoſe things to be incredible, which I have ſaid of them; but contrariwiſe, that I have ſpoken leſſe then they themſelves make evident in contemning their grievous tortures and puniſhments; which courage and magnanimitie of theirs increaſed very mightily amongſt our nation, being kindled by the moſt hainous injuries which were offered us by Geſſius Florus our Governour, by which means at length it came to paſſe that they revolted and rebelled againſt the people of Rome. But Herod and Philip took each of them the poſſeſſion of their Tetrarchy, and diſpoſed of the affairs thereof. Herod incloſed Sephoris with a ſtrong wall, and made it the chiefeſt city and ornament of Galilee: he fortified alſo another citie called Betaramphtha, and named it Julias in honour of Iulia the Emperour Cæſars wife. Philip repaired Paneada ſcituated neer unto the ſourſe of Jordan, and called it Cæſarea: he repaired alſo the borough of Bethſaida neer unto the lake of Genazereth, and gave it the dignitie of a city, both for the number of the inhabitants, as for other preeminences, and called it Julia by Cæſars wives name. Some little while after, Coponius returned to Rome, and Marcus Ambivius ſucceeded him in the government. In his time Salome King Herods ſiſter departing out of this life, bequeathed unto Iulia, the City of Iamnia and all the lands and countrey round about: ſhe gave her alſo Phaſælis ſcituate in the Plain, and Archelais where there are divers Date trees, bearing moſt excellent fruit. After Ambivius, Annius Rufus had the command, under whom died Cæſar the ſecond Roman Emperour, after he had reigned fifty ſeven yeers, ſix moneths and two daies, and had Antonius his copartner in the monarchy for the ſpace of fourteen yeers. He lived in the whole ſeventy ſeven yeers.

This Gratus depoſed Ananus, and appointed Iſmael the ſon of Fabius High Prieſt: and after his deceaſe (for he lived but a little whiles after) Eleazar the ſon of Ananus was made high Prieſt. A yeer after this, this Eleazar was alſo depoſed, and the Prieſthood was given to Simon the ſon of Camithus: who continuing in this dignitie for a yeers ſpace and no longer, Ioſeph called Caiphas ſucceeded after him. After Gratus had behaved himſelf thus, he returned to Rome, after he had remained in Judæa for the ſpace of 11. yeers. After him came Pontius Pilate, and ſucceeded him in the government.

A But Herod the Tetrarch being entertained into Tiberius friendſhip, builded a citie in honour of his name, and called it Tiberias. He planted it in the fruit fulleſt part of Galilee, hard by the lake Genazareth, and neer unto the naturall bathes in the borough called Emmaus. This City was peopled by ſtrangers, who reſorted thither from all parts; and by divers, of the countries of Galilee, ſome of which were conſtrained to inhabit the ſame. Some of thoſe likewiſe, who were in authoritie repaired thither, and from all countries there flocked many, who were not aſſuredly held for men of free condition; all which he infranchiſed, and gave them great gifts, under that condition, that they ſhould not abandon the Citie. To ſome of them he gave houſes already builded; to otherſome lands very apt to be tilled, knowing that the habitation of ſuch a place was contrary to the laws and cuſtoms of his countrey, and the B ordinances of the Jews; for that Tiberias was builded in a place full of ſepulchers: and our law ſaith, he that converſeth in thoſe places, is held unclean and defiled for the ſpace of ſeven dayes.

At that very time died Phraates King of Parthia, being traiterouſly ſlain by his ſon Phraataces, for this cauſe. After that Phraates had gotten many lawfull children, he took unto him an Italian woman to his concubine, called Thermuſa, whom with other preſents Iulius Cæſar had ſent unto him. After he had begotten on her his ſon Phraataces, he was ſo much beſotted with her beauty, that he took her to his wife, and held her in high eſtimation. She that might perſwade him unto all that whatſoever ſhe lifted, enforced herſelf to the uttermoſt to make her ſonne King of Parthia: and ſeeing that ſhe might not attain thereunto, except ſhe C had firſt found out the means to deliver her ſelf of Phraates lawfull children, ſhe perſwaded him to ſend them hoſtages to Rome. In a word, they were preſently ſent away, becauſe Phraates in no ſort had the power to contradict Thermuſas will, and onely Phraataces was brought up in the affairs of eſtate; who thinking the time too tedious and long, if he ſhould expect the Kingdome whileſt his father was dead, conſpired againſt him by the inſtigation and furtherance of his mother, with whom (as it is thought) he committed inceſt. In effect, being equally attainted of theſe two hainous crimes, both for the murther of his father, as his inceſt committed with his mother, he was generally hated by his ſubjects, who rebelled againſt him before ſuch time as he was ſettled in his Kingdome. By this means was his fortune overthrown, and he died. The noble men among the Parthians, perceiving that it was D impoſſible for them to maintain their policy without a King, and that their King ought lineally to deſcend of the race of the Arſacians (becauſe by cuſtome they might not chuſe any out of another ſtock) and ſuppoſing that their ordinances had too much already been broken, and that it would redound to their great diſhonour if the Kingdome ſhould be continued in the hands of ſuch a man, who was deſcended from an Italian concubine, they ſent Embaſſadours to require Herod to come and be their King, who otherwiſe was in hatred with all the people, and accuſed of extreme cruelty. In a word, he was an unſociable man, and extremely cholerick, notwithſtanding he were of the bloud of the Arſacides: they therefore flocked about him, and killed him at a banquet made at a certain ſacrifice (for the cuſtome of the Parthians was, that every one bare his weapon) or as the common report was, that he was ſlain at ſuch time as he was a hunting. For this cauſe, they ſent Embaſſadours to Rome, E requiring that one of thoſe that were hoſtages there might be their King, and one Vonones was ſent unto them, who was preferred above all his brethren. For he ſeemed to be capable of that high degree of honour, as to command two of the greateſt ſoveraignties that were under the ſunne; the one of his own nation, the other of a forrain dominion. But the Barbarians, who are by nature mutable and moſt impatient of indignitie, ſhortly after repented themſelves: for they diſdained to execute the command of a ſlave (for ſo called they a pledge) ſaying, that the Parthians had not a King given them by right of war, but that which was the moſt outrage that might befall them, by injurie offered them in the time of peace. For which cauſe they ſpeedily ſent for Artabanus King of Media, who was of the race of the Arſacides. To this requeſt of theirs he willingly condeſcended, and came unto them with his army. And Vonones marched forward to make head againſt him. At the firſt encountry, although the common ſort among the Parthians favoured Artabanus; yet was he overcome and fled to the mountains of Media. But not long after, having aſſembled a greater army, he once more ſet upon Vonones and diſcomfited him, at which time Vonones retired himſelfe with ſome horſemen of his into Seleucia. But Artabanus having made a great ſlaughter of thoſe that fled, and wholly abaſhed the mindes of the Barbarians, he retired himſelf to the Citie of Creſiphon, with thoſe people that accompanied him, and was afterwards made King of Parthia. Vonones arrived in Armenia, and at the firſt ſought to make himſelfe King over that nation, ſending to this effect certain Embaſſadours to Rome: but Tiberius repulſed his ſuit suit in respect of his cowardize, but the rather for that Artabanus by an expresse Embassage had threatned him with warre. For they of the greatest power among the Armenians (who are those that dwell about the floud Niphates) maintained Artabanus title; and Vonones, destitute of all hope to obtain the Kingdom, yeelded himself to Syllanus, who was governour of Syria, and in regard that he had been brought up at Rome, he was kept in Syria: and Artabanus gave Armenia to Orodes, one of his sonnes. Antiochus King of the Comagenes died also at that time, and there fell a debate betwixt the commons and the nobilitie; so that both parties sent their Embassadours to Rome. The nobles required that the forme of their government might be changed into divers signories; and the people requested that they might be honoured by a King, as they had been accustomed. The Senate decreed that Germanicus should be sent to settle the affairs in the East, fortune thereby presenting him with the occasion of his ruine. For, at such time as he arrived in the East, and orderly disposed all things, he was poysoned by Piso: whereof he died, as it is declared in another place.

CHAP. IV.

The rebellion of the Jews against Pontius Pilate.

Hedio & Russinus, chap. 6. al. chap. 8. Pilate bringeth Cæsars statues to Jerusalem, and upon the peoples instant motion transferreth them to Cæsarea.

Pilate Governour of Judea led his army from Cæsarea to Jerusalem, where he wintered them with an intent to bring in Cæsars statues, and standards into the Citie, in contempt of our law which forbiddeth us to make images. For which cause, those Governours that were before him, were wont to make their entries into the City without such pictures or paintings. Pilate was the first, who unawares and by night entred Jerusalem, bringing with him his images. Which when the people understood, in great multitudes they resorted to Cæsarea, beseeching him for many dayes, that he would transport those images into some other place. But when as Pilate denied them to performe their request, because the matter would redound to Cæsars dishonour, and the Jews also ceased not to sollicite him; some six daies after commanding his souldiers to lie in ambush in a readinesse, he sate him down in the Tribunall within the Hippodrom, making use of the opportunitie of the place, for that it was most fit for a stratagem. There being urged once more about the same businesse, he gave a sign to his souldiers to beset them, threatning them with death, except they would presently give over their suite, and repaire every one of them with all speed to their own houses. But they prostrating themselves upon the earth, and offering their naked throats, told him that they rather desired to die, then to see their laws violated, which were with so great judgement and reason proposed unto them. Pilate amazed at the confidence they shewed in the conservation of their laws, suddenly caused Cæsars images to be transported out of Jerusalem into Cæsarea, and out of the sacred treasurie he made certain conduits of water, that had their fountain heads more then two hundreth stades off. But the people took no pleasure in these conduits, and divers thousands of men assembled themselves exclaiming against Pilate, endeavouring thereby to make him give over his enterprize. Some of them also uttered divers injurious speeches against him, as it ordinarily falleth out amongst an unbridled multitude. But he caused them to be hemmed in by a great number of his souldiers, attired in popular habit, as soon as they began to exclaime against him, gave a sign to his souldiers: they, as it was before-time commanded them, made use of their maces; and without distinction either of the persons or the offenders, fell on all those whom they had encompassed; and so unmercifully laid on them, who were naked and disarmed, that some of them were slain, othersome grievously hurt: and after this manner was the tumult and sedition appeased.

At that time was Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawfull to call him a man. For he was the performer of divers admirable works, and the instructer of those who willingly entertain the truth: and he drew unto him divers Jews and Greeks to be his followers. This was Christ, who being accused by the Princes of our nation before Pilate, and afterwards condemned to the crosse by him; yet did not those who followed him from the beginning, forbear to love him for the ignominie of dis death. For he appeared unto them alive the third day after, according as the divine Prophets had before testified the same, and divers other wonderfull things of him: and from that time forward the race of the Christians, who have derived their name from him, hath never ceased.

Quest. 1. WHAT we are to think of Josephus his Testimony of our Saviour, whether genuine or no?

Answ. We ne're yet could see any convincing reason to believe it otherwise. 'Tis found in his 18th Lib. Cap. 6. "About this "time, says he, there was one Jesus, a wise "man, if it be lawful to call him a man, "who wrought Miracles, and taught them "who embraced the Truth with gladness. "—He had many followers, both Jews and "Gentiles; the same was Christ.——And "tho' Pilate by the Judgment of our Elders "delivered him to be Crucified, yet he "had those which from the beginning lo-"ved him. He appeared unto them alive "the third day after his suffering, as was "fore-told by the holy Prophets. Not only "these, but innumerable more wondrous "things are reported of him; and even to "this day the Christians encrease who took "their name from him.—Thus far he, and let never any more ask the Question—why Josephus took no notice of our Saviours Appearance, Resurrection and Miracles, (Vid. Qu.——) when he actually does take notice of 'em, and that in so noble and august a manner as we have recited. Nor wants there the most probable Arguments to prove this passage genuine. Josephus was a curious and careful Historian, he omits not the least passages, much less was he likely to do what wou'd make so much noise as this. He takes notice of John the Baptist, who was but our Saviours fore-runner, and bore witness of him—giving an account of his Birth, Preaching, Baptism, Enemies, Imprisonment, Death, and even the ends of his Persecutors. Besides, had he not been at least well-affected to the Christian Religion, and therefore likely to write at that rate; how comes he not once to speak ill of it thro'out all his Works, which the Jews were seldom very sparing of doing? Again, Eusebius quotes at large this very passage in his first Book and 12 Chap. (according to Haumers division) and after mentioning it, glories in it.—"What shift or refuge, says he, have "those impudent persons who have forged "Writings out of their own Brains contra-"ry to these passages? Is it likely he wou'd talk of others Forgery, had he not been secure that what he himself produced was sincere and genuine? Besides, tho' we deny not that some forged Pieces might even by this time be spread about the Church, or at least such as were attributed to those who were none of their Authors; and tho' some things might be struck out of the Fathers, which might not please those who succeeded 'em; yet there cannot Instances be so easily given of things added unto 'em so early—at least this seems not feazible in the Writings of Josephus, who had given so many Copies abroad, as he himself tells us, and whose Book it self was placed among the Emperors in the Publick Library.—— Besides, had any such thing been done, wou'd not the Jews or Heathens have loudly reclaim'd against the Christians for such a Forgery, or at least against Eusebius for making use on't, especially when he gives them so fair an occasion, and which in a manner defies 'em all to do it?

Quest. 2. Our Saviour ascended corporally into Heaven. 'Tis said no flesh shall see God—How do these agree?

Answ. This is so frivolous a doubt, that were it not for the Querists importunity, we shou'd not think it worth an Answer. It's no where said, no flesh shall see God—But no man shall see my Face and live—yet we hope after Death the Just shall see the Face of God, and their Bodies as well as Souls shall be in Heaven. There's a place indeed somewhat like what the Querist alledges, which we are apt to believe he indeed intended—'Tis that 1 Cor. 15. Flesh and Blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God—That is, the Body of man, in such a state as 'tis now, cannot enter into Glory—but 'tis added—we shall be changed into Angelicam substantiam, as Tertullian calls it—we shall be made like to Angels—nay, our vile Bodies shall be like the glorious Body of Christ.

Quest. 3. What's the meaning of that Text, Matth. 26. 29. But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of the fruit of the Vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Fathers Kingdom?

Answ. We dare not, tho' some have been of that mind, interpret this of the Time of the Millennium, lest the conceit shou'd seem too gross, tho' we are sure that Angels have eat and drunk with men, nay our Saviour did as much after his Resurrection. And indeed to that eating and drinking of his we are more inclin'd to refer this Resolution, than to any other; namely, either that with the Travellers at Emmaus, which some of the Fathers understand to have been a Sacramental Feast; however, it's probable enough they had the Fruit of the Vine, or Wine there, which was the ordinary drink of the Country. Now the time after our Saviours Resurrection, when the great work of mans Redemption was accomplisht, is sometimes call'd in the Scriptures the Kingdom of God, or the Kingdom of Heaven. Repent ye, says St. John Bapt. for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand, namely, the Times of the Messiah, and Joseph is said to be one that waited for the Kingdom of God. Now that this is the sense thereof, and that our Saviour here refers to his future eating and drinking with his Disciples ciples after his Resurrection, we think is pretty plain, from what we find in the same History as related by St. Luke, chap. 22. from v. 16. to 18. "I say unto you, I will not eat "any more thereof (of this Passover) until "it be fulfilled in the Kingdom of God; which seems to bear the same sense with what follows— "I will not drink of the "Fruit of the Vine until the Kingdom of "God shall come. He wou'd not eat the Passover until 'twas fulfilled, that is, compleated, the Prophetical Type in the great Antitype, Christ our Passover, who being once offered for us, fulfilled that and other parts of the Typical Ceremonial Law— after which he eat the Passover again, that is the Ld's Supper instituted in its room, which we ought not to believe he tarried so long as forty days with the Disciples without once celebrating; and accordingly did partake of the Wine as well as the Bread, and thus drink it anew with them in his Fathers Kingdom— which he refus'd to do at his last Supper, because he was approaching to the lowest Degree of his Exinanition, his Agonies in the Garden, when his Soul was exceeding sorrowful even to Death, as well as his Passion, which soon after succeeded —— And here at least we may have room for a Query, tho' we lay not much stress upon't —Whether when the Souldiers gave him upon the Cross Wine mingled with Myrrh, which when he had tasted thereof, he refused to drink, whether the reason of such his refusal was not this Promise?— "That "he would not drink of the Fruit of the "Vine, till he drunk it in his Fathers King-"dom. We are not ignorant that several other reasons are alledged for it; but this may appear as probable as any.

Quest. 4. Whether it were a sin in Jacob to defraud his Brother of the Blessing?

Answ. Had he only desired old Isaac's Blessing, or had he got it by fair means, without repeated Lies, we think he had done nothing but what was lawful, nay commendable. Further had he desired the Blessing of the First born, this we also think he might lawfully have done, and obtained it too, because he had sometime before fairly purchased the Birth right of his Brother Esau. So that he cou'd not so properly defraud Esau, as Esau wou'd have defrauded him, had he enjoyed the Blessing, which was a sort of a perquisite to the Birth-right, and was therefore by Esau formally renounced together with it, and sold for a Mess of Pottage to Jacob. Our Judgment then is, That Jacob sinned not in getting the Blessing it self, tho' he did in the manner of his getting it, and making use of Lies to obtain it.

Quest. 5. Jesse is said to have eight Sons, in 1 Sam. 16. and but seven, in 1 Chron. 2. How do you make this agree &c.

Ans. Very easily; tho' he had not only eight, but in all eleven Sons mentioned in Samuel, and but seven in the Chronicles, it's plain he had eleven when Samuel came to view 'em; for he made Eliab, Abinadab and Shamma first to pass before him. Again, he made seven of his Sons pass before him, v. 10. and after all the youngest, David, was fetched from the Field, who made up their number Eleven.—But if he had never so many more, they might all die, as some of 'em, no doubt, did before their Father; and therefore Four of 'em being deceas'd, and that probably without Name or Issue, the other surviving, seven are only enrolled in the Chronicles, and their names transmitted to Posterity.

Quest. 6. Wherein consisted David's sin, in numbring the People?

Answ Some think 'twas in that he thereby seemed to attempt the falsifying or contradiction of God's Promise, who had said, they should be as the Sea shore innumerable. —But that seems but a figurative expression; and besides, they were actually number'd both when they came out of Egypt, and at the forty years end, as well as at their return from the Captivity, and other times besides, as we shall anon prove. Another reason which is given for't, is—that his sin was Pride, and that being now with his People in a flourishing condition, his mind was too much elated, and thereupon to feed that humour more, he was resolved to have the number of his People. But it might be as well from a Political Reason, to know the strength of his People; or if a little vanity might be mixt with it, it hardly seems to deserve so severe a punishment; or if it had, how could the People be justly punished for David's sin?—It must then consist in somewhat wherein the People might be partakers with him, and this the Devil knew, who therefore stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number 'em, 1 Chron. 21. 1. And this Joab plainly intimates, v. 3. "Why doth my Lord require this thing?— Why will he be a Cause of Trespass in Israel? Now what this Trespass was which David caus'd 'em to commit, we may have a fair guess from the 30th of Exodus v. 12. "When "thou takest the sum of the Children of "Israel after their number, then shall they "give every man a Ransom for his Soul "unto the Lord when thou numbrest them, "—that there be no Plague amongst them "when thou numbrest them. Hence we learn evidently— that if the Children of Israel were number'd without paying this Ransom, a Plague wou'd follow. We are sure now that they were number'd, and that a Plague did follow; therefore we may very strongly infer, that it was for want of this Ransom, which either David did not require 'em to pay, the Priests being rich, and the Temple not yet built, or the haste of the work would not permit 'em to do it, which seems to be a sudden motion rais'd in his mind by the Adversary, and as suddenly imparted to Joab, who with the Rulers of the People only was commanded to number Israel, no mention being made of the High-Priest, who was present when they were first number'd by Moses in the Wilderness.

A Jews. There was in Rome a Lady called Paulina, renowed both for the nobility of her house, as also through her studie and exercise in vertue. Besides this, she was very rich, and with her riches beautifull, and in her flourishing yeers; and notwithstanding a very mirrour of chastitie. She was married to a certain noble man called Saturnine, that equald her in all these her excellent perfections. A certain young man called Decius Mundus, one of the knights of greatest account at that time, fell in love with her. But she was of that disposition, that it was impossible for him to corrupt her by presents: And the more she refused those infinite presents which he sent unto her, the more was Mundus heart inflamed with ardent affection; so that to enjoy her but onely one night, he offered her two hundred thousand B drachmes, amounting in our English money to some six thousand pound; yet for all this he could not overcome her. For which cause being unable to indure this his unfortunate love, he thought best to pine himselfe away for want of sustenance, thereby to deliver himselfe from the tyranny of that passion, wherewith he was afflicted: Finally, that he confidently resolved, he constantly put in execution. Now there was a certaim freewoman that belonged to Mundus father, whose name was Ida, expert in all sorts of subtilties, who being sore agrieved to behold the young mans resolution, whom she saw wholly addicted to a desperat death, she addressed her selfe unto him, and encouraged him with hope, promising him to bring him to Paulinas speech, by the means of a certain bribe which she intented to offer. He rejoycing very much at her motion, demanded what summe should serve her: who requiring nothing more then fifty thousand drachmes to obtain Paulina; he furnished her presently. C When as by this means she had quickned the young mans spirit, and received all that which she demanded, she shaped not the same course which others had kept that had the sollicitation of the matter before, seeing she saw that money would not tempt her; but knowing that she was deeply devoted to the service of Isis, she practised this subtill and unexpected policie. She addressed her selfe to certain Priests of the Temple, and upon great hopes, and offer of greater presents, and paying them down upon the present, twenty and five thousand drachmes, and promising them as much more upon the performance of the bargain, she disclosed unto them the passionate love which the young man bare unto Paulina, exhorting them to work so wisely that he might enjoy her. They bewitched with this huge present they had, and hoped to receive, promised her to work the feat. Whereupon, the eldest among D them resorted to Paulina, and having free accesse unto her presence, he required that he might have conference with her in secret: which when he had obtained, he told her that he was sent unto her by god Anubis, in that the god was surprized with her love, and desired that she would come unto him. Paulina, took great pleasure in this his discourse, and told her familiars how she had been honoured with the amorous sollicitation of a god, and certified her husband how Anubis would banquet and lie with her. Whereunto he consented, knowing how great his wives chastitie was. She therefore repaired to the Temple; and after she had supt, and the time was come wherein she was usually accustomed to lay her down to rest, and the gates were lockt up by the Priests that were therein, and the lights likewise were taken away; Mundus, who lay hid within, failed not to accost her: who thinking that it was god E Anubis satisfied his desires all the night long; and in the morning betimes before the Priests, who were privie to this treacherie, were stirring, he retired himself: Paulina also early in the morning repaired to her husband, and certified him how Anubis had appeared unto her, and boasting her self among her familiars what conference he had used with her. But some of them beleeved her not, in regard of the manner of their entertainment; the rest were altogether amazed, supposing those things to be no waies incredible, at such time as they bethought themselves of the Ladies chastitie. Some three daies after this act was committed, Mundus meeting with Paulina, said unto her: You have saved me two hundreth thousand drachmes, wherewith you might have augmented your treasure, and this notwithstanding, you have not failed to satisfie my requst: neither am I grieved that you have contemned me under the name of Mundus, since that undertaking Anubis name, I have accomplished my desire, and this said, he departed. But she presently amated with the mans audacious impudence, tore her garments, and having told her husband of all this subtill circumvention, she requested earnestly his assistance, and that he would not forsake her in the prosecution of her revenge: who presently certified the Emperour of each particular thereof. Now when, Tiberius had diligently understood, how all things had happened, by the inquisition and examination of the Priests, he condemned them and Ida, who had been the inventer and complotter of this treason against Paulina, to be hanged: he pulled down the Temple also, and cast Anubis statue into Tyber, and banished Mundus; supposing that he ought ought not to be more grievously punished, considering that the fault which was committed by him, proceeded from extreme love: Behold here the insolence committed in the Temple of Isis, by the Priest that appertained to that Temple. Of that which befell the Jews that were at Rome in Pilates time.

Fulvia Saturnines wife delivereth gold and purple to be sent to the Temple in Ierusalem, they convert it to their own uses, which when Tiberius knew he commanded all the Iews to be thrust out of Rome.

THere was a certain Jew, that having been accused for the breach of the Lawes of his Countrey, and fearing to be punished for the same, fled from thence, being without respect, a man of a most mischievous behaviour. He dwelling at that time in Rome, professed himself to be an Expounder of Moses law, and drawing to him three other no lesse reprobates then himself, he followed his ordinary profession. Fulvia a Lady of much honour became their scholler, and had embraced the Religion of the Jewes, whom they had perswaded to send certain purple and gold to the Temple of Jerusalem: which after they had received at her hands, they converted it to their own use, as before that time they had determined to do. Tiberius, who was informed hereof by Saturnine his familiar friend, and Fulvias husband, who had discovered the same unto him, commanded all Jews whatsoever to depart out of Rome. Of these the Consuls chose out and enrouled to the number of foure thousand men, whom they sent into Sardinia: and punished divers of them that refused to bear arms, for fear they should transgresse the Ordinances of their Countrey, So that by reason of the loose behaviour of foure wicked persons, all those of our Nation were driven out of the City of Rome.

Neither was the Nation of the Samaritans exempt from this trouble: for a certain subtil companion, who sought by all the means he might to incroach upon the peoples favour, perswaded them to withdraw themselves with him to the mount Garizim (which they supposed to be the holiest amongst all their mountains) in which place he avowed he would shew them the sacred Vessels buried in a certain place, where Moses had laid them: and at that time they being gathered together in arms, by his perswasion encamped themselves in a borough called Tirathaba, where they entertained those that repaired thither to adjoyn themselves with them, to the end they might ascend the mountain with the greater company. But Pilate prevented them, and got up before them with his horsemen and footmen: who charging those that were assembled in the borough, put them to flight; and slaying some, and putting the rest to flight, led away a great number of them prisoners with him. Pilate executed the chiefest ring-leaders amongst them, and those also of greatest force amongst the fugitives. The tumult of these Jews being published abroad, and their misfortune made known, the Senate of Samaria addressed themselves to Vitellius who had been Consul, and who at that time governed Syria, before whom they accused Pilate for the murther of those whom he had slain, saying, that they assembled not in Tirathaba to rebel against the Romans, but to warrantize themselves against Pilates tyranny. Whereupon Vitellius sent Marcellus his friend, to take charge of Judæa, commanding Pilate to return to Rome, and to satisfie the Emperour in those things whereof the people had accused him. Hereupon Pilate after he had sojourned ten yeers in Iewry, repaired to Rome, having no means to contradict that commandement that Vitellius had given him. But before he arrived there, Tiberius was departed and dead.

Vitellius cometh to Ierusalem, forgiveth the Iews their tribute, and committeth the charge of the high Priests garments to them. The high Priests vestments reserved in the castle of Antonia.

AS soon as Vitellius came into Iudæa, he went up to Ierusalem and celebrated there the feast of the Passeover, and after he had been magnificently entertained in that place, he forgave the Citizens all the tribute of those fruits which were sold. He delivered them also the Ornaments of the high Priests, with all the rest of the Priestly furniture within the Temple, committing the charge thereof unto the Priests, according as in times past they had the same. But at that time they were laid up in the Castle of Antonia for this cause which followeth: Hircanus the high Priest the first of that name (for divers have been so called) having builded a Tower neer unto the Temple, did for the most part make

A make his residence therein, and there kept his vestments that were committed to his charge, the rather for that he onely had the authority to put them on, and return them into their place at such time as he came down into the City, and put upon him his accustomed raiment. His son and his sons son entertained the same custome, till such time as Herod being exalted to the kingdome, and seeing this tower to be strongly sited, builded the same most magnificently, and called it Antonia, in honour of Antony his great friend. And having found these vestments in the place, he retained them with him, assuring himself, the people would attempt nothing against him. Archelaus his sonne and successour in the kingdome, kept the same course that Herod had done. But after that the Romans had obtained the soveraignty

B thereof, they kept the high Priests ornaments in their hands, and reserved them in a place builded for the purpose, under the seal of the Priests: and the Prefect of those that kept the sacred treasure, lighted the lamp every day in that place. This every seventh day before the feast, doth the Prefect deliver it into the high Priests hands, and after it was purified, he put it on to do divine service, and the next day after the feast he returneth it again to the same place where it was kept before: which custome was observed thrice every yeer in the time of a fast. But Vitellius returned those ornaments into the hands of the Priests, according to the ancient orders, leaving them to be used at such time as need required, commanding the Prefect to trouble himself no more about the place where they should be kept. After he had done this favour to the nation of the Jewes, he deposed the high Priest

C Joseph surnamed Caiaphas, and advanced Jonathan the sonne of Ananus to that dignity, and afterwards returned to Antioch.

Vitellius advanced Jonathan the son of Anani to the Priesthood and degradeth Joseph surnamed Caiaphas.

At that time he received letters from Tiberius, by which he commanded him to capitulate and conclude a friendship with Artabanus the King of the Parthians (whose hatred he suspected, and feared, lest being seized of Armenia, he should work further displeasure to the state of Rome) willing him to assure the league by hostages, and namely with Artabanus sonne. After Tiberius had written these letters above mentioned unto Vitellius, he perswaded the Kings of Iberia and Alania by great store of money, that with all expedition they should make warre against Artabanus. But the Iberians would not be drawn thereunto, yet suffered they the Alanes to march thorow their countrey, and opened them their gates of

D the mount Caspius, to give them passage to invade Artabanus. Thus once more was Armenia conquered, and the countrey of the Parthians was filled with warre, whereby the chiefest among them were slain, and all their estate was spoiled and disordered. The Kings sonne also was slain in those conflicts, with divers thousands of his men of warre. Moreover, Vitellius having sent money to a certain kinsman and friend of Artabanus, pretended to corrupt him to make Artabanus away. But Artabanus perceiving the plot that was intended against him, and seeing that he could not escape, because it was attempted by a great number of the best accounted nobles within his Court, ceased to passe any further: and seeing himself most apparantly invironed, and thinking that under the colour of friendship he was fraudulently betrayed, he thought it better to retire himself into the provinces of the higher countrey,

E and there to save himself, rather then to put himself in hazard, and resort unto them who had already betrayed and forsaken him. Arriving in that place, he assembled a great number of souldiers of the countries of Danes, and Swethians: and having fought against them who opposed themselves against him, he recovered his estate. When Tiberius had tydings hereof, he wrought the means to draw Artabanus into friendship with him: which when Artabanus had notice of, he willingly admitted; so that Artabanus and Vitellius met together neer Euphrates, and by the means of a bridge that was builded upon the river, they debated the matter together; being each of them attended by their guards. After that they had concluded the peace, Herod the Tetrarch feasted them in a very magnificent Pavillion, erected in the middest of the floud, not without his great cost. And not long after, Vitellius sent Da-

F rius, Artabanus son in hostage to Rome, with divers presents; amongst which there was a man seven cubits high, a Jew born, who was named Eleazar, who was called a Gyant by reason of his greatnesse. That done, Vitellius returned to Antioch, and Artabanus to Babylon. But Herod desirous to be the first that should advertise Cæsar of the receit of these hostages, sent expresse messengers with letters, by which he fully satisfied him of all that which had happened, omitting nothing for the Consul to certifie: so that after Vitellius letters were brought unto him, and that Cæsar had already certified him of the true information that Herod had given him, Vitellius was sore troubled and suspecting lest he had received a greater injurie then the matter made shew for; he conceived in his heart a secret despight, which continued untill such time as Tiberius was dead, and Caius obtained the Empire.

At that time also died Philip Herods brother, in the twentieth year of Tiberius reign, after G he had reigned himself for the space of seven and thirty years, in Trachonitis, Gaulonitis, and Bathanæa. During all the time of his government, he behaved himself very peaceably, and far from businesse. For he made his ordinary abode within his own dominion. He walked being accompanied with a small number of his chosen servants; and had that seat carried after him wherein he was accustomed to sit and do Justice, and therein sate he, to the end that if any one presented himself, and required his assistance, he might without delay do him right. For upon the first motion, the seat was placed in that part wherein the plaintiffe met him; and being seated therein, he examined the cause, punishing those that were guilty, and absolving the innocent. He died in Juliade, and was buried in the sepulchre which he himself had caused to be built, and his obsequies were performed with great so- H lemnity and Majestie. And for that he left no heirs males behind him, Tiberius seized his estate, which he annexed to the government of Syria, ordaining that the tributes that were gathered in his Tetrarchy, should be kept within the bounds of the same region.

CHAP. VII.

The war of Herod the Tetrarch, against King Aretas, and his overthrow.

Herod the Tetrarch putteth away Aretas daughter, and marrieth Herodias his brother Herods wife.

Meanwhile, Aretas King of Arabia Petræa, and Herod fell at strife, the one with the I other, for this cause that ensueth: Herod the Tetrarch married Aretas daughter, with whom he had lived married a very long time. Afterwards taking his journey towards Rome, he lodged with Herod his half brother by the fathers side (for Herod was the son of Simons daughter, which Simon was the high Priest) and there being surprized with the love of Herodias his brothers wife, which was the daughter of Aristobulus their brother, and sister to the Great Agrippa, he was so bold as to offer her some speech of marriage: which when she had accepted, the accords were made between them, that at such time as he should return from Rome, he should displace her, and lead her away with him, with conditions that he would banish Aretas daughter far from him. After he had ratified those covenants, he made his voyage to Rome, from whence he no sooner returned and performed that for which he went, but his wife (who had some privie notice K of the conventions which were made betwixt him and Herodias) before he suspected that she knew thereof, required him to send her to the Castle of Macheron, which was the frontier town betwixt Herods and Aretas countries, without certifying any wayes of her intent. Herod without suspect easily condescended unto her request, thinking she was ignorant of his drift: but she long before that time had taken order with the Governour of Macheron (which at that time was under her fathers government) to prepare all things for her journey, where being arrived, she speedily posted into Arabia, under the convey of those Governours, who received and conducted her the one after the other. As soon as she arrived in her fathers Court, she incontinently certified him of Herods resolution, whence arose the beginning of this discord betwixt them. As soon as therefore they had both of them as- L sembled their armies upon the confines of the countrey of Gamalite, they fought together under the conduct of the two Generalls, to whom they had committed their armies. In this battell Herods army was wholly discomfited through the treason that was complotted against him by certain banished men of Philips Tetrarchy, which were in pay with Herod. Tiberius was certified of all this by those letters which Herod had written unto him: and being sore displeased with Aretas for his proud attempt, he commanded Vitellius to make warre against him, willing him that if he could take him alive, he should send him bound unto him; but if dead, he should send him his head. Such was the commission that Tiberius sent to the Governour of Syria.

Herods wife returned into her own countrey.

Tiberius commandeth Vitellius to make war against Aretas.

Divers Jews were of the opinion, that Herods army was overthrown by the just vengeance M of God, who punished him most justly; because of the execution which he caused to be done on John surnamed Baptist: For he had done this man to death, who was replenished with all vertue, and who exhorted the Jewes to addict themselves thereto, and to execute justice towards men, and piety towards God: exhorting them to be baptized, and telling them that baptisme should at that time be agreeable unto God if they should renounce not onely their sinnes, but if to the puritie of their bodies they should annex the cleanesse of their soules repurified by justice. And whereas it came to passe that divers flocked and followed him to hear his doctrine, Herod feared lest his subjects allured by his doctrine and perswasions should

A ſhould be drawn to revolt. For it ſeemed that they would ſubſcribe in all things to his advice; he therefore thought it better to prevent a miſchief by putting him to death, then to expect ſome ſudden commotion, which he might afterwards repent. Upon this ſuſpicion Herod cauſed him to be bound, and ſent to the Caſtle of Macheron, whereof we have ſpoken heretofore, and there was he put to death. The Jews were of opinion, that in revenge of this ſo grievous a ſinne, Herods army, againſt whom God was diſpleaſed, had been ſubject to their utter ruine and overthrow: but Vitellius being addreſſed to make warre againſt Aretas, gathered together two legions, and all thoſe horſe or foot that he could aſſemble amongſt thoſe Kings, who were the Romanes allies, and marching towards Petra he ſtayed at Ptolemais, becauſe he pretended to paſſe by Judæa. Which when the principal nobles amongſt the Jews had notice of, they went out to meet him, beſeeching him that he would not paſſe thorow their countrey, becauſe it was a cuſtome amongſt them not to ſee any ima-

B ges born, ſuch as he had of divers colours in his army. Whereunto he condeſcended, and having changed his purpoſe, he cauſed his army to march thorow the great Plain: as for himſelf he came to Jeruſalem accompanied with Herod the Tetrarch and his friends, to offer ſacrifice to God upon the next feſtival day, where he was moſt magnificently received by all the people of the Jews. There ſojourned he for the ſpace of three dayes, during which time he depoſed Jonathan from the high Prieſt-hood, and inveſted Theophilus his brother. The fourth day letters came unto him that advertiſed him of Tiberius death, for which cauſe he commanded the oath of fidelity ſhould be miniſtred to the people, in the new Emperour Caius behalf. He called his army back alſo, and ſent them to their wintering garriſon, be-

C cauſe it was not lawful for him to proſecute the warre, by reaſon the ſoveraign eſtate was fallen unto Caius.

It is ſaid, that Aretas hearing news of Vitellius expedition or voyage, and after he had taken counſel of the Augurs, ſaid, that the army ſhould not find engines to pierce as farre as Petra, becauſe the Chieftain thereof, or he that had the command of the expedition, or he that obeyed his ordinance in conducting the ſame, or he againſt whom the army was conducted, ſhould die. Vitellius therefore retired himſelf to Antioch. A year before the death of Tiberius, Agrippa Ariſtobulus ſonne came to Rome, to intreat with the Emperour about certain affairs, according to the power which he ſhould obtain at his hands. But before I ſpeak any

D thing hereof, I will relate Herods progeny, both for that it is pertinent to this preſent narration, as alſo that the greatneſſe of Gods providence may appear, to the end that a man may know that neither the number of children, nor any other humane force whatſoever it be, can be availeable without the fear of God; conſidering that within the ſpace of one hundreth years or ſomewhat leſſe, it ſo fell out, that all Herods line, which was very populous and fruitful, was extinguiſhed, a very few excepted. Whereby we are given to underſtand, what the miſery of mankind is, and learn to moderate our own ſelves. It is alſo expedient to ſpeak ſomething of Agrippa, who amongſt all other deſerveth admiration, in that being a man wholly drowned in obſcurity and baſe in birth, he was exalted to ſuch greatneſſe, as no one of thoſe that knew him would ever have thought his fortune ſhould have ſuch ſucceſſe

E and mightineſſe. And although heretofore I have ſpoken ſomewhat of this matter, yet it is requiſite that I ſpeak ſomething more expreſly thereof in this place. Herod the Great had two daughters born by Mariamme Hircanus daughter. The one of them which was called Salampſo, was married by Herod to Phaſælus the ſonne of Phaſælus, who was Herods brother: the other called Cypros was eſpouſed to Antipater her Couſin, who was Salomes ſonne, who was Herods ſiſter. Phaſælus had five children by Salampſo: three ſonnes, Antipater, Herod, and Alexander; and two daughters, Alexandra, and Cypros, whom Agrippa the ſonne of Ariſtobulus married; and Alexandra was married to Timæus of Cyprus, who was a man of great dignity, and with whom ſhe died without iſſue. Cypros had by Agrippa her husband two ſons and three

F daughters: Bernice, Mariamme, and Druſilla: their two ſonnes were called Agrippa and Druſus. Druſus died very young: but Agrippa was brought up by his grandfather amongſt his other brethren, Herod, Ariſtobulus, and Bernice. Theſe were Herods children, ſonne unto him who was ſirnamed the Great; Bernice was Coſtobarus daughter, begotten on Salome Herods ſiſter: Ariſtobulus died leaving his children under age, under his fathers charge with Alexander his brother, as we have already recounted. Theſe attaining their full age were in this ſort married: Herod brother to Agrippa was matched with Mariamme, Olympias daughter, who was Herod the Great his daughter, and of Joſeph Herods brother: By her he had his ſon Ariſtobulus: Ariſtobulus Agrippas third brother married Jotape the daughter Sampſigeram King of the Emeſenians. They had a daughter which in like ſort was called Jotape, which was deaf.

These were the children begotten by Herods three sonnes. But Herodias their sister married G Herod the sonne of Herod the great, whom he begot on Mariamme the daughter of Simon the high Priest, by whom Salome was begotten. After her birth, Herodias in contempt of the laws of the Countrey, married her self with Herod her husbands brother begotten of the same father, being separated from him during his life-time, who was Tetrarch of Galilee. His daughter Salome was married to Philip the Tetrarch of Trachonitis Herods sonne; who dying without children, Aristobulus married her, who was Herods sonne and Agrippas brother. They had three sonnes, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus. See here the posterity of Phasælus, and Salampson. Antipater by Cypros had a daughter that in like sort was called Cypros, which was married to Alexas Selcius the sonne of Alexas, of whom he begat a daughter called likewise Cypros. As for Herod and Alexander, who (as I said) were Antipaters bro- H thers, they died without issue. Alexander Herods sonne, who was slain by his father, begat Alexander and Tigranes on the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia, Tigranes being King of Armenia died without issue, after he had been accused at Rome. Alexander had a sonne called Tigranes, after his brothers name, who was sent by Nero to reign in Armenia, who had a sonne called Alexander, who married Jotape the daughter of Antiochus King of Comagena. This Alexander by Vespasian was elected King in Lesis a City of Cilicia. As soon as Alexanders posterity began to multiply, they fell from their Countrey Religion, to follow the customes of the Greeks. All the rest of King Herods daughters died without issue. Having after this manner reckoned up Herods posterity, which continued untill such time as Agrippa the great began to reign; it remaineth at this time to declare what adven- I tures befell this Agrippa, and how he escaping his dangers, obtained at last so great power and dignity.

CHAP. VIII.

Agrippas voyage to Tiberius, where he is accused and shut in prison, and is delivered after Tiberius death, by Caius his successour

Agrippa living at Rome, through his livish liberality growth into necessity.

Some little time before the death of King Herod, Agrippa conversing at Rome, grew into great familiarity and acquaintance with Drusus, Tiberius the Emperours K sonne, and was beloved by Antonia the wife of Drusus the elder, by the means of his mother Bernice, whom Antonia held in great estimation, and to whom she had recommended her sonne. And whereas by nature he was of a liberal and high spirit, as long as his mother lived, he would not discover his intent, lest he should provoke her displeasure against him. But incontinently after Bernice was dead, and he became Lord of himself, partly by his daily and bountiful entertainment and living, partly by his immoderate liberalities, but especially by his lavish prodigality towards Cæsars freemen, whose favour he hunted after, he was brought into extream poverty, and could no more live at Rome; the rather for that Tiberius having lost his sonne, forbade his friends to come into his sight, for fear lest their presence should refresh and increase the sorrow he L conceived for the losse of his sonne. For these causes he returned back into Judæa, having but badly ordered his estate, spent his money, and left himself no means to satisfie his importunate and many creditors. For which cause uncertain how to dispose himself, and ashamed of his present estate, he withdrew himself into a Castle called Malatha in Idumæa, bethinking himself after some sort to cut off his miserable daies. Which purpose of his, when Cypros his wife perceived, she endeavoured by all means to prevent his resolution: she wrote also to his sister Herodias, who was married to Herod the Tetrarch, certifying her both what Agrippa had decreed, as also by what necessity he was enforced thereunto; and she exhorted her, that in regard of affinity she would assist him, and imitate her in this, who as much as in her lay, relieved his misery, although her fortunes were farre weaker then hers. Being there- M fore sent for by his sister and wife, he was commanded to dwell in Tiberias, and had a certain summe of money assigned him for his maintenance, and for his greater honour was appointed Magistrate of that City. Yet did not Herod continue long time in that mind, although by the means he had given him, he had not satisfied his kinsmans necessities. For being in the city of Tyre in a certain company, where he drank immoderately, Agrippa esteemed it for an extream injury, that Herod had upbraided him with his poverty, and hit him in the teeth that he maintained him at his charge. For which cause he withdrew himself to Flaccus, who had sometimes been Consul at Rome, and for the present was President of Syria, with Herod tanteth Agrippa with his poverty.

A with whom at Rome he had fallen into familiarity; who entertained by him lived with him, who long before that time had entertained Aristobulus; who though Agrippas brother, yet was he his enemie; yet notwithstanding this dissention between them, Flaccus entertained them both with equall favour. But Aristobulus remitted nothing of his hatred he bare his brother, neither ever rested he before he had drawn Flaccus into dislike with his brother, upon this occasion: The inhabitants of Damasco, contending with the Sidonians about their demaines, and being to debate their cause before Flaccus knowing what interest Agrippa had in him, they besought him that he would further their cause, promising him a great summe of money: whereupon he addressed himself in what he could to further

B those of Damasco. But Aristobulus, who had an inkling of this conclusion and promise, accused his brother to Flaccus: and after inquisition is was made, and he found guilty of the fact, Agrippa grew out of the presidents favour, and falling again into extream povertie, he came to Ptolemais; and for that he had no means of maintenance, he determined to saile into Italy. And for that he wanted money, he commanded Marsyas his free-man, that by all means whatsoever, he should seek to take up money upon interest. He spake unto Protus (who was Agrippas mothers free-man, who by the testament of his deceased Mistris was left unto Antonias protection) that upon his masters bill and promise, he would lend him some money. But he alleadging that Aprippa before that time ought him money extorted from Marsyas a bill of his hand, for twenty thousand Attique drachmes, deducting

C out of that summe two thousand and five hundreth, which Marsyas took for himself: which he might the more easilie do, for that Agrippa could not otherwise chuse. Having therefore received this money, he went to Anthedon, where getting shipping he prepared himself for the journey.

Aristobulus draweth Agrippa into Flaccus disfavour.

Agrippa by Marsyas means borroweth money of Protus.

But when Herennius Capito, who was treasurer of Jamnia, understood of his being there, he sent his souldiers unto him, to exact three hundreth thousand silver drachmes at his hands, for which he stood indebted to Cæsars treasurer during his being at Rome, by which means he was enforced to stay. Whereupon he made a shew that he would obey their demand; but as soon as it was night, he caused the cables of the ship to be cut, and cast off, and sailed to A-

D lexandria: there requested he Alexander Alabarca to lend him two hundreth thousand drachmes in silver. But he protested that he would trust him with nothing. But admiring Cypros his wives constant love towards her husband, and her many other vertues, he upon her promise accorded to do him kindnesse: whereupon in present money he payed him five talents in Alexandria, and promised to deliver him the rest of the money at Puteol, fearing Agrippas unthriftinesse. Thus Cypros having furnished her husband for his journey into Italy, returned her self and her children into Judæa by land. But Agrippa, as soon as he arrived at Puteol, wrote unto Tiberius Cæsar, who lived at Capreas, signifying unto him that he came to do his duty, beseeching him that he would grant him free and favourable accesse. Tiberius with all expedition returned him a very kind answer, certifying him that he would be very glad to see him safely arrived in Capreas. In a word, as soon as he was arrived, Cæsar

E expressed and made it known, that his affection was answerable to his letters, and both embraced him and lodged him. The next day Cæsar received letters from Herennius Capito who advertised him that Agrippa ought three hundred thousand drachmes of silver, which he borrowed and paid not at the time prefixed, and that at such time as the appointed time of payment was come, he was fled out of the countrey, and place of his procuration, and by this occasion had deprived him of the means to constrain him to make satisfaction. When Cæsar had read the letters, he was sore displeased, and commanded those of his chamber, that they should not admit Agrippa to his presence, untill such time as he had discharged that debt.

F But he, nothing dismaied at Cæsars displeasure, required Antonia, Germanicus and Claudius mother, who was afterwards Emperour, to lend him the sum of three hundred thousand drachmes, to the end he might not lose Cæsars friendship. Who remembring her Bereinice, Agrippas mother, and with what familiarity they had conversed together, and how Agrippa likewise had been brought up with Claudius her son, lent him that money: Whereupon he paying the debt, without any contradiction enjoyed the Princes favour, & was so reconciled to Cæsar, that he committed his nephew to Agrippas charge, commanding him to attend him alwaies, whithersoever he went. Being by this benefit bound and tied to Antonia, he began to reverence her nephew Caius, who was gracious in all mens eyes, and honoured in memory of his parents. At that time by chance there was one Allius a Samaritane, Cæsars fee-man, of whom he borrowed ten hundred thousand drachmes of silver, & paied Antonia her due, and kept the reſt more honourably to attend and wait on Caius. By whom being entertained with moſt inward familiarity, it hapned one day that riding in the ſame Coach with him, Agrippa wiſht (for they two were alone) that Tiberius might ſhortly ſurrender the kingdome and Empire unto Caius, who was each way more worthy then he. Theſe words of his were overheard by the Coachman called Eutychus, who was Agrippas freeman, who for that time ſpake not a word thereof. But being afterwards accuſed for ſtealing Agrippas garment (as he indeed had done) and brought back again after he had fled away to Piſo (who was the Prefect of the city) he asked him why he fled; who anſwered, that he had certain ſecrets which he deſired to reveal unto Cæſar, that appertained to his profit and ſafety: for which cauſe he was ſent by him in bonds to Capreas. Tiberius according to his dilatory maner, wherein no King or Tyrant ever equalled him, held him priſoner. For neither did he preſently admit any Embaſſadours, neither ſent he ſucceſſors to thoſe, who were Governors, and Prefects of his provinces, when the former were dead; and no leſſe negligent was he in yeelding audience to his priſoners. But when his friends at any time queſtioned with him, why he uſed theſe accuſtomed delayes; he anſwered them, that he deferred the Embaſſadours after that ſort, for fear leſt if he ſhould ſpeedily diſpatch them, they ſhould inſtantly return with new, whereby it ſhould come to paſſe, that he ſhould be continually troubled in entertaining and diſmiſſing them.

For what cauſe Tiberius changed not his governors.

And as touching his offices, he left them in their hands, to whom he had committed them, in regard of his ſubjects welfare. For naturally all magiſtracy is ſubject to avarice: but in eſpecial ſtrangers induce thoſe, who exerciſe the ſame to gather, and ingroſſe the more inſtantly, when as the time of their authority is ſhort and of ſmall aſſurance; whereas if they ſhould continue in the ſame for a long time, in regard of the gain they had made, and the much profits they had raiſed, they would be afterwards leſſe greedy to extort further. Now if he ſhould ſend others to ſucceed them on a ſudden, it were impoſſible for him to content them, notwithſtanding their many bribes: whereas in giving them time to fill their purſes, when they had gotten well, they would abate the furious deſire of lucre which they affected before. And to this purpoſe he told them an example of a poor man that was a Lazar, to whoſe wounds a great number of flies aſſembled themſelves, and covered the ſame: at ſight whereof ſome by fortune arriving there, and having compaſſion of his miſery, and ſuppoſing that the cauſe why he repulſed them not, proceeded from his diſability, approached neer to help him; but he required them to let him alone. Wheupon they demanding the cauſe wherefore he that was hurt refuſed to be delivered from ſo irkſome an evill, he anſwered them, for that they ſhould do him more wrong, if thoſe flies were driven away; for that being already full of blood, they prick me not (ſaid he) neither ſuck me ſo earneſtly, but give me ſome eaſe; wheras if new ſhould alight on my wound which were hungry, & ſhould ſeize my fleſh in that deſperate eſtate that I am, they would procure my death. For theſe cauſes he ſaid; that ſeeing his ſubjects already conſumed by ſo many exactions, he thought it a good pollicy in him, and a better proviſion for them, not to ſend them new Governours continually, who might after the manner of flies ſuck them to the quick, eſpecially if to their innated covetouſneſſe he ſhould annex the fear of their ſudden diſplacing. Now to approve that to be true which I have declared of Tiberius diſpoſition, this action of his may ſuffice to juſtifie me. For having been Emperour for the ſpace of twenty two years, all thoſe Governours which he ſent into Jewry were two, namely Gratus and Pilate his ſucceſſor; neither demeaned he himſelf otherwiſe towards the reſt of his ſubjects of the Empire.

Why Cæſar would not give audience to his priſoner.

Agrippa ſolliciteth Antonia to bring Eutichus to his anſwer.

Antonia very much honoured by Tiberius.

Antonia diſcovereth Sejanus conſpiracy to Cæſar.

And as touching his priſoners, the reaſon why he delayed ſo much to give them audience, was, to the end that they who had been condemned to death, ſhould not ſpeedily be delivered from thoſe torments wherewith he threatned them, and which they had deſerved by their wickedneſſe. For whileſt he kept them in that pain, their miſ-hap increaſed the more. For this cauſe Eutychus could not obtain audience at his hands, but was long time detained priſoner. Afterwards in proceſſe of time, Tiberius tranſported himſelf from Capreas to Tuſculanum, which was diſtant from Rome ſome hundreth furlongs. There did Agrippa ſollicite Antonia, to cauſe Eutychus to be called to his anſwer, as touching the accuſation which he pretended againſt him. Now Antonia was in great favour with Tiberius, both in regard of the affinity that was between them (in that ſhe was Druſus wife, who was Tiberius brother) as in reſpect of her modeſtie. For ſhe being young continued in her widowhood, and would not marry with any other, notwithſtanding Auguſtus importuned her to wed; but lived alwaies in honour without blame. Beſides that, ſhe had done Tiberius a great pleaſure: for at ſuch time as Sejanus his friend, and a man in great account in thoſe daies (by reaſon he had the govern-

A ment of the army) practiſed a conſpiracy againſt him, whereunto divers of the Senate, and of his freemen, and his men of war likewiſe were acceſſary: yet brought ſhe all their intents to nothing. This attempt had taken a great head, and Sejanus had finiſhed his purpoſe, had not Antonia uſed more adviſed courage, then Sejanus did in executing his treaſon. For having diſcovered the danger that threatned Tiberius, ſhe wrote and ſent her expreſſe letters by Pallas one of her truſty ſervants unto him to Capreas, certifying him in particular the whole proceſſe of the conſpiracy. Cæſar having true underſtanding thereof, cauſed Sejanus and his confederates to be executed. Although therefore that before that time he honored Antonia greatly, yet did he afterwards honour her far more, in ſuch ſort as he truſted her in all

B things. When as therefore ſhe entreated him to give Eutychus audience: Tiberius anſwered, If, ſaid he, Eutychus hath falſely objected any thing againſt Agrippa, it ſufficeth that he endure that puniſhment which I have enjoyned him. But if in the torture he maintain that which he hath ſpoken to be true, it is to be feared leſt Agrippa intending to puniſh his freeman, do rather heap the puniſhment upon his own head. When Antonia had reported this anſwer of his to Agrippa, he did the more inſtantly ſollicite her, requiring her that the matter might be brought to trial. And for that Agrippa ceaſed not to importune her, Antonia took the occaſion, which was this; Tiberius being after dinner time carried in his litter, and having Caius and Agrippa before him, ſhe walking foot by foot by the litter, beſought him to call Eutychus to his trial; whereunto he replied; The gods (ſaid he) know that that which I

Agrippa urgeth Eutychus trial, and for certain ſpeeches of his is caſt into bonds.

C do, I do it not of mine own will, but for the neceſſitie I am preſſed with upon your requeſt: and having ſpoken thus, he commanded Macron, Sejanus ſucceſſour to bring Eutychus before him; which was performed with all expedition. Whereupon Tiberius asked him what he had to ſay againſt him, who had enfranchiſed him? My ſoveraign (ſaid he) Caius that is here preſent, and Agrippa rode one day together in the ſame Coach, and I ſate at their feet. After divers diſcourſes held between them, Agrippa began to ſpeak after this manner unto Caius; O, ſaid he, would God the day were come wherein the old man departing out of this world would make you governour thereof. For his ſon Tiberius would be no hindrance unto you, for him might you make away. Then ſhould the world be happy, and I likewiſe have my ſhare in the felicity. Tiberius eſteeming this his accuſation to be true, and having of long

D time conceived a grudge againſt Agrippa, for that notwithſtanding he had commanded him to honour Tiberius, who was his nephew, and Druſus ſon; Agrippa had given ſmal regard to his commandment, and had not honoured him, but was wholly addicted unto Caius. For which cauſe ſaid he to Macron, bind me this fellow. He ſcarcely underſtanding that which he ſpake, and no waies ſuſpecting that he ſhould give that commandment in reſpect of Agrippa deferred the performance untill ſuch time as he might more exactly underſtand his mind. When as therefore Cæſar tutned into the Hippodrome, and by chance met with Agrippa in the teeth: This is he (ſaid he) Macron whom I have commanded to be bound, and demanding of him once more by whom he ſpake: It is Agrippa, ſaid he. Then had Agrippa recourſe to ſubmiſſive and humble prayers, refreſhing the memory of his ſon with

E whom he had been brought up, and alleadging the education he had uſed towards his nephew Tiberius: but he prevailed nothing, but was led away bound in thoſe purple ornaments which he then wore.

At that time it was very hot weather, and being in diſtreſſe of wine, he was extremely thirſty and diſtreſſed, yea more then became one of his quality. Whereupon eſpying Thaumaſtus one of Caius ſervants, who carried water in a pitcher, he required him to give him drink: which when he had willingly beſtowed on him, he drank, and afterwards ſaid unto him, This ſervice thou haſt done me in giving me drink, ſhall do thee good one day. For as ſoon as I ſhall eſcape out of theſe bonds, it ſhall not be long before I obtain thy liberty at Caius hands, for that thou haſt not neglected to do me ſervice in this my impriſonment, as

F thou haſt beforetime done me whileſt I was in my proſperity and dignity: Neither deceived he the mans expectation of his promiſe, but rewarded and gratified him. For afterwards when he had obtained the Kingdom, he begged Thaumaſtus liberty at Caius hands, & made him ſuperintendent of his affairs, and after his deceaſe he gave order that he ſhould ſerve in the ſame place, with his ſon Agrippa and his daughter Bernice; ſo that he died very old, and much honoured. But this hapned afterward. But at that time Agrippa ſtood before the place bound with other companions, who were likewiſe in bonds; and through the grief he conceived, he leaned againſt a certain tree, on which there ſate an Owle. One of thoſe priſoners, who was by nation a German, beholding that bird, asked the ſouldier that was fettred with him, who he was that was apparalled in purple: and underſtanding that his name was Agrippa, and that he was a Iew, and one of the nobility of that nation, he required the ſouldier, dier, who to the end to guard him was chained with him, to ſuffer him to draw near unto Agrippa, and to have a litle conference with him, for that he had a great deſire to aſk him of certain things concerning the cuſtomes of his countrey. Which when he had obtained, and having got near him, he certified him by an interpreter of that which followeth: "Young "man (ſaid he) the ſudden change that hath befallen thee at this preſent, afflicteth and op- "preſſeth thee with great and grievous torment; neither wilt thou eaſily believe that thou "ſhalt eſcape from thy miſery: yet ſo doth the divine providence diſpoſe all things, that thou "ſhalt ſhortly be delivered. Know therefore, and I ſwear unto thee by the gods both thoſe "of mine anceſtors, and thoſe alſo, who have reſidence and preſidence in this place, and who "have procured us this iron chain, that I will tell thee all, not to yeeld thee pleaſure by "my vain diſcourſe, or to entertain thee with fruitleſſe conſolation; knowing well that when "theſe predictions ſhall happen to fail, they will breed thee more ſorrow, then if thou hadſt "never heard of them. But I have thought it good, yea, although it were with mine own "danger, to declare unto thee the predictions of the gods. It cannot otherwiſe be, but that "ſhortly thou ſhalt be delivered from theſe bonds, and ſhalt be advanced to great honour "and power; ſo that thoſe, who at this day have compaſſion of thy calamity, ſhall bear en- "vy to thy glory and thou ſhalt depart this life in great felicity, and ſhalt leave thy children "mighty poſſeſſions. But bear this in thy remembrance, that when thou ſhalt ſee this "bird once more, thou muſt needs die within five dayes after. Theſe are thoſe things which "the gods think meet to foretell thee by this bird. As for my ſelf, I have ſuppoſed that I "ſhould do thee wrong, if I ſhould conceal this prediction from thee, having the fore- "knowledge thereof. I have therefore thought good to impart this joy unto thee, where- "by thorow hope of thy future profit, thou mayeſt more eaſily endure thy preſent miſ- "fortune: for which cauſe I beſeech thee, that as ſoon as thou ſhalt be partaker of this thy "felicitie, thou wilt endeavour thy ſelf to deliver us alſo from theſe adverſaries.

A certain German foretelleth Agrippa of his happy fortunes to come, and the manner of his death.

This preſage of the German ſeemed ſo rediculous to Agrippa, as it afterwards deſerved moſt mighty admiration. But Antonia being ſore grieved at the young mans calamity, thought it not onely a difficult matter for her to entreat Tiberius for him, but although unprofitable in regard ſhe ſhould be repulſed: yet wrought ſhe ſo much with Macron, that he was committed to the cuſtody of ſuch ſouldiers, who were of more reconciled behaviour, and had a Centurion appointed to keep him, that ſuffered him to uſe his daily bathings, & gave his friends and ſervants leave to viſit him, by whoſe ſervice and kindneſſe his neceſſities might be relieved. His friend Silas alſo was admitted to ſpeak with him, and amongſt his free-men Marſyas and Stichus, who brought him in ſuch meats as he was delighted withall, and coverings under colour to ſell them; which by the permiſſion of the ſouldiers, who had no leſſe diriction from Macron, they ſpread by night for him to take his reſt upon. See here the eſtate wherein Agrippa lived in priſon for the ſpace of ſix moneths. But Tiberius being retuned to Capreas, began at firſt to be attained with a certain lingring diſeaſe, and for that his ſickneſſe increaſed more and more, he began to conceive a ſiniſter hope of himſelf, and commanded Euodus, whom he moſt honoured amongſt all his free-men, to bring him his ſons, becauſe he intended to talk with them before he died. But the ſooth is, that he had not any children of his own, but had adopted them. For Druſus, who was his onely childe, was already dead, and had left bebind him a ſon called Tiberius, ſirnamed Gemellus. He had Caius alſo, his brother Germanicus ſon, who was in the flower of his age, and had travelled very diligently in good diſciplines. To him alſo the people aſcribed very much, in remembrance of the vertues of his deceaſed father; and as touching himſelf, he was of a ſweet converſation, and ſo modeſt that he was familiar and converſant with all men. Whereby it came to paſſe, that not onely the people, but the Senate alſo held him in great eſtimation, as alſo all the ſubjects in every ſeveral Province. For they that ſpake with him, were drawn partly by his affability, partly by the fidelity they ſaw in him: ſo that when he was dead, all of them mourned, not counterfeitly lamenting his loſſe, but with unfained ſorrow; for that there was not any one that ſuppoſed not his death to be every mans particular loſſe. He therefore demeaned himſelf ſo modeſtly towards all men, that his ſon after his death was highly advanced thereby. For among the reſt the men of war made their reckoning, that although it ſhould coſt them their lives to get him the Empire, they would not refuſe the hazard.

After that Tiberius had charged Euodus to bring him the two young men the next morrow by break of day, he beſought the gods of that place to give him an evident ſign whereby he might know who ſhould ſucceed him: For although he deſired to leave the Empire to his ſons ſon; yet made he more account of that which God ſhould make manifeſt unto him.

He

A He therefore conceived a preſage, that he, who the next day ſhould enter firſt to ſalute him, it ſhould be he, who in the Empire ſhould neceſſarily ſucceed him. And having ſettled this thing in his fantaſie, he ſent unto his little ſonnes Maſter, charging him to bring him unto him by break of day, ſuppoſing that God had ordeined that the Empire ſhould be his: but the matter fell out quite contrary to his expectation. For being in this thought, he commanded Eudus, that as ſoon as he might, and as ſoon as the day ſhould ariſe, he ſhould ſuffer him of the two young Princes to enter in unto him, who ſhould arrive the firſt. He walking out, met with Caius before the chamber door (for Tiberius was not there, who being ignorant of that which his Grandfather thought, was buſy about his breakfaſt) and ſaid unto him, that the Emperour his father called for him, and withal ſuffered him to enter. When Tiberius beheld Caius, he ſuddenly began to conſider upon the power of God, who deprived him of the means to diſpoſe of the Empire, according as he had determined with himſelf, for that it lay B not in his power: and he lamented greatly, not ſo much for that he ſaw his deliberation could not be brought to effect, as for that his ſonne Tiberius was diſtated of the Roman Empire; and beſides that, was in danger of his life. For he made reckoning that they, who were more ſtronger then he, would not ſuffer him to converſe among them, and that alliance could not aſſure him his life; for ſometimes for fear, and otherwhiles for hatred, ſome one would accuſe him, that he went about and buſily ſought to ſeize the Empire; or that he had complotted ſome ſtratagem, leſt he ſhould loſe the Empire with his life. In a word, Tiberius was very much addicted to Aſtrologicall predictions and nativities; ſo that the greater part of thoſe things which he executed in all his life-time, as ordered thereby.

C He ſeeing Galba one day coming towards him, ſpake thus of him to certain of his familiars: Behold the man, that ſhall be one day honoured with the Roman Empire. And amongſt all the Emperours, he gave greateſt credit to divination, for that in certain things he had found the conjectures correſpondent to truth. But at that time he was grievouſly diſquieted, by reaſon of the misfortune that had happened; yea, he was in ſuch ſort grieved, as if his grandchild had been already loſt, and he blamed himſelf for that he had ſought theſe preſages: for that he might have died without falling into that diſaſter, in being ignorant of that which was to come: whereas now he ſhould die in the knowledge of their miſhaps whom he loved moſt intirely. Being thus troubled to ſee that the ſoveraignty of the Empire ſhould contrary D to his intention fall into their hands, who by his will ſhould not enjoy the ſame; although it were with hearts grief and contrary to his will, yet ſpake he to Caius after this manner which enſueth: My ſonne, although Tiberius be more nearly allied unto me then you are; yet notwithſtandig both by mine own advice, as alſo by the will of the immortal Gods I commit unto your hands the Empire of the Romans. I require you therefore that when you ſhall enjoy the ſame, you forget not the good will I have born towards you, who have eſtabliſhed you in ſo high and worthy a dignity; and charge you likewiſe, that you forget not your Couſin Tiberius; but knowing that by the will of the Gods I am he, who after them am the « author of ſo many goods, which have befalne you, you return me the like good will and affe- « ction: and that you likewiſe take care of Tiberius, by reaſon of your mutuall alliance: for you « ought to know, that Tiberius ſerveth you for a bulwark to maintain your Empire, and your « E own life; and if he die, it will be the beginning of your miſhap. For it is a perilous matter « for thoſe, who are raiſed to high dignities, to be ſole and without allies. Furthermore, the « gods do never leave them unpuniſhed, who attempt or act any thing againſt the laws of conſanguinity. Theſe were the laſt words which Tiberius ſpake to Caius, who promiſed him to perform all that which he required, notwithſtanding he meant nothing leſſe. For incontinently after he was inſtalled in the Empire, he cauſed Tiberius to be made away, bethinking him of thoſe divinations: as alſo the ſame Caius died anon after by a conſpiracy that was practiſed againſt him. When that Tiberius had declared Caius his ſucceſſour in the Empire, he F lived not many daies after, and died after he had governed twenty two years, five moneths, and three dayes. Thus Caius was the fourth Emperour.

The Romans having intelligence of Tiberius death, greatly rejoyced at the good news; yet durſt they not aſſure themſelves: and though of long time they would have willingly redeemed the truth of theſe reports with a good ſumme of money; yet feared they leſt the news ſhould be falſe, and leſt if they ſhewed themſelves too diligent in expreſſing their ſignes of joy, they ſhould afterwards be accuſed for it, and loſe their lives thereby. For onely Tiberius had done much miſchief to the noble families in Rome, being of himſelf a man cholerick and implacable towards all men without any occaſion, having a natural inclination ſo cruel, that the eaſieſt pain whereunto he adjudged thoſe whom he condemned, was death: notwith-

notwithstanding therefore that each man took pleasure to hear the news, yet did each one conceal it, untill such time as they might be more fully assured, through the fear of those miseries they foresaw, if the matter should fall out otherwayes, But Marsyas Agrippas freeman, having certain notice of Tiberius death, ranne speedily to comfort his Master Agrippa, with these good news; and meeting with him as he came out of the bath, he made a sign unto him, and told him in the Hebrew tongue, the Lyon was dead. Agrippa conceiving that which he meant, was ravished with joy, and said unto him: I will requite thee for all those benefits I have received at thy hands, and especially for this good news, provided that it prove true. The Centurion, who had the keeping of Agrippa, considering what expedition Marsyas had used in running, and the pleasure that Agrippa had conceived in his report, he began to suspect some alteration, and asked him what had hapned: and whereas he delayed to give him an answer, he importuned him the more. Whereupon Agrippa told him plainly that he had heard, in that he had grown already into inward familiarity with him. The Centurion rejoyced at his news, as well as Agrippa, hoping to speed the better thereby, and made Agrippa good cheer: but whilest they were in the midst of their banquetting, and drunk freely; there came one unto them, who told them that Tiberius was alive, and that within few daies he would come to Rome. The Centurion troubled with this news, for that he had committed a capital crime in eating in the company of a prisoner, upon the news of Cæsars death, and by rejoycing with him, he drave Agrippa out of the place where he sate, and reproach fully said unto him: Thinkest thou (said he) that I know not how falsely thou spreadest rumour of Cesars death? yes, be assured thou shalt answer thy lie with the losse of thy head. This said, he caused Agrippa to be bound, whom beforetime he had suffered to go at liberty; and shut him up in more close prison, then he had been before: so that Agrippa was all that night long in this extream misery. The next day the rumour was spread thorow the whole City, that confirmed Tiberius death, and at that time every one boldly protested it. There were some also, who offered sacrifices for this cause, and there came letters also from Caius, which were addressed to the Senate, by which he certified them that Tiberius was dead, and how the Empire was committed to his hands. He wrote another also to Piso, who had the guard of the City, containing the like report: and besides that commanding him to transferre Agrippa from the company of those souldiers, by whom he was kept, to the same place where he was lodged before; so that from that time forwards, he waxed confident. For although he was as yet a prisoner, yet lived he at his own discretion. Cains arriving in Rome, brought with him Tiberius body, which he burned most magnificently, according to the custome of the Countrey. And although he were very willing to deliver Agrippa the same day, yet was he diswaded from the same by Antonia, not for any ill will she bare the prisoner, but in regard of Caius honour, lest thereby he should shew himself to be glad of Tiberius death, in setting him at liberty so speedily, whom he had committed to prison. When as therefore some few daies were overpast, he sent for him to his house, and caused him to be poll'd, and his garments changed, and that done, he set a Diadem upon his head, and made him King of Philips Tetrarchy, to which he annexed Lysanias Tetrarchy, and changed his chain of Iron into a chain of gold of the same weight, and sent Marullus into Judæa to govern there. The second year of Caius reign Agrippa asked licence to repair into Judæa, to the intent he might dispose of his kingdome, purposing to return again at such time as he had dispatched those affairs. Which when the Emperour had granted him, he came into Judæa, and was seen and saluted for a King beyond all mens expectation, serving thereby for a most notable example unto men, to expresse unto them how great the power of destiny is in humane affairs, considering the poor estate wherein he had been before, and the happinesse which he enjoyed at that time. Some tearmed him happy, in that he resolutely followed his hopes, other some could scarcely believe that he was in this sort advanced.

Herod the Tetrarch banished.

Hedio & Russinus. chap. 14. al. 16.

Herodias Agrippas sister envyeth her brothers happinesse, and inciteth her husband to seek a kingdome.

Herodias Agrippas sister was married to Herod the Tetrarch of Galilee, and Peræa. She envied her brother to see him raised to so great authority, and to farre greater dignity then her husband enjoyed. For which cause she was displeased, that her brother, who fled out of his countrey in that he wanted means to pay his debts, was returned in

A in great honour and with greater ſubſtance. This charge endured ſhe with great hearts grief, eſpecially, at ſuch time as ſhe ſaw him apparelled like a King, and invironed with a great multitude of people, and impoſſible was it for her to hide the bitterneſſe of her grief; for which cauſe ſhe incited her husband and perſwaded him to make a voyage to Rome, and to purchaſe as much as he poſſeſſed. For ſaid ſhe, I cannot endure to live, if Agrippa, Ariſtobulus ſon, condemned to death by the ſentence of his own father (ſo poor and indigent, that to redreſſe his neceſſities wherewith he was daily preſſed by his creditors, he was conſtrained at laſt to flie to Rome) ſhould return with ſuch titles of a King, and that her husband who was a Kings ſon, and was called to the Kingdome by his father, ſhould live obſcure, and paſſe his life like a private man: Husband (ſaid ſhe) if heretofore it hath been no prejudice to thee
B to live in leſſe dignity, then erſt thy father hath done; now at leaſtwiſe deſire that due honour which belongeth to thy family: neither think it to be ſufferable to ſubſcribe to him in eſtimation, who in times paſt hath been maintained by thy bounty. Neither ſuffer it to be thought (through thine own ſloth) that he in his neceſſitie had better means and induſtrie to obtain an ample fortune, then you amidſt your mighty abundance; as if it redounded not to thy ſhame to be thought inferiour to him at this time, who not-long ſince, except by thy mercy, had no means to live. Let us therefore haſtily repair unto Rome, and neither ſpare gold, ſilver, or any other expence, for that it availeth us not ſo much to keep the ſame as to imploy the ſame in the purchaſe of a kingdome. But Herod diſſwaded her as much as he might, for that he contented himſelf to live in quiet, and ſuſpected the confuſion that
C was at Rome, which he endeavoured as much as in him lay, to lay open to Herodias. But the more negligent ſhe ſaw him, the more inſtantly incited ſhe him to ſeek out the kingdom, and never gave ſhe him over, untill ſhe had conformed him to her deſire: Whereunto he the rather liſtned, in that ſhe might not be drawn from her reſolution. Having therefore furniſhed himſef after the moſt magnificent manner, and ſpared no coſt, he repaired to Rome, and led Herodias his wife with him. Agrippa ſmelling their intent and the preparation they made, made his proviſion likewiſe. And having notice that they were put to ſea, he ſent Fortunatus one of his free-men to Rome, with preſents to the Emperour, and certain letters againſt Herod, with commiſſion to certifie Caius of every particular, according as the occa-
D ſion ſhould ſerve. He embarking himſelf after Herod, had a happy paſſage, and was onely prevented by him, but for the ſpace that Herod preſented himſelf to Caius: for he incontinently followed him, and delivered his letters. For they arrived at one time at Puteol, and found Caius at Baia, a village of Campania, diſtant from Puteol ſom five ſtades, inriched with moſt royal and ſumptuous palaces, for that every Emperour enforced himſelf to exceed the honour of his predeceſſour, by reaſon of the hot baths that naturally iſſued out of the earth, ſerving both for the health of the body, and recreation of the ſpirits. Whileſt Caius talked with Herod in that he viſitted him firſt, he received Agrippas letters, containing Herods accuſations, for they accuſed him of a conſpiracy made and complotted betwixt him and Sejanus, ſince the beginning of Tiberius Empire: And how for the preſent he favoured Artabanus King of the Parthians to the prejudice of the Emperour Caius: of this the preparations Herod
E had ſtored up in his Arcenals, gave evident teſtimony, which were ſufficient to arm ſeventy thouſand men of war. Caius was ſore moved with theſe informations, and asked Herod if that which was informed him touching his warlike preparation, was true. He unable to contradict the ſame in any thing, for fear he ſhould be convicted of falſehood, avowed no leſſe. Whereupon Caius ſuppoſing the accuſation of his revolt to be ſufficiently approved, deprived him of his Tetrarchy, and annexed it to Agrippas kingdom; beſtowing Herods ſubſtance alſo upon him. He baniſhed him likewiſe for ever, and confined him in the City of Lions in France: and underſtanding that Herodias was Agrippas ſiſter, he gave her all that which in right appertained unto her. And ſuppoſing that ſhe would not willingly accompany her huſband in that his calamity, he told her that her brother ſhould be her warrant. But ſhe gave F him this reply: Mighty Emperour, you ſpeak magnificently, and as it well beſeemeth ſo great a Majeſtie, but there is a cauſe that hindreth me from partaking the benefit of that bounty, which you intend towards me, which is the affection that I bear unto my husband whom if I ſhould forſake in this his miſery, it would very ill beſeem me, in that I have been a partner with him in is felicity. Caius diſpleaſed with this her reſolute anſwer, baniſhed her likewiſe with her husband, and give the confiſcation of her eſtate alſo to Agrippa. God did after this manner puniſh Herodias, in regard of that envy which ſhe had conceived againſt her brother; and plagued Herod, in that he had ſo lightly liſtned to the fooliſh perſwaſions of a woman. But Caius governed the Empire, the firſt and the ſecond year of his raign, with moſt noble diriction, behaving himſelf graciouſly towards all men, whereby he obtained the

The sedition of the Jews and Grecians in the City of Alexandria.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 15. Alias, chap. 17. Appion Prince of the Alexandrians Embassage accuseth the Jews because they ascribed not divinity to Cæsar.

AND whereas there arose a sedition betwixt the Jewes and Grecians, that inhabited Alexandria, three chosen Embassadours on either side were sent unto Caius. One of these Embassadours of Alexandria was Appion, who charged the Jews with many outrages, and amongst other things he alleadged that they made no reckoning of honouring Cæsar: And that whereas all other subjects of the Romane Empire had erected Altars and Temples in honour of Caius, and in all other things had received him as a God, the Iews supposed it to be a dishonour for them to honour his statues, or swear by his name. After that Appion had urged many things and inveighed grievously against the Jews, hoping that Caius would be provoked against them, as in all likelihood and appearance it should have falne out, Philo, the cheifest among the Embassadours of the Jews, a man of a famous memory, and brother to Alexander Alabarcha, being experienced in Philosophy, enforced himself to answer those accusations which were urged against the Jews. But Caius commanded him silence, and willed him instantly to withdraw himself: and was so sore displeased, that it appeared very manifestly, that he intended some hainous revenge against them. Whereupon Philo departed after he had been grievously taunted, and spake thus unto the Jews that flocked about him. We must be of good courage, since Caius in words seemeth to be displeased with us; for in effect he will arm God in our behalf against himself.

CHAP. XI.

Caius sendeth Petronius into Syria, to make war against the Jews, who should refuse his Statue.

Alias, cha. 17. Cæsar sendeth Petronius into Syria & commandeth him in spite of the Iews to plant his statue in Gods Temple. The Iews repair to Ptolomais, beseeching him that he would not bring his statue into the holy City.

BUT Caius, being sore displeased for that he Jews onely despised his ordinances, sent Petronius into Syria to succeed Vitellius in his room, charging him with a strong army to invade Judæa, and if they willingly admitted his statue, that then he should place it in the Temple of God: but if they denied the same, then that over-coming them by war, he should enforce them to condiscend thereunto. As soon as Petronius came into Syria, he endeavoured himself to satisfie Cæsars command: and having assembled a great an army as he could possibly leavy, and leading forth with him two legions of Romane souldiers, he wintred at Ptolemais, intending upon the first spring to invade Iudæa. All which he signified to Caius by his letters: who commending him for his industry, advised him to use all expedition therein, and to make war against those who should disobey his commandements. Mean-whiles divers thousands of the Jews resorted to Petronius, who sojourned at Ptolemais beseeching him not to constrain them to do that thing which was contrary to their laws or to transgresse the ordinances of their fore-fathers. "For if (said "they) you have wholly decreed to bring and erect this statue in our Temple, first deprive "us of our lives: and afterwards do that which shall seem good in your eyes. For it is "impossible for us, as long as our souls remain within our bodies, to permit that which is "forbidden by our laws,, or to suffer such impiety in regard of that honour, which we owe "unto our Law-maker, and our predecessours who have ratified our laws to the intent we "should increase in vertue. Petronius enraged at this their protestation, answered thus; If I "were Emperour, and of mine own mind enterprized this action, you had reason to use these "kinds of insinuations unto me. But since Cæsar hath sent me this Commission, there is no "contradiction, but that I must obey his decrees: for if you resist the same, you shall en- "dure a most severe and rigorous punishment for your disobedience and contumacy. Here- "unto the Jews answered; My Lord (said they) since your pleasure is such, as you will not "in any sort transgresse the command and contents of Cæsars letters, neither will we any "wayes violate or infringe the prescript of our law, under hope of the divine assistance, and "in imitation of the vertue of our ancestors; For we are not so faint-harted, that under hope "of a vain and untimely desire of life, we should break those laws which Almighty God hath "proposed unto us, under the reward of eternal felicity: for which cause we will endure all "fortunes whatsoever; so as our countrey law and religion may remain inviolate, & we are "ready

A ready to encounter any misfortune, under hope that God will assist us, for whose honour we fear not to adventure on any danger. This had we rather do, then by obeying thee through cowardise, to incur perpetuall ignominie; and that which is more, Gods wrath in neglect of his laws, whose authoritie, even in thine own judgement, is more to be regarded then Caius Commission. The year of the world 4002. after Christs Nativitie 40.

Petronius conjecturing by these their answers, how hard a matter it was to estrange them from their opinion, and perceiving he could not do for Caius what he expected in the erection of his Statue, without great bloudshed, whereby much murther and inconvenience might follow, he took certain of his neerest and dearest friends with him, and posted to Tiberias, that he might more conveniently and circumspectly look into the Iews actions. Whereunto Petronius answered: Therefore ( said he ) will you fight with Cæsar, *without regard either of his abilitie, or your own weakenesse? We will not fight (*said they ) but we will rather die, then depart from our Lawes. Whereupon prostrating themselves, and laying open their naked throats, they said they were ready to entertain their deaths. In these terms continued they for the space of fourtie dayes, neglecting their husbandry, whereas at that time it was the chiefest seed-time. For it was most resolutely concluded among thems, rather to suffer death then to admit the Statue. Whilest the matter stood upon these Aristobulus, K. C tearm, Aristobulus, Agrippas brother, and Elcias sirnamed the Great, accompanied with divers of their houshold train, and some of the chiefest among the Jews, came unto Petronius, beseeching him that he would consider the obstinacie of the people: neither give them occasion to draw them into desperate actions, but rather that he would write unto Caius, with what obstinacie the people refused the dedication of his Image in the Temple: and how giving over the care of their husbandry, they prepared themselves for the warre, without any trust or confidence in their own strength, being rather addressed to die, then to suffer so great an indignitie to be offered to their Religion. Besides, how giving over their Tillage, there was nothing to be expected but robbery, whereas they should want means to pay their Customes, by which means they hoped that Cæsar would be moved to moderate his severitie towards that Nation, and not to

But Petronius, partly in respect of their prayers who instantly urged him; and the weightinesse of the Action; partly in regard of the contentious purpose of the Jewes, supposing that it was a matter unworthie a man to put so many thousands of men to death, to satisfie Caius unbridled desire and insolence, and touched with the fear of God, and remorse of his own conscience, he had rather to his own danger inform the Emperour of the absurditie of the matter by his Petronius promiseth the Jews to write unto Caius in their behalf, and exhorteth them to follow their husbandrie.

When as therefore he had assembled the Jewes together in Tiberias (when many thousands of them resorted thither) and disposed all those warlike forces that at that time gave attendance on him round about him, he told the Jewes first of all, not his own, but the Emperours intent, who would have them shortly taste his displeasure, and enforce them to bear the burthen of his indignation, who were so bold as to contradict him. For himself, that it necessarily concerned him, that since by the Emperours favour he had received so great honour, he should not commit any thing contrary to his command. I will therefore write to* Cæsar, *and certifie him of your mindes: and in all that I may, I will assist you to obtain your request. The yeer of the world 4002. after Chriſts Nativity 40.

After he had ſpoken thus, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly, praying the chiefeſt amongſt them to encourage the husbandmen to ply their buſineſſe, and to confirm the reſt of the people in their good hope. Of himſelf alſo he ceaſed not to animate them. And truly God ſhewed his aſſiſtance to Petronius, and aſſiſted him in all his affairs. For as ſoon as he had finiſhed his diſcourſe unto the Jews, there ſuddenly fell a great rain beyond all humane expectation. For the day was very fair, neither was there any appearance of rain in the ayre, and all that yeer long there was an extreme drought; ſo that men were paſt hope to have any moyſture, notwithſtanding, that ſometime there happened certain clouds in the heavens. At that time therefore the water fell in great abundance: and beſides the expectation and opinion of men, the Iews conceived hope that Petronius, ſoliciting their cauſe, ſhould not be repulſed. But Petronius was more amazed then all the reſt, ſeeing evidently that God undertook the affairs of the Iews, and gave them teſtimony of his manifeſt aſſurance; ſo that they that were their profeſſed adverſaries, had no means to contradict them, as he himſelf wrote to Caius at large, with inductions and exhortations, to the end he ſhould not draw ſo many thouſand men into a deſperate reſolution and unhappy death. For without war it was impoſſible for him ever to make them forſake their Religion. Furthermore, that he would not cut off and loſe the revenew which he received of that Nation; and would not erect a trophy of a an everlaſting curſe and malediction againſt himſelf. Adding moreover, what the ower of their God was: which he had ſo cleerly declared, that no man ought to doubt, but that his merciful hand was over them. This is the contents of Petronius letters.

After a long and continuall drought there fell a ſudden ſhowre. H

Petronius writeth to Caius. I

On the other ſide, King Agrippa, who at that time converſed at Rome, grew more and more in favour with Caius, having entertained him at a banquet, wherein he inforced himſelf to exceed all others in ſumptuouſneſſe, as in all other ſorts of delights and pleaſures; yea with ſuch feſtivals entertained he him, that not onely others, but alſo the Emperour himſelf could not attain to ſuch magnificence; ſo much enforced he himſelf to exceed all others through the great deſire he had to content and ſatisfie Cæſar in all things. Caius was abaſhed at this his courage and magnificence; ſeeing Agrippa enforce himſelf above his power and means to abound in ſilver; and all this to the intent to pleaſe him. For which cauſe Cæſar in requitall of his kindneſſe, intending to honour Agrippa to his uttermoſt power in granting him that which he moſt deſired, being one day whet with wine, invited him to drink a carouſe: adding theſe words:

Agrippa honoureth Caius in Rome, and in reward thereof Caius willeth him to demand ſomewhat, who deſireth nothing elſe then that Petronius commiſſion to erect the ſtatue ſhould be revoked. K

Agrippa, I have heretofore known the honour thou haſt ſhewed towards me, and thou haſt expreſſed the earneſt affection that thou beareſt me, in hazarding thy ſelf in divers dangers, into which thou haſt been drawn during Tiberius life-time; and haſt omitted nothing, no not in that which exceedeth thy power, to ſhew thy vertuous affection towards me. For which cauſe I think that it ſhould be a great ſhame for me, if I ſhould ſuffer my ſelf to be overcome by thee in kindneſſe, without ſome anſwerable correſpondence: I will therefore put that in practiſe which I have heretofore omitted. For all thoſe things that hitherto I have beſtowed on thee, are of no reckoning. My will is that thy ready vertue ſhould at this preſent be requited, by ſuch means as might for ever make thee happy. Now he ſpake after this manner, hoping that Agrippa would beg ſome great Province at his hands, or the revenews of ſome Cities. L

But although he had already prepared his demand, yet did he not diſcover his intent, but gave Caius this ready anſwer, that whereas he had ſerved him to the diſlike of Tiberius, it was not for the gain he expected heretofore, and for the preſent alſo he did nothing under hope to be rich, contenting himſelf that he was in the Emperours good favour. That the benefits he had received by him were great, yea exceeding all that which he durſt ever have hoped. For (ſaid he) although they be but ſmall in compariſon of your Greatneſſe, yet in reſpect of my ſelf, who have received them, and in my conceit and qualitie, they are very great. Caius being amazed at this his courage, inſiſted the rather to perſwade him, that he would grant him all that he would require at his hands. Whereupon Agrippa ſaid: Dread Prince, ſince it is your good pleaſure to think me worthy to be honoured by your preſents, I will not requeſt any thing at your hands that may tend to enrich me; for that by thoſe goods you have already given me, I am greatly honoured: but I beſeech and requeſt one thing at your hands, which will purchaſe you the reputation of Pietie, and will procure God to be propitious unto you in all your actions; and which alſo will breed me much glory among thoſe who ſhall hear that I have not been refuſed in my demand, which concerneth me more M

A then the neceſſities of this life. I therefore beſeech you that it will pleaſe you to give commandment, that that ſtatue, which you have charged Petronius to erect in the Temple of the Jews, may never be advanced there. This was Agrippa's requeſt, which to his great hazard he preſented the Emperour with, knowing very well how perillous a matter it was, and as much as concerned his life to demand any ſuch thing at Caius hands, that was not anſwerable to his humour. Caius on the one ſide moved with the ſervice Agrippa had done him, and on the other ſide ſeeing how great an indignitie it ſhould be for him, if before ſuch an aſſembly of witneſſes, he ſhould deny that which he had ſo inſtantly preſſed Agrippa to requeſt, as if he ſuddenly had repented himſelf, & admiring Agrippa's vertue (who having means B within a little time to augment his particular eſtate, either by revenews or other commodities, had preſerved the common cauſe, the Lawes of his Countrey and pietie before all theſe) he granted him his ſupplication, and wrote to Petronius, prayſing him for that he had uſed ſuch diligence in aſſembling his Army, as alſo for all that whereof he had certified him, annexing theſe words: If (ſaid he) you have already planted the Statue, as I commanded you, let it remain in the place; but if it be not done, be thou no more troubleſome to the Jews, but diſmiſſe thine Armie, and repair thou in perſon to that place whither I have ſent thee. For I urge no more the erection of that Statue, for the deſire that I have to gratifie Agrippa, whom I intirely honour, and in ſuch ſort, as it is impoſſible for me to contradict any thing whatſoever, that either he hath need of, or ſhall require. Theſe were the contents of
C thoſe letters, which Caius wrote to Petronius, before he underſtood that the Jews bethought them of revolt: for they made it known, that rather then they would endure the Statue, they would hazard a warre againſt the Romans: which when Caius underſtood, he was extremely ſorrowfull: and being a man addicted to all villany, and eſtranged from all honeſtie, and who gave place to no good councel, incontinently after he had conceived a diſpleaſure againſt any man, and who likewiſe thought it a great good hap for him to accompliſh all that whatſoever he pleaſed, he wrote again to Petronius to this effect: Since the Preſent which the Jews have given thee, have prevailed more with thee then my commandments have done, ſo as to pleaſe them, thou haſt deſpiſed that which I have enjoyned thee, I make thy ſelf the Judge how much thou haſt deſerved to incur my diſpleaſure, to the end that thou
D mayeſt ſerve for an example to all thoſe, who ſhall come after thee, that an Emperours commandment ought not in any ſort to be neglected. Although this Epiſtle was both written and ſent, yet did not Petronius receive the ſame during Caius life time, for that they that carried the ſame, were ſtayed by croſſe winds; ſo that Petronius received thoſe Letters that certified him of Caius death, before he received the other. For God would not forget Petronius, who expoſed himſelf to great dangers for the love of the Jewes, and the honour of God. And Caius being taken out of the world by Gods wrath being kindled againſt him, by reaſon that he affected divine honours, received his reward, and Petronius obtained favour both at Rome, and thorow all the whole government, and eſpecially among the principall Senators, againſt whom Caius was accuſtomed to vomit his cholerick diſgraces. He died a little after he had written the Letter to Petronius, by which he threatned
E and denounced him death. Hereafter will I declare the cauſe why he was taken out of this world, and the manner how Treaſon was complotted and wrought againſt him. The Letter that brought tidings of Caius death, was delivered to Petronius firſt; and incontinently after he received that wherein he enjoyned him to kill himſelf. He highly rejoyced at this his good hap, and Caius death, and admired Gods providence, who ſpeedily and happily had rewarded him both for the honour that he bare unto his Temple, as alſo for the aſſiſtance he uſed towards the Iewes. Behold, how Petronius eſcaped from death, by an unexpected means.

That which hapned to the Jews which were at Babylon, and of the two brethren, Aſinæus and Anilæus.

IN thoſe dayes there happened a grievous commotion amongſt thoſe Iewes that inhabited Meſopotamia and Babylon, and ſuch ſlaughters and calamities as never the like hath been declared in our former Narrations; which in that I intend to report both particularly and ſeriouſly, I will rippe up the whole cauſe thereof from his firſt Originall. tude: Moreover, it was such as might be hardly invaded by the enemy, both for that the river Euphrates hemmed it in on one side, as also for that it was defenced with very strong wals. Upon the same river also there stood another city, called Nisibis, in which the Jews, in respect of the strength of the place, kept their Dragma, which they were accustomed to offer unto God, and the rest of their votive money. These two Cities therefore served them for two store-houses: and from thence, according as time required, they sent the money they had gathered, to Ierusalem, and committed the convoy thereof to divers thousands of men, for fear lest it should be taken away by the Parthians, who at that time had the soveraigntie in Babylon. Among these Iews lived Asinæus and Anilæus, two brethren, born in Nearda; whose father being dead, their mother set them and bound them to the weavers trade, for that amongst those Nations it was accounted no indignitie to follow that trade: for both men and women exercise themselves therein. It happened, that their master with whom they learn'd their occupation, beat them one day, for that they came somewhat late unto their work. They taking this chastisement of his as if a great injurie had been done unto them, betook themselves to their weapons, whereof there were great store in that house, and retired themselves into a place where the floud divideth it self into two parts, which naturally abounded with excellent pastures, and such fruits as were reserved for the use of winter. To these men there flocked a number of needy persons, whom they armed and became their captains, and no man opposed himself against their insolent proceedings. Being by this means grown absolute and impregnable, for that they had builded themselves a strong fortresse, they sent unto the inhabitants, commanding them to pay them tribute for their cattell which they pastured; so that this tribute gave sufficient to entertain them, promising to those who obeyed them, all friendship, and that they would maintain them against all those that should injure them, of what place soever they were: but if they did not that which they commanded them, they threatned them that they would kill all their cattell. The inhabitants of the countrey, knowing themselves unable to crosse them, obeyed them, and sent them the number of cattell which they required; so that greater forces daily coupled themselves with them, and they grew of that power, that they could make their excursions against those whom they intended to hurt. Every one respected them, and they were feared by all men, so that their renown came at last to the ears of the King of Parthia.

Nearda, Nisibis, two cities of Bybylon.

Asinæus and Anilæus, born in Nearda, retire into a certain place, and great companies flock unto them.

Asinæus and his companions beset by the Governours and princes of Babylon.

The Governour of Babylon likewise intending to cut off this mischief before it grew to greater head, assembled as many men as he could possible, both Parthians and Babylonians, and marched forth against them, with an intent to root them out, before they should have any inkling thereof to prepare themselves for their defence. Having therefore prepared his army, he lay in ambush neer unto a marish, and the next day following (which was the Sabbath, in which the Iews forbear all kinde of work, he making his account that the enemie durst not make head against him, but without fight he should lead them away captives) he marched easily, thinking to charge them unaware. Asinæus, who at that time sate idly with his fellows, having his Arms fast by him: Ye men (said he) me thinks I hear the neighing of horses, not such as when they are in their heat, but as when they are backe by men. Moreover, I hear the noise of their bridles and I fear lest the enemies secretly stealing upon us, should circumvent us let therefore some one of us go and discover what the matter is, and certifie us truly of that which he shall perceive: I would I were found a lier in that which I have told you. This said, one of them went out to espie what the noise intended; who running hastily back again, told him that he had not falsly conjectured as touching the intent of the enemie, for that they were at hand, and would not suffer themselves any longer to be out-braved by them. He also declared, that there was a mightie number of horsemen, who were assembled like a drove of beasts, sufficient and able utterly to overcome Asinæus and all his company, forasmuch as they were not in a readinesse to defend themselves: for that our law forbiddeth us in any sort to travell on the Sabbath. Asinæus determined with himself not to do that which the Spy had said, but thought that it was better for them to behave themselves valiantly in that their necessitie wherein they were plunged, and that if they must needs die, it better became them to make breach of their law, then to hearten their enemies by their submission. He therefore presently betook himself to his weapons, and encouraged all those that were about him, to make it known in effect what their valour was. Whereupon all of them at once marched forth against the enemy, and slaughtered a great many of them, for that they, despising Asinæus and his followers, marched as if they went to lay hold on men already vanquished; but in the end they were constrained to betake them to flight.

Asinæus, after he had encouraged his souldiers, putteth his enemies to flight.

When

A When the bruit of this skirmiſh was brought to the ears of the King of Parthia, he was wholly aſtoniſhed at the boldneſſe of theſe two brethren, and he had a deſire to ſee them, and to ſpeak with them. He therefore ſent one of the truſtieſt of his guard, to let them underſtand that although King Artabanus had been injured by them, in that they had invaded his countrey; notwithſtanding ſaid this Embaſſadour, he making leſſe account of the diſpleaſure he hath conceived againſt you, then of your vertue, hath ſent me unto you to give you my hand and troth in his name for ſafe conduct and ſecuritie in your voyage, requiring you to be his friends: he conditioneth therefore with you without any deceit or fraud, promiſing you gifts and honours, and determineth to increaſe your dignity by his power. Aſinæus refuſed to enterprize this voyage, but ſent his brother Anilæus with certain preſents, ſuch as B he could poſſibly find. He therefore departed with the meſſenger, and preſented himſelf before Artabanus; who ſeeing Anilæus come alone, asked him how it happened that Aſinæus came not with him: and underſtanding that he ſtayed in his mariſh through the fear that he had of him, he ſwore by the gods of his Anceſtors, that he would do him no wrong, wiſhing them to give credit to his promiſe, and he ſtretched out his hand, which is the greateſt ſign which the Kings of that countrey uſe to aſſure thoſe that parley with them. For after they have mutually given one another their hands, there is no ſiniſter practice to be feared, and they from whom a man expecteth any harm, are no more to be feared at ſuch time as they have given this teſtimony of aſſurance. That done, Artabanus ſent back Anilæus to perſwade his brother Aſinæus to come to Court. Artabanus did this, ſuppoſing that this his C amitie with the two brothers would be a bridle for the Iews, who otherwiſe might encroach upon his governments. For, he feared leſt if any rebellion ſhould happen, and he ſhould be troubled in that war, Aſinæus and they of Babylon ſhould grow more ſtrong, both by the voluntary ſubmiſſion of the Iews, as by force: and thereby ſhould do him the more miſchief. Upon this deliberation he ſent Anilæus, who eaſily perſwaded his brother, giving him to underſtand among other things, what good will the King bare him, and the oath that he had ſworn: ſo that both of them reſorted to Artabanus, who received them very graciouſly, admiring Aſinæus vertue, who had ſo great a courage to exerciſe his enterprizes, conſidering eſpecially that he was a man of low ſtature, and who to look on ſeemed to be contemptible: and he told his friends that without compariſon, he had a greater heart then his body.

Aſinæus and Anilæus are ſought unto by Artabanus for friendſhip.

D And when as in banquetting he had named Aſinæus, and ſhewed him to Abdagaſis the Generall of his Army, ſignifying unto him with what valour theſe brethren were endowed in feats of arms; Abdagaſis required that it might be lawfull for him to kill Aſinæus, to the end he might puniſh the wrongs he had done to the eſtate of the Parthians. Never (ſaid the King) will I give my conſent to betray a man, who hath committed himſelf to my protection, and hath given me his hand, and who buildeth upon the oath I have paſt unto him in the name of the gods. But if thou be a valiant man in feats of Arms, thou haſt no need to make me forſwear my ſelf, to the end I might do juſtice on him for his outrages committed againſt the Parthians: but at ſuch time as he and his brother ſhall depart from hence, aſſail him, and overcome him by thy valour, provided that I be not privie to thy attempt. And afterwards E calling Aſinæus to him in the morning: It is time (ſaid he) that thou return homeward, for fear thou provokeſt divers of the Captains of my Court, which contrary to my will, will endeavour themſelves to kill thee. I commit the Countrey of Babylon to thy protection and guard, which by thy care and vigilancie ſhall remain exempt from all robberies, and other ſuch calamities. Reaſon it is that I procure thy good, becauſe I have engaged mine honour and faith irrevocably unto thee, not upon any light matter, but for things that importune thee as neerly as thy life. This ſaid, he gave him certain preſents, and incontinently diſmiſſed him. Now as ſoon as he returned home to his own fortreſſe, he fortified the places, both thoſe which before-time he had thorowly defenced, as the other which as yet no man F had attempted to ſtrengthen: and in ſhort time he grew to that greatneſſe, as no one man of ſo obſcure fortune and beginning attained before him. Neither contented with the honours of the Babylonians, he was alſo held in great account by the Captains of the Parthians, who were ſent to govern in the neighbouring Provinces: yea ſo much encreaſed his authoritie with his power, that all Meſopotamia was at his command. In this felicitie and encreaſing glorie of his, he continued for the ſpace of fifteen yeers: which never began to wane untill ſuch time as neglecting the ancient ſtudy of vertue, and contemning the lawes of his forefathers, both he and his factious followers being devoured in pleaſure, yielded themſelves captive to forrain luſts. It fortuned that a certain Governour of thoſe Parthians came into that Countrey, accompanied with his wife, not onely enriched and endowed with other perfections, but also admired for her incomparable comelineſſe and beautie, Whom without ever, ſeeing her, onely by reſpect of her beautie Anilæus, Aſinæus brother loved entirely: and when as by no one of his allurements he could obtain her favour, neither had any other hope to enjoy the Lady, he could not bridle his unruly luſt, but he made warre againſt her husband: and killing the Parthian in their firſt conflict, his wife became his, both in ſubjection, and bed-ſervice, which thing was the original of many mightie calamities both to himſelf, and towards his brother. For when as having loſt her former husband, ſhe was led away captive, ſhe carried with her the images of the gods of her countrey, which ſhe highly eſteemed, according as it was the cuſtome of thoſe that inhabited that place, to have their gods whom they adored in their houſes, whom at ſuch time as they travel into a forrain countrey, they carry about with them. She therefore brought them with her, and uſed them according to the faſhion of her countrey, at the firſt ſecretly: but after ſhe was known for Anilæus wife, then adored ſhe them according to the cuſtome, and with the ſame ſervice which ſhe uſed during her firſt husbands dayes, ſacrificing to her gods.

Anilæus killeth a Noble man of the Parthians, and leadeth away his wife.

Their chiefeſt friends ſeeing this, firſt of all reproved them, for that Anilæus committed ſuch things as were no wayes uſed among the Hebrewes, and altogether repugnant to their laws, for that he had maried a woman of a forrain nation, that contradicted and violated their accuſtomed Religion: for which cauſe they adviſed them to beware, leſt in ſubmitting themſelves too much to their unbridled pleaſures, they ſhould loſe the honour and power they had received from God, even until that preſent. But ſeeing their perſwaſions profited nothing, and that Anilæus likewiſe had villanouſly ſlain one of his deareſt friends, who had ſomewhat too freely reproved him (who at ſuch time as he lay a dying, being touched with the zeal of the Laws of his Anceſtors, and with grief againſt his murtherer, wiſhed that Aſinæus and Anilæus and all their aſſociates might die the like death: they for that they were tranſgreſſers of the Law; the other, for that they ſuccoured not themſelves in that oppreſſion, which they ſuffered for the maintenance of their Laws.) They were ſore diſpleaſed: yet notwithſtanding, they contained themſelves, calling to their remembrance that their felicitie proceeded from no other cauſe, but from the valour of thoſe brethren.

Anilæus being reproved for his wifes idolatry, killeth one of his friends.

But when they underſtood that the Parthian gods were adored by this woman, they bethought them that it behoved them not any more to bear with Anilæus, in contempt of their Laws: for which cauſe, addreſſing themſelves to Aſinæus in great aſſemblies, they exclaimed againſt Anilæus; ſaying, that he ought, although at firſt he had no power to diſpoſe of himſelf, yet now at laſt, to correct this errour before it ſhould redound to their publick plague: for that both his marriage was diſallowed in all mens eyes, as altogether contrary to their Laws, and that the ſuperſtitious obſervance of the gods, which the woman preſumed to uſe, was an apparant injurie offered to the true God. But he, although he knew that his brothers fault would breed ſome great inconvenience, both to himſelf and his followers, yet being overcome with brotherly affection, he eaſily pardoned his brother, aſcribing his errour to the violence of his unbridled paſſion. But whereas daily more and more he was tired with exclamations, and greater reproofs, at length he admoniſhed his brother of the matter, chiding him for that which was paſt, and willing him to amend the errour hereafter, by ſending home the woman unto her kindred. Yet did this admonition of his take no effect with him; for that the woman perceiving that the rumour that was raiſed among the people was for her ſake, and being afraid leſt for her love ſake Anilæus ſhould incurre ſome danger, ſhe poyſoned Aſinæus, to the end that her love being in authority, ſhe might more freely practice her impietie. Now when Anilæus had gotten the government into his own hands, he drew out his forces againſt certaine villages belonging to Mithridates, one of the cheifeſt among the Parthians, and Artabanus ſonne in lawe, which villages he ſpoiled, and carried away moveables, men, ſheep, and other riches. When Mithridates, who at that time was reſident in thoſe quarters, underſtood of the ſpoil of his villages, he was ſore diſpleaſed and the rather, for that without any occaſion or proffer of injurie, Anilæus had aſſailed him in contempt of his eſtate, who was a cheif Peer of the countrey: for which cauſe he incontinently aſſembled the greateſt power of horſe and footmen he could gather, to ſet upon Anilæus and his aſſociates. Leading his forces therefore againſt one of his villages, he kept himſelf in covert, to the end he might fight the next day; which was the Sabbath day, on which the Jews attempted not any thing. Whereof when Anilæus was advertiſed by a certain Syrian, who dwelt in another village, who had exactly told him all Mithridates intent, and the place where he intended to banquet with his ſouldiers; after he had made his ſouldiers take their refection, he departed by night, to the end he might charge the Parthians before they might be advertiſed of his comming. He therefore ruſhed in upon them about

A about the fourth watch of the night, and ſlew thoſe whom he found aſleep, and the reſt being aſtoniſhed hereat, were forced to ſave themſelves by flight: he alſo took Mithridates priſoner, and cauſed him to be carried away naked on an Aſſe, which is one of the greateſt diſgraces which the Parthians imagine may be offered them. Having after this diſgracefull manner carried him into a forreſt, ſome of his familiars perſwaded him to kill him: but Anilæus told them incontinently, that they ought to deale with him farre otherwiſe; for that it behoved them not to kill a man, who was one of the chiefe among the nobilitie of the Parthians, and one who was moſt honoured in regard of that affinitie and alliance he had with the King: that although all that which heretofore had been offered to Mithridates, were inſupportable; yet if they ſhould be the means of the ſafegard of his life, he would remit the injuries, B and remunerate them for their mercy in ſaving his life; whereas if they ſhould deale ſeverely with him, the King would ſeek his revenge, and make a horrible ſlaughter of all thoſe Iews; that inhabited Babylon: whom they ought to have compaſſion of, both for that they are of their bloud, as for that if any miſchiefe ſhould befall them, they knew not whither to retire themſelves; whereas they might be aſſiſted with the flower and picked number of the men of their nation. Having thus diſcourſed and debated the matter in the ears of his ſouldiers, his opinion was approved, and they were perſwaded; and ſo Mithridates was ſent back again.

Anilæus diſmiſſeth Mithridates.

But no ſooner returned he home unto his houſe, but that his wife hit him in the teeth, that he lived but by the mercy of his enemies notwithſtanding he were the Kings ſonne in law: C that he had made no reckoning to puniſh thoſe, who had ſo much injuried him: that he likewiſe contented himſelfe to have his life ſaved after he had been priſoner to the Jews. For which cauſe (ſaid ſhe) recover thou thy former vertue and honour, which thou haſt heretofore loſt, or I ſweare by the gods of the King my father, that the bond of marriage which is betwixt thee and me, ſhall be diſſolved.

Mithridates, unable to indure theſe uſuall reproaches, and on the other ſide, apprehending his wives haughty courage, from whom he feared to be ſeparated, he aſſembled the greateſt power of men of warre that he could poſſible, notwithſtanding it were againſt his will, and led them forth; ſuppoſing himſelfe to be unworthy of life, if he who was by nation a Parthian, ſhould be cowardly put to the worſt by the Jews. When Anilæus underſtood that Mithri- D dates came forth againſt him with a great force, he thought that it would redound greatly to his indignitie, if he ſhould lye lurking amidſt his marſhes; and hoping that he ſhould have no worſe fortune againſt his enemies, then he had at the firſt, and building much upon his ſouldiers, who were ever wont to get the upper hand in their encounters he likewiſe drew forth his army: to them alſo certain other adjoyned themſelves who ſought nothing elſe but pillage, and hoped that with their onely preſence they might diſmay their enemy.

But after they had had marched about ninty ſtades, and paſſed thorow a countrey that was ſcant of water, and were about the heat of the midday travelled with thirſt: Mithridates army came in ſight, and charged them even at that time; when they fainted for want of drink, and thorow the extremitie of heat, ſo as they could ſcarcely wield their weapons. At that time Anilæus ſouldiers encountring with Mithridates freſh men, were ſhamefully put to E flight: whereby it came to paſſe that a great number of them was murthered, and many thouſand men put to the ſword. But Anilæus himſelfe, and all thoſe of his company, retired themſelves in great haſte into a forreſt, leaving Mithridates Lord and Maſter of the field, whereof he was very joyfull. Notwithſtanding this dyſaſter, an infinite number of lawleſſe men reſorted to Anilæus, who ſet little by their lives, provided there might no limit be propoſed to their unbridled licentiouſneſſe; ſo that he gathered a greater number of men, then thoſe whom he had loſt: yet were they farre different in valour from the former: for they were men wholly ignorant of warlike diſcipline: notwithſtanding, he being accompanied with theſe men, went and ſet upon certain boroughs of the Babylonians, which were wholly deſtroyed by his rapine and violence. For which cauſe, the Babylonians and his other ene- F mies, ſent unto Nearda to the Jews that were there, requiring that Anilæus might be delivered into their hands: whereunto condeſcending not (for although they had a will to performe their requeſt, yet it lay not in their power to deliver him) they required that they might live in peace. And to intreat of the conditions of peace, the Babylonians ſent certain men to conferre with Anilæus. They having ſurveighed the place wherein Anilæus kept, aſſailed both himſelfe and his followers by night, and ſlew all thoſe they encountred with, without reſiſtance, and amongſt the reſt Anilæus. When the Babylonians ſaw that they were delivered from the oppreſſion of Anilæus, who till that time had been as it were a bridle unto them, to reſtrain and curbe the hatred they conceived againſt the Jews, with whom they had had oftentimes been at oddes, by reason of the contrarietie of their religions, whereby it grew that they oftentimes fell at debate upon each opportunitie, wherein they met. G

The yeer of the world.4003. after Christs Nativity.41.

At that time therefore that Anilæus men were discomfited, the Babylonians set upon the Jews on all sides; who seeing themselves in danger by reason of the insolence of the Babylonians, against whom they were too weak to make resistance, and on the other side unable to live amongst them, they went and dwelt at Seleucia, a City famous in regard of Seleucus the sonne of Nicanor, who builded it. In that City dwelt divers Macedons, divers Greeks, and a great number of Syrians. The Jews fled thither, and sojourned there about some five yeers, without any molestation: but in the sixth yeer, when the plague grew rife in Babylon, the Jews that remained there, were enforced to seek them some new habitation; and that remove of theirs into the City of Seleucia was the cause likewise of their further mischiefe, as I will make manifest. The Greeks who dwell in Seleucia, are ordinarily at debate with the Syrians, and have alwaies the upper hand; but after that the Jews came to inhabit in that place, in a certain sedition that arose among them, the Syrians had the upper hand, by the means of the Jews, who joyned their forces with theirs, who of themselves were valiant and good souldiers. H

The Greeks had been repulsed in this tumult, seeing they had but one onely means left them to maintain their former honour, but to break that league of friendship which was between the Syrians and the Iews, devised in private each one with those Syrians, with whom they were acquainted, promising to live in peace and amitie with them, whereunto they condescended willingly. For the chiefest of these two nations concluded the peace, which presently after followed, to the end that on both parts they should joyne in hatred against the Iews. So that altogether charging them at unawares, they slew more then fifty thousand of them: and all of them were slain, except some few, who through the mercy of their friends, and warrantize of their neighbours were suffered to escape. These retired themselves to Ctesiphon a City of Greece, that was not farre from Seleucia, where the King sojourneth every yeer, and keepeth the greatest part of his moveables; hoping in that place through the reverence of the King they might remain in more safety and securitie. All the nation of the Iews that were in these quarters stood in great fear: For the Babylonians and the Seleucians, with all the Assyrians of that countrey, accorded amongst themselves to make a generall warre against the Iews: whereby it came to passe that they assembled themselves at Nearda and Nisibis, trusting themselves to the strength of these fortresses, which were inhabited also by men who were expert in arms. See here what the estate of those Iews was, who remained in Babylon. I K

How Caius was slain by Chæreas.

Caius did not onely expresse and manifest his fury towards those Jews that dwelt in Ierusalem, and in other neighbouring places; but also thorow all the countries both by land and sea, which were subject to the Romane Empire, filling the whole world with an infinite number of mischiefes; yea, such and so hainous, as the like hereof hitherto have never been heard of. But Rome in especiall felt the force of his fury, which partook no lesse calamitie and misery, then any other Citie: but especially the Senatours, Patricians, and noble men were plagued. They also that were called Romane knights, who in wealth and dignitie were next unto the Senators, for that out of their number such men were chosen, who were to supply the Senate, were vexed with intolerable injuries. For with ignominies they were detracted, with baniſhments and confiscations weakned, and by slaughters wholly exterminated. He likewise usurped the name of God, commanding his subjects to dignifie him with more then humane honours; and ascending the Capitol, which amongst all the Temples in Rome is most religiously honoured, he was so bold as to salute Jupiter, and to call him brother. Many such impieties committed he, by which he expressed, that his unbridled and boundlesse madnesse did never forsake him. Amongst his other mad pranks that he played, this is worthy of memory: for on a time, thinking it to be too much trouble for him to crosse the sea between Puteol a Citie in Campania, and Misenum another town seated by the sea-shore, in a galley; and otherwise esteeming it a thing correspondent to his greatnesse, who was Emperour, to exact that superioritie on the sea, which was answerable to his soveraigntie on the land, betwixt one Cape of the sea unto another, for the space of thirty furlongs or stades, betwixt which the gulfe had his course, he caused a bridge to be built, on which he commanded himselfe to be drawn in a charriot, as if that way were answerable to the dignitie of his deity. He left not one Temple in Greece whatsoever, that he spoiled not of those excellent pictures or imagery that was therein; Giving a commission that all statues, and whatsoever ornaments or gifts, and presents that were didicated in any Temple, should be brought unto him; saying that such things as were admirable, should be reserved for a place of admiration, such as was the City of Rome: with these spoiles of the Temples decked he his Palace and Gardens, and generally all his houses and Palaces that he had in Italy He was so impudent also, as to give direction, that Iupiter Olympius statue which the Greeks had in great estimation and Phidias the Athenian carver had made, should be transported to Rome. But Memmius Regulus, to whom he directed this commission, executed it not, because the Masons informed him, that without spoiling it they could not remove it from the place. It is reported also, that he was hindered from this execution by such prodigies as are almost incredible: which he certified Caius of, giving him to understand, what the occasion was that had moved him to disobey him therein: & whilest he was in danger of death for this his delay, the sudden and successefull death of Caius warranted him from the same. Yea, so farre stretched his unbridled fury, that having a daughter newly born, he caused her to be carried into the Capitoll, and laid at the feet of the Image of Iupiter; saying, that that child was common betwixt him and Iupiter, leaving the judgement to all men, which of the two parents was the greatest. And notwithstanding all these his misdemeanours, yet did men tolerate him.

He gave libertie to slaves also to accuse their masters of whatsoever crimes they would: which was so much the more hatefull, because all things were done by Cæsars authoritie, and to his good liking: so that Pollux, who was Claudius bondman, durst accuse him, and Caius the Emperour was contented among the Judges to heare his uncle brought in question for his life, hoping (although it fell out otherwise) to pick out an occasion to put him to death. For having filled all the countries of his Empire with false accusations, and all sorts of mischiefes, and giving slaves a prerogative above their masters; their Lords devised many conspiracies against him, some for spite, and with an intent to revenge them of those injuries they had received: other some pretending by his death to prevent those inconveniences that threatned them. In a word, his death concerned the securitie of the laws, and the safetie of all men: and had he not been speedily cut off, our nation had almost been utterly exterminated. For which cause I thought good to make an exact and ample declaration of every occurrent, namely, for that the knowledge thereof maketh very much towards the manifestation of Gods power and will, which bring consolation unto those who are in adversitie, sitie, and keep them within the bounds of modestie, who suppose that their prosperity should G continue alwaies firme, and although they neglect vertue, think that no evill may befall them. Three plots of conspiracy were intended against him, and purposed to his utter ruine, each of them was attempted by men of great reckoning. For Aemilius Regulus, who was borne in Corduba in Spain, was fully resolved to kill him, himselfe, or to make him away by the means of his confederates. Chæreas Cassius, Colonell over a thousand men, was the chieftain of another band; and Annius Minucianus was in no lesse readinesse to doe his uttermost herein. The cause that moved them to accord thus altogether in hatred against Caius, was, that in respect of Regulus, he was by nature a detester of all iniquitie: for he was a man endowed with great magnanimity, and beautified with a liberall spirit; so as he dissembled not any of his counsels, but communicated them with many, who either were his friends, or va- H liant men fit for execution. And as touching Minucianus, he was induced to seek his revenge, through the desire hee had to doe justice on him in Lepidus behalfe, who had been one of his especiall friends, and one of the rarest men that were ever found among the Romane citizens (whom Caius had put to death through the fear he had conceived of him) knowing well that all they, against whom Caius was incensed, could not escape with lesse indig-nitie then losse of life. As for the third man Chæreas, he could not endure the shame and reproach of cowardise that Caius had objected against him, but feared besides, that his friendship and inward familiaritie with Caius would draw him into manifest dangers: for which cause and his own securitie and honours sake, he thought good to make him away.

Generally, all of them were resolved to rid the world of Caius, and bring an end to his pride I and tyrannicall power, for their hope was that their attempt should have good successe:
which if it happily fell out, their countrey and common-weale should reape the fruits thereof, for whose securitie and safety, it became them to hazard themselves, though it were with losse of their heads. But above all the rest, Chæreas was egged on with a desire he had to grow famous, and through the facilitie and convenient means he had to finish the same, because his Colonels roome gave him most secure accesse unto him. About that time the Circensian games were solemnized, which is a kinde of pastime which the Romanes very willingly behold, and to this intent they resort to the place of these exercises, and the common people is wont to demand somewhat at their Emperours hands, which they desire to obtain; and they, after they have examined their requests, doe never refuse them. Now they required K with instant and importunate supplications, that Caius would discharge them of their taxati-ons, and moderate the excessive tributes which they paid: but he would give no eare unto them, and caused those to be apprehended who called upon the matter most earnestly; sending his Guard, some of them one way, some of them another, to put them to the sword.
After he had given this commandement, and they who received the charge, had fully executed it, a great number of men were slain. The people seeing this, ceased to exclaime any more, setting light by their goods; and seeing before their eyes, that their refusall would be the cause of their death. These considerations incited Chæreas the more to execute his enterprize, to the end he might finish his furious and lawlesse life, whose pleasure was all mens L injury and prejudice. And very oftentimes was he determined to set upon him whilest he banquetted, yet he deferred to doe the same, not for that he failed or fainted in his resolution, but because he expected some fit opportunitie to hit him home, and speed him to the death. He lived Captain of Caius Guard a long time, yet took he small pleasure in conversing with him.

Three conspiracies against Caius. Æmilius Regulus. Cassius Chæreas. Annius Minucianus.

The Circensian games. Caius causeth divers to be murthered, who request mitigation of their exactions

Chæreas for many causes is incited against Caius.

But after that Caius had appointed him to gather in his tributes, and that money which was confiscate, he seemed to have lesse occasion then before: for at that time he had doubled their paiments, in the execution whereof he followed his own nature rather then Cæsars command, and spared those of whom he ought to have compassion for their povertie sake.
Caius was sore displeased herewith, and objected against him, that the cause why he delayed M the bringing in of his money, was his cowardise and negligence: And among other outrages that he offered him, as oft as he gave him the watch-word, as he usually went to fetch it once a day upon his watch day, he gave him the names of women, and other that were full of ignominie, notwithstanding that he himselfe was not exempt from note of no lesse dain-tinesse. For in certain ceremonies which he himself had established, he attired himself like a woman, and was disguised with certain vailes, whereby he might the better counterfeit that sex, and yet notwithstanding durst he object this dishonour to Chæreas. As oftentimes as Chæreas received the watch-word, so oftentimes grew he in choler: which was increased the more at such time, as he delivered the same to his companions, who openly mocked and jeasted at him. For when it was his turn to receive the word from Cæsars mouth, he ordinarily

narily fitted him with such a one as might move laughter, which made him the bolder to conspire with his confederates, in that he had just occasion to be displeased: among these was a Senator, and one that had past all honours and offices, otherwise an Epicure and lover of delights. Him did Timidius accuse (in that he was his enemie) that he had used certain injurious speeches against Caius: and for proofe hereof, he alleadged Quintilia for his witnesse, a woman amongst all stage-players dearly beloved of many, but in especiall, by Popedius, by reason of her incomparable beauty: and for that she refused to bear witnesse in a matter falsely objected against him, whom she intirely loved, Timidius required, that she might be examined by torture. Caius, provoked herewith, commanded Chæreas with all expedition and diligence to see Quintilia tortured: and the rather gave he Chæreas these commissions to kill and torment those whom he pleased, for that he had conceived this opinion, that he would acquit himself with more crueltie, to the end he might exempt himselfe of that reproach of faintheartednesse which was wrongfully inforced against him.

Popedius is accused of a crime by Timidius unto Cæsar.

Whilest thus Quintilia was led forth to be tortured, she trod upon the foot of one of those who were of the confederacie, giving him to understand that he should be of good courage, for that there was no fear that she would bewray any thing in torture, but would endure it with constancy: notwithstanding, Chæreas tormented her cruelly, which he rather performed by constraint then of his own free will. And seeing he could enforce nothing out of her, he brought her back to Caius in so pitiful an estate, that all they that beheld her, had compassion on her. Caius likewise himself was moved, and bethinking him of those pains she had indured, he desisted from the enquest and accusation which was prosecuted against Popedius and Quintilia, and gave her a certain sum of money, to comfort her against the indisposition that might happen by reason of her torments, which she had so couragiously endured.

Caius commandeth Quintilia to be tortured who confesseth nothing.

Popedius is absolved.

This displeased Chæreas very much, as if he had been the cause of all those evils that had hapned to those two persons, having been so great, that to heale them, it behoved Cæsar to minister a medicine. He consulted therefore with Clement, who was Captain of the footmen, and Papinius, who had the command of the guard, and spake unto them to this effect: We "have (said he) O Clement, imployed our selves to the uttermost for the Emperours safety: "for by our providence & travell we have wrought so much, that of all those, who have con-"spired against him, some of them have been slain: the rest in such sort tormented and mar-"tyred, that Caius himselfe had compassion on them. But what reward or honour recive we "for oll these services? Clement, hearing these words, held his peace, giving manifest testimony by his looks, and the change of his colour, that he was greatly ashamed he had so long time obeyed the Emperours commandements: and whilest he thought with himselfe that it was no policy for him to open his mouth against Caius crueltie, Chæreas emboldned himselfe to discover the calamities and dangers wherein both the City and the whole Empire were plunged, telling him that the common report was, that Caius was the cause of them:

Chæreas conferreth with Clement and Papinius.

But (said he) those that will narrowly examine the truth, will judge that I, and Papinius that standeth by me, and you, Clement, more then we, have caused the Romanes torment, and the worlds misery, for that of our own will we have been ministers of Caius commands; and although the means lieth in us to make an end of those violences that are committed against the citizens, and injuries to the whole world: yet we serve him for his guard and hangmen, instead of men of warre. And we bear arms, not to maintain our liberty, and the Romane Empire, but to preserve him, who keeps their bodies and mindes in servitude: and every day are we soyled in their bloud who are slain and tortured, until such time as some one serve us with the same sauce, to satisfie Caius crueltie. For it is not for the good will he beareth us, that he maketh use of us: but that which is more, we are suspected by him, and he will cause us to be slain, as he hath done others. For his displeasure is not limited by justice, but by his will: we also shall serve him for a mark to aime at. For which cause, it behoveth us to provide for thë securitie and lilertie of all men, and especially to warrant our selves against those dangers that threaten us.

Clement declared by apparent signes, that he thought well of Chæreas resolution, but he counselled him to make no words of it, for fear the rumour thereof should be spred among the people, and the secret should be discovered before the execution: and lest that Caius getting an inkling thereof, they should all of them be drawn into danger of death; and in the mean while, it behoved them to hope that some good fortune would fall out to their furtherance: and that for himselfe, his age had taken from him the necessary courage that belonged to such enterprizes. It may be (said he) that I may furnish you with some advice more secure then yours is, Chæreas: for a more honester then it is, who is he that can propose? This said, Clement returned to his house, ruminating with himselfe upon those words which he

he had both heard and ſpoken. But Chæreas waxt fearfull, and conferred with the Colonell, G
The year of the world, 4004. after Chriſts nativity, 42. Cornelius Sabinus, whom he knew to be a man of reputation, a lover of liberty, and greatly diſcontented with the eſtate about the miſeries of the common-weale; and ſeeing it was neceſſary to attempt that with all expedition which he had intended, he thought good to impart the matter to him; fearing leſt Clement ſhould diſcover all the conſpiracie, conſidering that delay and procraſtination would be but an occaſion to hinder the action. When as therefore he perceived him to give willing eare to all that which he intended, and that already he was confirmed with no leſſe reſolution then himſelf was; but in that he knew not with whom he might familiarly communicate the ſame, he ſaid nothing: whereas otherwiſe he was readie, not onely to conceale that which he had heard, but alſo declared that which he had in his heart, he was ſo much the more encouraged. For which cauſe, without further delay they went to H
Cornelius Sabinus. Minucianus, who was conformable unto them in vertue, good affection, and great courage; and who beſides that, was ſuſpected by Caius by reaſon of Lepidus death. For Minucianus and Lepidus were very great friends, and had been aſſociates in the ſame dangers. For Caius was feared by all thoſe who had any publike office, ſparing none of them in particular or in generall, but made them all groane under the burthen of this fury.

Annius Minucianus.

Now they knew well one another, that all of them were diſpleaſed to ſee the common-weale in that eſtate: but the apprehenſion of the danger ſuffered them not to manifeſt the hatred that each one of them bare to Caius, although their ſecret conceit ingendred among them a certain amity. For before that time, as often as they met together, they were accuſtomed to eſteeme Minucianus for the moſt honourable man of the company; as in truth, a- I mong all the citizens of Rome he was the moſt famous, valiant and beſt eſteemed among them: being therefore aſſembled at that time, he was firſt of all requeſted to ſpeak his opinion. For which cauſe he asked Chæreas what the watch-word was he had received that day (for all the city knew very wel what mockery Caius uſually uſed in giving Chæreas the watchword:) Chæreas, notwithſtanding this diſgrace, failed not to anſwer him, relying on the wiſedome of Minucianus, and ſaid unto him;

But give you me for the watch-word, Liberty; mean while I give you thanks for that you have awakened me more ſpeedily then of my ſelf I have accuſtomed to be. You need not now any further inforce your ſelfe to incite me by your words, ſith both you and I have undertaken the ſame reſolution. Before we were aſſembled in this place, our thoughts were united. Behold here my ſword, that is girt unto my ſide; this ſhall ſuffice for us both. And if you pleaſe, you ſhall be my captain, and I will march K under your command, and will follow you under aſſurance of your aſſiſtance and wiſedom. They, who have valiant hearts, never want arms: for it is a confident courage that makes the weapon walk. That which enkindleth me thus to this action, is not the conſideration of my particular intereſt: for I have not the leiſure to think on thoſe dangers that threaten me, through the grief that I conceive, to ſee the libertie of my countrey changed into ſervitude, and the force of the laws wholly aboliſhed, and all ſorts of men aſsigned to death by the crueltie of Caius. It is I that deſerve to be truſted in this execution, and I make you my Judge, ſith you have the like intention as I have.

Chæreas, with certain others intend to kill Caius. and after he had praiſed him, he exhorted him to continue his conſtancy: then departed they one from the other, with prayers and wiſhes; and at that time there hapned a preſage that confirmed them the more. For as Chæreas entred into the Senate, ſome one among the people caſt out a word, that redoubled his courage. Diſpatch (ſaid he) that which thou haſt to doe: for God will aſſiſt thee. Chæreas was ſome-what affraid, leſt ſome one of his aſſociates had betraied him. But at laſt, he thought it was ſome one of thoſe, who, being privie to his reſolution, gave him a watch-word to animate him the more; or that it was God, who, governing and obſerving of humane affairs, puſhed him forward. After he had imparted this his deliberation to divers; ſundry Senatours, knights, and men of warre being advertiſed hereof, were in arms. For there was not any one that ſuppoſed not that Caius death was the greateſt good hap the common-wealth could expect. For which cauſe, all of them enforced M themſelves as much as they could, to aſſiſt the execution with couragious and vertuous reſolution: and as forward were they in affection as in power; in words as in effect, deſiring each of them to be partakers in the diſpatch of a Tyrant. For Caliſthus alſo, who was Caius free-

A contrary to all right and reason. Besides, for that he knew the unbridled nature of Caius, who having once conceived an ill opinion of any man, could never afterwards be disswaded or reconciled. Amongst divers other dangers that he had to apprehend, the greatnesse of the danger of his riches was not the least, which was the cause that made him serve Claudius, and secretly to follow him under hope, that after Caius death, he should be his successour in the Empire, and that at that time he should by him be maintained in the same estate, which he enjoyed: and by this means thought he to obtain his amity and good liking, by giving him to understand how Caius had commanded him to poison him, and how he had invented infinite delayes to defer this execution. As for mine own part, I think that Calisthus forged this matter. For if Caius had pretended to kill Claudius, he had not been disswaded by Ca-
B listhus allegations, who had incontinently received his reward, if he had deferred to execute his Masters command, with all expedition in a matter so acceptable to him. So it is, that the providence of God would not permit Caius to execute that rage against Claudius; and Calisthus was thereby thanked for a benefit which he no waies deserved.

Those that were about Chæreas day by day, followed the action very slowly, notwithstanding that he willingly delayed not, but thought all occasions fit to finish his purpose in, for that he might assail him at such time as he ascended up into the Capitol, or even then when he solemnized those ceremonies, which he had instituted in honour of his daughter, or at such time as he stood in the palace to scatter gold, and silver money among the people, by casting him from the top of the palace into the market place, or at such time as he celebra-
C ted those mysteries, that were introduced by him. For no man suspected Chæreas, so discreetly had he behaved himself in all things: and he perswaded himself that no man would have thought that he should lay violent hands on Caius. And although he had done nothing to any effect; yet so it is, that the power of the gods was sufficient to give him force, and to kill him without drawing weapon. Chæreas was sore displeased against his companions, in respect that he feared that they would let slip their occasions; and although they perfectly knew that he travelled for the maintenance of the lawes, and for the good of them all: yet did they request him to delay a little, for fear lest in the execution he should in some sort miscarry, and for that cause the City might be brought in trouble, by the informations that D would be made of that act; and that finally when Caius should be so much the better defenced against them, they should not know how to shew their vertue, when the time required that they should assault and set upon him. They therefore thought it good that the opportunity to set forward this businesse, should be the time in which the games of the Palace were clebrated, which were solemnized in honour of Cæsar, who first of all disanulled the peoples authority, and appropriated it to himself. This solemnity is celebrated in a Tent before the Palace, where the noble citizens with their wives and children remained to behold the sport, and Cæsar himself likewise. At that time concluded they that it would be an easie matter for them, when as so many thousands of people should be shut up in so narrow a place; so that he, who would step formost to give the stroke, might very easily be succoured, for that he could have no force in armes, although his guard should have, the courage and E desire to defend him. Chæreas resolved upon this, and it was concluded that the first day of those sports that were next at hand, the deed should be done: but their adventure was greater then their conclusion. For the delay was such, as the third day was almost past, and hardly could they be drawn to attempt the matter on the third day. At which time Chæreas assembled all the confederates, and told them that the opportunity of time had overslipt them, accused and reproached them of slackneſse in that execution, which had been so vertuously resolved amongst them: and that it was to be feared, lest if any should be discovered, the whole matter should wax frustrate: by which means Caius might grow more cruel then he was before. See we not (said he) that by how much liberty we take from our selves, by so much
F we augment Caius tyranny? whereas we ought first of all to obtain security for our selves, and afterwards purchase perpetual felicity to others, the greatest glory wherof shall redound unto our selves. Now they having nothing to reply against so honourable a resolution, and yet notwithstanding no waies enforcing themselves towards the action, but remaining altogether dismayed without one word speaking, Chæreas spake thus:

Chæreas expecteth the occasion to assail Caius.

The finall conclusion of the confederates touching Caius death.

Most noble and generous gentlemen, what is the cause that we linger and delay in this sort? See you not that this day is the last day of the games, and that Caius is ready to depart to sea? For he hath determined to sail into Alexandria, and to see Egypt: verily it will be a small honour for us, if we suffer him to escape our hands, to the end that both by land and sea, he may triumph over the Romans vain boast and negligence. How can we chuse but condemn our selves justly, and challenge nothing but dishonour, if some Egyptian supposing G that men of free condition could not any longer endure his insolence, should put the matter in execution? For mine own part, I will dream no longer upon your consultations, but this very day will I hazard my self; and betide me what can, I will sustain all fortunes with pleasure and courage. For I am a man of that mind, that no danger can be so great or grievous to daunt me, as that Caius should be slain, during my life-time, and I should be deprived of so deserved an honour, which so worthy attempt may challenge. This said he departed with an intent to attempt and end the matter, and encouraged the rest to do the like; so that all of them were desirous to set hand to the enterprize, without any further delay. The custome was, that the captains of the guard entred the Palace with their swords by their sides, and in such equipage they asked the Emperour the watch-word. At that time it fortuned that it was H Chæreas turn to fetch the watch-word, when as a great number of people flocked to the Palace, to take up their places to behold the games with great prease and noise; wherein Caius was greatly delighted: for there was no distinction of place either for Senators or Knights, but each one sate together confusedly, men and women, slaves and freemen. Caius, arriving those sports were solemnized. It came to passe that whilest those beasts were emboweld, that were appointed for sacrifice, Asprenas gown, who at that time was Senator, was besprinkled with bloud: whereat Caius began to laugh; yet notwithstanding, this was a pre-sage for Asprenas. For he was slain that very day that Caius was. It is reported that Caius at that time, contrary to his own nature, behaved himself most affably toward all men, so I that all the assistance were astonished to behold the courtesie that he used. After the sacriof his friends and familiars. Now was there every yeer a Theater builded, according to this form and fashion that ensueth: It had two gates, the one towards the open yard; the other opening upon the porch, by which the actors had their egresse and regresse, without disturbance of those who sate to behold the pastime. There was within the same a certain severall roome, separated from the rest, where the Players and Musicians kept. When the Batibius. people were seated, and Chæreas, with the captains were neer about Cæsar, who sate on the Clavitus. right side of the Theater: Batibius one of the Senators, a man very expert in feats of Arms, asked Cluvitus privily in his eare, who sate by him and had in like sort been Consul, whe- K ther he heard any news? who answering him, that he had heard nothing. On this day (said Batibius) shall the Tragedy be plaid of a Tyrants death. Cluvitus made him this reply in Homors words.

Whist: lest some Greek should listen to our talk.

Now whilest some one darted certain apples and rare and precious birds at the people, Caius took great pleasure to behold how they strove one with another round about him, buffetting one another to see who should get the same: but at that present there chanced two presages: for the sport that was represented, was of a Judge, who was apprehended and crucified, and in the dance they represented Cynera, who was slain with Myrrha her daughter: L and there was a great quantity of blood gathered to counterfeit both the murther of the Judge that was crucified, as also of Cynera. It is affirmed likewise that the day was the very same, whereon Philip the sonne of Amyntas King of Macedon, had been slain by Pausanias one of his familiars, at such time as he entred the Theater. Whilest Caius was incertain with himself whether he should remain untill the sports were finished, for that it was the last day of them, or rather should resort to the bath, and after he had taken his refection, return back again thither, as he had done beforetime, Minucianus sitting next unto him, fearing lest the occasion should be overslipt, arose for that he had seen Chæreas depart out of doors, with an intent to go and encourage him. But Caius catcht him by the gown, saying, Whither go you my friend? At which time for the reverence sake that he bare unto Cæsar, he M sate him down again: but the fear that he had, grew so forcible, that he arose again; so that Caius could not detain him, supposing that he had departed thence to dispatch some important businesse. At that time did Asprenas counsel Cæsar to repair to the bath, telling him that after his refection he might return thither again; all which he did, being desirous that the resolution might take effect. They that were with Chæreas were ready disposed to take advantage of the time, and were agreed each of them to stand prepared and in a readinesse, in a place appointed, to the intent to act the tragedy: and the delay was very grievous unto them, for that it was already three a clock after noon. So that Chæreas seeing that Caius lingred so long, intended to go in unto him and assail him in his seat: but he conceived

that

A that he could not bring that to paſſe without great loſſe and murther of the Senators, and Knights that were there preſent. Now although he had this apprehenſion, yet addreſſed he himſelf to the execution thereof, ſuppoſing that the loſſe that might happen by the death of ſome one, would be well recompenced by the ſecurity and liberty, that would redound unto all men. When as therefore they were in a readineſſe to enter the Theater, news was brought them that Caius was riſen to come forth; by means whereof there aroſe ſome noiſe. For which cauſe the confederates turned back into the Theater, and appeaſed the people, telling them that they diſpleaſed and annoyed the Emperour: but the effect was, to draw him aſide from all thoſe, who might yeeld him any aſſiſtance; and ſo to ſet upon him. Before Caius marched Claudius his uncle, and M. Minucianus his ſiſters husband and Valerius, who at that time was Proconſul, who might not any wayes be drawn from their place, although they had the will, by reaſon of the place and dignity which they held. Caius followed after them, accompanied with Paulus Aruntius. Now when he was entered into the Palace, he left the ready way where his officers were, and Claudius with his aſſociates held: he turned aſide by an unfrequented way to the baths, upon purpoſe to ſee certain young boyes, who were come out of Aſia, and were ſent him out of that countrey, partly to ſing in thoſe ceremonies that were inſtituted by him, and partly to dance in arms about the Theater; and in that place Chæreas came and encountred him, asking him the watch-word: which Caius gave him very reproachfully according to his cuſtome. For which cauſe without any further delay, Chæreas aſſayling him both in word and act, drew his ſword and gave him a great wound, which notwithſtanding was not mortal: ſome ſay that Chæreas purpoſely wounded him after that ſort, becauſe he would not kill him at once, but to his further torment increaſe the number of his wounds: but I cannot believe the ſame, for that in ſuch executions a man hath no leaſure to determine how to ſtrike And if Chæreas had ſuch an intention, I account him the verieſt fool that might be, for that he rather took his pleaſure to content his deſpite, then readily to deliver both himſelf and others, who by his delay in being of his confederacy might be drawn into hazard. For if Caius had not been ſuddenly ſlain, he could not have wanted means of reſcous, and it ſhould ſeem that Chæreas had not pretended to do ſo much miſchief to Caius, as to himſelf and his fellow confederates. And being in this uncertainty, whether his enterprize ſhould have fallen out happily or no, he had without reaſon both undone himſelf and loſt the occaſion: whereas having happily hit home, he might without a word ſpeaking, warrantize himſelf againſt thoſe, who would offend him. But let each man think what beſt pleaſeth him. Caius feeling the grief of the wound (for he was ſtrucken betwixt the ſhoulder and the neck, and his ſword could not pierce further, by reaſon that it hit upon the firſt bone of the breſt) he cryed not in any ſort, neither called for any of his friends, whether it were that he diſtruſted them all, or that he had ſome other thought, and in lamenting himſelf he paſſed onward. But he was met by Cornelius Sabinus who was already prepared to encounter him, who thruſt him down upon his knees: whereupon all of them environed him round about, and with mutual exhortations encouraged one another to do their uttermoſt in muthering him. At length in all mens opinion they agreed on this, that it was Aquila that gave him the deadly wound, that ſevered his ſoul from his body. But this act ought to be attributed to Chæreas. For although divers ſet to their hands in the action; yet was he the firſt, who had bethought him of the action, having long time before any of them premeditated the ſame, after what ſort it ſhould be attempted: and he alſo was the firſt that durſt boldly impart it unto others, and who after they had allowed of his reſolution aſſembled them: and when as every one was to ſpeak his opinion, he concluded the ſame very diſcreetly, and had alwayes done far more then the reſt; ſo that by his earneſt and honourable perſwaſions, he encouraged thoſe that were faint-hearted, ſince at ſuch time as the opportunity preſented it ſelf, to ſet hand to the execution, he was the firſt that attempted it, and who valiantly ſtrook and made an eaſie way to the reſt, who found Caius calm enough, in that he was a man almoſt thorowly ſlain. For which cauſe, it is neceſſary, that all that which others have done, ſhould be aſcribed to Chæreas advice, vertue and diligence.

Caius ſlain.

Aquila gave Caius his deaths wound: but Chæreas was the author and chief acter of the tragedy.

Thus died Caius, being ſlaughtered with many mortal wounds: now when Chæreas and his companions had diſpatched him, they perceived well that it would be impoſſible for them to ſave themſelves, if ſo be they ſhould return by the way that they came; ſo much were they raviſhed with that which they had done. For they drew themſelves into no ſmall danger by murthering an Emperour, who was cheriſhed and beloved through the folly of the common people, and whoſe death the men of war would not leave unpuniſhed. Now in that the wayes were narrow where the murther was done, and they themſelves alſo were hindred by that day in guarding the Emperour; they took another way and retired themselves into Germanicus lodging, who was Caius father, whom they had lately slaughtered. This house adjoyned upon the palace. For although the palace was but one, yet consisted it of divers lodgings which were builded by several Emperours; whose names, whether they had begun or finished the works, were imposed on the same buildings. When as therefore they were escaped from the preasse, they were in safety as long as the inconvenience that had befallen the Emperour was as yet hidden. The first report of his death came to the Germanes who were of his guard, being a company chosen out of that nation named the Celtique band, for the preservation of the Emperours person. These men are very prone unto wrath, and H amongst all other Barbarians, it is a rare thing in them to examine the causes of their execution: otherwise they are men strong in body, and who in the wars alwayes give the first onset, yeelding great advantage to those on whose side they fight. They having notice of Caius murther, were vehemently aggrieved thereat, for that it is their manner to censure all things not according to right, but as they are answerable to their own profits: Caius in especiall was dearly beloved by them, in that he had obtained their favour by bestowing much money upon them. Their Captain was one called Sabinus, who was not advanced to that estate, either for his vertue or the nobility of his ancestors (for he was but a Fencer) but for his I mighty strength and huge body. They therefore ran about with their naked swords searching for Cæsars murtherers from house to house; and meeting with Asprenas at first, whose gown (as we have said) was bebloodied with the blood of the slaughtered sacrifice, which was a presage that boaded him but little good fortune, they hewed him in peeces. The second was Norbanus (who for his nobility and ancestors might derive his titles from the noblest citizens, amongst whom were divers Generals of Armies) who seeing they made no reckoning of his dignity, and being of himself endowed with great force and strength, he took a sword from one of them which first assailed him; with whom he grapled, and made them know that he intended they should buy his blood very dearly; and indeed so had he done, but that being invironed by divers, who assailed him at once, he was beaten down and slaughtered with many deadly wounds. The third was Anteius, one of the number of the Senators, who with some others met not with these men by chance, as the two K other had done; but to shew the hatred that he bare unto Caius, and the pleasure that he took to see him lie dead, was come out of his house, being egged on with envy to feed his eyes with that spectacle. For Caius had banished Anteius father, whose name likewise was Anteius, and not content therewith, he had sent his souldiers to kill him. He therefore with great pleasure beheld the slaughtered carcase of this tyrant; but hearing the uproare that was raised in every part of the house, he thought good to hide himself; yet might he not avoid the narrow search of the Germanes, who were so displeased, that they slew all those whom they met with, whether they were guilty or guiltlesse of the fact: Thus were these three made away. L

What sort of people they were that lamented Caius death.
But after the rumour of Caius death was heard in the Theater, every one was amazed, and could scarcely believe it. For although divers of them were very glad that he was taken out of the world, perswading themselves that it would highly profit them; yet did their fear hinder their belief. On the other side, there were some, who desiring not that any such mishap should befal Cæsar, and conceiving in their thoughts, that it was impossible to be done, for that there was no man so hardy, as to enterprize the same; they supposed the report to be utterly untrue. Of this minde were certain women and children, slaves and souldiers. These by reason they received wages at his hand, and tyrannized with him, being his ministers in all M those outrages that he offered to many good Citizens, in partaking the booty and other advantages that Caius drew unto him. As for the women and children, they were of that opinion, by reason that such kind of people take delight in playes, jests, donations of flesh, and other such pastimes, which Caius in word pretended to do to gratifie the common people, but in effect it was to have means to satisfie his rage and cruelty. He was also gracious among the servants and slaves, for that by him they had the liberty to accuse and contemn their Masters, and were therein countenanced by Caius. For when they falsely accused their Masters, they were easily believed; and when they discovered their Masters treasures, in recompence of their discovery they were not onely made free by him, but also sent home with rich and ample rewards. For the reward that was assigned them, was the eight part of those goods that were confiscated. As for certain of the nobility, although the matter seemed true to some of them, for that before time they were privy to that which the rest intended, and notwithstanding they desired that the enterprize should be effected;

A yet kept they all things close, and gave no sight of joy, nor made any shew that they heard that which was reported. For some of them feared lest if they should be frustrated of their hope, they should bring themselves in danger of punishment, for that they had discovered their intent sooner then they should have done. They likewise who knew the enterprize and were confederates with the actors; yet did they more closely conceal it the one from the other, fearing lest if they should discover the matter to any one of those, who drew any commodity from Caius tyranny, they might bewray them: whereby if Caius should be yet alive, they might incurre the danger of punishment. For the voice was, that he had been wounded in certain places; yet that he was not slain; but as yet alive, and among his Physicians hands, who dressed his wounds. No man therefore durst liberally discover the secrets of his heart to his neighbour. for they that spred those reports, were either friends (and for that cause were suspected as favourers of his tyranny) or enemies, and by that means in that they were but finisterly affected towards Caius, there was no certainty to be gathered of that which they said. There arose also another report, which abashed and beat down the hearts and hopes of the nobility, namely, that Caius setting light by the danger wherein he was, & as little also by the wounds he had received, was come into the market place all bloody as he was, and after that manner declaimed before the people. See here how they that spred these rumors, preferred their conjectures, which were void of all reason; which distracted those uncertainly that heard the same, according as they were affectioned. This notwithstanding, no C man removed from his place, for fear lest they should be suddenly accused, knowing well that they should be censured, not according to their thoughts and affections, but according to the disposition of their Judges and accusers.

But after that the troup of Germanes had invironed the Theater with their naked swords, all the assistance expected nothing but death; and as soon as any man entred, they were seazed with such an amazement, as if they had already felt the strokes; so that they knew not what to do, having no heart to depart from thence: and otherwise perswading themselves, that if they stayed there any longer, it would breed them further danger. Finally, when the souldiers were entred into the Theater by force, all the whole assembly cried out, and besonght them, protesting that whatsoever was done, it was besides their knowledge, whether D it were either attempted by conspiracy, or any other means. They therefore most humbly intreated them, that they would spare them, and not inflict the penalty of the guilty on those that were innocent for their own parts, they besought them to search out those, who had committed the act, if any such thing were committed. And thus spake they with tears, beating their brests, and calling the gods to witnesse, alleadging all that which the present danger suggested them with, and as much as such as pleaded for their lives could proffer. By these perswasions of theirs the souldiers fury was abated; so that they began to repent themselves of that which they had executed in the Theater: for this also was a cruelty, as they themselves (notwithstanding their barbarous incivility) supposed it to be, which was, that the heads of Asprenus and other that were slain, were carried and set upon an Altar. Whereat E all the assistants were most grievously discontented, remembring themselves of the dignity of the men, and having compassion of that which had befallen them, considering also that they themselves were not farre off from dangers, being uncertain whether they should save themselves: whereby it came to passe, that some of those, who had for good cause hated Caius, durst not freely rejoyce at his death, because they were upon the point to lose their own lives, having as yet no appearance of any safety.

The Germane souldiers resort to the Theater

At length Auruntius, a man who was gracious among the people, and was one of the common criers, who had a strong voice, and by crying such goods as were to be sold, had gathered so great substance, as that he was accounted one of the richest men in Rome, and in great estimation amongst all men in that behalf, entred the Theater in a mourning habit, and F after a lamentable manner: and although he inwardly hated Caius, yet for the fear he conceived lest he should lose his goods, and in consideration of the present danger, he dissembled his joy, wearing all those garments of mourning, and using no lesse lamentation then if he had bemoaned the death of his dearest friend. After this manner came he into the Theater, publishing Caius death, to the intent that the people might not be ignorant of that which had hapned: after this, he began to represse the rage of the Germans, and commanded their Captaines and Tribunes to put up their swords, certifying them of the Emperours death, which act of his did manifestly save the lives of all those, who were assembled in the Theater; and all them likewise, whom they could have met with. For if they had had but the least surmise, that Caius had as yet been alive, there was not any sort of cruelty which they had not committed. For they bare him so great love and affection, that to warrantize him from that miſ-hap, they would have redeemed him with the loſſe of their own lives. But as G

Beſides, the fear they had leſt that in purſuit of their tyrannous murthers, the Senate ſhould be incenſed againſt them, if ſo be the government of the eſtate ſhould be returned into their hands, made them contain themſelves. Thus was the fury of theſe Germans appeaſed for the death of Caius.

Chæreas, Minucianus, and Clement conſult about Cæſars death.

Mean-while Chæreas (who feared very much leſt Minucianus ſhould fall into the Germans hands, and in their fury be ſlaughtered by them) ſought for him among the ſouldiers, enquiring of every one whether they knew if he were ſlain or no. Whereupon Minucianus and Clement were brought unto him, who in his preſence commended Chæreas exploit, and gave H him thanks in the name of the whole Senate, who witneſſed that it was to the general benefit and good of the common-weal, and that the greateſt perſons were beholding to him, for that he had neither wanted good advice in his deliberation, nor courage to execute his reſolution; alleadging that the nature of tyranny was ſuch, that being puffed up with a ſhort pleaſure of unjuſt and intollerable rule, it finally (as being hated by all good men) determined and ended in miſery, as it manifeſtly appeared in that which had befallen Caius; who before any thing was either deviſed, practiſed or executed againſt him, was already hatefull to all men, and had in ſuch ſort violated all laws; that his greateſt friends were reſolved to take arms againſt him, who in appearance had deprived him of life, when both in truth and I in effect it was he himſelf, who was the authour of his own ruine.

Hereupon all they aroſe who were in the Theater, and raiſed great noiſe and trouble in ſeeking to ſave themſelves. The occaſion was, that a certain Phyſician called Arcion, being called out to go and dreſſe certain men that were wounded, making a ſhew as if he went to go and prepare ſuch things, as were neceſſary for thoſe that were wounded, made thoſe iſſue out with him who ſate neareſt unto him: but the truth was, that he did it to the end to draw them out of the preſent danger. Mean-while the Senate aſſembled themſelves in the Palace, and the people flocked together to make enquiry after thoſe, who had murthered Caius: the people with an intire and ſimple intent, the Senate onely to uſe ſome formall proceeding. For Valerius Aſiaticus, who had otherwhiles been Conſul, came forth among the people, who were in an uproare, and ſuppoſing it a ſtrange matter that no man knew who K had ſlain the Emperour, whileſt every one enquired who it was that had done the deed: O ſaid he, would it had been I that had done it. But the Conſuls publiſhed an edict, containing the accuſations that were preſented againſt Caius, commanding the people and ſouldiers, who were as yet in the Theater, to retire themſelves to their lodgings. And the people were put in great hope, that they ſhould be eaſed of thoſe taxations, wherewith beforetime they had been burthened: and the men of warre were promiſed honours and dignities, if they would contain themſelves in their accuſtomed order, and ſtirre up no further trouble. For it was to be feared, leſt if they had been further fleſhed in ſlaughters, the City ſhould have fallen into ſome great danger through rapines and ſpoiles both of houſes and temples. But by this time all the whole order of the Senate were aſſembled, eſpecially thoſe who were L confederates in Caius murther; who ſeemed to gather courage, and to ſpeak boldly, as if the government of the eſtate had been fallen into their hands.

Claudius took upon him the government of the Empire.

The ſouldiers elect Claudius Emperour.

WHileſt the eſtate of the Empire was thus diſtracted, Claudius was ſuddenly fetcht out of his houſe: for the ſouldiers aſſembling themſelves together, and conferring among themſelves what was requiſite to be done, perceived that it was im- M poſſible, that ſo many and ſo waighty affairs of the common-weale ſhould be well diſpoſed by a popular Government; and that this change alſo would yeeld them little profit, if ſome of thoſe who were in authority ſhould happen to obtain the ſoveraign government. Furthermore, that it would be every way prejudiciall unto them, if they had not a part of the governance, and a hand in the adminiſtration of the common-weal. Whileſt therefore the ſoveraign authority remained as yet undiſpoſed, they thought meet to elect Claudius, who was Caius uncle, for their Emperour; who was a man of that reputation, that none of thoſe, who had been aſſembled in the Senate, was more capable then he was, both in regard of the vertue of his anceſtors, as alſo in reſpect of the doctrine wherewith he was endowed

A dowed. Who likewiſe being by them exalted to the dignity of the Empire, would honour them, and withall anſwerable bounty acknowledge their good deſerts. This concluſion of theirs was both admitted, and preſently executed: ſo that Claudius was received and elected Emperour by the men of war. But Cnaius Sentius Saturninus having intelligence that Claudius was in this ſort elected (who in appearance ſeemed vertuouſly to contradict, but in effect deſired nothing more) preſented himſelf before the Senate: and being neither amated nor amazed in any ſort, he freely ſpake his minde; and as it became his birth and nobility, he ſpake unto the aſſembly after the manner that enſueth: The yeer of the world, 4005. after Chriſts Nativity, 43.

" You Lords of Rome, although it be an incredible matter, that the liberty which hath ſo Cnaius Sentius Saturnius declaimeth in the Senate.
" long time been unexpected, ſhould return and viſit us; yet ſo it is, that we ſee the excellency
B "therof; although it be uncertain how long time the Gods will beſtow it on us: which is ſuch
" that it may rejoyce us for the preſent; what iſſue ſoever it may have hereafter. For to them Liberty a precious thing.
" that know what vertue is, it is no ſmall felicity to live one hour in freedome of mind, and " in a free countrey governed by ſuch laws, which in times paſt have made our Common" weal to flouriſh. For mine own part, I cannot remember our ancient liberty, for that I was " born after the ſubverſion thereof: But I infinitely deſire to have the happy fruition of that " which we enjoy at this preſent. And I think them alſo very happy, who are born & brought " up in vertuous ſtudies. I likewiſe ſuppoſe that a ſecond honour next to the immortal Gods " is to be aſcribed to them, by whoſe vertue at laſt though very late even in this our age, we " have obtained the felicity to enjoy the ſame; which happineſſe would God with our inhe-C "ritances we might bequeath to our poſterity. For in regard of our ſelves, this day ſufficeth us
" both, as well all thoſe that are young as they alſo who are old. For the aged ſhall forſake
" this life with more pleaſure, in that they have had the knowledge of that bleſſing which is " annexed to their liberty: and the younger ſhall be furniſhed with a royal example in admi-
" ring and knowing their vertues, by whom we enjoy this benefit of freedom. For in regard
" of the preſent time, there is not any thing that we ought more earneſtly to affect, then to " live vertuouſly. For onely vertue is the thing that confirmeth men in their liberty. I cannot
" ſpeak of the time paſt, but onely by hear-ſay: but for that I have ſeen with mines eies, and
" percieved by my obſervation, I know how great miſchiefs tyrannies do ordinarily breed
" in a politike eſtate: for they utterly extinguiſh all vertue, and deprive freemen of all that D " perfect magnanimity that may be in them, and teach both to flatter and to fear, for that
" the common-weal is abandoned not to the wiſedom of the laws, but to the fury of intem" perate governours. For ſince Julius Cæſar bent his thoughts to overthrow the popular " government in Rome, and violated that happy courſe of law, whereby our ſtate was po- Liberty purchaſeth by vertue.

" king, and himſelf to his particular deſires, there is not any kind of miſery and miſchief, " that hath not overthrown our city; ſo that his ſucceſſours have imployed themſelves to
" the utermoſt, and with a certain emulation, to aboliſh the laws of our countrey, ſtriving
" which of them might deſpoil our common-weal of her nobleſt citizens: for that they Julius Cæſar.
" have made their account, that their ſecurity conſiſted in communicating their ſecrets with " ſuch as were baſe and abject; abaſing not onely the haughty courages of thoſe men, who E "were famous for their nobility and vertue, but alſo by ſlaughtering a great number of them
" by all ſorts of puniſhment: and whileſt each of them laboured to be abſolute in their com" mand, they enforced themſelves to oppreſſe the common-weal.
"But amongſt all the reſt, Caius, who this day hath loſt the benefit of life, hath wrought grea" ter miſchiefs himſelf alone, then any other, by enforcing his brutiſh and beaſtly wrath not " onely againſt the common citizens, but alſo againſt his own parents and friends; demea-
" ning himſelf alike towards all men, and manifeſting his unjuſtice in that he purſued them " with moſt injurie, who were moſt innocent: and by this means grew hateful not onely to " men, but alſo to the immortal Gods. For it is not enough for tyrants to ſatisfie their con-F " cupiſcence, to uſe all ſorts of outrages, to raviſh both mens wealth & their wives; but alſo
" their gain and glory is, when they may utterly ruinate both their fortunes & families, who " are their enemies. For all liberty is oppoſed againſt tyranny, and it is impoſſible (notwith-
" ſtanding all the miſeries that it may be imagined or offered) that freemen ſhould accord " with tyrants, how little time ſoever it be that they have exerciſed their tyrany. They alſo " know too wel with how many miſchiefs they have intangled their ſubjects (although they " have not the ſpirits to revenge themſelves of thoſe wrongs that are done unto them) & be" ing well aſſured into what incombrances they have drawn them, perſwade themſelves,
" that they have but one only means left them to warrantize themſelves from ſuſpitions; &
" to procure their own ſecuritie, which is, to put them to death, if they may poſſibly do it.

Sith

"Sith therefore at this preſent you are delivered from ſo many miſchiefs, and are no more G
"ſubject, except to one another (which is a pledge of concord for the preſent, and of ſecuri-
"ty in time to come, and glory unto him that hath redreſſed the eſtate) you ſhall deal very "well & wiſely in my opinion to provide for the common-weal, foreſeeing very diligently "all that which concerneth the good and profit thereof. It is free for any man to ſpeak his "opinion of that which diſpleaſeth him, for that there is no ſuperiour to countermand their "ſayings, or that is exempt from reproof if he offend againſt the common-weal, or that "may threaten with the authoritie of an Emperour for that ſhall be ſaid. For what elſe in "theſe later times hath increaſed and furthered our over-topping tyrannie, then their ſloth-
"ful fear, who durſt in no ſort oppoſe themſelves againſt his luſt? For being entangled by a "certain kind of pleaſure of a quiet life, and accuſtomed to live after the manner of ſlaves,
"and being afraid alſo to die vertuouſly, and deſirous to live with ſhame, we are fallen in-
"to theſe ſcarce ſufferable calamities, and into ſuch miſchiefs as have concerned us to near"ly. Firſt of all therefore, you ought to honour thoſe, who have ſlain the tyrant, by digni- H
"fying them with as great honours as may be imagined, and eſpecially Chæreas. For he one-
"ly hath been the man, who by the power of the gods, and through his great wiſedom and "valour, have given you your libertie. Neither ought you to forget him, but to heap ho"nours on his head, yea eſpecial favours, as to the man who firſt of all conſulted, and firſt of "all hazarded himſelf againſt a tyrant for your libertie. It is an honeſt and well-beſeeming "action in men of free hearts, to reſtore and repay condigne kindneſſe for the benefits that "they have received: ſuch is this man in your behalf, not like to Brutus and Caſſius, who "murthered Cæſar; for they were the originals of ſeditions and civil wars in this citie: and
"this man by the death of a tyrant, hath not onely at once delivered you of him, but alſo "hath cut off all thoſe miſchiefs that aroſe by him.

Thus ſpake Sentius, and his advice was entertained with great applauſe, not onelie by the I Senators, but the knights alſo that were there preſent. Whereupon a certain Senator called Trebellius Maximus aroſe, and ſtepping to him, pulled off the ring which Sentius had on his finger, wherein was inchaſed a ſtone with Caius picture in it, which Sentius had forgot to pull off: ſo intent was he about that which he both ſaid and did: and by this means the engraved image was broken. Now for that it was late, Chæreas demanded the watch-word at the Conſuls hands, who gave him the word Libertie. Thus all of them were aſtoniſhed at this change, and could ſcarcelie believe that which happened. For ſince that time that the popular government had been aboliſhed, the Conſuls had never given the watch-word until that preſent time. For before the citie was oppreſſed by tyrannie, the Conſuls commanded the men of war. After that Chæreas had received the word, he gave it to his ſouldiers, who ſubſcribed to the Senates authoritie: of theſe there were about four companies, which pre- K ferred the lawful government before a tyrannie, who alſo retired themſelves to their chieftains. As for their parts, the people returned to their ſeveral houſes, full of joy hope, and courage, for that they had regained the government of the ſtate, which belonged unto them, and not to any particular governour. In a word, Chæreas was their onelie hope: He foreſeeing that there would ſome miſchief follow, if Caius wife and daughter ſhould remain alive; and that if all his friends and family ſhould not be utterly extinguiſhed, all thoſe who ſhould be ſpared, would ſerve to no other end, but to the ruin of the common-weal and the laws: and on the other ſide, deſiring to ſee a final end of that which he had begun, and to ſatisfie that hatred he had conceived againſt Caius, he ſent Julius Lupus one of the captains of the guard, to kill both his wife and daughter, which he did. And the cauſe why he gave this charge chiefly to Lupus, was, for that Lupus was Clements kinſman, who was a confede- M rate in the execution of Caius; to the end, that partaking after this manner the death of the tyrant, he might be known to have dealt as forwardly for the common-weal, as if from the beginning he had been a counſeller and agent in the conſpiracy. Notwithſtanding there were ſome of his companions of that opinion, that it ſhould be but cruelty to deal with a woman in that ſort, for that Caius had offended through the corruption of his own nature, and not by the counſel of his wife; and that all thoſe evils which he committed in the common-weal, by deſolating the flower thereof, was his own offence, not hers.

There were others that accuſed her to be the cauſe of all that which Caius had committed, alleadging that ſhe had given him an amorous drink, by which he was tied and entangled in ſuch ſort unto her, and ſo led and tranſported by her love, that ſhe governed all that which concerned the eſtate of Rome, and the world ſubject to Rome, but her defenders prevailed nothing. For finally it was reſolved that ſhe ſhould loſe her life.

To finiſh this tragedy, Lupus was diſpatcht, who loſt no time in the accompliſhment of their

A their intent who had ſent him, for fear he had to be blamed, and accounted but coldly affectionate towards the good of the Common-Weal. As ſoon as therefore he came into the palace, he found Caſonia, Caius widdow, lying faſt by the body of her ſlaughtered husband, deſtitute of all that which the law gratifieth thoſe that are dead with, altogether bloody and greatly afflicted, having her daughter faſt couched by her: being in this eſtate, ſhe was heard to utter no other words, but that ſhe blamed Caius, for that he had not given credit to that counſel which ſhe had given him ſo often: which words of hers, were by certain of them interpreted two wayes. For ſome of them thought that ſhe meant, that ſhe had counſelled her husband to give over his cruelty, and murthers which he exerciſed againſt his citizens:
B and that in his government he ſhould uſe a tempered meaſure with vertue, for fear leſt his ſubjects miſliking of his manners, ſhould ſeek his deſtruction. Others took it as if ſhe had encouraged Caius to ſet upon the conſpirators and kill them without any delay; yea, before they had committed any offence, and by that meanes provide for his ſecurity. They therefore ſaid, that Caſonia blamed Caius for that he had behaved himſelf too careleſly, in that wherein ſhe had counſelled him. Such were the words Caſonia ſpake, and ſuch was the expoſition, as divers men interpreted the ſame.

Caſonia accuſeth Caius, for that he would not give credit to her counſels.

She ſeeing Lupus coming ſhewed him Caius body, and beſought him with tears and complaints to come no nearer. But perceiving that he continued in his reſolution, and made no account of her words, but did that for which he came, after that ſhe knew the cauſe of his
C arrival, ſhe offered her naked throat unto him with a great courage, uſing ſuch ſupplications as they ordinarily do who deſpair of their lives. For ſhe willed him to deferre no longer to finiſh that tragedy which his companions had begun, and died in this ſort couragiouſly by the hand of Lupus: and after her was her daughter ſlain, which was very young. This did Lupus certifie Chæreas of with all expedition. This was Caius end, after he had lived four years wanting four moneths Before ſuch time as he obtained the Empire, he was an intemperate and wicked man, and addicted to his pleaſure, a favourer of tale-bearers, exceeding fearful, and for that cauſe, when he got the upper hand of any man, he was ready to kill him.
D He eſteemed this the onely fruit of his power, when he abuſed the ſame againſt innocents; and gathered or heaped up great ſpoils and booties by wicked and unjuſt murthers, rapines and oppreſſions; lifting himſelf above all humane authority, and affecting to be eſteemed as a God, ſuffering himſelf to be tranſported by the peoples praiſes. Furthermore, all that which the law condemned and puniſhed, as a thing moſt deteſtable, that made he uſe of to puniſh vertue with. He never remembred any friendſhip that had been done him, how great ſoever it either was or had been, at ſuch time as he was in his choler, and was apt to inflict puniſhments in his rage on juſt and upright men. All that which was anſwerable to vertue, was odious in his eyes; In all things that him liſted he had ſo violent appetites, that it was impoſſible to contradict him; ſo that he was not aſhamed to uſe the unlawfull company of his own ſiſter: whereby it came to paſſe, that the citizens of Rome began to hate him extremely, for that the like matter had not been ſeen nor heard of: of a long time men could
E not believe the ſame, yet notwithſtanding they ſufficiently expreſſed the hatred they bare againſt the fact he had committed. It cannot be ſaid of him, that he builded any work beſeeming his royal magnificence worthy the mentioning, or profitable either to the preſent or future world, except ſome Ports that he made near to Rhegium and Sicilia, for harbour of ſuch ſhips as came and went into Egypt for corn, which doubtleſſe is a goodly and mighty work and very profitable for ſuch as travel by ſea. True it is, that it was not brought to perfection, but onely half finiſhed, becauſe the workmen travelled leaſurely. But the chief cauſe thereof was, that he ſpent his ſtudy in unprofitable matters, and loved rather to conſume his ſubſtance to feed his own private luſts wherein he took great delight, then to erect and build any goodly or famous work, which might have redounded to the profit of the F Common-Weal. Otherwiſe he was a man well ſpoken, and very expert in the Greek and vulgar Roman tongues, apprehending preſently that which others ſaid: and although they had ſpent long time in diſcovering their minds, yet anſwered he them upon the inſtant; and in affairs of conſequence he had ſuch a moving perſwaſion and power, as no man could exceed him, both in regard of his quick ſpirit and eaſie apprehenſion, as of the exerciſe and pain he had taken. For being Tiberius brothers ſon, whoſe ſucceſſour alſo he was, he was enforced to be ſtudious, ſeeing that Tiberius, who was of the ſame years, was in like manner excellently learned. Caius therefore enforced himſelf to imitate the Emperour Tiberius, whoſe near kinſman he was, and ſurpaſſed all thoſe that were in Rome at that time; yet notwithſtanding all theſe great advantages, which his good inſtruction had bred in him, could not hinder the misfortune that befell him, by the abuſe of his authority. So rare a thing it is to see them, who have liberty to do what they list without punishment, to govern themselves with modesty. In the beginning he took delight in the friendship of very honest men, to get credit and reputation, thinking to outstrip the most excellent: but after he was given over to licentiousnesse, the affection that he bare them was changed; and in stead thereof, he grew in hatred of them from day to day: whereby they were inforced to conspire against him, and seek his ruin. G

Now, as I have heretofore declared, Claudius understanding of that which had befallen Caius his Nephew, and seeing all his house wholly troubled, for this occasion was in such distresse, that he knew not what to do to save himself; but went and hid himself in a certain corner, where he was surprized, having no other cause to apprehend his danger, except his Nobility. For during the time that he lived a private man, he behaved himself modestly, kindly, and favourably unto all men, being well seen in the Sciences, and principally in the Greek tongue, shunning as much as in him lay, all tumult and train that might breed trouble. When as therefore the people at that time were wholly amazed at the trouble, and the Palace was repleniſhed with souldier-like fury and fear, and nothing reigned more in general then confusion and disorder; the souldiers of the guard, who were the most experienced and hardy amongst the men of war, consulted amongst themselves what course they were to take. Neither were they much discontented with Caius death, in that they supposed that upon just occasion, he was put to death; for which cause they rather bethought themselves on that which concerned their estates, and how they might assure themselves in those dangers, seeing the Germanes where wholly bent against those, who had slaughtered Caius; rather incited thereunto of their own cruel natures, then of any good affection they had towards the welfare of the Common-Weal. All which things troubled Claudius, and put him in fear of his life, the rather for that he saw Asprenas head and the rest of the Nobility that were massacred, carried about to be seen: for this cause he kept himself in a certain place, which was onely accessible by certain steps or stairs, and hid himself therein, because it was obscure. In that place one of the souldiers of the Palace called Gratus, being unable to discern who he was, in regard of the obscurity of the place, and supposing him to be some one that desired to be concealed, he drew near unto him, to the intent he might the better know him: And when as Claudius besought him that he would depart and leave him, he passed the more onwards, and laying hold of him and drawing him into the light, knew him; crying out to those that followed him: This is Germanicus, let us take hold of him, and create him Emperour. Claudius perceiving that he was ready to be attached, and fearing lest they should put him to death in the like manner as they had done Caius, besought them that they would pardon him, protesting unto them his innocency, and how he had in no sort been either accessary or agent in that which had been done. Whereupon Gratus beginning to smile, took him by the hand, saying, that he had no cause in that sort to suspect his life: For (said he) it behoveth thee to pull up thy spirits, and to bethink thee how to govern an Empire, of which the gods (who have the care of the whole world) have despoiled Caius, to reward thy vertue with. Arise therefore and take possession of the throne of thine ancestors. This said, he lifted him on his shoulders, for that Claudius could not walk on foot, through the fear and joy that he had conceived of that which had been told him. H I K L

Upon these speeches divers of the souldiers of the guard assembled about Gratus and perceiving that it was Claudius, whom they supposed to be dragged to his death, they had compassion of him as on an innocent, for that they knew him to be a man of a milde nature, who all the time of his life intermedled with nothing, and who in like sort had been often in great danger during Caius life. There were others of them that said, that the judgement of this matter pertained to the Consuls: whereupon, although a great number of souldiers flocked about him, and the simple people that were unarmed fled from them; yet could not Claudius go onward in his way; so weak and feeble felt he himself in his whole body. It fortuned likewise, that they who carried his litter, perceiving his flight, fled away for fear, and left him, so little hope had they that their Master should escape with his life, whom they saw to be thus drawn by the souldiers. Now when Gratus and his associates were arrived in the Court of the Palace, which (as it is reported) is the place which was first of all inhabited in Rome, they began to think upon that which was to be done: thither also there flocked a great number of other souldiers unto them, who took pleasure to behold Claudius, enforcing themselves to place him in the Imperial dignity, in regard of that good affection which they bare to Germanicus his brother, whose memory was much honoured among all those, who had at any time conversed with him. Moreover, they ripped up how many avaricious acts the Senate had committed, and how great errors the chiefest Senators had defaulted in, M in, before the publike government was changed. Moreover, they considered upon the danger and difficultie of their actions then in hand, for that the government being administred by one onely man, would be dangerous for them, if he should obtain the same by any other means; whereas if Claudius should enjoy the same by their permission and good will, he would have them in remembrance who had favoured him, and would recompence them according to their merits. This was the effect of their discourse, which they held among themselves, or when they met with one another. Finally, all of them at length concluded upon this advice, and environed Claudius, and lifting him up upon their shoulders, they carried him into the army, to the intent that no man might hinder them to finish that which they intended. There fell a debate also betwixt the Senators and citizens: For the Senate desirous to recover their former dignitie, and enforcing themselves to avoid the servitude that had befallen them by the outrage of Tyrants, intended the maintenance of their offered good fortune. Contrariwise, the people envied them that dignity. And knowing that their Emperours should be as it were certain bridles, to restrain the avarice of the Senate, and the refuge of the people, they were very glad to see that Claudius was advanced; making their account that if he were created Emperour, they should avoid a civil war like unto that which happened in Pompeius time.

Claudius carried on mens shoulders into the army.

Difference betwixt the citizens and Senators.

"The Senate knowing that Claudius was carried into the army by the souldiers, chose out "some of their order, and now sent them as Embassadours in their behalf, to signifie unto "him that he ought to use no violence in obtaining the Empire, but rather to remit the "charge of the common-weal to the Senate. That he both was and should be one of the "Senators, and have the conduct of the common-weal, and dispose it according to law, per-"swading him to call unto his remembrance those grievous mischiefs, which the former "tyrants had wrought in the common-weal, and what dangers he himself had also suffered "with them, during the reign of Caius their late Emperour. That it should ill become him, "who had detested the fury of others tyranny at such time as they used outrages, now wil-"lingly to be drawn to oppose himself against his countrey. That if he would obey them, "and continue to expresse the vertue and constancy of his life, which in times past he led "with commendation, he should obtain those honours which free citizens could afford him; "and in suffering himself to be governed by laws, to the end he might have part in the com-"mandment, & to be commanded in his turn, he should obtain the praise of vertue. That if "he should not be disswaded by the slaughter of Caius, which was fresh in memory, for their "own parts they would hinder his proceedings as much as in them lay. They also alleadg-"ed, that they were furnished with men of war, with store of armour, & a great number of "domestical servants, all which they would imploy against him: But over and above these "things, they had far greater helps, namely their hope, and good fortune, and the gods, who "are wont to fight for those who mantain vertue and goodnesse. They solemnly protested "also for their own parts, that they were of that mind, that there was nothing more honest "and just, then to fight for their liberty and countrey. The Embassadours that brought this message, were Veranius and Broccus, who both of them were Tribunes of the people. They prostrating themselvs on their knees before him, humbly besought him that he would draw the common-weal, into civil war. And seeing that Claudius was inclosed with a great company of men of war, in respect of whom the Consuls were of no force, they besought him that it would please him to demand the government at the Senates hands, and receive it from them if he were resolved to be Emperour; for that it would be an act more holy, and coupled with justice and good hap, if he should obtain the same with their good will, and not in despight of those, who would vouchsafe it him willingly.

The Senate perswade Claudius to resign the dignity offered him.

CHAP. III.

The sedition that arose between the Senate and the people.

ALthough Claudius knew with what presumption the Senate had sent this Embassage, yet did he modestly entertain the same for the present. But supposing that it stood very little with his security to commit himself to their trust, and being encouraged by the exhortation of the souldiers, who promised him their utmost endeavour, and by the incitation of King Agrippa, he determined in no sort to let the soveraigntie escape out of his hands, in that it was so willingly and freely bestowed on him when he thought lest on it. After that Agrippa had performed all those duties unto Caius which were requisite for such a one as had been by him advanced to honour, and having taken his body and laid it in a litter, he brought him out before the souldiers of his guard, and certified them them that Caius was yet alive, and for that he found himself sick of those wounds that he had received, he sent to seek for Physicians. But afterward, understanding that Claudius was taken by the men of war, he thrust so much that he got himself passage, and unto him, whom he found altogether dismaid, and ready to surrender all things into the Senates hands, and incouraged in him, and incited him to take upon him the government of the Empire which the men of war had offered him. Which done, he departed, and was suddenly sent for by the Senate, whither he resorted altogether perfumed with odors, as if at that time he were returned from some banquet, and had known nothing of that which had happened: He therefore asked the Senators what was become of Claudius, who certified him of the truth; and besides that required him to give them his opinion and counsel as touching the present affairs: "His answer was, that he was ready to adventure his life in the behalf of the Senate; "yet by the way he told them that they ought to have an especial regard of the common-"weal, rather then all the pleasure they could pretend; and that they who would be Lords "of an Empire, had need of arms & men to maintain themselves, lest being weak and unfur-"nished, they should be deceived in their expectations. The Senate replied that they had "great store of furniture,, and that they would contribute money; that they had good store "of men of war, to whom they would annex their slaves and give them liberty. But Agrip-"pa replied, Would God, grave fathers, that you were able to perform the matters you in-"tend; yet will I not fear to discover that unto you, which concerneth you nearly. You "know well, that the army which is with Claudius, consisteth of such men, who have been "long time trained up in feats of arms; and that those that are to fight on your side, are but "men gathered together, and such as you couple them with, are the very scum of your "slaves, who are both intractable and untrained. We shall therefore enter fight against ex-"pert souldiers, and commit our fortunes to such men as scarcely know how to draw their "swords: I rather think it meet that we send unto Claudius such men, as may perswade him "to give over the Empire. And to perform this message, behold my self in a readinesse to "be commanded by you.

Claudius confirmed in his resolutions by Agrippa.

Agrippa telleth the Senate his opinion.

Agrippa with som others is sent to Claudius.

To this effect spake Agrippa; and hereunto the Senators accorded, and sent him to Claudius, appointing him certain others to accompany him. As soon as he came to Claudius, he secretly discovered unto him in what perplexity the Senate was, and gave him instructions to answer and mean himself like an Emperour, and to shew his dignity and power. Where-upon Claudius gave the Embassadours this answer; "That he wondred not that the Senate "were so unwilling to be commanded by a Soveraign; in regard of that cruelty which the "fore-passed Emperours had used to their destruction. But for the present, they should taste "of his mercy, and feel his moderate rule; and they should live under the government of "such a one, who although in name he had the Imperial authority; yet that in effect he "would govern all things by their disposition. For which cause he wished them in no sort to "distrust him, whom as they themselves could witnesse, they have seen and known to have "dealt vertuously & justly in many affairs, although the state of times had been far different. Those that were sent from the Senate hearing these words, returned back again. But Claudius instantly assembled his men of war, and exacted an oath of fidelity from them, bestowing on every one of them who were of his guard in way of largesse, five thousand drachmes, amounting to some 25. pound a man of our sterling money. He presented their Captains also with presents answerable to the qualities, promising to perform no lesse bountie to all the rest of the men of war, in what place soever they were. Hereupon the Consuls assembled the Senate in the Temple of Jupiter the victorious, before day, and some of them hid themselves through the fear they had of that which should be spoken: othersome departed out of the City, and resorted to their countrey farms, foreseeing with themselves the issue of all these things: and perceiving that their hope of liberty was lost, they thought it far better for them to be exempt from danger, and to passe their life in repose, though it were with subjection, then to be altogether uncertain of their security and safety, by maintaining the dignity of the Senators: yet about some hundred of them drew themselves together and no more. Now whilest they were consulting upon that which they were to do, they suddenly heard a shout of souldiers that were assembled round about them, requiring the Senate to chuse them an Emperour, and not to suffer their State to be lost through a multitude of governours: and to this effect spake they, lest the government should be given to divers, and not to one. This course of theirs gave little content to the Senators, both in regard of the losse of that liberty which they expected, as through the good liking they had of Claudius; notwithstanding there were some that pretended some hope to be advanced both in respect of the nobilitie of their race, as in regard of their alliance that they had by marriage with the Cæsars. For amongſt other the fencers, who were of no ſmall number, they of the watch, and the ſaylers joyned themſelves together with the men of warre. Some affect the Empire.

About the day-ſpring Chereas and his companions went forth to debate the matter with the ſouldiers: but they ſeeing by the beckning with their hands they would draw them to
B ſilence, and were upon the inſtant to fall into diſcourſe, made a great noiſe to cut them off from proceeding any further, for that all of them were earneſtly affected to have an Emperour and Soveraign Lord, and required with all expedition that they might have one proclaimed and known. At that time the Senate were ſo diſtracted, both for the manner how they ſhould command, as for the means they ought to uſe to cauſe themſelves to be obeyed, conſidering the ſouldiers ſet light by them; and thoſe that were confederates in the death of Caius, ſuffered not the Senate to obey the ſouldiers. At length, Chereas being unable to conceal his paſſion wherewith he was ſurprized, and hearing that they asked for a Monarch, promiſed that he would give them one, if they would bring him a token from Eutychus, who was the Wagoner to the green band, whom Caius had loved extremely, in ſo much as he
C imployed his ſouldiers in ſervile labours, as to build him ſtables for his horſes, and reproached them with divers like matters, telling them that he would bring them Claudius head, ſhewing them that it was a matter ill beſeeming them, if after a mad man they ſhould commend the Empire to a fool. Yet none of theſe words could divert them from their purpoſe: but all of them drew their ſwords, and with diſplayed Enſignes, marched towards Claudius to unite themſelves with thoſe, who had already bound themſelves by an oath to ſerve him faithfully. So that the Senate was abandoned, and deſtitute of all defence; ſo as there was no difference betwixt private men and Conſuls. All of them were aſtoniſhed and confuſed, not knowing what to do, becauſe they had thus provoked Claudius diſpleaſure againſt them. And now fell they to reviling one another, in teſtimony of the repentance they conceived
D for theſe their proceedings. Whereupon Sabinus one of thoſe who had murthered Caius, aroſe and proteſted that he would ſooner cut his own throat, then conſent to the eſtabliſhment of Claudius, or behold with his eyes the miſery and thraldome of his Countrey: he likewiſe encouraged Chereas, telling him that he deſerved very little by cutting off Caius, if he thought to live without the liberty of his Countrey. To which he anſwered, that he made no account of his life; yet that he intended to ſound Claudius minde, and with this reſolution they concluded. Mean while certain of the Senators ſought on every ſide to break thorow the midſt and thickeſt of the ſouldiers, to go and do reverence and homage to Claudius: amongſt whom was Q. Pompeius one of the Conſuls, whom the men of War accuſed to be one of the principal actours to incite the Senate to recover their liberty, and they
E drew their ſwords againſt him. And if Claudius had not reſtrained them, they had ſurely diſpatched him: but he made him ſit down by him, and by that means delivered him from the danger. The other Senators, who accompanied him, were not entertained thus honorably; but ſome of them were wounded even then when they preſſed forth to ſalute Claudius. Aponius retired himſelf ſore wounded, and the reſt were in great danger to loſe their lives. But King Agrippa drawing neer unto Claudius, deſired him to uſe as much lenity as was poſſible in him towards the Senators, for that if any miſchief ſhould betide them, he ſhould have no other perſons to command. To the which councel of his, Claudius gave place, and aſſembled the Senate in the Palace, cauſing himſelf to be carried thorow the Citie in the company of his ſouldiers, who marched before him, doing much miſchief to the common people. But F amongſt thoſe that ſlew Caius, Chereas and Sabinus were come out into the ſtreets, notwithſtanding, they were forbidden by Pollio, whom not long before Claudius had made Captain of his guard. And as ſoon as Claudius came into the Palace, whither he aſſembled his friends, he pronounced ſentence againſt Chereas. For although his action was accounted both generous and noble; yet was he condemned for this, becauſe he was perfidious; whereupon he was adjudged to die, to give example to others, to the end that Princes and Emperours may hereafter live in ſafetie. He was therefore led to his death with Lupus, and divers other Romans. It is ſaid of Chereas, that he endured this accident with a great courage, which he expreſſed not only in that he changed not his countenance, but alſo by the reproaches which he gave Lupus who wept. For when as Lupus was putting off his cloaths, and complained of the cold that he felt, he taunted him thus, alluding to his name which was Lupus; That never any cold did harm to a wolf. Furthermore, when he came to the place of execution, where a great number of people were gathered together to behold the spectacle, he asked the souldier that was appointed to behead him, if he were a cunning headsman, and whether he had a new sword, wishing him to use that wherewith he murthered Caius. His death was happy, for he received but one stroke; whereas Lupus was faint-hearted, and received divers, because he stretched not out his neck freely. Some few dayes after, at such time as the Romans solemnized their expiations, and that every one honoured the memory of his dear friend, they gave Chæreas a part of that honour, and cast his portion into the fire, saying, That was to deface and purge their ingratitude, whereof they were guilty towards him. Thus ended Chæreas his life. But for Sabinus, although Claudius had not onely absolved him, but also suffered him to exercise his office, as beforetime he had done: yet thought he that he should do amisse and against justice, if he falsified his faith to his associates and confederates; for which cause he shortned his own dayes, thrusting his sword thorow his body to the very hilts.

INcontinently after this, Claudius cashierd all those of the souldiers whom he suspected; and published an Edict, by which he confirmed the kingdome to Agrippa, that Caius had given him, accompanying his bounty with many prayses; annexing moreover unto his government all that which Herod his grandfather had possessed, to wit, Judæa, and Samaria, which in that they were as one lawful inheritance, appertained unto him. He gave him also out of his own dominions, Abela and all the countrey about the mount Libanus, that in times past appertained him to Lysanias. And he caused the alliance that was past betwixt them twain, to be engraven and registred in an open place of the Citie of Rome. He took from Antiochus the kingdome that he had, and gave him in exchange a portion of Cilicia and Comagena. He set Alexander Lysimachus Alebarcha at libertie, who had been his old friend, and sometimes Governour in Arabia, and other whiles his mother Antonias steward, who had been committed prisoner through Caius displeasure, and maried Bernice, Agrippa's daughter, with his son Marcus: which after the death of Marcus, who died before he was espoused, was afterwards maried with her father Agrippa's allowance to Herod his brother, for whom Agrippa begd of Claudius the kingdome of Chalcis. At that very time tha Jews that were in the Citie of Alexandria, mutined against the Greeks. For after Caius death, the Nation of the Jews, which had been oppressed during his reign, and injuriously dealt withall by the Alexandrines, recovered their former courage, and instantly fell to arms. For which cause Claudius gave commission to the Governour of Egypt, to pacifie and appease that uproar. He sent also his Letters Patents into Alexandria and Syria, at the request of the two Kings Agrippa and Herod, to this effect:

BY theſe Edicts of Claudius Cæſar, which he ſent both to Alexandria and other parts of the world, it plainly appeareth how well affected he was towards the Nation of the Jews. As ſoon as he came to Jeruſalem, he offered his ſacrifices of thankſgiving which he had vowed, without omitting any thing that was commanded by the Law. He cauſed alſo divers Nazarites to be pould, and offered in gift that chain of gold that Caius had given him: which was of the ſame weight the iron chain was of wherewith his royall hands were manacled, in memory of the adverſitie he had paſt, and the teſtimony of the exchange thereof into better fortune: commanding that it ſhould be hanged up in the Temple, and over the chamber of the Treaſury, to teſtifie unto thoſe that ſhould behold the ſame, that the higheſt eſtates are ſubject to alterations, and that God can raiſe men again from obſcuritie to happy fortune. When as therefore Agrippa had duely and devoutly acknowledged Gods mercies, he depoſed the high Prieſt Theophilus the ſonne of Ananus; and beſtowed that honour on Simon ſirnamed Canthara, the ſonne of Boethus. of the Jews, and erected it in that place; which insolence of theirs highly offended Agrippa, G who construed it as an Act that tended to the abolition of the Religion of their Countrey: for which cause, with all expedition he repaired to Petronius, who was Governour of Syria, and complained against these Dorites, who was no lesse displeased with the action then he himself. For he supposed that such breach of Religion was the means to further impiety, and for that cause he wrote to those which had attempted this innovation, somewhat sharply, to this effect following.

Petronius letters written to the Dorites, in the behalf of the Jews. H

Alias cap. 5. P. Petronius writeth to the Dorites, to send them unto him who have broken Cæsars edict.

PUblius Petronius, Lieutenant to Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, to the Magistrates of the Countrey of Doria, health: Whereas Cæsar hath published an Edict by which he permitteth the Jews to live according to their Lawes and Customes, some one amongst you have been so presumptuous to contradict the same in effect (although in words you protest that you obey him) and do all that which you can, to hinder the Jews from enjoying their Synagogue, in so much as in the same you have planted Cæsars image, not onely thereby opposing your selves against the Jews, but also against the Emperour himself, whose image might have been better placed in his own Temple, then in a forrain Temple: and you have placed it in their Synagogue, whereas by right every one ought to be master of his place, according to Cæsars judgement: For it should be very ridiculous in me to alledge mine own judgement after that of Cæsars, I who hath granted the Jews the liberty to live according to their Lawes and Customes, and hath commanded that they should converse in equal freedome among the Greeks. For these causes I command you, that they who have been so bold as to contemn Augustus Decree (against whom their own Magistrates have been displeased, excusing themselves that this accident happened not by their motion, but by the fury of the common people) be brought before me by the Captain Proculus Vitellius, to yield a reason of that which they have done, exhorting the Magistrates, that if they will not be accounted parties in this contempt, they labour to discover those that are guiltie unto Proculus, and give order that no sedition or violence be offered thereupon. Which notwithstanding it seemeth that they effect, although we and the most honoured King Agrippa, whom I take for my good and special friend, labour nothing more then that the Nation of the Jewes should not assemble and take arms under colour of their defence. And to the end, that whatsoever Augustus hath ordained as touching this matter, may be the better known unto all men, I have annexed his Edict which he published in Alexandria: and although they are sufficiently known unto all men, yet hath the most honoured King Agrippa read them unto me, at such time as I sate in my tribunal seat, concluding according to right, that the Jewes ought not to be excluded nor hindered from enjoying those benefits, which are granted unto them by Cæsar: I therefore charge all men, that hencefor-ward they take heed lest they seek any occasion of mutinie or sedition, and that every one live according to his Religion. See here how Petronius proceeded in this matter, both to amend that which was past, as also to prevent that which was to come, that none should be so bold to attempt the like. After this, Agrippa took the Priesthood from Simon Cantharas, and L gave it again to Jonathan the son of Anani, whom he esteemed to be more worthy then the other. But Jonathan declared that he was not desirous of this dignity, for in effect he refused it, saying, O King, I most willingly acknowledge the honour which it pleaseth you to bestow upon me, and know well that it is a dignity which of your own free-wil you bestow upon me; notwithstanding that God judgeth me unworthy. It sufficeth me that I have once been invested with the sacred habit: for at that time I wore it with more holinesse, then I can now receive it at this present; yet notwithstanding if it please you to know one that is more worthy of this honour then my self, I will inform you of one. My Liege, I have a brother, who towards God and you is pure and innocent, whom I dare commend unto you for a most fit man for that dignity. The King took great pleasure in these his words, and leaving Jonathan, he M bestowed the Priesthood on Matthias his brother, according as Jonathan advised him: and not long after this, Marsus succeeded in Petronius room, and took upon him the government of Syria.

Jonathan the son of Ananus is restored to the Priesthood and refuseth it, and prayeth that his brother Matthias may minister therein.

Agrippas acts untill the time of his death.

Silas was made General over the Kings army: and for that he had alwayes been faithful unto him, and had never forsaken him in any danger that was offered, without partaking the utmost extremity, but had alwayes adventured on the greatest perils in respect of his intire and constant resolution; he made his account, that being so firme a friend to the King, he should also be partaker and companion with him in the honour. For which cause in all things whatsoever, he submitted not himself to the King, but challenged to himself a liberty to speak what him lifted. For this cause he grew hatefull in the Kings sight, for that in particular he boasted of himself beyond measure, and oftentimes refreshed the memory of those adversities the King had past, the rather to expresse how affectionate he had been toward him, and his continual talk was nothing else but of those travels he had endured. Now for that he observed no measure in this his discourse, the King took it as an injury intended to his honour, and was offended with the unbriled licence of the mans prattle. For nothing soundeth more harsh in a mans ear, then the memory of his fore-passed misery, and it is but the fault of a fool to rip up the courtesies he hath employed on another man. Finally, Silas grievously provoked the Kings displeasure against himself, that rather subscribing to his wrath then his wit, he not onely dispossessed Silas of his Generals room, but also sent him bound into his countrey in that place to be held prisoner. This notwithstanding, time asswaged his displeasure, and the King drawing himself into better consideration, and remembring himself how many travels Silas had endured in his behalf, he revoked the sentence that he pronounced. At such time therefore as he was ready to celebrate the festival day of his birth, and all his subjects were addressed to take their pleasure, he speedily sent for Silas, to the end he might be partaker thereof, and banquet with them. But Silas, who was of a free nature, supposing that he had just cause to be displeased, concealed it not from those who were sent unto him, but spake unto them after this manner: To what honour doth the King invite me at this present, to the intent incontinently to deprive me thereof? For he hath not onely deprived me of those honours which he bestowed upon me, in acknowledgement of the good affection I have alwayes shewed unto him: but he hath altogether spoiled me, and contumeliously intreated me: but if he think that he can restrain me from speaking freely, he deceiveth himself. For my conscience knoweth how many hazards I have delivered him from, and as long as I breathe, I will ring it in all mens ears, how many travels I have endured for his conservation and honour, in recompence whereof I am at this day in bonds, and shut up in an obscure prison, which I will never forget. Yea, and when my soul shall depart out of this body, she shall bear with her the remembrance of those benefits I have imployed on him. These words spake he with a loud voyce, willing them to relate the same unto King Agrippa; who seeing that he was grounded in an incurable folly, left him in prison.

After this, the king began to fortifie the walls of Jerusalem, on the side of the new town, upon the common charge; increasing them both in length and breadth: and might he have thorowly finished them, it had been a fortresse invincible, by all humane force. But Marsus the Governour of Syria certified Cæsar what the work was; and Claudius suspecting some commotion, wrote expresly to Agrippa, commanding him thence-forward to desist from further building of the walls, according to that form wherein he began: whereunto he would not disobey. This King Agrippa was of nature so ready to exercise liberality, and took so great pleasure to use his magnificence towards all sorts of nations, that the great expences he was at, obtained him great reputation. So that his whole pleasure and delight was, to shew courtesie unto all men, and to purchase good esteem, being every way different in nature and disposition from King Herod his predecessour. For Herod was naturally malicious, extreme in punishing men, and irreconcilable to those with whom he was displeased, manifestly expressing that he loved the Grecians better then the Jewes. For he beautified those cities that belonged to strangers, and gave them money, and erected them bathes, and sumptuous Theaters, and Temples, and in some of them galleries: but as touching the cities of the Jewes, he bestowed not this bounty on any of them, no not the least reparation or gift that was worthy the speaking of. Contrariwise, King Agrippa was very courteous and lowly, and equally imparted his bounty unto all men. He was courteous unto strangers, and testified no lesse by the bounty he bestowed on them. To his countrey-men he behaved himself himself affably, and in especiall he was merciful to all those that were in misery. For which cause his ordinary court and the place he took most pleasure in, was Jerusalem. He was a diligent observer of the laws of his countrey, and lived religiously, and with as great piety as was possible: neither passed there one day wherein he offered not sacrifice. It happened at one time that a certain cunning Lawyer, who was called Simon, and dwelt in Jerusalem, had assembled the people by reason of the kings absence, who for the present was in Cæsarea: In which assembly he alleadged many things against him, that he was a prophane man, and that upon just cause he was forbidden to enter the Temple, in that it was not lawful nor decent for those that were unclean to enter thereinto. These words of Simons thus wrongfully urged against him, were signified to the king by certain letters sent him by the Governour of the city: when as therefore he sate him down in the Theater, he commanded that very Simon to sit next him, and in peaceable and kind manner he spake thus unto him: Tell me, I pray thee, what thing thou seest fault worthy, or done contrary to the Law, in that which is done here? Simon having not any thing to reply, besought him to pardon him. The king grew friends with him far sooner then it could be imagined, resolving with himself that mercy doth far better become a king, then wrath; and that moderation is more requisite then haughty courage; so as after he had bestowed certain presents on Simon, he dismissed him. Now although he had many reparations in divers places; yet honoured he those of Berith above all the rest, and builded them a Theater surpassing all other in sumptuousnesse and beauty: and besides that, he made them a sumptuous Amphitheater, and baths and porches: in which he neither spared cost, neither scantled the beauty and greatnesse of the works in any sort. The dedication also of these things was celebrated with great pomp and magnificence: he also made great shewes and plaies in the Theater, in which there were all sorts of musick and recreation. He made also divers turnaments in the Amphitheater, expressing in all things the greatnesse of his magnificence; and being desirous to delight the people with a combate, he gathered all the malefactors that he could get, and made two several companies of seven hundred apiece, and brought them together to fight, to the end that in skirmishing they might receive their punishment; and besides, that by this warlike exercise he might present the people with a pastime concluded with the punishment of wicked men: for each of these combatants slew one another.

After that he had finished these above named buildings in Beryth, he resorted to Tiberias a city of Galilee, and was admired of all the other kings, so that Antiochus king of Comagena came to visit him: the like did Samsigeran king of the Emesenians, Cotys king of Armenia the lesse, and Polemon Lord of Pontus; and besides all these, Herod prince of Chalcis and his brother, all whom he received and entertained most magnificently and amiably, to shew his greatnesse; to the end that all men might perceive, that he was deservedly honoured with the presence of so many kings. And during the time that these Princes were with him, Marsus the governour of Syria visited him likewise, whom, to the end he might expresse the reverence he bare to the Romanes, he met with, seven furlongs off from the City. This interview of so many kings was the original of that discontent that grew betwixt him and Marsus; for whilest he sate in his litter, he sent for these other kings. But Marsus suspected this concord and so great amity, supposing that this agreement of so many kings, would be no ways profitable or beneficial to the Romanes. For which cause he presently sent unto them, charging them with all expedition to return each of them into their own countries: which strict commission of his Agrippa took in ill part, and for this occasion he conceived scarce kindly of Marsus. He took the Priesthood from Matthias, and gave it to Aclioneus the son of Cithæus. After he had reigned three whole years over Judæa, he came to Cæsarea, which in times past was called the tower of Straton, and there made he sports in honour of Cæsar, ordaining a certain feast for his conservation, to the celebration whereof there were assembled a great number of those, who were of estate and dignity thorow the whole countrey. On the second day of this solemnity, he shewed himself being apparelled in a Robe of silver, made with admirable workmanship; and came in the same to the Theater in the morning. Whereas the first reflex of the rising of the Sun beating upon his Robe, he shined after such a sort, that all those that beheld him, were seized with reverence and fear. Whereupon certain sycophants (which did not a little dishonour him) exclaimed one on the one side, the other on the other, saluting him for a God, and in speaking to him cryed out thus: Be merciful unto us; hitherto have we feared thee as a man, but hence forward we will confesse and acknowledge thee to be of a nature more excellent then mortal frailty can attaine unto. Agrippa reproved them not for using these words: neither rejected he their palpable and detestable flattery. But not long after, he looking upwards, perceived an Owl over his head

And ſuddenly he was ſeized with a terrible griping in his belly, which began with very great vehemency: for which cauſe turning his eyes towards his friends, he ſpake unto them after this manner: Behold him (ſaid he) whom you eſteem for a God, condemned to die, and deſtiny ſhall apparently convince you of thoſe flattering and falſe ſpeeches, which you have lately uſed in my behalf. For I, who by you have been adored as one immortal, am under the hands of death. But I muſt willingly entertain that which God pleaſeth to ſend me: For I have not lived in obſcurity, but in Whileſt he ſpake thus, his griefs augmented in ſuch ſort, that he was brought almoſt to his laſt; for which cauſe he was with all expedition conveighed into his royal Palace, and the rumour was ſpread in every place, that very ſhortly he would be dead. For which cauſe the people with their wives and children put on ſackcloth, according to the cuſtome of the countrey, to the end they might ſolicit Gods mercy in the Kings behalf, and all the City was filled with teares and lamentations. The King that lay in an upper chamber, and looking down into the court, ſaw them lying thus on the earth, could not refrain himſelf from teares. And after he had for the ſpace of five dayes without ceaſing been tormented with griping in his belly, he gave up the ghoſt in the fifty fourth year of his age, and the ſeventh year of his reign. For he had reigned four years under the Empire of Caius Cæſar (having firſt of

C all governed Philips Tetrarchy three years, to which was annexed the ſigniory of Herod in the fourth year) and three years under the Empire of Claudius Cæſar, during which time he governed over the above named countries; and moreover, over Judæa, Samaria and Cæſarea. His revenue amounted to twelve hundred myriades, beſides which, he made many loans. For in that he was very liberal in giving, he ſpent far more then his revenue, and ſpared not any thing to ſhew himſelf magnificent. Before the people knew of his death, Herod his brother Prince of Chalcis, and Chelcias the Kings lieutenant and friend, agreed between themſelves to ſend Ariſto one of their truſtieſt ſervants to kill Silas, who was their enemy, as if they had been commanded by the King.

After Agrippas death, they of Cæſarea and Sabaſte forgot themſelves of thoſe benefits they had received from him, and uſed him no leſſe deſpitefully, then as if he had been their utter enemy. For they reproachfully abuſed him after his death, and reviled him in ſuch ſort, as it is unſeemly to report the ſame. Furthermore, all the men of warre, who were at that time many in number, went unto the kings lodging, and with one accord ſeized the ſta-

E tues of the kings daughters, and carried them to the brothel-houſe; where after they had placed them, they uttered all the indignities they could poſſibly, practiſing ſuch ſhamefull matters, as they may not be expreſſed. Beſides this, reſting themſelves in the publike places, they banqueted in the open ſtreet, wearing chaplets of flowers on their heads, and perfuming themſelves with odours to ſacrifice to Charon, drinking to one another for joy that the King was dead. Thus expreſſed they their ingratitude not onely towards their King Agrippa, who had beſtowed ſo many liberalities on them; but alſo towards Herod his grandfather, who had builded their Cities, and to his extreme charge erected their Ports and Temples.

The Cæſareans and Sabaſtians revile Agrippa being dead.

At that time Agrippa, the deceaſed Agrippas ſonne was at Rome, and was brought up un-

When Cæſar underſtood how thoſe of Cæſarea and Sabaſte had injuriouſly dealt with Agrippa, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and moved with their ingratitude: and his purpoſe was, to ſend the younger Agrippa with all expedition to take poſſeſſion of the kingdom of his father, and there withall to diſcharge himſelf of his oath: but divers of his freemen and friends, who were in great credit with him, diſſwaded him from the ſame, alleadging that it would be a dangerous matter to commit the greatneſſe of ſuch a kingdome to a young man, who ſcarcely had as yet attained to the age of eighteen years: and for whom it was impoſſible to ſupport the care of ſo great a kingdome, conſidering that if he were at mans eſtate, he ſhould find himſelf over burthened with the charge of a kingdome. This advice of theirs was allowed by Cæſar, and for this cauſe he ſent Cuſpius Fadus to govern Judæa, and the whole realme; honouring his dead friend in this, in that he would not ſuffer

He gave eſpecial commiſſion alſo, that Fadus ſhould ſharpely puniſh thoſe of Cæſarea and Sebaſte, for the outrages they had offered to his deceaſed friend, and the exceſſe that was committed againſt his daughters who were yet living: commanding him to tranſport the companies of the Cæſareans and Sebaſtens, and the five Roman legions into the country of Pontus to ſerve in that place, and to take thoſe Romane ſouldiers that bare armes in Syria, to ſerve in that place: yet notwithſtanding this commandement of his, they were not diſplaced. For they ſent Ambaſſadors to Claudius to appeaſe him, and by this means they obtained the favour to remain in Judæa. After this they gave an entrance to thoſe moſt grievous miſchiefs and calamities that befel the Jewes: for they ſpread the ſeed of the war which was awakened under Florus government. And for that cauſe, after that Veſpaſian had obtained the victory, as it ſhall be hereafter declared, he cauſed them to depart out of that province, and made them ſeek their habitation elſewhere.

CHAP. I.

The diſſenſion between the Philadelphians and the Jewes: and of the Ephod which was the ſacerdotal ſtole.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 1. Caſſius Longinus Præfect of Syria.

AFter King Agrippas deceaſe (as we have heretofore declared in our former Book) the Emperour Claudius ſent Caſsius Longinus to ſucceed Marſus in the government of Syria, whom he diſplaced of that honour in memory of Agrippa, who during his life-time had oftentimes required by his letters, that he ſhould not ſuffer Marſus to govern the State of Syria. As ſoon as Cuſpius Fadus came into Jewry to take charge of that countrey, which he was to govern under Cæſar, he found the Jewes that dwelt on the other ſide of Jordan in an uproare, who had taken armes againſt the Philadelphians, about the limits of a certain village called Mia which was ſtored with valiant men at armes. Now had thoſe who inhabit beyond Jordan, armed themſelves in this manner, without the conſent of their Governours; and had ſlain a great number of the Philadelphians. Which when Fadus underſtood, he was ſore diſpleaſed, for that they had not reſerved the cauſe to his hearing, and opened their griefs they had conceived againſt the Philadelphians, but were ſo bold of their own authority, and without fear, as to betake themſelves to their weapons. Having therefore apprehended ſome three of them who had been principals pals and authours of the sedition, he commanded them to prison, and executed one of them called Annibas, and banished the other two whose names were Amaram and Eleazar.

Annibas executed, Amaramus and Eleazar banished.

Anon of this, Tholomaus the Archthiefe was also taken, and brought unto him, who commanded him to be executed, in that he had done many robberies in Idumæa and Arabia; and by this means all the countrey of Judæa was cleered of all theeves, by the care and providence of Fadus. After this he sent for the high Priests, and the Governours of Jerusalem, commanding them, according to the Emperours direction, that they shou'd deliver up into the Castle of Antonia the long and sacred robe, which the high Priest only was accustomed to weare; to the end that it might be at the Romans disposition, as in times past it had been. This command of his they durst not contradict, yet notwithstanding, they required Fadus and Longinus (who at that time was come to Ierusalem with a great power, for feare the Jewes, by reason of this injunction, should grow to rebellion) first, that it might be lawfull for them to send their Embassadors unto Cæsar, to beseech him that the Sacred Robe might remain in their custody. Secondly, that it might please them to expect the answer which Cæsar would return upon this their request Fadus gave them this answer, that he permitted them to send their Embassadors to Rome, provided, that beforehand they delivered him their children for hastages. Which when they had readily performed, the Embassadors were sent away. Now when they came to Rome, the younger Agrippa (who was his sonne, that lately dyed) knowing the cause of their comming, and being ordinarily accustomed to attend upon Cæsar (according as we have heretofore declared) besought Cæsar, that he would grant the Iewes their request, as touching the sacred Robe, and that it might please him to signifie no lesse unto Fadus. On this his petition Claudius gave the Embassadors audience: and told them that he favoured their suit, willing them to be thankfull to Agrippa, upon whose suit hee respected them, and allowed of their demands: and besides this answer, he delivered them a letter to this effect:

Tholomæus the arch theef.

Fadus requireth the High Priests garment should be delivered into the power of the Romans, and kept in the Castle of Antonia. Alias cap. 2.

I have also written to this effect to* Cuspius Fadus mine agent: the names of those who have received my letters, are Cornelius the son of Ceron, Trypon the son of Theudion, Dorotheus the son of Nathaneel, and John the son of John. Given the eight and twentieth of June in the year wherein Rufus and Pompejus Silvanus were Consuls. At that same time Herod, who was Agrippas brother that had lately deceased, to whose hands in times past the government of Chalchis had been committed, required the Emperour Claudius to grant him the power over the Temple, and the sacred vestments and necessaries, and the authority of chooſing the High Priest. All which he obtained, and from that time forward untill the end of the war of the Jews, this power remained in all his successors. according to this authority Herod deposed Cantharа from the Priesthood, and gave the succession thereof to Joseph the son of Caneus.

For which cauſe, his other brothers envied him: which increaſed their hatred, for that all the reſt of them were aggrieved, becauſe Monobazus made moſt account of Izates. The father manifeſtly perceived all this, yet did he pardon them, knowing that H they did it not for malice, but for the deſire that every one of them had to be beſt eſteemed by his father. Notwithſtanding, being affraid leſt ſome miſ-hap ſhould betide Izates, by reaſon of the hatred his brethren bare unto him, he gave him many great gifts, and ſent him to Abemerigus, who reigned at that time in a fort called Spaſinus, committing his ſonnes life into his hands. Abemerigus alſo entertained him with kinde affection, and loved him in ſuch ſort, that in proceſſe of time he gave him Samacha his daughter to wife and for her dowrie he gave him a countrey of great revenue.

Monobazus being old, and ſeeing he had no long time to live, deſired before his death that his ſonne might come and viſite him; he therefore ſent for him and received him very lovingly, giving him a countrey which he called Cæron, which bringeth forth great aboundance of I excellent Amomum. In this place was the remainder of the Ark, in which Noe was ſaved, during the Deluge; which remnants are to be ſeen at this day, if any man have a deſire to behold the ſame. Izates remained in that place untill his fathers deceaſe. But on the very day of his death, Helena ſent for all the Lords and Governours of the Kingdome, and Captaines of all the Army, and upon their aſſembly ſhe ſpake unto them after this manner:

Cæron very fruitfull in Amomum, in which the reliques of Noes arke are to be ſeen.

I ſuppoſe (ſaid ſhe) that you are not ignorant of my husbands minde, who hath deſired that Izates might be king in his ſtead, and hath eſteemed him moſt worthy of ſuch an honour: yet expect I your judgement in this point. For he that receiveth the ſoveraignty, not from one mans hand, but from many, and hath the ſame confirmed unto him by their conſent, is happy. She uſed this diſcourſe unto them to trie what their intent was, who were there aſſembled. They underſtanding her minde, K proſtrated themſelves firſt of all upon the earth before the Queene, according to the cuſtome of their countrey; and afterwards anſwered her, that they approved the Kings election, and took pleaſure to obey Izates, whom his father deſervedly, and to all their contents and the deſire of the common people had preferred above the reſt of his brethren: alleadging moreover, that they would put his brethren and kinſmen to death before his coming, to the end that he might enjoy the kingdome with all ſecuritie: for by their deaths all the fear that might grow by their hatred and envy might be extinguiſhed. Hereunto the Queen anſwered, that ſhe gave them thanks, for the favour they bare unto her and her ſonne Izates: notwithſtanding ſhe required them to ſuſpend their judgements touching the death of his brethren, untill ſuch time as Izates himſelfe ſhould give his conſent thereunto. L

Izates was made King by his mother Helena, and the nobilitie, and Monobazus governeth the Kingdome till his coming

They ſeeing they might not obtain the libertie to put them to death, gave counſell that they ſhould be kept priſoners untill his coming, to the end, at leaſtwiſe for their own parts, that they might be out of danger; and that moreover, untill his coming there might one be appointed to govern the eſtate, whom ſhe ſhould eſteeme moſt truſtie and faithfull unto him. Whereunto Helena condeſcended, and made his elder brother Monobazus King, and ſet the Diademe on his head, and gave him his fathers ſeale ring, with that robe which they call Sampſera; exhorting him to govern the Kingdome untill his brothers arrivall. Izates having certain notice of his fathers death, reſorted thither ſpeedily, and receiving his brother Monobazus willing ſurrender, took upon him the government of M the Kingdome.

Izates and his mother Helena learn the the true ſervice of God according to the manner of the Jews.

During ſuch time as Izates ſojourned in the fortreſſe of Spaſinus a certain merchant, who was a Jew, called Ananias, having acceſſe to the Kings wives, taught them the manner how to ſerve God, according to the religion of the Jews: and Ananias by their means growing acquainted with Izates, taught him the like, and accompanied him into Adiabena: being drawn thereunto by his earneſt entreaties, at ſuch time as Izates reſorted thither upon his fathers ſending for. It chanced alſo in like ſort that Helena was in like manner inſtructed by another Jew, and retained the rites and religion of the Jews.

After that Izates came into his Kingdome, and knew that his brethren and kinſfolk were impriſoned he was much grieved. Conceiving therefore with himſelfe that it would be a great

A great impiety in him to ſuffer them to be ſlain, or kept bound in priſon; and that on the other ſide, it were a dangerous matter for him, if being at libertie they ſhould remember the evill they had endured: for this cauſe he ſent ſome of them to Rome for hoſtages with their children unto the Emperour Claudius, and the reſt unto Artabanus King of Parthia. Afterwards when he was thorowly aſſured that his mother was wholly addicted to the religion of the Jews, he endeavoured himſelf the more to ſhew himſelf zealous therein: and ſuppoſing that he could not be a perfect Jew, except he were circumciſed, he prepared himſelf to be circumciſed. Which when his mother underſtood, ſhe laboured to her uttermoſt to hinder his reſolution, certifying him that in ſo doing, he ſhould bring himſelf in great danger; for B that in being King, he would draw himſelf into the diſlike of his ſubjects, if they ſhould have notice that he was addicted to a new Religion, and to ſtrange Ceremonies, and that they would not endure, that in being a Jew, he ſhould be their king: ſo ſhe for a while by her diſſwaſion reſtrained him from his deſire. But the King required counſell of Ananias, who, according with Helena in the courſe of her diſlike, threatned Izates, that if he would not obey his mother, he would forſake him, and depart from him, for that he feared, leſt if the matter ſhould be publikely known, he ſhould ſuffer ſome puniſhment, as being the onely author and inſtructer of the King in undecent matters; that otherwaies he might ſerve God, although he were not circumciſed; ſince he had reſolved to live according to the iuſtitution and laws of the Jews, and that God would pardon him: for in this, true Religion conſiſteth, more then in the circumciſion of the body, though he were not actually circumciſed, ſince the C neceſſitie and fear of his ſubjects over-ruled him. By which words the King for that time was wonne to affect the ſame no further. But ſome little whiles after (for he was not wholly altered in that affection which he had) another Jew called Eleazer, coming from Galilee, and accounted a man of great experience in the doctrine of our Religion, perſwaded him to be circumciſed. For, coming one day unto him, to ſalute him, he found him reading of the Books of Moſes, and ſaid unto him; O King, contrary to your knowledge you offend the Law, and God likewiſe; for it ſufficeth you not, that you underſtand the ſame, but the cheifeſt matter you are tyed unto, is to doe that which the Law commandeth: how long therefore will you remain uncircumciſed? And if as yet you have not peruſed the D Law as touching this point, read it now, to the intent you may know what impietie it is to omit it.

Izates ſendeth his brothers to Claudius Cæſar and Artabanus.

Izates is diſſwaded by Helena his mother and Ananias from circumciſion.

Eleazer perſwadeth Izates to be circumciſed.

After the King had heard this, he would no longer deferre his circumciſion: for which cauſe withdrawing himſelf into another chamber, he called a Surgeon unto him, who acted that which he required, and afterwards calling his mother and maſter Ananias unto him, he certified them what had paſt: whereupon they grew ſtrangely amazed, fearing leſt the King ſhould grow in danger of the loſſe of his Kingdom, if this action of his ſhould come to light; for that his ſubjects would not endure, that ſuch a man that followed a contrary Religion ſhould be their king; they feared alſo, leſt they themſelves ſhould be in danger, foraſmuch as the cauſe of all this matter would be imputed unto them. But God by his providence prevented leſt any of thoſe things which they feared ſhould come to effect: for he delivered E Izates himſelf and his children likewiſe out of many dangers, yeelding them his aſſiſtance in their doubtfull and deſperate eſtates, declaring in effect that thoſe that onely put their truſt in him, and depend upon his providence, are never deprived of the fruit of their piety But of theſe things we will ſpeak hereafter.

They that rely on God, and put their confidence in him, doe alwaies reap the reward of their piety.

When Helena the Kings mother perceived that the eſtate of the Kingdome was in peace, and that by all mens opinion, both home-bred and ſtrangers, her ſon was reputed happy by the good will of God, ſhe was ſeized with a deſire to goe and viſite the City of Jeruſalem, and adore God in the Temple, which was ſo much renowned through the whole world, and offer ſacrifice of thankſgiving therein; for which cauſe ſhe beſought her ſon that he would ſuffer her to perform her vows: who willingly condeſcended to her deſire, and furniſhed F her royally with all things that were neceſſary for ſuch a voyage; giveing her a great maſſe of money with her, and bringing her onward on her way many dayes journey; ſo that at length ſhe arrived in Jeruſalem, to the great advantage of the inhabitants of that City. For at that time the City was oppreſſed with a grievous famine, ſo as many died for want of food; for which cauſe Queen Helena ſent her ſervants, ſome into Alexandria to buy a great quantity of corn, the reſt into Cyprus to buy dried figs, who returned with all expedition they might; whereupon Helena diſtributed the victuals among the poore, leaving a ſingular memory of her beneficence among the whole Nation. Her ſonne Izates alſo underſtanding of this famine, ſent a great ſumme of money to the Governour of Jeruſalem. But hereafter will will I declare what other benefits the King and Queen have bestowed upon our nation.

The yeer of the world.4009. after Christs Nativitie, 47.

Now Artabanus King of Parthia, perceiving that the Princes of his Kingdome had conspired against him, resolved with himselfe to go unto Izates, for the securitie of his life and person, hoping by his means, if it were possible, to recover his Kingdome. He therefore retired thither, and brought with him about one thousand men of his kinsfolk and houshold servants. And by the way he met with Izates, whom he knew very well by his royall traine, notwithstanding he were unknown unto him by countenance. Drawing therefore neer unto him, he first of all humbled himself on his knees, according to the custome of the countrey, and afterwards spake unto him after this manner:

Artabanus retireth himselfe to Izates and requireth his assistance.

Dread King, forsake me not, who am thy servant, neither reject thou my prayers. For being dejected by the means of my misfortunes, and of a King become a private man, I have neede of thy succour. Consider therefore the inconstancie of fortune, and think with thy selfe, that by providing for me, thou shalt provide for thy selfe. For if thou makest no reckoning of the wrong that is done unto me, divers men will grow audacious to enterprize upon other Kings.

These words pronounced he with weeping tears, and with looks lowly fixed upon the ground. When Izates had heard Artabanus name, and saw his humble and submissive estate, he leapt incontinently from his horse and said unto him: King, be of good courage, and let not thy present and perplexed condition dismay thee, as if thy misfortunes were irrecoverable. For this sorrow of thine shall suddenly be changed, and thou shalt finde a better friend and allie, then thou hopest for at this time. For either I will repossesse thee of thy Kingdome of Parthia, or I will lose mine own government. This said, he caused Artabanus to get up on horseback, and walked by him on foot, yeelding him this honor, as to a greater King then himself. Which when Artabanus saw, he was discontented, and sware by his honor & fortune to come, that he would set foot on ground, if he would not get up on horseback and ride before him: whereunto he obeyed, and mounting upon his horse again, he conducted him to his Palace; yeelding him all the honour that was possible, both in his sittings and banquets, as in his assemblies, not respecting his present estate or condition, but his former dignitie: considering with himself, that such casuall misfortunes and changes are incident to all men. Furthermore, he wrote unto the Parthians, perswading them to receive their King Artabanus, assuring them on his faith and oath, that he would obtain a free pardon for all that which was past, and to that intent he offered himself to be an arbitrator between them. The Parthians gave him this answer, that they would not refuse to entertain him, but that they could not: for that one who was called Cinnamus, was advanced in his place and dignitie, & that they feared lest a sedition should happen amongst them. Cinnamus, who was a noble and honourable minded man, knowing that their intent was such, wrote himself unto Artabanus, who had nourished and brought him up, exhorting him to return upon his faith, and to receive again his own Kingdome. Artabanus upon this motion gave credit to his words, and returned back again. Whereupon Cinnamus came forth and met him, and prostrating himself before his feet, called him King; and afterwards taking the diademe from off his own head, he set it upon Artabanus head, who by this means was restored to his former estate by Izates mediation, after he had been driven out of his Kingdome by his chiefest nobilitie. And he did not forget the favours which he had received at Izates hands, but did him all the honour that possibly he could imagine: For he permitted him to weare the straight Tiara, and to sleep upon a gilded bed, which is a priviledge that belongeth onely to the Kings of Parthia. He gave him also a goodly and great countrey which he had taken from the King of Armenia. This countrey was called Nisibis, where in times past the Macedons had builded the City of Antioch, by them called Mygdonia.

Izates writeth to the Parthians, and perswadeth them to receive their King.

Antiochia and Mygdonia builded by the Macedons.

Presently after Izates was in this sort honoured, Artabanus died, leaving his Kingdome to his sonne Vardanes: who repaired to Izates, praying him to joyn with him in that war which he intended to wage against the Romanes: but he prevailed not with him. For Izates knowing the Romanes force and good hap, imagined that he undertook a matter beyond his power. Furthermore, he had sent five of his young sonnes to Jerusalen to learn our tongue and discipline, and his mother likewise to adore in the Temple, for which cause he the rather held back and disswaded Vardanes from enterprizing against the Romans, whose power and puissant conquest he ordinarily reckoned up unto him, to the end he might dismay him, and by these his allegations cause him to give over his purposed intent of war against them. But the Parthian was displeased with this his perswasion, and for that cause denounced a present warre againk Izates. But this his enterprize had but a fruitlesse issue: for God cut off all his

For the Parthians understanding what Vardanes intent was, and how he was resolved to undertake a war against the Romans, slew him, and gave the Kingdome to his brother Gotarza, whom not long after this, his brother Vologesus slew by treason, restoring to his two brothers by the mothers side these Provinces, that is to say, the kingdome of Media to Pacorus who was the eldest, and Armenia to Tiridates who was the younger.

The year of the world 4009. of Christs Nativity. 47.

After Vardanes was slain the Kingdome is committed to Gotarza, Volegesus King of Parthia.

When Monobazus King Izates brother and the rest of his kinsfolk saw how happily all things succeed to Izates, and how in respect of his piety towards God, he was honoured and reverenced by all men, they also resolved themselves to forsake their religion, and to serve God after the manner of the Jews. But this intent of theirs was discovered. Whereupon the chiefest among them grew displeased; yet did they not manifest their despight, but kept it hidden in their hearts, seeking some fit occasion to revenge themselves as soon as they Monobazus and his Lords think to receive the Jews religion.

B might. They wrote also to Abias King of Arabia, and promised him great sums of money, if he would take armes against their King, promising him that upon the first charge, they would forsake him, for that they desired to be revenged on him, who was grown in hatred of their religion. Having therefore confirmed their promise with an oath, they incited him to make hast. The King of Arabia performed that which they required, and marched forth against Izates with a great power. And when as the first charge was ready to be given, and before they came to handy-strokes, all Izates souldiers forsook him; and turning their backs to their enemies, fled in great disorder, as if they had been surprized with a Panick fear; yet was Izates no wayes dismaied, but having discovered that it was the treason and conspiracy

The Adiabenians conspire with the King of Arabia against Izates.

C of his greatest Pears, he retired himself also into his campe, where he enquired of the cause that they pretended. After he knew that they had complotted with the Arabian, he caused the conspirators to be put to death: and the next day after went out to fight, and slew a great number of his enemies, and constrained the rest to betake them to flight. He pursued their King also into a Fort called Arsam, which he battered and assaulted with such spirit and diligence, that he took the same with a great quantity of booty that was therein, and returned to Adiabena with great triumph: but he took not Abias alive; for he himself had prevented his captivity with his death. The Lords of Adiabena seeing themselves frustrated of their former hopes, in that by Gods hand they were delivered into the hands of their King, could not contain their displeasure, but practised further mischief: for they wrote their letters to

The Lords of Adiabena perswade Volegesus to kil Izates.

D Vologesus King of Parthia, desiring him to kill Izates, and to bestow another King upon them who was a Parthian, for that they hated their King who had abolished their religion, and had embraced a strange law. The Parthian understanding hereof, prepared himself for the war; and having no just colour or pretext to enforce the same, he sent a messenger unto him to redemand those honours which his father had given him, which if he refused, he denounced War against him. Izates was not a little troubled in his minde, when he understood this message: For he thought that if he should restore the gifts, he should offer himself great prejudice, for that it would be imagined that he did it for fear; knowing on the other side that if the Parthian should recover that which he redemanded, yet would he not be in quiet, he therefore commended his cause to God, trusting that he would take care of him. And building upon this, that the greatest good he might have, was to have God to help, he shut

E his wives and children in a strong Castle, and his corn in his strongest Towers: and afterwards burned all the hay and forrage: and having after this manner provided for all things, he expected the approach of his enemy. The Parthian came onward sooner then he was expected, with a great power of horsemen and footmen, For he marched forward in all haste, and encamped near unto the flood that separateth Adiabena from Media. Izates likewise encamped not far from thence, having with him about six thousand horsemen. To whom the Parthian sent a messenger to give him to understand how great his power was, which extended from the river Euphrates as farre as Bactria, recounting unto him what Kings he had under his subjection, threatning him to punish him very severely, in that he behaved himself so ungratefully towards his benefactors, yea, in such sort as the God whom he ado-

F red, might not deliver him out of the Kings hands. Hereunto Izates answered, that he knew well that the Parthian far exceeded him in power, but that he was far better assured that Gods power extended beyond all mens contradiction. And having returned him this answer, he betook himself to his prayers, and prostrating himself upon the earth, and casting ashes on his head, and fasting himself, his wives and all his children, he called upon God, and prayed after this manner: O Lord Almighty, if I have not vainly submitted my self to thy protection, but have intirely chosen thee for mine onely and true God, be thou my help and assistance, and not onely deliver me from mine enemies, but also abate and controule their pride, who have not been affraid in their unbridled language, to prophane thy

And thus Izates by Gods providence was warranted from the Parthians threats.

Izates deliver-eth up the kingdome to his brother Monobazus and dieth.

Not long after this, at ſuch time as he had lived fifty five years, and reigned four and twenty, and left behind him four and twenty ſons, he died, and appointed his brother Monobazus to ſucceed him in the kingdome, requiting hereby his faith and loyaltie, in that during the H time of his abſence, and after the death of his father, he had faithfully ruled and governed the kingdome to his uſe. His mother Helena hearing news of his death, lamented very grievouſly as reaſon would, in that ſhe being his mother was deprived of a ſon that ſo zealouſly honoured and feared God. Yet notwithſtanding ſhe was comforted, when ſhe underſtood that her eldeſt ſon was to ſucceed him in the Kingdome, and haſted her ſelf with all diligence to go and meet him. As ſoon as ſhe arrived in Adiabena, ſhe lived not long time after her ſon Izates. Whereupon Monobazus took both her body and his brothers bones, and ſent them to Jeruſalem, commanding that they ſhould be burried in three Pyramides which Helena had builded, ſome three ſtades or furlongs from Jeruſalem. But hereafter will we recite the acts and geſts of Monobazus during his reign.

But Fadus would not permit that ſuch a fury of theirs ſhould breed them any commodity: but he ſent a troope of horſemen, who charged them on the ſudden, and ſlew a great number of them, and took divers of them priſoners alive; amongſt whom was Theudas, whoſe head was ſtricken off, and was afterwards carried to Jeruſalem. The Governour Tiberius Alexander puniſheth the ſons of Judas the Galilean.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 5. al. 8. Tiberius Alexander governour of Judæa. James and Simon the ſons of Judas of Galilee crucified.

AFter Fadus, ſucceeded Tiberius Alexander, the ſon of that Alexander who had been Governour of Alexandria; a man of as great riches as any one of his time and place, who ſurpaſſed likewiſe his ſon Alexander in piety and ſervice of God, who forſook the religion of his forefathers. In that time there hapned a great famine in Jewry, during which Queen Helena ſent huge ſums of money into Egypt, and bought corn, and diſtributed the ſame to thoſe that were in want, according as I have foreſpoken. At the ſame time James and Simon the ſons of Judas of Galilee, who had buſied themſelves to in- L cite the people to reſiſt the government of the Romanes, were put to death at ſuch time as Cyrenius valued each mans goods, as we have heretofore declared. Theſe did Alexander command to be crucified. Herod King of Chalcis took away the ſoveraign Prieſthood from Joſeph the ſon of Camydas, and transferred it to Anias the ſon of Nebedæus. After Tiberius Alexander ſucceeded Cumanus. Then died Herod, who was brother to King Agrippa the Great, in the eighth year of Claudius Cæſar. He left behinde him three ſons; Ariſtobulus whom he had by his firſt wife Bernicianus and Hyrcanus by Bernice his brothers daughter. Claudius Cæſar gave the kingdowe belonging to him, to Agrippa the younger. How a great number of the Jews were ſlain about the Temple.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 9. al. 10.

AT the time of the feaſt of Paſcha (during which time we are accuſtomed to feed on unleavened bread) a great number of people aſſembled themſelves from all parts to the City of Jeruſalem. Whereupon Cumanus fearing leſt by this occaſion there ſhould ariſe ſome commotion, he gave order that a company of his ſouldiers ſhould be armed, and ſhould keep their guard in the porches of the Temple, to end that if any trouble ſhould happen, they might repreſſe it. Thoſe governours, who had been his predeceſſours, had done the like in ſuch manner of aſſemblies. It came to paſſe on the fourth day of the feaſt that a certain ſouldier diſcovering thoſe privities which were undecent to be ſeen, ſhewed them before the people: wherewith they that beheld the ſame, were ſore diſpleaſed, and provoked, ſaying, that the diſhonour was not done unto them, but to God, to whom it rightly appertained. And ſome of them of beſt reſolution caſt out certain ſpeeches againſt Cumanus, ſaying, that the ſouldier was ſet on by him. Which when Cumanus underſtood, he was in like manner grievouſly offended in regard of thoſe injuries; yet exhorted he thoſe, whom he ſaw too forward in raiſing factions, to keep the peace, for fear leſt a ſedition ſhould grow during the time of the feaſt; and ſeeing they would in no ſort obey him, but contrariwiſe they ceaſed not to injure and revile him, he commanded that all the forces he had ſhould be in arms, and retire themſelves into the fortreſſe of Antonia that was near unto the Temple, as we have heretofore declared. The people, ſeeing the armed ſouldiers, were affraid, and began to flie: but becauſe the places thorow which they iſſued, were but narrow, they imagined that they were perſued by their enemies; ſo that they thruſt on one another in their flight, and divers of them were thronged to death. In this mutiny there died twenty thouſand men: and after this, inſtead of a feaſt, there was nothing but mourning; and without bethinking themſelves of their prayers and ſacrifices, all of them began to weep and lament. So great a miſchief ſprang from the inſolence of one ſouldier. This firſt lamentation was ſcarcely finiſhed, before a ſecond ſucceeded the ſame. For ſome of thoſe who had a part in this mutiny, being about ſome hundreth ſtades from the City, robbed one Steven that was Cæſars ſervant in the high-way, and took from him all that which he had. Which when Cumanus underſtood, he preſently ſent ſome of his ſouldiers to ſpoil thoſe villages, which were neareſt to the place were the fact was committed, and to bring the chiefeſt inhabitants thereof in bonds unto him. In this pillage a certain ſouldier found a book of the law of Moſes in one of theſe villages, which he took and brought, and before them all tore it in peeces, with hainous blaſphemies and vile ſpeeches againſt the law and whole nation. The Jews underſtanding hereof, ſuddenly aſſembled themſelves in great numbers, and ran to Cæſarea where Cumanus kept for that preſent, requiring him that he would revenge not their cauſe, but Gods, whoſe law was on that ſort diſhonoured; ſignifying unto him, that it was impoſſible for them to live, ſo long as their law was thus contemned. Cumanus fearing leſt a ſecond mutiny and uproare ſhould be raiſed among the people, by counſel of his friends cut off the ſouldiers head, who had committed that outrage againſt the law, and by this means appeaſed the ſedition that was ready to take head.

In the feaſt of Paſcha, a certain ſouldier ſhewing his privy members, moveth a ſedition among the people, whereby twenty thouſand Jews loſt their lives.

The ſedition of the Jews againſt the Samaritanes.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 10. al. 12.

THere hapned alſo an enmity betwixt the Samaritanes and the Jews, upon this occaſion. They of Galilee, who reſorted to the City of Jeruſalem at the times of our ſolemn feaſts, were accuſtomed to paſſe thorow the countrey of the Samaritanes. And at that time it hapned, that their way lay thorow a borough called Nais, ſcituate in a great champaine field: where a quarrel ariſing betwixt divers inhabitants of the place, and certain paſſengers, a great number of the Galileans were murthered. Which when the Magiſtrates of Galilee underſtood, they reſorted to Cumanus, requiring him to execute juſtice on thoſe that had murthered their countrimen: but he being corrupted with money by the Samaritanes, made no account of their complaint. The Galileans being provoked by this contempt of his, perſwaded the common people of the Jews to betake them to their weapons, and maintain their libertie; telling them that ſervitude is of it ſelf tedious; but that when it is accompanied with outrages, it is intollerable. But their governours laboured to pacifie them, promising them to deal so effectually with Cumanus, that he should take punishment of the murtherers: but they gave them no audience, but fell to arms, requiring Eleazar the sonne of Dineus, to be their chieftain. This Eleazar was a thief, who for many yeers made his abode in the mountains: they therefore spoiled and burnt certain villages of the Samaritanes. After that the report of all that which had passed, came to Cumanus ears, he took a company of the souldiers of Sebaste, with four bands of footmen, and armed the Samaritanes likewise to go and make war against the Iews; whom they took, and slew many of them, and led more of them away prisoners. When the chiefest Governours in Jerusalem saw into what an infinity of mischiefs they were falne, they clothed themselves in sackcloth and cast ashes on their heads, exhorting those that were mutinous, to forethink themselves of the ruine of their countrey, the danger the Temple was in to be burned, the servitude both of themselves, their wives and children, to prophane and strange nations, and desired them to change their advice, and to lay aside their weapons, and cease to offer violence to the end that they might hereafter live in quiet, and that every one of them would retire themselves peaceably to his own habitation. By which words in the end they being perswaded, returned home, and betook them to their businesse. The theeves also retired themselves again into their strong holds, and from that time all Judæa was repleniished with thefts. The Governours of Samaria resorted to Numidius Quadratus governour of Syria, who dwelt at that time in Tyre, to accuse the Jews for that they had fired their villages, and spoiled, them; telling him that their losse did not so much trouble them, as for that they saw the Romans were contemned by the Jews: who notwithstanding ought to appear before them as their competent Judges; yet nevertheless that they assembled themselves in such sort, as if the Romanes were not their superiours. For which cause they addressed themselves to him, to the end they might have redresse of those wrongs which they had received by them. This is that wherewith the Samaritanes charged the Jews: who answered to the contrary, alleadging that the Samaritanes themselves had been the authors of that mutiny and uproare; and that Cumanus being wholly corrupted by their money, had smothered the matter, and done no justice on the murtherers. When Quadratus heard this, he reserved the judgement till another time, telling them that he would give sentence in the matter at such time as he came into Iudæa, and had examined the truth on both sides; so that they returned without doing any thing.

Anon after, Quadratus came into Samaria, where he heard that the Samaritanes had been the authors of the trouble: and on the other side, knowing that some Iews likewise intended some insurrection, he caused them to be crucified, whom Cumanus had left in prison. From thence he transported himself to Lydda, which is a borough of no lesse bignesse then a Citie: in which place he sitting on his tribunall seat, heard the Samaritanes the second time and discovered by the report of a certain Samaritane, that one Dortus one of the principallest among the Iews, and for other his confederates induced the people to rebell against the Romanes. These did Quadratus cause to be executed. As for Ananias, who was the high Priest, and the Captain Ananus, he sent them bound to Rome, to render an account to the Emperour Claudius of that which they had done. Moreover, he commanded the chief Governours both of the Samaritanes and Iews, that they should speedily repair to Rome; whither Cumanus and Captain Celler should conduct them, to the end they might be judged by Cæsar himself, upon the information taken on both sides. And fearing lest the common people of the Iews should break out into some rebellion, he repaired to the City of Ierusalem, to give order that the Iews should attempt to raise no new stirres; but when he came thither, he found all in peace, and busied in the celebration of the feast, and offering sacrifices to God, according to their accustomed ceremonies. Being therefore assured that no man would innovate or rebell in that place, he left them to their solemnities, and repaired to Antioch.

But the Iews that were sent to Rome with Cumanus, and the principall Samaritans had a day assigned them by the Emperour to decide the differences that were between them. Cumanus and the Samaritanes laboured all that they might by the mediation of Cæsars friends and free-men, to have the upper hand of the Iews, and indeed the day had been theirs, if young Agrippa had not been in Rome. For he seeing that the matter was handled to the disadvantage of the Iews, besought Agrippina the Emperours wife, that she would labour her husband in such sort that he would be pleased to take full knowledg of that which was done; and that afterwards he should execute due justice on those whom he found guilty of that sedition. Claudius favourably gave eare to this request: and hearing the whole matter, he found

A found that the Samaritanes were the first authors of all those mischiefs, and cause them to be put to death who came before him to plead, and banished Cumanus: he gave order also that Captain Celer should be sent back to Jerusalem, and that there in sight of all the people he should be dragged about the City, untill he died. Furthermore, he sent Claudius Fœlix, Pallas brother, to govorn Judæa. The year of the world, 4015. after Christs Nativity, 53.

In the twelfth yeer of his reign, he gave Agrippa, Philips Tetrarchy, with Batanea; and besides that, annexed thereunto Trachonitis and Abila, which in times past appertained to Lysanias Tetrarchy, taking from this the Province of Chalcis, which he had governed for the space of 4. years. After that Agrippa had obtained this gift at Cæsars hands, he married his sister Drusilla to Azizus King of the Emessenians, who consented to be circumcised, because Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 9. al. 14. B Epiphanes, king Antiochus sonne would not give eare unto the marriage, for that he refused to entertain the religion of the Jews, although in times past he had promised his father no lesse. He gave Mariamme also to Archelaus, Chelcias son, who by her fathers consent was beforetime promised him, on whom he begat a daughter called Bernice. A little after this, the marriage of Azizus and Drusilla was broken off, on this occasion following: at such time as Fœlix governed Jewry, he saw Drusilla, and was surprized with her love, for that she surpassed all other women in beauty. He therefore sent a certain Magician called Simon, who was born in Cyprus, and one of his greatest friends among the Jews, who perswaded her to forsake her first husband, and to marry with Fœlix, giving her to understand, that she should be happy, if she refused not this match. She unadvised, and resolved to rid her self from the envious affection Mariamme. Fœlix getteth Drusilla from her husband. Polemon king of Cilicia marrieth Bernice.

C which her sister Bernice bare towards her (who hated her in regard of her beauty, and for this occasion ceased not to injure her) she condescended to forsake the religon of the Jews, and to marry with Fœlix, by whom she had a son who was called Agrippa. His death hereafter will I declare, and how in the Emperour Tiberius time he died, and was burned in the fire of the mountain Vesuvius with his wife. Bernice remained a widow, very long time after Herods death, who was both her uncle and her husband, and the report was that she had the company of her brother. Finally, she wrought so much, that Polemon King of Cilicia caused himself to be circumcised, to the end he might espouse her, purposing by that means to make it known how falsely she had been accused. Whereunto Polemon gave eare, because she was rich. But this marriage continued not any long time. For Bernice thorow her impu- The year of the world, 4018. after Christs Nativity, 56.

D dency, as it is reported, abandoned Polemon, who giving over that marriage forsook also the religion of the Jews. At the same time Mariamme having refused Archelaus her husband, married with Demetrius one of the chiefest Jews that were in Alexandria, both in regard of his descent, as also his riches, who at that time also exercised the office of Alubarcha, that is to say, the Governour of Arabia. She caused the sonne she had by him to be called Agrippinus. But of all this, will I speak more exactly hereafter. Mariamme scorning Archelaus, marrieth Demetrius. Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 10. al. 15.

The Emperour Claudius died after he had reigned thirteen yeers, eight moneths, and 20. dayes. Some say that he was poysoned by Agrippina his wife the daughter of Germanicus Claudius brother, which was first married to Domitius Aenobarbus, one of the greatest men of Rome: after whose death and long widowhood, she was finally married to Claudius, into

E whose house she brought her sonne called Domitius, by his own fathers name. Claudius had before-time put Messalina his wife to death, for the jealousie that he had of her: although he had had children by her, namely Brittanicus and Octavius. He had Octavia also by his first wife Pætina, which was elder then her brethren, and was married to Nero, whom Claudius so named, and adopted for his sonne. Agrippina, fearing lest Brittanicus, growing to mans estate, should succeed his father in the Empire, and desirous to make her own sonne Emperour, as it is reported: she left nothing unattempted that might bring her husband to his death; and presently sent Burrus, who was Generall of the Army, with certain other Captains, and those of greatest power among his free-men, to bring Nero into the field, and Agrippina, Messalina, and Pætina, Claudius wives. Nero Emperour.

F to proclaim him Emperour. He being thus established in the Empire, caused Brittanicus to be secretly poysoned; and not long after this, he openly caused his mother to be put to death, yielding her this recompence, not onely for that she had born him in her wombe but also because by her policies he had obtained the Empire. He likewise murthered Octavia his wife, and divers other noble men, under colour of some conspiracy intended against him. But I will no further prosecute this matter, for that there are divers who have composed Neros History, of whom some have no regard of the truth, but have spoken at their pleasure, for that he had been their benefactor: othersome transported with hatred and despight against him, have not been ashamed to publish such impudent lies against his renown, as they deserve to be condemned. Neither doe I wonder that they have invented so many lies against Nero, considering that in those Histories which they wrote as touching the precedent The year of the world, 4019. after the Nativitie of Christ, 57. Nero a tyrant. Emperours, they have not studied to speak truth, although they had not any occasion to hate them, considering that they lived a long time after their death. But let these contemners of truth write as them listeth, for that they seeme to take delight in that licence. For mine own part I am intended to write nothing but the truth: neither stand I much on that which concerneth not the matter which I intreat of, purposing in all truth and diligence to declare that which hath befalne our nation of the Jews, without omitting of either their misfortunes or follies, that have proceeded with them. I will therefore return to the discovery of our affairs. Azizus King of Emesene being dead the first year of the Emperour Neros reign, his brother obtained the Kingdome: Aristobulus the sonne of Herod King of Chalcis, had the government of the Signory of the lesser Armenia from Neros hand. Cæsar gave Agrippa a certain portion of Galilee, commanding those of Tiberias and Tarichæa to live under him. Besides this, he gave him Julias scituate beyond Jordan, with fourteen boroughs near adjoyning thereunto.

CHAP. VI.

The acts and gests of Fœlix, Governour of Judæa.

But the affairs of Judæa grew daily worse and worse. For the countrey was replenished again with theeves, and inchanters, who deceived the common people. Fælix apprehended many of them daily, and caused them to be executed and put to death. He took Eleazar also the sonne of Dinæus, who was captain of those outlaws and and theeves that ranged in the countrey, and surprized him by a subtilty. For Fælix had given him his word, that he should in no sort be endangered: Whereupon he came and submitted himself, and was presently fettered and sent to Rome. And for that he had conceived a displeasure against Jonathan the high Priest, who had divers times admonished him to use more circumspection in the government of Judæa, for fear he should be blamed by the people, for that he had required Cæsar that Fælix might be admitted to the government, he thought it not amisse to cut off Jonathan, who continually sollicited and vexed him. For this cause, he perswaded and bribed a certain man called Dora, who was born in Jerusalem; and was one of those in whom Jonathan reposed his most trust; to bring in certain theeves to murther Jonathan, who willingly listened to his demands; and desirous to gratifie the Governour, by this means that ensueth brought that to effect which he had intended. There were certain theeves that came up to Jerusalem, under colour to adore God, who carrying their swords closely hidden under their garments, accosted Jonathan and slew him. Now for that this murther was let slip, and not punished; from that day forward the theeves resorted boldly to solemn feasts, having their weapons hidden under their garments and thronging in among the people, slew some of those who were their adversaries; and othersome to pleasure those, who had hired them with ready money to rid them of those they misliked. And these outrages committed they not onely in other parts of the City, but in the Temple likewise, where they slaughtered some who little suspected that any impiety should be committed in that place. For mine own part, I think that God hath destroyed our Citie in detestation of that impietie: and for that he accounted the Temple for an impure mansion place, he hath sent us the Romanes, who have set fire on the same to purge the citie, and make us slaves with our wives and children, intending thereby to teach us wisdom by our own miseries. Thus was the City filled with these thefts and murthers. And as touching the enchanters and deceivers, they perswaded the common people to follow them into the desart, promising them to shew them signs and miracles done by the power of God: whereunto divers gave eare, and at last suffered the penalty of their folly. For Fælix recalling them back again, punished them.

At that same time there came a certain man from Egypt to Jerusalem, who tearmed himself a Prophet, who incited the common people to follow him to the Mount called Olivet, scituate not far off from Jerusalem, and onely distant some five furlongs from thence, telling them from thence that he would make them see the wals of the Citie fall unto the ground, by which way he promised to give them entrey. Which being reported to Fælix, he caused his souldiers to arme themselves, and departing out of Jerusalem with great store of horse and foot, he set upon them, and slew four hundred of them, and took two hundred alive: as for the Egyptian he escaped out of the skirmish, and no man knew what became of him. The theeves also incited the people anew to make war against the Romans, telling them that they ought not to yeeld them obedience; and they burned and spoiled divers of these boroughs which opposed themselves against them. It chanced also that that the Jews, which inhabited Cæsarea, mutined against the Syrians that were in the same

A City, in that they strove to have an equal authority in the government of the State as well as they. The Jews pretended the title of superiority, because that Herod, who was a Jew, had builded the City of Cæsarea: on the other side, the Syrians avowed the Iews sayings to be true; but they replied also that Cæsarea was in times past called the tower of Straton, and that at that time, there was not one Jew that inhabited the same. Which when the governours of that countrey heard, they laid hands on the authors of this sedition, as well of the one as of the other party, and gave them the bastinado, pacifying by this means the trouble for a little space. For the Jews once more being puffed up with their riches, and contemning the Syrians injuriously reviled and provoked them: on the other side, the Syrians being
B weaker in substance, but as great in heart (by reason the greatest number of those that bare arms with the Romans were Cæsareans and Sebastens) at some times brake out into opprobrious speeches against the Jews, and at length the quarel grew to that heat, that they cast stones one at another: so that on both sides divers of them were both slain and hurt, yet had the Jews the upper hand. Fælix perceiving that this debate might breed a war, came on between them, requiring the Jews to desist from further violence, and commanding his souldiers to beat down those who would refuse to obey him: by which means a great number were slain, and divers taken prisoners. Moreover, he gave his souldiers liberty to spoil, and rob divers very rich houses. The other Jews, who besides their authority were renowned for their moderation, fearing lest the like misery should befal them, besought Fælix to sound
C a retreat, and to call in his souldiers, and to spare that which as yet remained, being sore grieved at that which had happened: to which Fælix condescended. At that same time king Agrippa gave the Priesthood to Ismael, the son of Phabeus. There arose also a dissention betwixt the high Priests, and the other Priests and Governours of Jerusalem, and each faction walked forth accompanied with a troup of proud and mutinous persons, who decided their debates with bitter words, and flinging of stones, so that no man might pacifie them. For all things were so out of order as if there had been no Magistrates in the City: and the impudency and audaciousnesse of the high Priests permitted so much, that they sent their servants to the granges, to seize the tenths that were due unto the Priests; whereby it came to passe, that some poor Priests died of necessity, and want; so much did the violence of the seditious at that time prevail above all right.

CHAP. VII.

The goverment of Portius Festus: and of certain murtherers.

After that Portius Festus had been sent by Nero to succeed Fælix in the government of Iudæa, the chiefest of those Iews that inhabited Cæsarea, repaired to Rome to accuse Fælix: and without all doubt he had been punished for the injuries he had committed against the Iews, if Nero had not pardoned him upon his brother Pallas submission and intreaty, who importuned him, and was at that time in great reputation with E him. Furthermore, two of the chiefest amongst the Syrians wrought Berillus, who had sometimes been Neros Master, and at that time was Secretary of Estate in the Greek tongue, by mighty bribes, to beg at Neros hand the revocation of the right and title, which the Iews enjoyed in the government and administration of the common-weal. For which cause Berillus sollicited the Emperour, and obtained a letter at his hands, which was the cause of those mischiefs that afterwards hapned in our nation. For the Iews of Cæsarea, understanding what commission the Syrians had gotten, were so much the more kindled and encouraged to make war.

As soon therefore as Festus was arrived in Iudæa, he found the countrey grievously af-
F flicted with robberies, and the lower countrey was spoiled by sword and fire. The theeves likewise at that time increased wondrously, & they used short swords after the manner of a Persian Cymetre, & crooked like the Romane Faulchion; with which they slew divers men. For thrusting themselves into the presse of people that came in great multitudes on the festival dayes to celebrate Gods service, they killed those very easily whom they listed: and oftentimes repairing to their enemies villages, they spoiled and burnt the same. But Festus sent divers forces both of horse and foot against certain Iews, that were seduced by an enchanter, who had promised them security and repose from all their troubles and molestations, if so be they would follow him into the desart; who slew both the deceiver and the deceived that followed him. At that time King Agrippa erected a stately building, within the Palace at Ierusalem, neer unto the Porch. This Palace in times past appertained to the Asmonians, Asmonians, and was scituate in a high place with a goodly prospect, from whence they that listed, might with pleasure behold the whole City of Ierusalem, wherein the King took great delight, and beheld from thence that which was done in the Temple. The chiefest men of Ierusalem seeing this building, were sore displeased. For neither doth our custome or law permit that any one should look on that which is done in the Temple, and especially forbiddeth that any man should behold the sacrifices and oblations. They therefore builded a high wall upon the gallery, which was within the Temple on the Westside, which did not only dam up the sight of the royal chamber, but also that of the gallery without the Temple on the Westside, where the Romans kept guard near unto the Temple on the festival dayes. Herewith was King Agrippa sore displeased, and the Governour Festus far more then he, who commanded them to pull down the wall. But they besought him that he would give them licence to send their Embassadours to Nero, to this intent, alleadging that it was impossible for them to live, if any part of their Temple should be beaten down. Which being granted them, they sent ten of their chiefest nobility, and with them Ismael the high Priest, and Chelcias the Treasurer of the Temple, unto Nero: who no sooner heard their suit but he pardoned them, not onely for that they had done, but he commanded that the building should remain as it was. All which he did in favour of his wife Poppea, who was intreated by the Jews, for that she was a devout Princesse, to sue for them. She therefore commanded the ten Embassadours to return, and kept Chelcias and Ismael for pledges with her. The King understanding how all things had past, gave the high Priesthood to Joseph, sirnamed Cabi, which was the son of Simon, who in times past had been high Priest.

CHAP. VIII.

The government of Albinus.

CÆsar being advertised of Festus death, sent Albinus to govern Iudæa. But King Agrippa commanded Joseph to lead a private life, and advanced in his stead a certain man called Ananus, the son of Ananus, who is reported to have been most happie. For he had five sons, all which supplied the place of the high Priest, after himself had long time before them enjoyed the room: the like whereof hath never happened to any of our high Priests. The younger Ananus, who, as we said, was advanced to this place, was a rash and head-strong man, that followed the sect of the Sadduces, who (aswe have already declared) were amongst all other the Iews the most severe in executing justice: whereas therefore Ananus was of this disposition, he thought that he had a fit occasion offered him to do what him listed after Festus death, and during the time that Albinus was as yet upon his way. He therefore ascended and sate down in the Tribunal, assisted by the Iudges, and caused James the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, to appear before him, with certain others, and accused them for transgressing the law, and blasphemy against God, and caused him to be stoned to death. They that were men of upright conscience within the City, and diligent observers of the law, were very much displeased with this act, and sent secretly unto the King, beseeching him to prohibite Ananus, that hereafter he should commit no such like offence: for that his first action was not allowable. Some of them also went to meet Albinus, being on his way to Alexandria, to enform him that it was not lawful for Ananus to assemble the Councel without his licence. Albinus perswaded by these words, wrote a cholerick letter to Ananus, wherein he threatned to punish him. And for the same cause King Agrippa dispossessed him of the Priesthood, after he had held the same for the space of three moneths, and in his stead he established Jesus the son of Damnæus. After that Albinus was arrived in Ierusalem, he employed all his care and study to pacifie the countrey, by executing divers of the theeves.

But the high Priest Ananias daily increased in honour and credit, and purchased the good will of the citizens by his liberality and great gifts. But he had certain mischievous servants about him, who conversed with those that were most intemperate and audacious, who repairing from grange to grange, took up many tenths that belonged to the Priests, and beat those that refuse to tender them. The Priests used no lesse force then did their servants, having no man that might restrain them: whereby it came to passe that the Priests, who were before-time maintained by the tenth, died at that time for want of victuals. And the theeves renewing their entrance into the City by night, during the feast that was celebrated at that time, took the Secretary of Captain Eleazar alive, who was Ananias son, who was the high Priest. And having bound him, led him out of the City, sending Ananias word, that Agrippa permitteth the Miniſters of the Temple to ſing the ſacred Hymnes.

At that time was the building of the Temple finiſhed. And the people perceiving that more then eighteen thouſand workmen ſhould be idle, and deprived of wages, whereupon they were accuſtomed to live in travilling in the building of the Temple: on the other ſide, being loath to reſerve their money through the fear they had of the Romanes; to provide for thoſe workmen (in the entertainment of whom they reſolved to imploy their treaſure. for if any one of them travelled but one hour in the day, he was ſuddenly paid his wages) they requſted the King that it would pleaſe him to repair the Eſtern gate on the outward part of the Temple, ſcituate in a deſcent, the wals whereof were in height four hundred F cubits; made of ſquare ſtones of white marble, from the top to the bottome, and every ſtone twenty foot long, and ſix foot thick.

The people of the Iews beſeech the King that it may be lawful for them to repair the porch.

This work was firſt builded by King Solomon, who was the firſt that builded our Temple. But the King, who whom Claudius Cæſar had given the commiſſion of building the Temple, thinking with himſelf that it was very eaſie to break it down, but very hard to build it up, and that to reedifie the porch, it would coſt much time and expence, he denied their requeſt, permitting them never the leſſe to pave their City with broad ſtone. He took the Prieſthood from Feſus the ſon of Gamallel, and gave it to Matthias the ſon of Theophilus. In whoſe time the war betwixt the Romanes and Iews grew to the firſt head.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 18. The succession and number of the high Priests among the Jews.

Aaron and his progeny.

There were 83. high Priests in all.

But I think it not amisse, but very answerable to the course of this present history to speak G of the Priests, and to shew how they had their beginning, and to whom this honour may be lawfully communicated, & how many they were in number, untill the end of the war. The first of them was Aaron, Moses brother, after whose death his children succeeded him, and from that time forward the honour hath continued with their successours. For it is a law observed by our ancestors. that no man should be admitted to the Priesthood, except he be of Aarons posterity: for albeit he were a King, if so be that he were of another line, it was impossible for him to obtain the Priesthood. All the Priests after Aaron, (who as we have said) was the first, untill Phanasus, whom the seditious created Priest in the time of the war, have been in number eighty three, whereof 13 have executed the office from the time that Moses erected Gods Tabernacle in the desart untill such time as arriving in Judæa, King Solomon H builded a Temple to God. For in the beginning, the high Priesthood continued with the possessors for term of life: but afterwards, although the Priests were yet alive, yet were there other successours planted in their rooms. These thirteen were of Aarons posterity, and obtained this degree in succession the one after the other. Their first government was Aristocratie, which is the government of the nobility: afterwards a Monarchy; and finally, a royal government. The number of years wherein these theirteen flourished, were six hundred and twelve years, from the day that our fathers departed out of Egypt, under the conduct of Moses, untill the edification of the Temple that was builded in Jerusalem by King Solomon.

After these thirteen high Priests, there were eighteen others; who after Solomons time succeeded one after another, untill the time that Nabuchodonosor King of Babylon, having en- I camped before the City, took the same and burned the Temple, and transported our nation into Babylon, and led away the high Priest Josedech prisoner. The time of the Priesthood, and continuance of these eighteen was four hundred sixty years, six moneths, and ten daies: so long as the Jews have had the royal government. After the surprizal of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, untill such time as Cyrus King of Persia dismissed the Jews, and gave them leave to return from Babylon into their own countrey, with permission to reedifie their Temple, there are seventy years; and at that time the captives being returned, Jesus the son of Josedech took upon him the high Priesthood, who with those of his posterity to the number of fifteen, have governed in a Democratie or popular estate, untill the time of Antiochus sirnamed Eupator, for the space of four hundred and fourteen years. This Antiochus was the first, who with his General Lysias displaced Onias, sirnamed Menelaus, of his Priesthood; K commanding him to be slain at Beryth, and after he had driven his son out of the succession, he established Jacim high Priest, who notwithstanding was of Aarons race; but not of his family. For this cause Onias, the son of Onias, and nephew to the deceased Onias retyred himself into Egypt: where growing familiar with Ptolomey Philometor and Cleopatra his wife, he perswaded them to build a Temple in the confines of Heliopolis, not unlike to that of Jerusalem, and to create a high Priest in the same: of which Temple in Egypt, we have made very oftentimes mention. After that Jacim had held the Priesthood for the space of three years, he died without successour. For the City remained seven years without a high Priest. Again, the Asmoneans recovered the government of their nation, and after they had warred against the Macedons, they established Jonathan high Priest, who exercised the of- L fice seven years: but afterwards he was slain by an ambush, and treason conspired against him by Tryphon, as we have declared elsewhere. After him, Simon his brother undertook the Priesthood, who was not long after slain treacherously by his son in law at a banquet. After him succeeded his son Hircanus, who enjoying this dignity for the space of thirty one years, died when he was very old, leaving behind him Judas sirnamed Aristobulus, who dying by sickness, left his brother Alexander his heir, both of the Kingdom and high Priesthood. After that Aristobulus had obtained the royal government, he enjoyed both dignities one whole year. For this Judas sirnamed Aristobulus, was the first that set the Diadem on his head, causing himself to be called a King. The which Alexander did continue; for he also joyned the Kingdome with the high Priesthood, and raigned twenty seven years: M and feeling himself draw near to his death, he left it in Alaxandras his wives hands to dispose of the Priesthood as she pleased. She therefore bestowed it on Hircanus: and as touching the Kingdome, she kept it in her own hands nine years, and afterwards died. Her son Hircanus was high Priest for so long time: for after Alexandras death, his brother Aristobulus made war against him: and having overcome him, he took the Kingdome from him, and not onely seized the Crown, but the Priesthood. After he had raigned three years, and as many moneths, Pompey repaired to Jerusalem, and took it perforce, and laying hold of Aristobulus, sent him bound unto Rome with his children. After which he restored the Priesthood once

A more to Hyrcanus, committing the government of the nation unto his hands, forbidding him in the mean ſpace to wear the Diadem. Beſides the firſt nine years, Hyrcanus governed twenty and four, but Barzapharnes and Pacorus Princes of the Parthians, paſſed Euphrates, and made war againſt Hyrcanus, and took him alive priſoner, and made Antigonus, Ariſtobulus ſon king. But after he had governed three years and three moneths, Soſius and Herod took him alive perforce, and Antonius ſent him to Antioch where he was put to death. After that Herod was created king by the Romans, there was never any high Prieſt created of the poſterity of the Aſmoneans (for he gave the high Prieſthood to certain men of obſcure and baſe condition, who were of the order of the Prieſts) Ariſtobulus onely excepted. This Ariſtobulus was Hyrcanus nephew, who was priſoner among the Parthians: and having given him the Prieſthood, he married himſelf with Mariamme his ſiſter, to the intent to continue him-

B ſelf in the good liking of the people, in remembrance of Hyrcanus: but afterwards fearing leſt all of them ſhould turn to Ariſtobulus ſide, he cauſed him to be ſlain, by finding out a means to cauſe him to be ſtifled, at ſuch time as he bathed himſelf in a fiſh-pond near to Jericho, as we have declared before this. After him he beſtowed the Prieſthood no more on any of the line of the Aſmoneans. Archelaus his ſon, followed his fathers ſteps in reſpect of the Prieſthood, and from that time forward the Romanes have enjoyed the ſoveraignty over Jewry. All they then that have exerciſed the Prieſthood from Herods time, untill the day that Titus took the City and the Temple, have been in all twenty and eight. All the continuance of their government was one hundred and ſeven years. Certain of theſe governed during Herods life, and in the dayes of Archelaus his ſon: but after theſe two were

C dead, the government was Ariſtocratical, or of the Nobility, wherein the Prieſts had the government over the whole Nation. Thus much have we thought meet to ſpeak at this time as touching the high Prieſts.

CHAP. IX.

How Florus Albinus ſucceſſor, offered many injuries to the Jewes, which conſtrained them to take Armes.

D Geſsius Florus being ſent by Nero to ſucceed Albinus, filled all Judæa with many miſchiefs and miſeries. He was a Clazomenian born, and was married to a certain woman called Cleopatra, no leſſe miſchievous then himſelf; who being beloved by Poppea Neros wife, obtained this dignity for him. He behaved himſelf ſo outragiouſly and violently in all his government, that through the great injuſtice he committed, the Jewes praiſed Albinus as if he had been their benefactor. For he concealed his miſchief, taking care leſt it ſhould wholly be conceited or diſcovered: But Geſsius Florus behaved himſelf in ſuch ſort as if he had been ſent to make open ſhew and ſale of his villanies, publiſhed his injuſtice in the ears of our nation, without omitting either rapine or injuſtice in executing and inflicting puniſhment on the innocent. For he was pitileſſe and covetous, and made no difference between noble and ignoble, and was not aſhamed to be partaker with theeves: of whom there were divers that made it their profeſſion to ſteal without any

E fear, in that they were aſſured of their ſafety, becauſe he was partaker with them. And in a word, there was no moderation in him; in ſuch ſort that the poor Jewes being unable to endure the inſolent rapines and ſpoiling of their goods that they received by theſe theeves, were conſtrained to abandon their own houſes, and to flie their countrey and remained in ſome more commodious place of ſecurity, yea, though it were among ſtrangers. What need I ſpeak any more? He that conſtrained us to raiſe our ſwords againſt the Romanes, was Florus who made this account, that it was better for them to die all at once in great troopes, then to periſh by little and little. In brief, the war began the ſecond year of the Government of Florus in that Province, which was the twelfth year of Neros Empire.

F But they that deſire to know exactly all that which we have been conſtrained both to do and ſuffer, may peruſe my books as touching the Wars of the Jewes. For which cauſe in this place I will end this ancient Hiſtory, after which I have begun to deſcribe the Hiſtory of the War.

The beginning of the Wars.

This ancient Hiſtory containeth all that which hath been reported to be done ſince the firſt creation of man, untill the twelfth year of Neros Empire, omitting nothing that hath befallen the Jewes, as well in Egypt as in Syria and Paleſtine: All that likewiſe which we have been enforced to ſuffer under the Aſſyrians and Babylonians; as alſo our eſtate under the Perſians and Macedons, and finally under the Romanes. All this, as I ſuppoſe, I have compiled and gathered together with careful diligence, and I have enforced my ſelf to recite the

Furthermore, I dare boldly ſay, that whatſoever I have ſet down, is ſo aſſured, that there is no man either Jew or of what nation ſoever, yea, although he ſhould have employed the uttermoſt of his power, could more exactly communicate the ſame unto the Greeks, then I have done. For in their confeſſions and opinions who are of our nation, I have ſuch knowledge in that which concerneth our doctrine, as I ſurpaſſe them all: And as touching the Grecian diſciplines, I have ſtudied and learned the tongue, al-

For amongſt us we make but ſlender reckoning of thoſe, who are exerciſed in divers tongues, for that this ſtudy is accounted prophane by us, and common not onely to free perſons, but alſo unto ſlaves; and they onely are eſteemed to have profited in wiſdome who fully know the contents of the law, and who can expound the holy Scriptures. For this cauſe, although divers have travelled in this exerciſe of writing Hiſtories, yet are ther ſcarcely two or three of them that have written ſucceſſefully, and have received the fruits of their labours. THE LIFE OF FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS,

THE SON OF MATTHIAS, WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

NOw therefore that I am not basely but nobly descended, being both on the fathers and mothers side, derived from the line of the Priests: and for as much as some are accustomed to draw the ground of their nobilitie, the one from this man, the other from that; so among our Nation the mark of true nobilitie is, to derive a mans pedigree from the Priesthood. Touching my self I am not onely lineally issued from the Priests, but I draw my original from them, who amongst the foure and twentie ranks or families of Priests justly challenge the superioritie. Moreover, by my mothers side I am of the bloud Royal, for the heirs of the Asmoneans, from whom she is descended, have for a long time exercised the Priesthood and Princely power among our Nation. I will likewise make it known, how my predecessours have succeded the one after the other. My great grandfathers father was Simon, sirnamed Psellus, that is, the stutterer, who lived at such time as Hircanus the high Priest, the first of that name, and the son of Simon the high Priest, was in office. This Simon Psellus had nine sons: the one of these was Matthias, sirnamed Aphlas. This Matthias tooke to wife the daughter of the high Priest Jonathan, by whom he had one sonne, who was Matthias, sirnamed Curtus, who was borne in the first yeere of Hircanus Priest-hood. Matthias begat Joseph the ninth yeer of Alexandras government, and of Joseph came Matthias the teath yeer of the reign of Archelaus; and Matthias begat me the first yeer of the Empire of Caius Cæsar. I likewise have three sons, mine eldest is Hircanus, who was born in the fourth: my next Justus, who was born in the seventh: and Agrippa my last was born in the ninth yeer of Vespasians Empire. This Genealogy of mine do I in this manner propose, according as I have found it written in the publick Registers, to put them to silence who shall pretend to reprove or detract the same.

Josephus Linage.

Joseph the son of Matthias was born in the first yeer of Caius Cæsars Empire, and the 4001. yeer of the world, and the 39. after Christs birth.

My father Matthias was not onely famous for his expresse nobilitie, but hath also been prayed by reason of his justice and authoritie in Jerusalem, which is the mother City of all the rest in our Countrey. My bringing up during my tender yeers was with Matthias, who was my brother by the same father and mother; with whom I happily profited in all kind of Science, having a good memory and a quick apprehending Spirit: so that, being as yet a child of fourteen yeers of age, I was prayed by all men in regard of the good affection I bare to learning, and the Priests and noblest Citizens alwayes assembled about me, to receive certain exact instructions from me in any thing that concerned our Ordinances. About the age of sixteen yeers, my desire was to have a search and insight into the Sects of our Nation, which (as I have said) are three: The first of the Pharisees, which is the chiefest. The second of the Sadduces. And the third of the Esseans. For I truely thought with my self, that I might easily choose the better of the three, at such time as I had been exercised and acquainted with them all: for which cause with great abstinence and no lesse labour, I passed thorow them all: and not content with this experience, after I had heard that a certain man called Banus lived in the desart, clothing himself with that which the trees brought forth, and feeding on no other kind of meat, but that which they willingly yielded him, washing himself oftentimes by day and night in cold water to keep himself chast; I began to imitate his course of life: and after I had lived with him for the space of three yeers, and satisfied my desires, at last I returned into the Citie.

Joseph from his infancy very studious, and addicted to learning.

At the age of nineteen yeers, I began to intermeddle with publick affairs, following the Sect of the Pharisees, which very neerly resembleth that Sect among the Græcians, who are called Stoicks. After I was six & twenty yeers old, it was my fortune to repair to Rome upon this occasion that ensueth: During such time as Felix governed Judæa, there were certain Priests my familiars, men of much honour, and more vertue, who upon some slight occasion were bound and ſent to Rome by his commandment, to anſwer to that which was objected againſt them in Cæſars preſence. Whereupon I being deſirous to labour for their liberty, having ſpecial intelligence, that notwithſtanding the torments wherewith they were martyred, they buried not in forgetfulneſſe that pietie which they ought to God, but lived on figs and nuts: for this cauſe I departed for Rome, and was encountred with many great and grievous hazards by ſea. For the ſhip, wherein I ſailed, was wrackt in the midſt of the Adriatike ſea, and there was about ſix hundreth of us that ſwamme all night long, and upon the day-ſpring by Gods providence a Cyrenian ſhip came in ſight, and both I and certain others, to the number of fourſcore, out-ſwimming the reſt, were taken up into it and ſaved. After I had in this ſort eſcaped, I came to Dicæarchia, which the Italians call at this day Puteol, and grew acquainted with Aliturus a Jew born, who was a Player, and in good reputation with Nero; by whoſe means inſinuating my ſelf into Poppeas knowledge, who was Cæſars wife, I determined to beſeech her to procure thoſe Prieſts liberties, with all expedition: which done, I by her means recovered their preſent libertie: and being gratified likewiſe by her with many great gifts, I returned into my Countrey. There found I the Common-weale too much addicted to factions and troubles, and divers too prone and ready to rebel and forget their allegeance to the Romanes. I inforced my ſelf to repreſſe the ſeditious, and exhorted them to change their opinions, repreſenting before their eyes the qualitie of thoſe, againſt whom they enterprized their warre, with whom they neither might compare in experience of Warre, neither in good Fortune: For this cauſe I adviſed them, not to hazard and overthrow their Countrey by their raſhneſſe and rage, and with it their poſterities and themſelves.

Ioſephs ſhipwrack.

Ioſeph obtaineth the Prieſts liberties.

The Iews ſeditious.

To this effect ſpake I unto them, and inſtantly entreated them to forſake their untamed reſolution, for that I foreſaw that the end of this war would redound to our utter ruine: but I prevailed nothing with them. For the furie of deſperate and diſſolute men prevailed above reaſon: for which cauſe fearing leſt by continual inforcing of one thing, I ſhould grow into hatred and ſuſpicion amongſt them, as if I favoured their enemies; fearing likewiſe leſt if they ſhould lay hold on me, they ſhould be put to death, ſeeing that the Fort of Antonia was already ſeized upon by the ſeditious; I retired my ſelf into the inner part of the Temple. In proceſſe of time, after Manahem and the chiefeſt among the thieves were put to death; I came out again from the Temple, and converſed with the Prieſts, and chiefeſt Phariſees, who were ſurprized with great fear. And grievouſly were we diſmayed, when we ſaw the people in arms: and being uncertain what to doe, and wanting the means to pacifie theſe mutinies, and apparantly perceiving their manifeſt danger, both I and the Phariſees told them, our opinion was anſwerable to theirs, and counſelled them to contain themſelves in peace, and not to provoke the enemie. For our hope was, that Feſſius would with all expedition draw out great forces, and chaſtiſe thoſe peace-breakers. But as ſoon as he arrived, and had fought with them, he was overcome, and a great number of his men were ſlain; whereupon grew the utter ruine of our whole Nation. For ſuch as deſired the War, were puffed up with that victorie, and conceived an aſſured hope that in the end they ſhould overcome the Romans. Beſides that, this enſuing occaſion preſented it ſelf: The inhabitants of the Cities that bordered upon Syria, laid hand on thoſe Jews that dwelt amongſt them, and ſlew both them, their wives and children, without any juſt cauſe or crime committed by them. For they had not conſpired any wayes, or intended to revolt from the Romanes, or to uſe any hoſtilitie, or any ſecret conſpiracie againſt any of thoſe, with whom they were converſant. But among all the reſt, the Citizens of Scythopolis exceeded all other in impietie and wickedneſſe. For being beſieged without by certain of the Jewes, they inforced thoſe Jewes that inhabited amongſt them to take armes, and charged thoſe of their own Nation (which is both prohibited and unlawful by our Lawes) who fighting againſt them diſcomfited them: but after this overthrow, they in ſuch ſort falſified and forgot their faith, that they had given to their aſſociates and fellow Citizens, that they ſlew every mothers ſon of them, to the number of many thouſands. The like misfortune alſo fell upon thoſe Jewes that inhabited Damaſco. But of this we have more amply ſpoken in thoſe our books, which we have written of the Wars of the Jewes: and at this preſent I make mention hereof, intending to ſignifie, and certainly perſwade the Readers, that the War which was waged with the Romanes, proceeded not of a reſolute intent and purpoſe, but for the moſt part of an inforced neceſſitie.

Ioſeph dehotting the Iews from ſedition, is ſuſpected by them of treaſon.

The Iewes are plagued both by ſtrangers and their own conntreymen.

The Iews conſtrained by neceſſitie to make warre.

After that Ieſſius was overcome (as we have heretofore declared) the chiefeſt men of Jeruſalem perceiving that the thieves made a party among the ſeditious, and were ſtrongly and plentifully armed and provided, they began to fear leſt if they ſhould be found diſarmed, they

A they ſhould ſuddenly be overthrown by their enemies; as in effect it fell out afterwards, and hearing that all Galilee was not as yet wholly revolted from the Romans; but that a part thereof as yet entertained the peace, they ſent me with two other Prieſts, Joazar and Judas, who were both vertuous and honorable men, to perſwade the mutinous to lay by their arms, and to let them know that it was more behooveful for the good of the Nation, that ſuch men as were in authoritie and reputation, ſhould have the keeping thereof. The reſolution that was taken by them was, that they had them alwayes ready upon all occaſions, but that they expected untill they were certified, what the Romans intended to do.

With this commiſſion and ſuch like inſtructions, I repaired into Galilee: where I found the Sephorites were in no ſmall hazard in reſpect of their countrey, for that they of Galile had reſolved to forrage the ſame in regard of their league of friendſhip continued with the Romans, and contracted and ratified by Senius Gallus, Governor of Syria. But I delivered B them all of that fear, and appeaſed the common people by permitting them, to ſend at all times when they pleaſed, their hoſtages to Geſſius, who lay at Dora, a City of Phœnicia. I found likewiſe that the inhabitants of Tiberias were already in arms,, upon this occaſion following: There were in that City three different factions, the one of the nobilitie, whoſe chieftain was Julius Capella, and all thoſe that accompanied him, that is to ſay, Herod the ſon of Miarus, Herod the ſon of Gamalus, and Compſus the ſon of Compſus, (for Criſpus his brother, who in times paſt had been governour for Agrippa, ſirnamed the Great, was amongſt his poſſeſſions on the other ſide of Jordan) all theſe, I ſay, gave counſel at that time to ſubſcribe to the Romans authoritie, and to obey their King. But Piſtus would no wayes accord to this advice, C in regard of his ſonne Juſtus: for naturally he was vain-glorious. The ſecond faction was of the common ſort, who concluded upon warre. Juſtus, Piſtus ſonne, who was the ring-leader of the third faction, carried himſelf very doubtfully as touching the warre; yet notwithſtanding he ſought and thirſted after innovation, hoping that by a change he ſhould encreaſe his power. "Preſenting himſelf therefore in the midſt of the multitude he inforced "himſelf to perſwade the common ſort, that their Citie had alwaies belonged to Galilee, and "that during the dayes of Herod the Tetrarch, who founded the ſame, it was the chiefeſt city, "whoſe pleaſure it was that the Citie of Sephoris ſhould yield obedience to that of Tiberias. "Furthermore, he avowed that they had not loſt that preeminence in the time of king Agrippa "the father, but had continued the ſame till Felix obtained the government of Judæa. But D "for the preſent wherein they had been given by Nero to the younger Agrippa, they had "fallen and loſt their ſuperioritie. For the Citie of Sephoris obtained the ſoveraignetie of "Galilee, after that ſhe acknowledged the Romane government, who had aboliſhed the "table royal and publick Regiſters. By theſe words and others of like nature, inforced againſt "King Agrippa, he incited the people to rebellion, ſignifying unto them, that the opportu- "nity invited them to take arms, to the end that being aſſociated with the Galileans, they "might make themſelves Lords, for that all of them would willingly joyn themſelves with "them through the hatred they bare the Sephorites, on whom they would revenge them- "ſelves with great force, becauſe they continued in their allegeance, which they promiſed to E "the Romans.

And by theſe, words he won the peoples hearts unto him: for he was a man that was very eloquent, and by his ſubtilty and politike diſcourſe, eaſily overthrew all that which his adverſaries produced againſt him. For he was not ignorant of thoſe ſciences that are known unto the Greeks: but truſting to his wiſedome and good diſcourſe, he began to diſcover how all things had paſt at that time, to the intent that by ſuch colourable inſinuations he might ſmother the truth. But in the proceſs of our diſcourſe, we will declare that he was a man of a diſſolute life, and that by his and his brothers means, he wanted little of utterly overthrowing his Countrey. When as therefore this Juſtus had perſwaded the Citizens of Tiberias, to take armes, and had conſtrained divers men likewiſe, who were of the contrary opinion F to do the like, he iſſued out with them, and burned the villages of the Gadarenians and Hippenians, that are ſcituate in the confines of Tiberias and Scythopolis. In this eſtate was Tiberias: And as touching Giſchala, their eſtate and affairs were brought to this iſſue: John the ſonne of Levi ſeeing ſome of the Citizens waxen proud by means of their revolt from the Romanes, laboured to reſtrain them; and required them to continue in their allegeance: but notwithſtanding, all his perſwaſion and diligence he could not contain them. For the Nations round about them, as the Gadarenians, Gabaraganeans and Tyrians aſſembled a great Army, and with the ſame aſſailed Giſchala, and took it by force: and after they had conſumed it by fire, and utterly deſtroyed the ſame, they returned every one to their dwelling

When as therefore Philip had ſojourned there for H
the ſpace of four dayes, on the fifth he fled away, diſguiſing himſelf in a falſ hair, for fear he ſhould be diſcovered: And as ſoon as he was arrived in one of thoſe Villages, which was of his own poſſeſſion, ſcituate neer unto Gamala, he ſent for certain of his ſubjects to make their repair unto him. But God would not permit it; but for Philips greater good, he croſſed the ſcope of his intent, which otherwiſe had been the ruine of many: for being ſurprized by a ſudden fever, he committed certain letters of his written to Agrippa and Bernice, who were yet but young, to one of his free-men, commanding him to deliver them to Varus, who was put in truſt by the King and Queen to adminiſter the affaires of their Kingdome, for that they were gone to Beryth to meet with Geſſius. As ſoon therefore as he had received Philips letters, and underſtood that he was eſcapt, he took it very hardly, for that I he thought it would be ſaid, that the King and Queen had no uſe of him ſince Philip was arrived. He therefore brought him that had the carriage of theſe letters, into the peoples preſence, objecting againſt him that he had forged that writing, alledging that he falſely lied, in that he reported that Philip was in Jeruſalem, making war with the Jews againſt the Romans: and for that cauſe he commanded him to be executed, Philip being ignorant of the cauſe why his free-man did not return; ſent another with letters, to the intent he might diſcover what was become of his firſt meſſenger, and for what cauſe he ſtayed ſo long. But Varus accuſing his ſecond meſſenger alſo very falſely, commanded him to be executed, as he had done the firſt. For the Syrians that inhabit Cæſarea, had made him proud, inſomuch that he aſpired to high and great matters, by telling him that Agrippa ſhould be put to death K by the Romans, in regard of thoſe faults which the Jewes had committed, and that Varus, who was royally deſcended, ſhould poſſeſſe his government. For without queſtion Varus was held to be of the blood-royal, for that he derived his pedigree from the Tetrarch Sohemus that governed the Countrey that abutted on Libanus. For theſe cauſes, Varus grew proud, and retained Philips letters by him, hoping by theſe means that the King ſhould have no knowledge thereof; and he ſet watch in every paſſage, for fear leaſt any man ſhould flie, and certifie the King of that which had happened; and to give the Syrians the better content, who dwelt in Cæſarea, he put divers of thoſe Jews that dwelt among them to death. He intended alſo to undertake a war againſt the Jewes of Bathanæa, who were called Babylonian Jewes, by confederating himſelf with the Trachonites of Barthanæa. For which cauſe, ſend- L ing for twelve of thoſe Jewes who were of moſt eſtimation amongſt the inhabitants of Cæſarea, he enjoyned them to repair to Ecbatane, to ſignifie unto thoſe of their Nation that dwelt there, that Varus underſtanding that they pretended to take armes againſt their King, and ſcarcely believing it, had ſent them unto them, to perſwade them to lay by their armes. And that this ſhould be a certain ſigne, by which they might perfectly expreſſe that he had no reaſon to give credit to their reports who had enforced and objected ſo much againſt them. Furthermore, he commanded them that ſeventie of the chiefeſt of them ſhould be choſen out, to anſwer to thoſe accuſations wherewith they ſhould be charged. Theſe twelve arriving in Ecbatane, and entertained by thoſe of their Nation, found that they neither imagined nor intended any commotion: for which cauſe, they perſwaded them to ſend their M ſeventie men: which they did, little ſuſpecting that which would happen.

Varus killeth the ſeventy Iews with the Embaſſadors. The Iews retire themſelves into the fortreſſe of Gamala, and thither reſorteth Philip alſo.

As ſoon therefore as theſe with the other twelve Embaſſadors came to Cæſarea, Varus having inkling of their coming, met them on the way with the Kings forces, and ſlew them altogether with the foreſaid Embaſſadors, and took his way towards the Jews of Ecbatane. But one of the 70 who had eſcaped, reſorted thither with all expedition, preventing Varus, and certified the reſt of that which had hapned. Whereupon, they incontinently fell to arms, and with their wives and children retired themſelves to the Fort of Gamala, abandoning their Villages which were ſtored with all kind of goods, and many thouſand cattell. When Philip had tidings hereof, he repaired himſelf alſo to the Fort of Gamala: where he no ſooner arrived,

A arrived, but the people cried out with a loud voice, exhorting him to take the soveraignty, and to make warre against Varus, and the Syrians of Cæsarea. For they had intelligence that the King was dead. But Philip moderated their fury, recounting unto them what benefits the King had bestowed on them, and of what power the Romans were, against whom it was but a folly for them to take arms; and in the end he perswaded them to peace. The King understanding that Varus was determined to kill and murther all the Jewes that were in Cæsarea, with their wives and children all in one day, (who were as many in number) he sent unto him Equus Modius to supply his place, as it hath been by us declared in another place. Mean-while Philip kept the Fort of Gamala, and the Countrey thereabouts, persevering in their fidelitie
B and loyaltie to the Romans. As soon as I arrived in Galilee, and had perceived and learned all occurrences that had happened, by those who reported the same unto me, I presently signified the whole estate by my letters, to the Councel at Jerusalem, to know what their pleasure was I should do. Who gave me this answer, that I should remain where I was, and retain those Embassadors that I had with me, if they thought good to take charge of Galilee. But they being very wealthy, by means of those tenths and tithes that were given them; and very willing, because they were due, to gather them up in right of their Priesthood, resolved with themselves to return to their own houses. But for that I entreated them to remain with me, untill such time, as we had settled the affairs, they willingly consented unto me. I therefore departed with them to the Citie of Sephora, and came into a borough called Bethmaus distant from Tiberias some four furlongs, and from thence I sent a messenger to C the Councell of Tiberias, exhorting the chiefest among the people, to come and speak with me: who coming forth to visit me, accompanied with Justus also, I told them that I was sent Embassadour unto them, with those other, by the communaltie of Jerusalem, to perswade them to deface that building that was erected by Herod the Tetrarch, wherein divers figures of living Creatures were painted; for that our law forbad them to allow, or doe such things, and I exhorted them to suffer us to doe that execution as soon as they might.

Capella and those of his party, did for a long time refuse to consent thereunto: but in the end, we enforced them so much, that they condescended. Now whilest we debated upon this
D conclusion, Jesus the son of Saphias (of whom we have spoken heretofore, declaring how he was the Chieftain and conductor of the faction of sailers and poore men) took with him certain Galileans, and set fire on all the Palace, under hope to get great riches thereby (for that there were certain roofs of the house covered with gold) who spoyled many things against our consent. For after we had conferred with Capella, and the chiefest Tiberians, we retired our selves from Bethmaus into the higher Galilee. In the mean time Jesus men slew all the Greekes that remained there, and who before the war had been their enemies. Which when I was certified of, I was grievously displeased, and came down to Tiberias, and disposed of the Kings moveables, for fear they should be carried away by the robbers: and having recovered a candlestick of Corinthian work, princely tables, and no small quantitie of massive silver: I resolved with my self to reserve it to the Kings use. Calling therefore E tenne of the chiefest Senatours, and Capella, Antillus son unto me, I delivered the vessels into their hands, charging them to deliver the same to no man, except it were to my self.

From thence, with mine associates, I went to John at Gischala, to know what his minde and resolution was, and I presently smelt out by him, that he affected innovation and tyranny. For he besought me to grant him liberty, to transport Cæsars wheat that was stored up in the villages of higher Galilee, telling me that he would bestow the same in reedifying and repairing the walls of his Countrey. But I smelling out both his drift and counsels, denied him that liberty. For I thought that that wheat would either serve the Romans, or my self, for that already I had the care of that Countrey committed to my hands by the Citie
F of Jerusalem. When as therefore he could win nothing at my hands, he appealed to my companions, who were improvident of those troubles that were to come, and greedy of rewards, and obtained at their hands through his lavish liberalitie, a liberty to dispose of all the corn that was in the Province, in that I my self was unable to contradict them both. After, this, John used another subtiltie: for he said that those Jews, who inhabited Cæsarea Philippi being by the command of their King, to whom they were subiect, Kept prisoners within their walls; being in want of pure oyle, desired to buy the same at his hands, for fear lest contrarie to their custome, they should be compelled to use that of the Greeks. But this spake he not in respect of religion, or devotion, but for his filthy lucres sake. For knowing that among the Cæsareans, two sextaries were sold for a drachme, and that at Gischalis eightie ſextaries were ſold for four drachmes, he ſent all that oyle that was in that place unto them, doing it (as he thought) by my permiſſion. But I did not willingly condeſcend thereunto, but for fear leſt I ſhould withſtand the ſame, the people ſhould ſtone me to death. As ſoon therefore as I had given them leave, John gathered a great ſum of money by this cunning ſhift. G

From this place diſmiſſed I my companions, and ſent them back to Jeruſalem, imploying my ſelf wholly afterwards in preparing armour, and fortifying Cities. After this, calling the ſtouteſt thieves before me, when as I perceived that I might not recover their weapons from them, I perſwaded the multitude to hire them by rewards, telling them that it was more profitable for them to entertain them in their ſervice, then to ſuffer their countrey to be ſpoyled by their excurſions. And thus having taken their oaths, did I diſmiſs them under H condition, that they ſhould not come into our Region, except they were called, or to receive their due pay, under condition, that they ſhould abſtain from ſpoyling either the Romanes, or the inhabitants of the Countrey. But above all things my care was to keep Galilee in peace. And whereas my deſire was to get ſeventie pledges of their loyaltie, choſen out amongſt their Nobility under pretext of friendſhip, as ſoon as they came unto me in way of friendſhip, I made them my companions and fellow Judges, and decreed many things according to their opinions, having an eſpeciall care, leſt through raſhneſſe I ſhould injure Juſtice, or through corruption of rewards ſtain mine incorrupted honour. At ſuch time therefore as I was thirty yeers old, at which yeers, although a man bridle himſelf from unlawfull affections; yet hardly can he eſcape from the poyſoned ſting of detraction, eſpecially, if a great authoritie be annexed to his green yeers: I never offered vain and unlawful courting to any I woman, neither could any man faſten a bribe on me, in that I pretended want of nothing: yea, I refuſed thoſe tenths, which in right of Prieſthood I might have received from thoſe, that brought them me. Yet after the conqueſt of the Syrians, I took part of the ſpoil, which (as I freely confeſſe) I ſent to Jeruſalem to my kinſmen. And whereas at two times I had forcibly overcome the Sephorites, the Tiberians four times, and the Gadarenians once, and had brought John under my ſubjection, who had oftentimes ſought to entrap me; neither could I endure to revenge my ſelf on him, neither on any of the abovenamed people, as in the ſequel of this Story I will make manifeſt.

Ioſephs bounty towards his enemies.

For which cauſe I ſuppoſe, that God, who is the trier, and ſearcher of all juſt hearts, both K delivered me at this time out of the hands of mine enemies, and afterwards, and that many times out of dangerous and ſeveral misfortunes; as hereafter ſhall appear in time and place. But ſo great was the faith and benevolence of the common people of Galilee towards me, that their Cities being overthrown, and their Families led into captivitie, they ſpent not ſo many tears for their own calamities, as they beſtowed cares for my preſervation and ſecurity. Which when John perceived, he began to envie me, and beſought me by his letters, that I would give him licence for his health ſake, to bathe himſelf in the hot baths of Tiberias: I ſuſpecting no treaſon, willingly granted him that which he demanded. Moreover, I wrote unto thoſe, to whom I had committed the truſt and adminiſtration of the citie, to prepare him a lodging, and to furniſh all his companions with victuals, and to provide him alſo of all L things neceſſarie for his diet and entertainment. In the mean ſpace, I my ſelf paſt my time in a certain Village of Galilee, called Cana. But after that John came to Tiberias, he wrought the Townſmen in ſuch ſort, that forgetting both their faith and dutie, they revolted unto him; and many of them lent a willing ear unto his entreaties, eſpecially ſuch as rejoycing in innovations were too prone to change, and greedy of diſſenſion: but in eſpecial, Juſtus, and his father Piſtus, willingly entertained this occaſion to revolt from my obedience, and to ſubmit themſelves to John; yet was this conſpiracy of theirs prevented by my ſpeedy acceſſe. For a certain meſſenger came unto me from Silas, whom I had in former time preferred to the government of Tiberias, who certified me of the Citizens intent, and exhorted me in all haſte to make my repair thither, for that otherwiſe, the citie would ſhortly fall into M another mans hands. As ſoon therefore as I had peruſed Silas Letters, I travelled all night long with two hundred choſen men; and ſending a meſſenger before me, who might ſignifie my approach to the citizens, I loſt neither time nor way: And in the morning when I drew neer unto the citie, the whole people came out to meet me, and among the reſt, John; who after he had beheld me, and ſaluted me with a ſuſpicious countenance, fearing leſt his treaſon being diſcovered, he ſhould grow in danger of his life, ſpeedily retyred himſelf into his lodging. And when as I drew neer the citie within a furlong, diſmiſſing all my guard but one, and retaining onely ten armed ſouldiers with me, I began to expoſtulate with the Tiberians from a certain high place, from whence I might be heard, and counſelled them

that,

A that they would not revolt, leſt in ſo doing they might ſhortly repent them of their mutability, and breach of faith: for that no man hereafter would give him credit, being already either ſuſpected, or guilty of this their perfidiouſneſſe.

Scarcely had I ſpoken this, but that I heard one of my attendants, who perſwaded me to deſcend, telling me that this was no time now to reconcile the Tiberians, or to perſwade them, but rather to ſeek for mine own ſecuritie, and how I might eſcape mine enemies. For after that Iohn had learned that I was deſtitute of followers, he ſent a thouſand of his choſen ſouldiers: commanding them to kill me; who were at hand, and ready to commit the murther, had I not ſpeedily leapt down with my ſervant Iacob, and being relieved by Herod the B Tiberian, had been brought to the lake; where finding a barke by chance, and putting forth to ſea, I eſcaped contrary to mine enemies expectation, and came to Taricheas.

Iohn ſeeketh to betray and murther Ioſeph.

As ſoon as the inhabitants of that eitie underſtood how perfidiouſly and traiterouſly the Tiberians had dealt with me, they were ſore diſpleaſed, and betaking themſelves to their weapons, perſwaded me to lead them forth againſt them, telling me that they would revenge the injury that was offered unto their Governour, and they blazed this treaſon of theirs thorow all Galilee. For which cauſe a number of armed Galileans came to me, requeſting me that I would invade Tiberias, and entering it, that I would ſpoil the ſame; and in the ruines thereof, that I would ſell the inhabitants with their whole families under the ſpeare. The like did my friends, who eſcaped with me out of the City, perſwade me. But I C in no ſort would admit their ſuite, ſuppoſing it to be a matter unworthy my diſcretion, to revive a cauſe of civil warre, imagining with my ſelf, that ſuch a contention ought to proceed no further then words: yea, I proteſted unto them, that ſuch revenge would be prejudiciall to themſelves alſo, if the Romanes ſtanding at gaze, they ſhould ſpend themſelves in civill diſcords. By this means at length the Galileans wrath was appeaſed.

The Galileans require that they may invade Tiberias.

But when Iohn perceived that he failed of his purpoſe, he began to fear: for which cauſe, taking with him thoſe armed men that he kept about him, and forſaking Tiberias, he repaired to Giſchala, and from thence he wrote his letters unto me, excuſing the fact, as if he had been no waies guilty thereof, and beſought me, that I would in no ſort ſuſpect him, and confirmed his words with execrable oathes, whereby he might win the more credit to his D writing. But the Galileans, who were gathered in great multitudes from all parts of the region, knowing that he was a wicked and perfidious man, beſought me that I would lead them forth againſt him, promiſing me to overthrow both him, Giſchala, and all his countrey. Therefore, after I had given them thanks for their love towards me, I promiſed them, that mine offices of love ſhould be anſwerable to their kindneſſe. Yet beſought I them to reſtrain themſelves, and to grant me pardon, for that I thought it better to appeaſe, then procure troubles.

Iohn excuſeth himſelf to Ioſeph.

This requeſt of mine the Galileans granted: Whereupon we preſently came to Sephoris. But the townſmen, who were reſolved to continue faithfull towards the Romane people, fearing my approach, endeavouring themſelves to diſtract me with ſome other affairs, where- E by they might live in more ſecurity. Whereupon, ſending their meſſenger to Ieſus, the Captain of the theeues, that kept upon the confines of Ptolemais, they promiſed him a great ſumme of money, if with his army of eight hundreth men, who lived under his command, he would wage warre with us. He allured by their promiſes, bethought himſelf to aſſail us ſuddenly and unawares: for which cauſe he beſought me by a meſſenger, that I would grant him leave and liberty to come and ſalute me: which when he had obtained, for that I was wholly ignoraut of his treaſon, taking with him a troup of his theeves, he haſted ſpeedily towards me: yet failed he of his purpoſed treaſon; for when he was not far off from me, a certain fugitive of his troup diſcovered his intent towards me. Which when I heard, I went out into the market place, faining that I knew nothing of his ſecret fraud, attended F with a multitude of armed Galileans, and among theſe with certain Tiberians.

Ieſus captain of theeves.

Afterwards, ſending abroad certain ſpies, who ſhould ſcoure the high-waies, I commanded the keepers of the gates, that they ſhould onely ſuffer Ieſus to enter with the formoſt of his company, & exclude the reſt: and if they ſhould attempt to break in by force, they ſhould beat them off. Who fulfilling that which was commanded them, Ieſus entered with a few: and being willed by me preſently to lay down his weapons, except he deſired to be ſlain; he, ſeeing himſelf invironed with armed ſouldiers, obeyed. Whereupon they that followed him, and were excluded, perceiving that their Captain was apprehended, ſuddenly betook them to flight; & leading Ieſus apart, I told him I was not ignorant of thoſe treaſons, which he intended againſt me, neither by whoſe provocations he attempted the ſame. Yet told I him that that I would pardon him, if so be by changing his manners, he would be faithfull unto me hereafter. Who promising me all that which I requested, I dismissed the man, and gave him leave to depart with his weapons: yet threatned I to punish the Sephorites, except hereafter they desisted from their Treasons. About the same time there came two noble men unto me, who were subject to the King of Trachonites, bringing with them both horsemen, armour and money: whom when the Jews would have constrained to be circumcised, if so be they would remain amongst them, I would not permit them to be troublesome to the Trachonites, alledging that every man ought, according to his own mind, and not by other mens impulsion serve God: and that it was not to be suffered, that they, who for their securitie sake were fled unto us, should repent themselves of their trust they put in us. And thus having perswaded the multitude, I freely and aboundantly furnished these men with all things necessary.

Iosephs care of religion.

In the mean space, Agrippa sent out his forces under the conduct of Equus Modius, to take the Castle Magdala by force, which for that they durst not assault, they beset the wayes, and the rather troubled Gamala. But Ebutius Decadarcus, who had the government of the great champain, hearing that I was come to a certain village called Simonias, scituate on the confines of Galilee, and distant from the same some sixty furlongs, took with him by night one hundred horse that attended him, and about two hundreth footmen, with certain inhabitants of the Citie of Gaba their associates, whom he conducted by night, and assailed and beset the borough where I was. Against whom after I had drawn forth a valiant band of men, Ebutius laboured all that he might, to toul us into the champain, for that he trusted very much in his horsemen: but he easily perceived that we might not be won. For knowing the advantage which the horsemen had, if we should encounter them in the plain, considering that we were but footmen, I resolved to fight in the place where we were, and Ebutius charged us for a while very valiantly. At length perceiving that he had no use of his horsemen in that place, he sounded the retreat, and departed back again with lost labour to Gaba, having onely lost three men in the battel. But I presently pursued him with two thousand armed men: and when I came to Besara, which is scituate on the confines of Ptolemais, distant some twenty furlongs from Gaba, where Ebutius encamped at that time; and besetting all the passages with courts of guard, whereby we might be more secure from the excursions of our enemies untill we had carried out the wheat, whereof there was a great quantitie stored up in that place, which was gathered out of the townships thereabout, belonging to Queen Bernice, and loading divers Camels and Asses, which to that end I had brought with me; I sent the same corn into Galilee. And having finished this businesse, I offered Ebutius the battel: and whereas he detracted the same, being terrified by our boldnesse, I took my course to encounter with Noepolitanus, who (as it was reported) was in the territory of the Tiberians, and forraged there. Now this Noepolitanus was a Captain of horsemen, and had undertaken to defend Scythopolis against their enemies: Having therefore driven him from doing any wrong in the Countrey belonging to the Tiberians, I provided for the securitie of Galilee.

But John the son of Levi, who (as we said) lived at Gischala, after he heard that all things fell out fortunately with me, and that I was loved of my subjects, and feared by mine enemies, was sore aggrieved thereat: and supposing his own fortune was embased by my felicitie, and being touched with no small envy, and in greater hope that he should hinder my good successe, if so be that he could bring me in hatred with my subjects; he solicited those of Tiberias and Sephoris to forsake me, and supposed also that the Gabarenians would revolt unto him, which Cities are the chiefest in Galilee. For he told them that under his conduct the Common-weal should be more discreetly governed: but among the rest, the Sephorites gave least ear unto him, for that neglecting us both, they onely held for the Romans.

John maligneth Josephs good success.

As for the Tiberians, they would not consent to rebel: yet notwithstanding they promised him some friendship. But the Gabarenians wholly addicted themselves to John, by the means of one Simon, a principal citizen, who was Johns fellow and friend. Yet did they not openly seem to allow him, for that they vehemently feared the Galileans, whose good will towards me they were long time assured of, but privily they sought another means to entrap me. And truely I fell into great danger upon this occasion. For when as certain Debarittenians (being audacious young men) had intelligence that Ptolomeis wife, the Kings steward, under the conduct of certain horsemen should in great pomp travel along the great Plain, out of the Kings countrey into the Romane government, they suddenly set upon them, and putting the woman to flight, they spoyled all that which she carried with her. Which done, they

A they drave to Taricheas, a place where I then kept, certain Mules loden with apparell, and houſhold ſtuffe of divers ſorts: among which there were divers ſilver veſſels; and five hundreth pieces of gold. Intending therefore to reſerve theſe things for Ptolomey, as being one of the ſame tribe, in that our law permitteth not to defraud, no not our enemies, if they be of the ſame tribe; I told thoſe that brought the goods thither, that they muſt be kept to be ſold to the end that the price of the goods might be beſtowed upon the building of the wals of Jeruſalem. This motion of mine, the young men interpreted very hardly, in that they were cut off from the part of the prey which they hoped for. For which cauſe, diſperſing themſelves in the ſtreets of Tiberias, they ſpread a rumour, that I would betray the countrey
B to the Romanes, alleadging that I onely fained that the prey was deſtinated towards the repairing of the wals of Jeruſalem: whereas the truth was, that I kept the ſame to the intent I might reſtore it to the owner. In which matter they were no whit deceived in their opinion. For after the departure of the young men, I called unto me two chiefe citizens, Daſtian and Jannæus the ſonnes of Levi, intire friends to the king, and commanded them, that taking the houſhold ſtuffe with them, they ſhovld convey it unto the King, threatning them with death, if they revealed this ſecret to any man.

Ioſeph labourceth to reſtore Ptolomey to his goods.

But when as the rumour was ſpread thorow Galilee, that I would betray the region into the hands of the Romans, and all of them being grievouſly bent and intent againſt me to puniſh me; they of Taricheas alſo giving credit to the young mens fained ſpeeches, perſwading my guard and the reſt of the ſouldiers, that forſaking me whilſt I was aſleep, they ſhould
C come into the horſe-race; and conſult with other in that place how to degrade me, and give the honour unto another. They being perſwaded, came to the appointed place, where they found many others ther arrived: and all of them cried out with one conſent, that it was meet to take puniſhment on a traitor, who hath ſought the deſtruction of the commonweale. But he that moſt of all incited them to theſe troubles, was Ieſus the ſonne of Saphias, who at that time had the magiſtracy of Tiberias in his hands, a man given over to all wickedneſſe, and borne to breed troubles, and ſtirre up ſedition.

Sedition againſt Ioſeph. Ieſus the ſon of Saphias, conſpireth againſt Ioſeph.

This man, bearing Moſes tables in his hands, and comming out into the midſt of the aſſembly, ſpake thus with a loud voice: If (ſaid he) you be touched with no care of your ſelves, yet, at the leaſtwiſe contemne not theſe ſacred laws, which this your cheiftain Ioſeph, a man
D worthy to be hated by all men, hath of long time dared to betray, and for that cauſe is worthy of extreame puniſhment.

After he had thus ſpoken, and was applauded by the acclamations of the people, he leading the armed men with him, haſtily repaired to the houſe where I kept, with a certain intent and purpoſe to put me to death. Meanwhile, I ſuſpecting nothing of all this tumult, and tired with labour and wearineſſe, took my reſt; when as ſuddenly Simon one of my guard, who at that time onely remained with me, ſeeing the iucurſion of the people, came and awakened me: and certifying me of mine inſtant perill, he gave me counſell likewiſe, that rather, like a noble and undanted chieftain: I ſhould ſhorten mine own life, then ſhamefully die by mine enemies direction. Whileſt he gave me this counſell, I committing my E ſafety to Gods hands, and changing my garments, went forth into the aſſembly after a mournfull maner, and wearing my ſword hanging about my neck, ſtealing by that way, by which I knew that none of mine adverſaries might meet me: and coming into the horſe-race, I offered my ſelfe to every mans eye, and lying proſtrate on my face, and watering the earth with my teares, I moved all men that beheld me to compaſſion. And when I perceived that the affections of the people were changed, I laboured all that I might, to divide them in opinions, before the armed ſouldiers returned from my houſe: and confeſſing my ſelfe that I was not wholly cleere of that which was objected againſt me, I beſought them to underſtand to what uſe I reſerved that prey that was brought to my hand; after which, if they liſt they might kill me. And whileſt the multitude commanded me to ſpeak, the ar-
F med men returned back, and beholding me, ruſhed in upon me with an intent to murther me: but being reſtrained by the peoples exclamations, they moderated their fury; ſuppoſing, that after my confeſſion of treaſon, and reſervation of the Kings money, they might have a better occaſion to finiſh my Tragedy.

your indignation is provoked againſt me. Upon theſe words, the Taricheans and ſtrangers cried out, giving me thanks, and willing me to be of good courage. But the Galileans and Tiberians continued in their hatred, inſomuch as they grew to debate betwixt themſelves, the one threatning me with puniſhment; the other contrariwiſe, willing me to aſſure my ſelf of ſecuritie. But after I had promiſed the Tiberians that I would reedifie their wals, and fortifie other convenient cities, they giving credit to my words, repaired every one of them to their own houſes. And I beyond all expectation eſcaping from ſo great a peril, with certain of my friends, and ſome twenty ſouldiers, returned to my houſe. G

But once again the theeves and authours of ſedition, fearing leſt they ſhould be puniſhed for theſe their offences, begirt my lodging with ſix hundreth armed men, intending to conſume it with fire. Of whoſe arrival, as ſoon as I had intelligence, imagining with my ſelf that it would be much diſhonour for me to flie, I reſolved to uſe valour and courage againſt them: for which cauſe commanding the gates to be ſhut, I required them from the top of the houſe, that they would ſend in ſome of them unto me, to receive that money, for which they had been drawn into this mutiny: whereby they might have no further cauſe to be incenſed againſt me. Which done, laying hold of one of the moſt troubleſome fellowes, that with the reſt came in unto me, I cauſed him to be beaten with many grievous ſtroks, and his hand to be cut off, and hung about his neck; and thus handled, we thruſt him out of doores to return unto thoſe that had ſent him. But they being wonderouſly affraid herewith, and ſuſpecting the like puniſhment if they ſhould ſtay there any longer, for that they ſuſpected that I had divers armed ſouldiers in my houſe, they ſuddenly all of them fled away: and ſo by this ſtratagem eſcaped I the other danger. Yet wanted there not ſome, who incited the people once more againſt me; ſaying, that the Kings ſervants, who were fled unto me for refuge, ought not to live, except they ſubmitted themſelves to their laws and cuſtoms, from whom they required protection. Another ſedition.

They likewiſe accuſed them, that they were of the Romane faction, and priſoners, and preſently the people began to mutiny, being deceived by their words, who laboured to flatter them. Which when I heard of, I once more informed the people, that they ought not to perſecute thoſe who reſorted unto them for reſcous: and I jeaſted at their folly who accuſed them of impoyſoning, and that the Romanes would not vainly nouriſh ſo many thouſand of ſouldiers, if they pretended to make away their enemies with poyſon. Being by theſe words ſomewhat pacified, they had ſcarcely withdrawn themſelves a while, but that by certain outcaſts and wicked men, they were incited againſt the Nobility, ſo that with armed weapons they came to the houſes of the Taricheans, intending to murther them. Which when I heard, I was ſore affraid, that if this wickedneſſe ſhould be committed, no man hereafter ſhould dare to truſt his life in my hands. For which cauſe being aſſiſted by divers others, I haſtily reſorted to their lodging, and ſhut up the gates: and cutting a trench betwixt it and the lake, I called for a Bark, and entring into the ſame with them, I croſſed over into the confines of the Hippenians: and furniſhing them with money to buy them horſes, for that they could not tranſport their own with them in that flight, I diſmiſſed them, requiring them to digeſt their preſent misfortunes with a conſtant mind. For I my ſelf took it very heavily, that I was once more inforced to land thoſe men in the enemies countrey, who had committed themſelves to my truſt: yet thinking, that if it ſhould ſo fall out, that they ſhould fall into the Romans hands, they ſhould be ſafer, then if by ſuffering them to remain in my countrey, I ſhould ſee them oppreſt: I adventured them thus. Yet were they ſaved, and the King gave them pardon. And this was the end of this tumult. K L

But they of Tiberias wrote unto the King, requiring him to ſend a Garriſon into their Countrey, and promiſing him to revolt and follow him. Which done, as ſoon as I came unto them, they required me that I would build them thoſe walls which I had promiſed them: for they had already heard that Taricheas was environed with wals. Whereunto I condeſcended, and gathering ſtuffe from every place, I ſet the workmen to their task. But ſome three daies after, departing from Tiberias towards Taricheas, which was thirty ſtades diſtant from thence, by chance a troop of Romane horſemen were diſcovered, not farre from the Citie, which made the Inhabitants beleeve that they were the Kings Army: Whereupon they preſently began to utter many things in honour of the King, and more in my reproach. And preſently a certain friend poſted unto me, and told me what their minde was, and how they intended to revolt from me. Which when I underſtood, I was wonderouſly troubled: For I had ſent back my men of War from Taricheas to their houſes, for that the next day was the Sabbath: for I would by no means, that the Citizens of Taricheas ſhould be charged or troubled M

Sedition and rebellion in Tiberias.

A troubled with entertaining ſouldiers. And at all times, when I remained in that city, I took no care of the guard of mine own perſon, having had often proof of the loyaltie of the inhabitants towards me. Being therefore at that time attended onely with ſeven ſouldiers, and a few of my friends, I knew not what to do. For I thought it not fit to call back my forces, for that the day was well nigh paſt; and although they ſhould have been with me the next morning, yet they might not have taken Arms, becauſe our laws forbad the ſame, how great ſoever the occaſion be that is offered. And although I ſhould have drawn forth the Taricheans and the ſtrangers that were retired thither, and if under hope of prey, I had led them forth, yet ſaw I that they were too feeble to reſiſt their forces. On the other ſide, I already perceived, that if I ſtayed over long, the Army which was ſent by the King, being already en-
B tred the Citie, would have excluded me: I therefore determined to uſe this ſtratageme: I preſently therefore guarded the gates of the Taricheans with moſt truſty friends, ſuffering no man to paſſe out of them; and aſſembling the chiefeſt of every Family, I commanded every on of them to lanch their Boats into the Lake, and to follow me with the maſters of their ſhips. After which both I and my friends, and ſeven other ſouldiers betook us to a Bark, and ſailed toward Tiberias. But when the Tiberians perceived that they had no forces come from the King, and that the whole Lake was covered with Barks; amazed and fearing the ruine of their Citie, for that they ſuppoſed the Ships to be loaden with Souldiers, they changed their former opinion. For which cauſe laying by their weapons, they themſelves with their wives and children came forth to meet me, entertaining me with happie acclama-
C tions: for that they thought I had heard no inkling of their intents, beſeeching me that for the ſafety of their citie, I would enter the ſame. But I drawing neer the citie, commanded the maſters of the Barks to caſt Anchor far off the ſhore, leſt the Townſmen might perceive that the ſhips were emptie: And I my ſelf drawing neer with mine own Bark unto them, accuſed them, for that contrary to their oaths, they had been ſo fooliſhly induced to revolt. Afterwards, I promiſed them aſſured pardon, if ſo be they would deliver me ten of their chiefeſt Nobilitie: which when they had incontinently performed, I ſhipt them in a Bark, and ſent them priſoners to Taricheas: and by this policie one after another, I at laſt got all the Senate of Tiberias, and many of the chiefeſt Citizens, and carried them thither alſo.

Joſeph ſaileth to Tiberias.

D At length, the reſt of the multitude, as ſoon as they perceived in how great danger they were, they beſought me that I would puniſh the chief Author of this conſpiracy, who was called Clytus, a bold and raſh young man. But I that held it a wicked act to kill one of the ſame Tribe, and yet was enforced to puniſh him, commanded Levias one of my guard to goe unto him and cut off his hand: who not daring for that he was alone, to enter into ſo huge a multitude; for fear leſt his cowardiſe ſhould be diſcovered by the Tiberians, I called Clytus unto me, and ſaid unto him:

Clytus the authour of the ſedition in Tiberias.

Sith ungrateful and perfidious man, as thou art, thou deſerveſt to loſe both thy hands, I charge thee to become thine own Executioner, for fear leſt through thy delay thou procure thy further puniſhment. And whereas with many prayers he beſought me to grant him one of his hands, I hardly condeſcended: at length of his own accord, for fear leſt he ſhould loſe both, he took a knife and

As ſoon as I returned to Taricheas, and the Tibertans underſtood what ſtratageme I had uſed with them, they were all amazed, ſeeing how I had puniſhed their ingratitude and diſobedience without any bloodſhed or murther. After I had ſent for ſuch of the people of Tiberias as were in priſon, amongſt whom was Juſtus and his father Piſtus, I invited them to ſup with me: and during the repaſt, I told them that I was not ignorant, that the Romane Army excelled all men of the world in power and force: notwithſtanding that I kept my ſelf ſilent in the reſpect of thoſe theeves that were round about, and I counſelled them that they alſo would do the like in expectation of ſome better dayes; and yet that in the mean time
F they would not think amiſſe of my government, becauſe the time afforded them not a more affable and commodious Governour. I admoniſhed Juſtus alſo, that before I came from Jeruſalem the Galileans had cut off his brothers hands, accuſing him to have forged falſe letters before the Warre; and that after Philips departure the Gamelites, being at ods with the Babylonians, ſlew Chares, Philips own kinſman, and had moderately puniſhed his brother in law Jeſus, who had married his ſiſter. After this diſcourſe during ſupper time, I diſmiſt Juſtus and his friends early in the morning, with their freedoms. But before this came to paſſe, it hapned that Philip the ſon of Jacimus departed from the Fort of Gamala upon this occaſion that enſueth: As ſoon as he underſtood that Varus was revolted from King Agrippa, and that Modius Equus who was his friend, was ſent to ſucceed him, he certified him of Joſeph ſtirred up a ſedition in Gamala. But Joſeph a certain drougier or treacle-ſeller, gathering together a ſort of bold young men, and inciting the Nobilitie of Gamala, perſwaded the people to fall from the King, and that betaking them to their Arms, they ſhould recover their former liberty: and thus drew they other into their opinion, killing thoſe that durſt contradict them. Amongſt theſe died Chares and Jeſus his kinſman, and the ſiſter of Juſtus the Tiberian, as we have heretofore declared. After this, they requeſted me by letters, that I would ſend them aide, and certain labourers to begirt their Town withall. To both which requeſts of theirs, I eaſily condeſcen-ded. About this time the countrey of Gaulonite, as far as the borough of Solyma, rebelled armour and munition for defence.

Mean-while, John the ſon of Levi, increaſed his hatred dayly more and more towards me, being greatly aggrieved to ſee my fortunes happie, and the ſucceſſe anſwerable: and whereas he was wholy reſolved to rid me of my life, after he had encompaſſed his countrey Giſchala with wals, he ſendeth Simon his brother with one hundred ſouldiers to Jeruſalem, K to Simon the ſon of Gamaliel, requiring him to labour the matter in ſuch ſort with the Citie, that my authoritie might be diſannulled, and that John by the common conſent of all, might be ordained Governour over the affairs of Galilee. This Simon was born in Jeruſalem, noble in birth, and in ſect a Phariſee (which ſect of all other ſeemed moſt exactly inſtructed in the laws of our countrey) a man of excellent wiſedome, who by his counſel was able to repair the decaying ruines of his countrey, who of long time had made uſe of Johns friendſhip, becauſe he was at that time mine enemie.

John labour-eth to ſupply Joſeph in his government. This man, ſolicited by the interceſſion of his friends, perſwaded the high Prieſt Ananus and Jeſus the ſon of Gamala, and other of his line and faction, to cut off my increaſing honours, and not to permit me to attain the fulneſſe and content thereof. For it ſhould be very L profitable for them alſo, if I were removed from the government of Galilee. Further, he told Ananus and the reſt, that they were not to delay the matter, leſt upon the diſcovery of their counſel I ſhould invade the citie with mine Army. Thus ſpake Simon: yet Ananus the high Prieſt replied that it might not eaſily be done, for that divers Prieſts and Governours of that it was ill done to intend an accuſation againſt a man, who might not be touched with any miſdemeanour. When Simon had heard what Ananus had ſaid, he beſought him and the reſt alſo to ſpeak nothing thereof; neither to make his motion known, certifying them that he had providently provided, that I ſhould be ſpeedily driven out of Galilee: And calling unto him his brother John, he charged him to ſend preſents to Ananus. For (ſaid he) M in ſo doing they would ſo much work with him, that they would make him change his opinion. In the end, Simon obtained that which he long time ſought after. For Ananus and his adherents were corrupted with money, and accorded to caſt me from the government of Galilee, without the conſent or allowance of any other of the Citizens. For which cauſe they thought good to ſend certain noble men in birth, and no waies inferiour to one another in

A of them all. Theſe did they command, that calling together a Councell of the Galileans, they ſhould demand why they loved me ſo well; commanding them that if they anſwered that I was a Galilean, they ſhould likewiſe ſay that Ieruſalem was their countrey. But if they allowed me the knowledge of the law, they were likewiſe willed to ſay, that they knew their countrey cuſtomes, or if in regard of the name of Prieſthood, they ſhould ſay they loved me, they ſhould likewiſe averre that two of them were Prieſts. Being thus inſtructed, and receiving fourty thouſand ſilver drachmes of the publike treaſure, for their fellow and conſort Jonathan, they ſet forwards. Embaſſadours with ſould are ſent to Joſeph.

And for that at the very ſame time a certain man called Jeſus of Galilee, was come to Ieruſalem with a band of ſix hundreth ſouldiers, they ſent for him and hired him, and gave him
B three moneths pay, commanding him to follow Jonathan and his companions; and to do that which they ſhould command them: and to theſe annexed they three hundreth Citizens, whom they hired with reward. With this preparation the Legates ſet forward, being accompanied with Simon Johns brother, who had one hundreth ſouldiers with him, who had commiſſion from thoſe that ſent them, that if I willingly gave over arms, they ſhould ſend me alive to Ieruſalem: and if I reſiſted, by their authority they might lawfully kill me. They had letters alſo directed to Iohn, which incited him to make warre againſt me. Moreover, they charged the Sephorites, Gabarites, and Tiberians, to maintain Iohn againſt me. After that I had intelligence hereof, by my fathers letters, who had intelligence thereof by Ieſus the ſonne of Gamala, one of thoſe who were preſent at the deliberation, and who intirely
C and familiarly loved me; I was much grieved, ſeeing with how much ingratitude my countrey-men requited me, who of malice had decreed upon my death: and for that my father invited me by moſt affectionate letters to draw my ſelf homeward, telling me how much he deſired to ſee me, who was his ſonne, before he left this life; I imparted theſe things to my friends, and certified them, that within three dayes I would forſake their countrey, and retire my ſelf into mine own. Whereupon they were altogether ſurpriſed with great ſadneſſe, and beſought me with weeping tears, that I would not forſake them, for that they ſhould be utterly overthrown, if ſo be they were left deſtitute of my conduct. But whereas by no means they might perſwade me, and the care of mine own ſecurity prevailed very much with me; the Galileans fearing leſt I ſhould leave them, and by that means the theeves
D ſhould be encouraged to ſet upon them, they ſent meſſengers thorow all Galilee, to ſignifie unto them the reſolution of my departure. Whereupon divers of them being made privie to theſe news, reſorted unto me from all parts, bringing with them their wives and children; not ſo much, as I ſuppoſe, for the ſorrow they conceived at my departure, as the fear that they had of their own eſtates: For they perſwaded themſelves, that if I remained among them, there could no miſchief befall them. They aſſembled therefore in a great Plain, called Aſochim, where I remained. Joſeph reſolveth to return home.

That night in my ſleep I had a wonderfull dream. For lying in my bed, and being wholly diſconſolate and troubled with the news I had received, me thought that a certain man from above ſpake unto me after this manner: Pacifie thou the paſſions of thy ſpirit, and be thou free
E from all fear. For that which diſcomforteth thee, ſhall be that which ſhall make thee great, and happy beyond thine expectation. For not onely theſe things ſhall turn to a fortunate end or iſſue, but alſo many other. Be not thou therefore diſmaied, but remember thy ſelf that thou art reſerved to make warre againſt the Romanes. After I had this dream, I awaked; and ſo prepared as I was, went I down into the Plain: and as ſoon as I came thither, all the people of Galilee, with their wives and children, humbling themſelves upon the earth and weeping, beſought me that I would not leave them for a prey to their enemies: neither that I would abandon their countrey to ſerve for a prey and mockery to their adverſaries. But ſeeing that I made ſmall reckoning of their prayers, they conſtrained me by oath to remain amongſt them, and uttered divers injurious outrages againſt the people of Jeruſalem, that envied them the peace
F and happineſſe which they enjoyed. Joſephs admirable dream. A number of Galileans beſought Joſeph that he would not forſake them.

After I had heard theſe words, and ſeen the deſolation of the people, my heart was broken with compaſſion, and I reſolved my ſelf that in reſpect of ſo great a multitude, my life could not be better hazarded then for their contentment: I therefore gave my conſent to remain with them. I gave order that five thouſand of the beſt ſouldiers, with their proviſion, ſhould attend me: as for the reſt, I ſet them back every one to his own houſe. When theſe five thouſand preſented themſelves, I annexed them to the other three thouſand that I had with me, and drew out with them fourſcore horſemen, and marched on towards Chabalon Joſeph conſenteth to ſtay in Galilee.

And for that he was entrenched before the city of Ptolemais, I encamped mine army likewiſe not farre from the borough Chabalon, ſome ſixty ſtades off: and divers times drew I out my forces to bid him battell, but never would he offer any thing but skirmiſhes. For Placidus, perceiving my forwardneſſe to fight, was abaſhed thereat, and retired himſelf: yet departed he not from Ptolemais. G

Ionathan letters to Ioſeph.

About that time came Ionathan with the other Embaſſadors, who (as we have heretofore declared) were ſent by Simon, and the high Prieſt Ananus, who laboured to entrap me by policy, for that they durſt not aſſail me in open field. They therefore wrote a letter unto me to this effect: Ionathan and the Embaſſadours with him, who are ſent by thoſe of Jeruſalem to Ioſeph, Greeting. "We are certified by the chiefeſt men of Jeruſalem, that Iohn of Giſ- "chala hath oftentimes ſought to betray you: for which cauſe we are ſent to repreſſe his ma- "lice, and to exhort him hereafter to ſubmit himſelf unto you: and being deſirous to confer "with you, as touching that which concerneth the publike profit, we pray you to reſort unto "us as ſoon as you can, with ſome few attendants, becauſe the borough is not able to entertain "many. To this effect wrote they unto me, hoping that one of theſe two effects ſhould fall out: either that I comming diſarmed, ſhould be eaſily ſurpriſed by them; or that bringing with me a great company, I ſhould be condemned for an enemy to my countrey. The meſſenger H

that brought me this letter was a valiant young man, mounted on horſeback, who had in times paſt born arms for the king. The time wherein he came unto me, was two hours within night, and even then was I banquetting with my friends, and the chiefeſt Governours of Galilee. After that one of my houſhold ſervants had certified me, that a certain Jew on horſeback came to ſpeak with me, I commanded he ſhould be brought in; who embracing me but coldly, and delivering me the letter, ſaid unto me: They that are come from Jeruſalem, ſend you this letter; give them a ſpeedy anſwer: For I am commanded to make a ſpeedy return. They that ſate at the table with me, were amazed at the ſouldiers boldneſſe. But for my ſelf, I willed him to ſit down, and to make merry with me: but he refuſing the ſame, I kept the letter in my hand in ſuch manner, as I had received the ſame, and began to talk with my friends of other affairs: and not long after riſing from ſupper, and diſmiſſing the reſt to their I K reſt, I onely retained with me ſome of my moſt inward friends, and commanding my page to fill me wine, I opened the letters before any man perceived the ſame: and conceiting incontinently what they meant, I ſealed them anew, and as if I had known nothing of the contents, having the letter in my hands, I gave order that the ſouldier ſhould receive twenty drachmes for to bear the charges of his voyage. He having received the ſame, and giving me thanks, I perceived well that he was addicted to gain, and might eaſily be wrought with money. Whereupon I ſaid unto him, if thou wilt drink with me, thou ſhalt have a drachme for every glaſſe thou drinkeſt. To this the ſouldier liſtned willingly, and having drunk good ſtore of wine, to get him the greater ſtore of money, he grew drunken; ſo that he was unable any longer to conceal his ſecrets: but of his own accord he declared the treaſon that was prepared, and how the ſentence of death was given by them againſt me. Which when I L underſtood; I anſwered them to this effect: Ioſeph to Ionathan, and thoſe that accompany him, Health: "I am very glad to hear that you are arrived in Galilee in good health, eſpeci- "ally for that I may now deliver into your hands the government of the affairs thereof, to the "end (according as I have long time deſired) I might return into my countrey. I will not one- "ly therefore viſit you at Xallon: but in any further place alſo, notwithſtanding you had ne- "ver ſent for me. Notwithſtanding pardon me, though I come not at this preſent: for I am "now at Chabalon to confront Placidus, who pretendeth to invade Galilee. Reſort you "therefore unto me, who ſhall read my letters. Farewell.

Ioſephs policy. Ioſephs anſwer to Ionathan.

Ionathans meſſage and letter to Ioſeph.

After I had written this anſwer, and delivered it to the ſouldier to carry it unto them, I ſent by the ſame way thirty of my moſt approved friends of Galilee, commanding them to M ſalute them that were come, without any further ſpeech. I aſſigned alſo to each of theſe, one of my moſt reſolute and beſt ſouldiers, to take heed leſt any of thoſe I ſent ſhould conferre with Ionathans men. They therefore ſet forward on their way: and Ionathan and the other ſeeing their firſt purpoſe failed them, they ſent me another letter after this tenour which enſueth: Ionathan and his company to Ioſeph, Health: We command you that within three daies, you make your appearance before us, without any of your ſouldiers, in the borough of

Gadara;

A Gadara, to the end you may anſwer to that which Iohn hath objected againſt you. As ſoon as they had written this, and ſaluted thoſe whom I had ſent, they went to Japha, which is the greateſt town of Galilee, defenced with ſtrong walls, and peopled with many inhabitants. Againſt theſe the people of that City, their wives and children came forth, exclaiming againſt them with huge cries, charging them to return back, and not to deprive them of the good governour they had. Ionathan and his companions were provoked with theſe cries; yet durſt they not make any open ſhew of their diſpleaſure, but without returning them any anſwer they reſorted to other Cities, where they met with no leſſe effectuall exclaims from the multitude, proteſting with a loud voice, that no man ſhould be able to diſſwade them from continuing Ioſeph in authority in their government. Whereupon Ionathan with his fol-
B lowers marched forth without any further ſpeech, and came to Sephoris, the greateſt City of Galilee. But the inhabitants thereof being addicted to the Romanes, came forth to them: but for my part they neither praiſed nor blamed me. Departing from Sephoris, they came to Aſochim, where the citizens ſung the ſame ſong, that the Japheans did. Whereupon they being unable to contain their diſpleaſures, commanded their ſouldiers to beat them with their truncheons, who exclaimed againſt them, and claimed me for their Governour. And when they drew neer to Gabara, Iohn came out to meet them, accompanied with 3000. ſouldiers: and I having intelligence by their letters, that they were reſolved to make war againſt me, departed from Chabalon; accompanied with 3000. ſouldiers; and having committed the camp to the charge of my truſtieſt friend, I went to Jotapata, becauſe I would be within
C four ſtades of them, and ſent them this letter: If your will be that I muſt needs come unto you, there are in Galilee two hundreth and four cities and boroughs, I will meet you in any one of them, which you pleaſe, except Gabara or Giſchala: for that the one is the place of Johns nativity, and the other is his aſſociates and friends.

The Embaſſadours of Ieruſalem coldly entertained in Galilee.

Ioſeph writeth again to them.

As ſoon as Ionathan had received this anſwer, he replied not any more, but ſought the means to entrap me. Iohn was of the opinion to write unto all the cities and boroughs of Galilee, ſuppoſing that without queſtion there were one or two in them that were mine enemies, whom they might incenſe againſt me, as againſt their common enemy. He gave order alſo, that this his reſolution ſhould be ſent to Jeruſalem, to the end that thoſe of the city underſtanding that I was adjudgedged an enemy by the Galileans, might in like ſort confirm
D that their decree by their opinion. For he ſaid, that by this means it would come to paſſe, that the Galileans, who were well affected towards me, ſhould forſake me for fear they had of them. This advice of Iohns marvellouſly pleaſed them all, and was preſently brought unto me about the third hour of the night, by one Sacchaeus, who flying from them, came and brought me the news, and particularly related to me their intent. For which cauſe perceiving that the time required no longer delay, and ſuppoſing that Iacob was one of my moſt aſſured and truſtieſt ſervants, I commanded him to take two hundreth men with him, and to belay the waies between Gabara and Galilee, and to ſend me thoſe whom he ſhould ſurprize, that came that way; and eſpecially thoſe that carried letters. I ſent Ieremy alſo, who was one of my friends, to the marches of Galilee, with ſix hundreth men at arms, to keep the paſſages
E that way towards Jeuſalem, commanding him to lay hands on all thoſe that carried letters, and to commit the men to priſon, and to ſend me their packets.

The conſultation of the Embaſſadours againſt Ioſeph.

Ioſeph beſetteth the waies of Galilee.

After I had in this ſort inſtructed thoſe whom I ſent, I willed and commanded the Galileans the next day following, to take their arms, and to furniſh themſelves with victualls for three daies, and to attend me at the borough of Gabaroth. Thoſe ſouldiers that I had, I diſtributed in four companies, and kept thoſe with me in whom I repoſed moſt confidence for the guard of my perſon: and having appointed captains over them, and commanded them to be carefull, I charged them to ſuffer no unknown ſouldier to enter in among them. The next day I came to Gabaroth, the fifth hour of the day, where I found all the fields about the City full of men of warre, of thoſe of Galilee, who reſorted thither to aſſiſt me, ac-F cording as I had commanded them. Thither alſo came there a multitude of other men from other boroughs. As ſoon as I came to their preſence, and was ready to ſpeak unto them, all of them began to cry out, calling me their benefactor, and maintainer of their countrey. After I had ſolemnly given them thanks for this favour they had ſhewed me, I charged them neither to offer warre, or attempt any ſpoil in the champion countrey, but to encamp amidſt the fields, contenting themſelves with that proviſion they had brought with them. For I told them all in generall, that I would extinguiſh thoſe troubles without effuſion of blood. It hapned the ſame day that Ionathans meſſenger and letters fell into their hands, who had the guard of the paſſages by my appointment, and according to my direction the into Ieſus houſe, which was a great tower, nothing different from a cittadell, in which they hid a number of men of warre, and locked up all the other gates ſave one; expecting that I ſhould come that way, to ſalute them. In a word, they had commanded their ſouldiers that when I ſhould enter, they ſhould ſuffer no man elſe to enter with me, but exclude all the reſt.

For they made no other account, but that by this means they might eaſily lay hold on me.
But they were deceived of their hopes: for having notice beforehand of their intents, as ſoon as I came thither, entring into a lodging that was right over againſt theirs, I fained that H I went to take my reſt. Whereupon Ionathans ſouldiers ſuppoſing that I was aſleep, and that in troth I was ſafe; they came forth in all haſte into the Plain, labouring to diſſwade my ſouldiers from their love and alleageance, and detracting my Government. But all things fell out contrary to that they thought: for as ſoon as they were diſcovered, the Galileans gave a great ſhout, teſtifying the good will they bare unto me, who was their Governour, and they blamed the Embaſſadours, for that without any cauſe of injury, they were come to diſturb the publike peace, willing them to be gone, for that they intended to admit no other Governour. When theſe things were ſignified unto me, I made no doubt to advenbaſſadours could alleadge againſt me. Upon my arrivall the whole troop ſhouted for I joy, and applauded me with a loud voice, giving me thanks for my happy and peaceable government.

Ionathan and his adherents hearing this, were affraid, leſt if the Galileans ſhould ſet upon them, they ſhould grow in danger of their lives, and began to bethink themſelves how they might eſcape. But perceiving that they might not retire, for that I required them inſtantly to ſtay, they were altogether diſmaied, and paſt their ſenſes. I therefore commanded the people to ſurceaſe their ſhooting, and planted the ſouldiers of greateſt truſt in every paſſage, to prevent leſt Iohn ſhould charge them unawares. After this, I exhorted the people to be-might not be driven to diſorder. This done, I firſt of all began to rip up to Ionathans follow- K ers and fellowes, what letters they had written, and how they had certified him, that they were ſent by the commonalty and inhabitants of Jeruſalem, to make an end of thoſe debates that were between me and Iohn; and how they had incited me to come unto them: Afterwards in the ſequell of my diſcourſe I produced their letters in open view, to the end they might not deny any thing, ſeeing themſelves convicted by their own hand-writing, and ſpake thus unto them:

In the mouth of two or three witneſſes conſiſteth truth. If being accuſed by John, I ſhould produce two or three witneſſes that were men of reputation, to teſtifie for my life, it were a matter moſt evident that thou ſhouldeſt be compelled, O Jonathan and you my lords Embaſſadours (after you had fore-inquired of their lives) to acknowledg mine innocency, and to acquit me of that whereof I am accuſed. But to the intent you may know that I have faithfully governed the eſtate of Galilee, I ſuppoſe that three witneſſes are too little for an upright man, for which cauſe I produce all theſe. Enquire of them how I have lived, and whether I have governed this countrey in all honeſtie and juſtice, I adjure you all therefore, who are my fellows and friends of Galilee, that you hide nothing of the truth, but that before theſe men, as before your Judges you profeſſe, if I have done any thing that is contrary to right. L

The Galileans teſtimony of Ioſeph's good government. Whileſt I ſpake after this manner, all of them with one accord called me their benefactor and defender, and gave teſtimony of my forepaſſed government, and exhorted me to continue the ſame hereafter. And all of them affirmed by a publike oath, that I had carefully prevented leſt any woman ſhould be violated, or any man by my means ſhould be drawn into any injury, or inconvenience. This done, I publikely read the two letters in the preſence of by me to beſet the waies, and were by them ſent to me, which were full of injuries and falſhoods, alleadging that I rather behaved my ſelf like a tyrant then a governour towards them: and beſides that, there were divers other things written and urged very impudently.

Theſe letters (ſaid I) were voluntarily offered me by thoſe that carried the ſame. For I was unwilling that mine adverſaries ſhould know that I had beſet the waies, fearing leſt they ſhould forbear to write hereafter.

The people having heard this, were diſpleaſed and animated againſt Ionathan and his followers,

A lowers, and flocked on to murther them; and they had ſurely done it, had I not pacified the diſpleaſure of the Galileans, As for the Ambaſſadors that accompanied Jonathan, I told all of them that I pardoned whatſoever was paſt, if ſo be they would repent themſelves of that which was done, and if upon their return into their countrey, they would truly report unto thoſe who had ſent them, how all things had paſt under my government. This ſaid; I diſmiſſed them, notwithſtanding that I knew they would perform nothing of that which they had promiſed. But the whole multitude proſecuted their diſpleaſure againſt them, requiring me to give them leave to puniſh thoſe with all rigour, who had committed this ſlanderous act. But I laboured all that I might to perſwade them, to lay no hands upon them, knowing full well that whatſoever mutiny it be, it cannot but breed prejudice to the commonweale. This notwithſtanding, the multitude would by no means be ſatisfied, but all of them B ran in heaps with great fury to the lodging, where Jonathan and the Ambaſſadors kept. Whereupon ſeeing that it was impoſſible to reſtrain their fury, I incontinently betook me to my horſe, and commanded the people to follow me to Sogan a borough of the Arabians, diſtant from thence ſome twenty ſtades. By this ſtratagem I brought to paſſe, that the beginning of the civil war might not be imputed to me.

The wrath and fury of the people againſt Jonathan and his fellow Ambaſſadors.

Joſeph pacifies the ſedition without bloodſhed.

After I came near to Sogan, I aſſembled the people, and told them that they ſhould not violently ſubmit themſelves to their froward diſpleaſures, nor entertain their unquenchable deſire of revenge: and I commanded them to pick out an hundred of the chiefeſt and oldeſt men amongſt them, who ſhould make their repair to the City of Jeruſalem; and there complain unto the people againſt thoſe that had kindled ſedition in their countrey. And I C ſaid unto them, If the people be favourable and liſten to your diſcourſe, you ſhall perſwade them to write unto me, that according to their command I remain in Galilee; and that Jonathan and his partners depart from hence. After I had given them this charge, and that they were furniſhed with all things neceſſary for their journey, in all expedition on the third day after the general aſſembly, I diſpatched them and ſent five hundreth armed men with them, I wrote alſo to my friends in Samaria, ſo to further them that they might finiſh their journey in all ſecurity, For Samaria was already in ſubjection to the Romans; and it behoved my men of neceſſity, who would make a ſhort journey, to paſſe that way. For from Galilee by this means a man may in three daies arrive at Jeruſalem. Furthermere, I guarded the Ambaſſadors my ſelf as farre as the frontiers of Galilee, laying forces and guards upon the waies, D to the end that no man might eaſily diſcover or know of their departure. Which done, I ſojourned for a certain time at Japha.

Joſeph ſends oue hundred Ambaſſadors to Jeruſalem.

But Jonathan and his companions having failed of their purpoſe intended againſt me, diſmiſſed John to Giſchala: as for themſelves they went to Tiberias, hoping to bring the ſame under their obeyſance; for that Jeſus, who was Preſident at that time, had written unto them, and promiſed them to perſwade the people to entertain them, and to take their part if they came: and under this hope they alſo retired themſelves thither. Sylas, who (as I declared) was left by me as mine Agent in Tiberias, certified me of all this by his letters, requiring me to uſe all diligence: and I condeſcending thereunto, was brought in danger of my life upon this occaſion that enſueth: Jonathan and his followers being come to Tiberias, perſwaded divers E who were mine enemies, to revolt from me; but after they was certified that I were there in perſon, they were afraid, and came unto me, and ſaluting me, told me that they reputed me happy, for that I had ſo wiſely behaved my ſelf in Galilee: and they rejoyced alſo in appearance, for that I was returned with honour, telling me that the honour that was done unto me, was their ornament, for that they were my inſtructors and fellow Citizens, and that the friendſhip which I bear them, was more juſt then that of Johns: they therefore required me to repair unto my houſe, promiſing very ſhortly to deliver John into my hands: and theſe ſpeeches of theirs they ſeconded with dreadful oathes, which made me think that I had no cauſe to misbelieve them. Furthermore, they required me to take up my lodging in another place, for that on the morrow was the Sabbath day, and it were an inconvenience that the City of Tiberias ſhould be drawn into trouble on that day. I that ſuſpected nothing, re- F paired to Taricheas, leaving notwithſtanding certain of my friends behind me in Tiberias, who might curiouſly obſerve what the common talk was of me: and all along the way betwixt Taricheas and Tiberias I laid certain men in wait, who from one to another might certifie me of that which was diſcovered by them who remained in the City. The next day therefore they all aſſembled in the Proſeucha or Oratory, which was an ample houſe wherein they prayed, and was able to contain a great multitude. When Jonathan was entred into this place, he durſt not manifeſtly ſpeak unto them of a revolt, but onely told them that their city had need of a better Governour. But the Preſident Jeſus without diſſembling, ſpake

But the greater part took no pleaſure therein: and there had preſently followed a mutiny, had not the aſſembly been diſmiſſed, by reaſon it was mid-day, which is the ordinary hour amongſt them to take their repaſt in. Thus did Jonathans conſorts remit the determination of the matter untill the next day, retiring themſelves without any good done. Which being preſently reported unto me, I reſolved with my ſelf the next morning to repair to the City of Tiberias: and on the morrow I arrived there in due time, for I found the people already aſſembled in the place of prayer, and they that were drawn to the convocation, knew not the cauſe why they were aſſembled. H

The Jews ſixt hour is to us eleven or twelve a clock at noon.

Jonathan and his aſſociates ſubtilty.

Jonathans partners ſeeing me there in perſon contrary to their expectation, were very ſore troubled, and bethought themſelves of this ſubtilty. They told the multitude that a certain friend of theirs had informed them, that he had diſcovered certain Romane horſemen upon the frontiers of that Territory, ſome thirty ſtades from the City, in a place called Homonœa: and that the news being brought to them, thoſe of Johns faction had preſently ſignified the ſame unto them, to the intent they ſhould not endure their Countrey to be ſackt by the enemy. They uſed this ſpeech, ſuppoſing that under pretext of reſcuing the countrey, they might drive me abroad, and ſtrengthen the City for themſelves.

Now although I knew very well what their intent was, yet gave I ear unto them, leſt I ſhould drive the Tiberians into an opinion, that I was negligent and careleſſe of their ſecurity: I therefore rode out, and came to the place of which they had ſpoken: where finding ſcarce a footſtep or appearance of an enemy, I returned ſpeedily without delay to Tiberias. I Falſe accuſations and Epiſtles produced by the Embaſſadours againſt Joſeph.

When I came there, I found the whole Councel aſſembled with a multitude of people, and John's partakers urging againſt me a very vehement accuſation, that I made no account to relieve them in their wars, but that I ſtudied nothing but mine own pleaſure. And whileſt they ſpake theſe words, they produced four letters, as being written unto them by thoſe who were upon the marches of Galilee, requiring them to come and ſuccour them, for that the Romane horſemen and footmen would within three daies forrage and ſpoil their countrey: for which cauſe they made haſte, and would not neglect their ſuit who beſought them. The Tiberians hearing theſe allegations, and ſuppoſing them to be true, cryed out, ſaying, K That it behoved them not in that manner to dally time, but to go and ſuccour their countreymen invironed with great dangers. Whereunto I anſwered, that I was ready to obey them, and promiſed to march forth againſt the enemy with all expedition. Now I knew well the pretence of Johns partakers; and was of the opinion, that ſince thoſe letters ſaid that the Romanes gathered head in four divers places, it was requiſite to divide our power into five companies, appointing every one of them a Chieftain over them. For it is an honour for good men not onely to give counſel, but alſo when need requireth, to be the firſt and formoſt in action: For I told them that it lay not in my power to lead any more then one company. This my advice was pleaſing unto all the people, who preſently conſtrained theſe men to march out unto the war: whereby it came to paſſe, that they were greatly confuſed L to ſee that they might not finiſh that which they had imagined, becauſe I croſſed all their enterprizes. Hereupon, one amongſt them called Ananias, a wicked and perverſe man, counſelled the people to celebrate a ſolemn faſt the next day in honour of God, and gave direction at the ſame hour, that all of them ſhould gather together in that place in arms, to proteſt before God, that if they obtained not ſuccours at his hands, they held all ſort of reſiſtance unprofitable. He ſpake this not for any piety that was in him, but to the end to ſurprize both me and my followers unarmed. To this advice of his was I enforced to condeſcend, to the end it might appear that I contemned not that which appertained to the ſervice of God. As ſoon therefore as we retired every one of us to our ſeveral lodgings, Jonathan and his partakers wrote unto John, to reſort unto them early in the morning with his men of war, M and all the power he could make; for that they might eaſily lay hands on me, and accompliſh that which they had ſo long time longed after. He receiving this letter, willingly obeyed. The next day I commanded two of my ſtrongeſt and faithfulleſt Souldiers to hide their ſhort ſwords under their gownes, and to attend me, to the end that if in any ſort we were aſſailed by the enemy, we might defend our ſelves. I put on my curets alſo, and girt my ſword by my ſide in ſuch ſort, as no man might perceive the ſame, and came with them to the place of prayer.

But Jeſus, as ſoon as I was entred with my friends, having the guard of the gate, would not permit the reſt of my followers to enter with me: and at ſuch time as we were ready to

A begin our prayers according to the cuſtome of our countrey, Jeſus ariſing demanded of me what was become of the houſhold ſtuffe that was taken out of the Kings palace when it was burned, and where the bullion of ſilver was, and with whom I had left the ſame: of all which he therefore made mention, that he might delay the time till Johns approach. I anſwered that Capella had all, and thoſe ten of the chiefeſt nobility of Tiberias, and willed him to ask of them whether it were true that I ſpake: who confeſſed that they had it. What (ſaid he) are become of thoſe twentie pieces of gold, that you received by the ſale of a certain weight of maſſive ſilver, where are they? I anſwered him, that I had delivered the ſame to the Ambaſſadors, to defray their charges in their voyage towards Jeruſalem. Hereupon Jonathans partakers ſaid, that I had done amiſſe, in employing the publick treaſure to the uſe of private Ambaſſadors. The people being diſpleaſed herewith (for I very eaſily perceived B the wicked diſpoſition of theſe men) and ſeeing that a ſedition was likely to ariſe, I thought it beſt to whet and animate the people the more againſt them: I ſaid, that if I had done amiſſe in rewarding the Ambaſſadors on the common ſtock, they ſhould need to take no further diſpleaſure for that: for ſaid I, I will repay thoſe twenty pieces of Gold out of mine own purſe. Hereupon the people were incenſed the more againſt them, in that they manifeſtly diſcovered what hatred they wrongfully bare unto me. Whereupon Jeſus fearing leſt ſome change might ariſe, commanded the people to depart, and required the Councel to ſtay, for that it was unpoſſible to examine matters diſcreetly, where ſo much trouble and turmoil was. The people cried out, that they would not leave me alone among them. Whereupon there came one unto Jeſus, who ſecretly informed him that John with his armed C men was at hand, who for that cauſe being unable to contain and conceal his joy, God ſo providing for the conſervation of my life (for had their purpoſe taken effect, John and his followers had utterly overthrown me.) Forbear (ſaid he) ye Tiberians, to enquire of the twentie pieces of Gold: but Joſeph meriteth not puniſhment for this matter, but becauſe he affecteth the tyranny, and that by his words he hath deceived the people of Galilee, and gotten the ſoveraignty to himſelf. Whileſt he ſpake theſe words, they ſought ſuddenly to lay hands on me, intending to murther me. But thoſe two, whom I had with me, perceiving their intent, drew their ſwords, threatning thoſe who ſhould dare attempt to offer me violence. The people likewiſe gathered ſtones to caſt at Jonathans partakers, and pull'd me away violently from mine enemies: and for that if I ſhould have gone but a little further, I had D met with John and his army, through the fear I had, I turned another away. For croſſing down a privy way that led me to the lake, I betook me to a boat and went by water to Tarichea, avoiding this danger beyond all hope.

Whereupon I incontinently ſent for the chiefeſt men of Galilee, and told them how contrarie to all law and right I had almoſt been murthered by Jonathan and the Tiberians. For which cauſe the Galileans were grievouſly diſpleaſed againſt them, and willed me without delay to make warre againſt them; or if I liſt not my ſelf to ſuffer them with all expedition to cut off both John and Jonathan, with all their followers. Yet did I reſtrain them the beſt I could, and pacified their diſpleaſure, and prayed them to expect untill ſuch time as we knew what news our Ambaſſadors would bring that were gone to Jeruſalem. For I told them E we ought to execute no kind of thing without their approbation and conſent: and by theſe means I perſwaded them. But John ſeeing at that time that his policy had but very ſlender ſucceſſe, returned back again to Giſchala.

Some few daies after, our Ambaſſadors, who were returned from Jeruſalem, certified us that the people of Jeruſalem were ſore diſpleaſed with Ananias the High Prieſt, and Simon the ſonne of Gamaliel, for that without their common conſent they had ſent Ambaſſadors into Galilee, and ſought to diſplace me of the government there, and their diſpleaſure was ſo kindled, that they were ready to ſet their houſes on fire. They brought me alſo letters, by which the Governor of Jeruſalem, upon the inſtant requeſt that the people had made unto them, confirmed me in the Government of Galilee, commanding Jonathan and his aſſociates to return back again with all expedition. After I had received theſe letters, I repaired to F the borough of Arbela, where I aſſembled the Galileans: before whom I commanded the Ambaſſadors to report how much the people of Jeruſalem were diſpleaſed and diſcontented, in regard of thoſe things which Jonathan had injured me in; and how they confirmed me in the government of this countrey, and had called and commanded Jonathan and his confederates back again to Jeruſalem: to whom I ſpeedily ſent that letter that was directed to them, commanding the meſſenger to obſerve very carefully both their actions and acceptance. After they had received the letters, they were greatly troubled, and ſent for John and thoſe of the Councel of Tiberias, with the Governor of Gabara, and conſulted with them them what they were beſt to do. The Tiberians opinion was, that they ſhould continue G and maintain their eſtates, and that they ſhould not forſake the City which had already ſub-ſcribed to their authority, eſpecially for that I would invade them: for that I had ſo threat-ned them, they were not aſhamed to fain and imagine. This advice not onely pleaſed John, but he furthermere gave this counſel, that ſome two Ambaſſadors ſhould be ſent from them to the people of Jeruſalem, to accuſe me for that I had unjuſtly governed the common-weale of Galilee, telling them that they might very eaſily incenſe the people againſt me, both in regard of their authority, as alſo for that the common people are by nature variable and inconſtant. This counſell that John gave was allowed by them all: whereupon it was thought fit that Jonathan and Ananias ſhould in perſon repair to Jeruſalem, and that the other two ſhould remain at Tiberias, and for their convoy they gave them a hundred armed ſouldiers. H

The Tiberians intend warre againſt Joſeph. Jonathan with his followers taken and kept captive.

The Tiberians had before this provided for the ſecurity of their walls, and gave commandment to all the Citizens to take armes, and afterwards ſent for ſome ſupplies to John to ſtrengthen their garriſon, if they ſhould any waies be provoked by me. For John kept at Giſchala. Mean-while Jonathan travelling onwards of his Journey, came to Dabaritta, a City ſituated upon the uttermoſt borders of Galilee in a great Plain: and there met he about midnight with ſome of my troopes that kept the watch, who commanded them to lay by their armes, and kept them ſafely bound, as I had commanded them. Hereof Levi, who had the charge of this quarter, certified me by his letters: wherefore diſſembling the matter for ſome two dayes, I ſent letters to the Tiberians, by which I counſelled them, that laying their armes aſide, they ſhould diſmiſſe every one to his own dwelling place. But they returned me an injurious anſwer: for they ſuppoſed that Jonathan and his train were already arrived in Jeruſalem. But I ſetting light by their injuries, reſolved to circumvent them by this cunning ſtratagem: For I thought it a dangerous matter to kindle warre againſt the citizens. Being therefore very willing to draw them out of their walls, I choſe out ten thouſand of my beſt ſouldiers, whom I diſtributed into three bands, and lodged one company of them ſecretly at Dora, to lie there in ambuſh: I encamped alſo another thouſand in a certain borough ſituate in a mountainous place, ſome four ſtades diſtant from Tiberias; commanding them that as ſoon as I gave them a watchword or ſign, they ſhould break forth: as for my ſelf, I withdrew my ſelf and kept in the open field, and ſate me down on the graſſe. K

The Tiberians ſcoffe very bitterly againſt Joſeph.

Which when the Tiberians perceived, they made continual excurſions towards me, uſing many bitter and injurious taunts againſt me: and ſo great folly poſſeſſed them, that they ſpread a magnificent couch in the open Plain; and marching round about the ſame, they ſcornfully ſeemed to lament me, as if I had lien therein, whileſt in the mean time I took pleaſure to laugh and look upon their follies.

But being very deſirous to ſurprize Simon by ſome policie, and Joazar alſo with him, I ſent unto them, requiring them that they would march forth a little without their walls, attended by their friends and guard for their ſecurity ſake; for that I was determined to conferre with them upon a peace, and to confirm the one half of the government unto them. Herewith all expedition: but Joazar ſuſpecting ſome ſtratagem, would not adventure without the walls. As ſoon as I ſaw Simon attended by his friends and guard, I went out to meet him, and embraced him kindly, giving him thanks for that he was come down; anon after walking along with him, as if I intended to communicate ſomewhat with him in ſecret, I withdrew him from his friends, and laying hands on him, I delivered him to my friends to lead him into the borough, and gave a ſign unto my ſouldiers that they ſhould come down, and with them I aſſaulted the city of Tiberias. There was a ſharp skirmiſh on both ſides, and the Tiberians had well nigh gotten the victory: For my ſouldiers began to flie; but perceiving how the matter went, I animated thoſe of my company, and with them gave a vali-

and ſent another company by the lake, to ſet on fire thoſe houſes which they ſhould firſt fall upon. Hereupon the Tiberians thought that their city was taken by force, and caſt down their weapons for fear, praying me to have compaſſion on their wives and children, and to pardon their city. For this cauſe being moved with compaſſion, I reſtrained the fury of my ſouldiers; and for that it was late, I retired my ſelf with my ſouldiers, both to the intent
I might ſpare the city, and relieve my wearied and wounded ſouldiers. Hereupon I ſent for Simon to come and banquet with me, and comforted him in his misfortune, promiſing him to ſend him to Jeruſalem, and to aſſure him in his journey homeward, and to furniſh him for his ordinary expences with all things neceſſary. The next day I aſſembled ten thouſand ſouldiers,

A souldiers, and presently made mine entry into Tiberias; and having assembled the chiefest citizens in the horse-race, I commanded them to discover unto me who they were that were the authors of that rebellion: who having satisfied me, I laid hands on them and bound them, and sent them incontinently to Jotapata. As for Jonathan and his consorts, I set them at liberty, and gave them money for their charges, and sent them back to Ierusalem with Simon and Joazar, and five hundred souldiers for their guard. Hereupon the Tiberians reassembled themselves before me, beseeching me to pardon their misdeeds, promising me to recompence by their future fidelity their forepassed and foul faults: beseeching me also to restore those goods unto the citizens, which in way of pillage were taken from them. Whereupon I gave a present command, that all the prey should be brought and laid before me: and B whereas the souldiers delaied to perform the same, I espying one of those souldiers that stood by me, better apparelled then he was wont to be, asked him where he had gotten that garment: who confessing that he had taken it in the spoil of the city, I chastised him with strokes, and threatned a worse punishment to all those that would not restore that which they had taken away: whereby recovering a great part of the prey together, I gave every citizen that which he knew to be his own.

Ioseph sends the authors of the sedition to Iotapata.

Those goods that were taken from the citizens are restored.

In this place I cannot chuse but in some sort I must reprehend Justus, who wrote upon this argument; and others, who promising a History, are not afraid in contempt of truth, either for favour or hatred, to commit lies to their posterity. For they differ nothing from counterfeiters of evidences, and razers of records, but that these men are more corrupted by im- C punity. For he, to the end he might seem to imploy his time well, undertaking to set down the events of this war, hath belied me in many things, and hath not been ashamed to belie his own countrey. For which cause I am necessarily enforced in this place to discover that which hitherto I have concealed, and to reprove that which he hath falsely testified of me: neither is it to be wondred at, that I have so long time deferred the performance thereof. For whosoever writeth a History, ought of necessity to speak the truth; yet is it not lawful for him to inveigh against the wickeder sort too vehemently, not for that they are worthy of this favour, but for his own modesties sake.

A reproof of Iustus the Historiographer, that falsely accused Ioseph.

"Tell me therefore Justus (for thou desirest to be held for the man of greatest note amongst "all other Historians, and art not ashamed to vaunt and boast thy self of that title) till me I "pray thee in familiarity (for I must so talk with thee as if thou wert present before me) how D "I & the Galileans have been the authors of that rebellion, which thy countrey began both "against the Romans and their King. For before I was chosen governor of Galilee by the "people of Jerusalem, both thou and all the Tiberians were not onely up in arms, but had "already made war against the ten Cities of Syria. Thy self hadst burnt their villages, & one "of thy servants died in that encountry: yet not I alone protest this, but it is extant also in "writing in the records of the Emperour Vespasian, how the inhabitants of these ten cities "cryed out to Vespasian in the city of Ptolemais, requiring that thou mightest be punished, as "the author of their mischiefs: and assuredly thou hadst been punished by the Emperour, had "not Agrippa, who had received commission to execute thee, upon the instant request of his "sister Bernice spared thy life, and kept thee bound in prison for a long time. Furthermore, E "thy politick behaviours do sufficiently expresse what the rest of thy life hath been, & how "thou hast caused thy countrey to rebell against the Romans: whereof I will produce here- "after most evident arguments, and for thy cause will I urge somewhat against those other "Tiberians; and I will make it plain to those that shall read these Histories, that thou hast been "no friend to Rome nor faithful to thy King. And I enforce these my authorities from the "greatest cities of Galilee, Sephoris, and Tiberias, in which thou Justus wert born. For Sepho- "ris is situate in the heart of Galilee, having round about it a number of villages, and being a "city sufficiently able in it self to attempt and execute any noble action at their pleasure, yet "notwithstanding the citizens thereof resolved to observe their faith to the Romanes, and F "thrust me out of doors, forbidding every man among them to bear arms for the Jews. And "to the end they might be more assured in my behalf, the inhabitants deceived me, in that "they entreated me to encompasse their city with a wall: and that done, they willingly "entertained a Garrison which was sent them from Cestius Gallus, who was generall of the "Romane Legions in Syria in contempt of me, although at that time I had a great power, "and terrified the countrey round about. But when our great city of Jerusalem was be- "sieged, and that Temple which was common to all our nation, was in danger to fall into "the enemies hands, the Sephorites sent no succours, to the end it might not be said that they "took arms against the Romans: But thy countrey, Justus, being scituate upon the lake of ſcore, in a countrey obedient to the King, having not any city of the Jews round about it, might have very eaſily kept their faith to the Romans, if they had liſted. For both the City and people were furniſhed with munition in all abundance: But as thou ſayeſt, I was the cauſe at that time. And who afterwards? For thou knoweſt that before the ſiege of Jeruſalem, I was in the Romans hands, and that Jotapata was taken by force, and divers other caſtles; and that many other Galileans were ſpent in divers battels. At that time ſhouldeſt thou have delivered thy ſelf of that fear thou hadſt of me, laying thine arms aſide and preſenting thy ſelf to the King and the Romans, when thou undertookeſt theſe arms not of thine own accord, but enforced. But the truth is, you expected Veſpaſians coming, even until ſuch time as he begirt your citie with a ſige, and then laid you your arms aſide for fear of H danger: yea even then had your citie been overthrown, except the King in excuſe of your folly, had obtained your pardon at Veſpaſians hands. It was not therefore my fault, but your offence, that behaved your ſelves like enemies. Do you not remember how oftentimes I have obtained the victory againſt you, and how few times you could complain of bloodſhed? But you falling at diſſention one with another, having been the inſtruments of your own ruin; and not for the love you bare either to the King, or the Romans, but of your own malice ſlew an hundred eighty five citizens, at ſuch time as I was beſieged by the Romanes in Jotapata. Nay more, is not this true, that during the ſiege of Jeruſalem, whereof I have made mention, there were more then two thouſand Tiberians ſlain, or otherwiſe taken priſoners? But perhaps thou wilt alleadge, that at that time thou wert no enemie, for that thou wert fled to the King; but I tell thee that thou fleddeſt thither for the fear thou hadſt of me. I am a wicked man, as thou ſayeſt: but what art thou? whom King Agrippa, upon many preſents delivered from puniſhment, at ſuch time as thou wert condemned by Veſpaſian to loſe thy head, For what cauſe having made thee priſoner twice, and having ſo many times paſt the ſentence of baniſhment againſt thee, and having once commanded thee to be thine own murtherer, hath he given life upon the importunate ſollicitation of his ſiſter Bernice? And after ſo many crimes committed by thee, having entertained thee for his Secretary, when he found thy corruption in that office, he baniſhed thee from his preſence. I

Juſtus condemned to death.

But I will not too exactly touch thee with theſe matters, yet notwithſtanding I wonder at thine impudence, that haſt openly proteſted, that thou haſt written more exactly and perfectly of this matter, then any man; whereas thou art utterly ignorant of thoſe things that were done in Galilee. For at that time wert thou at Berytum with the King, & wert no waies privie to the ſiege of Jotapata; ſeeing thou didſt not follow us. Neither couldſt thou be able to learn how I behaved my ſelf therein, for that there was no one left alive to give thee certain intelligence. Thou wilt perhaps ſay, that thou haſt carefully deſcribed that, which happned during the ſiege of Jeruſalem. And how may this be poſſible? For thou wert neither agent nor looker on in that war; neither haſt thou read the commentaries of Veſpaſian. But I conjecture hereby that thou haſt not read them at all, foraſmuch as thou haſt written clean contrarie to that which is contained therein. And if thou art ſo confident, that thy Hiſtorie is truer then other mens, why didſt thou not publiſh it during Veſpaſians and Titus lives, who L were the Generals of that war; neither before King Agrippa, and thoſe of his race, who were all of them verie expert in the Greek tongue? For thou haſt kept it written by thee above twentie years, and mighteſt have produced witneſſe of thine exact diligence before them, who were privie to all things. But now when they are dead, and thou thinkeſt that no man liveth that may repove thee, thou haſt undertaken boldneſſe to publiſh thy work. But I have uſed no ſuch policy or fear in my books, but have preſented them to the Empirerours themſelves, who have been eye-witneſſes and actors thereof. For I knew in mine own ſoul that I had ſet down all things truly: Whereupon I obtained my expected approbation. Moreover, I communicated the ſame Hiſtory with divers others, whereof ſome of them were preſent in the war, as was King Agrippa, and ſome of his kindred. And Titus the Emperour himſelf was ſo deſirous that men ſhould ſearch for the truth of that Hiſtory out of M theſe books, that he placed them in a Library, and cauſed them to be publiſhed, being ſubſcribed with his own hand. As for King Agrippa, ſent me ſeventie two Epiſtles, teſtifying the truth of my books, wherof two of them are under written, to the end that the truth may appear thereby. King Agrippa to his dear friend Joſeph, health: "I have with great contentment over read thy book, wherin thou ſeemeſt in my opinion to have handled this matter "more exactly, then any other. For which cauſe I pray thee ſend me the reſt. Farewell my "friend. King Agrippa to Joſeph his dear friend, Health; I perceive by my own writing, that "thou needeſt no intelligence from me, how matters have paſſed from the beginnning: yet

A "when we meet next, I will between me and thee certifie thee of certain things which thou "knoweſt not. Thus was he a witneſſe of the truth of my accompliſhed Hiſtory: not flatter- "ing me, for it became him not; neither deriding me, as you perhaps may object; for far was "it from ſo notable a mind to be ſubject to ſo ſervile a folly: but onely to this end, that the "truth of my writings might be commended to the reader by the worth of his teſtimony. And thus much have I thought good to ſet down in way of anſwer to Juſtus.

Now as ſoon as I had pacified theſe troubles in Tiberias, and had eſtabliſhed a councel of ſuch as were well affected towards me, I bethought my ſelf of that which concerned me to to do in reſpect of John. All they of Galile were of the opinion, that I ſhould arm them all, and that in battel aray I ſhould march againſt John, and do juſtice upon him, as he that had
B been the author of all this miſchief. But for mine own part, I miſliked their counſels, for that my deſire was to extinguiſh theſe troubles without blood-ſhed; and for that cauſe I incited them with all diligence that was poſſible, to learn the names of all thoſe who ſerved under him: which being done, & I made privy what they were, I publiſhed a proclamation, by which I promiſe both ſafety and pardon to all thoſe, that ſhould forſake John, aſſigning them the terme of twenty daies, to determine of that which ſeemed beſt for their own ſecurity: and I threatned to ſet fire on their houſes, and confiſcate their goods, except they gave over their armes. They hearing theſe things, were greatly troubled, and forſook Iohn and after they had laid down their weapons, they came unto me to the number of four thouſand: ſo that onely fifteen hundred men remained with Iohn or there abouts; either of Citi-
C zens, or ſtrangers of Tyre. When Iohn perceived that he was circumvented by this policy, he ever after remained quiet in his countrey in great fear.

Four thouſand of Iohns followers forſake him and follow Ioſeph.

At that time the Sephorites grew ſo bold, that they took arms under the confidence and ſtrength of their walls, and for that they ſaw me diſtracted with other buſineſſe. They therefore ſent to Ceſtius Gallus Governour of Syria, praying him to repair unto them, with all expedition, to take poſſeſſion of their City, or to ſend them a Garriſon of men at the leaſt. Gallus promiſed to come unto them, but he ſet down no certian time of his approach: whereof when I was advertiſed, I took the men of war that I had, and marched againſt the Sephorites, and took their City by force. The Galileans very glad of this opportunity, and ſuppoſing the time was come wherein they might ſatisfie the inſatiable hatred that they bare
D againſt that City, marched on with that intent; as if they would have wholly ruinated the City, with all the inhabitants. They therefore traverſed the ſtreets, and ſet fire on the houſes, which they found wholly deſolate: for the inhabitants were fled away for fear, and were retired into a fortreſſe. They therefore ranſackt all things, and left nothing unſpoiled; neither was there any kind of miſery which they inflicted not on their countrimen. Which when I ſaw, I was ſore grieved, and commanded them to give over; ſignifying unto them that it was impiety in them, to ſhew themſelves ſo ſavage towards their countrimen. And ſeeing that neither by any prayer or command that I made, I could draw them to obedience for that their hatred ſurpaſſed my connſels, I commanded thoſe that were about me, and whom I moſt truſted, to ſpread a rumour that the Romanes charged us on the other ſide of the City, with great force. All which I did, to the end that by this rumour, I might pacifie
E the fury of the Galileans, and ſave the City of Sephoris: and this poliey took good effect. For when they heard this news, they were afraid, and forſook their pillage, to truſt to their heels, in ſpecial, for that I who was their General did the like. For I made a ſhew, that I beleived the rumour to be as true, as they believed it: and by this ſtratagem the City Sephoris was ſaved beyond all hope.

Sephoris ſpoiled.

And hardly eſcaped Tiberias from being ſpoiled by the Galileans, through this occaſion which enſueth: The chiefeſt of their councel wrote unto the King, that he ſhould come unto them, and take poſſeſſion of their City. The King promiſed to ſatisfie them very ſhortly, and anſwered them by his letters, and delivered them to one of his chamber, called Cri-
F ſpus a Jew born, to carry them to the Tiberians. The Galileans knowing this meſſenger, took him and brought him unto me: which when the common people underſtood, of meer ſpleen they fell to arms, and the next day divers of them aſſembled themſelves from all parts and came to the City of Aſoch where I made my abode, and made huge acclamations, calling the Tiberians traytors, and the Kngs friends, and demanding of me licence and liberty that they might repair to Tiberias, and raze it to the ground, being as much diſpleaſed againſt the Tiberians, as they were againſt the Sephorites.

Tiberias in danger of ruin.

Which when I heard, I ſtood in great doubt how I might deliver the Tiberians from that diſpleaſure, which the Galileans had conceived againſt them; for I could not deny but that the Tiberians had written and sent for the King: for the answer which he made them, did G

And having a long while debated the matter with my self, I said unto them, I know as well as you, that the Tiberians have offended: neither will I hinder you from spoiling their City, yet must you proceed to the execution thereof with some judgement. For the Tiberians alone do not betray our liberty, but others also, who are more accounted of in the countrey of Galilee. Stay therefore untill such time as I am throughly enformed, who they be that are authors of this treason: and then you shall have them all under your hands, with all those amongst them, whom you may particularly think worthy punishment. By these perswasions I won the people, who departed from me wholly contented and pacified. As for the messenger that was sent by the King, I caused him to

And calling Crispus secretly unto me, I charged him to make those souldiers drunk, who had the charge of him, to the end that he might in all security flie back to the King. This Tiberias being ready to be destroyed, the second time by my government and providence, avoided at that time a great and fatal danger.

At the same time Justus, the son of Pistus, fled unto the King without my knowledge: the cause of which flight of his, I will orderly expresse. As soon as the Romans had begun their Justus desireth to command Galile. war against the Jews, the Tiberians concluded to obey the King, and in no sort to rebel against the Romans. But Justus egged them on to take arms, thirsting after alteration, and hoping both to obtain the government of Galilee, as of his own countrey: but his hope failed I him of a successful end; for the Galileans being enviously bent against the Tiberians, for those injuries they had suffered at their hands before the war, could not allow Justus to be their Governour. My self also, whom the people of Jerusalem put in trust with the government of Galilee, was oftentimes so much moved, that I failed little of killing Justus, so intolerable was his wickednesse. He therefore fearing lest my displeasure should shorten his daies, went unto the King, supposing that he might live more freely and securely with him. The Sephorites beyond their expectation having escaped this first danger, wrote unto Cestius Gallus the second time; requiring him to come unto them, to the end that he might be the sooner seized of their City; or that he should send them forces to withstand the incursions of their enemies: and finally they wrought so much, that Gallus sent them store of horse- K
Joseph assailed the walls of Sephoris. men, and after them foot men, who came by night, and were received into their City. But seeing that the countrey round about them was but in poor estate, by reason of the Roman horsemen, I took my souldiers, and came to Garizim, where I encamped some twenty stades off from Sephoris, and by night I approached the same, and set ladders to the wall, with which I entred a great number of my souldiers, and became master of the better part of the City; from whence notwithstanding we are afterwards constrained to retire, for that we knew not the place, killing before our departure twelve Romane footmen and two horsemen, with some Sephorites, to the onely losse of one of ours. Afterwards a fight happening betwcen us and their horsemen in open field, we fought for a long time with disadvantage: For the Romanes having invironed me on all sides, my rereward through the fear they conceived, began to retire. In this skirmish I lost one of my guard, called Justus, who in times L past had served in the very same place under the King. At that very time the Kings forces both of horse and foot came thither, under the government of Silas Captain of the guard, Silas Captain of the Kings guard. who encamping some five stades off from Iulias, beset the high-wayes that bended towards Cana with men of war, and the fort of Gamala, to hinder the inhabitants from receiving any commodities from the countrey of Galilee.

As soon as I received news hereof, I sent out two thousand souldiers, with Jeremy their Coronel; who shrowding themselves within a stade of Iulias, near unto the floud Iordan, offered nothing else but light skirmishes, until such time as I had gathered three thousand souldiers more, and was come unto them. The next day having planted an ambush in a certain trench M near unto the enclosure of their camp, I touled out the Kings souldiers to skirmish, having first forewarned my souldiers to fain a flight, until such time as they had drawn their enemies as far as the ambush; which they cunningly executed. But Silas supposing that our men fled

At that time the estate of the countrey was at a good point, had not some cursed spirit thwarted mine honest purposes. For the horse whereon I road, falling into a certain bogge, cast me on the ground:

A ground: whereby mine hand being thruſt out of joynt about the wriſt, I was carried into a borough of Cepharnom. My ſouldiers hearing hereof, and fearing leſt ſome more ſiniſter misfortune had befalne me, then indeed had done, reſtrained themſelves from purſuing the enemy any further, and turned their backs through the grief they had conceived by reaſon of mine accident. Having therefore ſent for Phyſicians, and cauſed my ſelf to be dreſſed, I ſtayed there for that day; and being ſeized with a fever, I was carried by night to Tarichæas, according to the advice of my Phyſicians.

Silas and his ſouldiers having news of mine accident, recovered their courages; and underſtanding that we kept but ſlender watch in our camp, they laid an ambuſh by night on this ſide Jordan, with their horſmen, and as ſoon as the day appeared, he drew out our ſoul- B diers to fight: who willingly condeſcended thereunto, and being come into the Plain, they perceived the men that lay in ambuſh, by whom they were put to flight, and ſix of our men were ſlain. But they purſued their victory no further: For having news that certain ſouldiers had paſt the water of Tarichæas to Julias, they were afraid and returned back.

Ioſephs misfortune animateth the enemy.

Not long after, Veſpaſian arrived at Tyre, accompanied with king Agrippa. Againſt whom the Tyrians began to utter many reproaches, telling Veſpaſian that the king was both an enemy to the Tyrians and the Romans, alleadging that Philip his General had betrayed the kings Palace and the Romans army in Ieruſalem, and that by the kings Commiſſion. Which when Veſpaſian underſtood, he reproved this impudent boldneſſe of the Tyrians, for blaming a king of that power, and a friend to the Romans: and adviſed the king to ſend Philip C to Rome, to yeeld account of his actions. But notwithſtanding that Philip was ſent thither, yet preſented he not his ſelf before Nero; for finding him extremely buſied with troubles and civil wars, he returned unto the king without doing any thing. When Veſpaſian was arrived at Ptolemais, the Governours of the ten cities of Syria cryed out againſt Juſtus the Tiberian, accuſing him for burning of their boroughs. Veſpaſian therefore delivered him bound unto the king, to the end that the ſubjects of his kingdome might have him puniſhed. But the king before that time, unwitting to Veſpaſian, had kept him priſoner, as it hath been heretofore declared. The Sephorites alſo reſorted to Veſpaſian to ſalute him, and receive a garriſon from him, with their Commander Placidus, who made many roads into the countrey, and purſued them untill ſuch time as Veſpaſian arrived in Galilee: of which arrival I D have amply ſpoken in my Books of the Wars of the Iews, how he came, how he fought againſt me, the firſt time near to the city of Tarichea; how I departed from thence to repair to Iotapata, by taking my deliverance, and all my actions and fortunes during the wars of the Iews, and the ſiege of the City of Jeruſalem. But now me ſeemeth that it is neceſſary that I deſcribe other things exploited by me during my life time in other places, then in the Wars of the Iews. After the ſiege of Iotapata was ended, I was priſoner with the Ronans, and kept very carefully: yet notwithſtanding, Vepaſian did me much honour. For by his commandment I married a virgin; that was one of thoſe that had been taken captive in Cæſarea. But ſhe remained not long time with me: for after I was ſet at liberty, and that I followed Vepaſian, ſhe retired her ſelf to Alexandria. After which, I married another wo- E man in Alexandria, from whence I was ſent to Titus to the ſiege of Ieruſalem, where I was oftentimes in danger of death. For the Iews laboured what they might to take and puniſh me: and the Romans ſuppoſing that as many and oftentimes as they were repulſed, it was by my treaſon, cryed out continually to the Emperor to execute me for a Traitor, But Titus well experienced in the changes of war, pacified the violence which his ſouldiers intended againſt me, by his ſilence. And after the City of Jeruſalem was taken, Titus often ſollicited me to take that which I liked among the ruins of Ieruſalem, promiſing to give it me. But I making but ſmall account of any thing after the ruin of my countrey, beſought him that he would give me certain free men, and the ſacred Bible, which I received for a great conſolation in my miſeries. All which he graciouſly granted me. Not long after having beg'd my brother, and fifty other of my friends, they were given me, and I was refuſed in nothing. F Entring into the Temple by Titus permiſſion, I found a great number of priſoners ſhut up therein, and all thoſe women and children of my friends and familiars, whom I knew, I delivered them, to the number of one hundred and ninety, without paying any ranſome: and I reſtored them to their former free condition. Being ſent with Cerealis and one thouſand horſe into the City of Tecoa by the Emperour Titus, to eſpie if the place were fit for a camp; in returning from thence I ſaw divers priſoners, who were on the gibbet, amongſt which were three of my familiars; whereat I was grieved in my ſoul, and I came and ſignified the ſame unto Titus with tears: who incontinently commanded that they ſhould be taken down, and as carefully dreſt and cured as might be: two of which died notwithſtanding the utmoſt diligence of the Phyſicians, and the third ſirvived. G

Joſeph repaireth with Titus to Rome, and is honourably entertained by Veſpaſian.

After that Titus had appeaſed the troubles of Judæa, conjecturing with himſelf that the poſſeſſions which I had in Jeruſalem, would yeeld me but little profit, by reaſon of the Roman garriſon that ſhould be placed there, he planted me in a poſſeſſion in a champian countrey: and intending to embark himſelf to depart for Rome, he took me with him in his own ſhip, and did me great honour. As ſoon as we came to Rome, Veſpaſian had great care of me; for he lodged me in his own houſe, where he kept before he was Emperour, and honoured me with the title of a citizen of Rome, and gave me an annual penſion in money; and as long as he lived, continued his good affection towards me, forgetting no kind of bounty which he might uſe towards me. Whereupon I was ſo much envied, that I grew in danger thereby to loſe my life. For a certain Jew called Jonathan, having ſtirred up a ſedition in Cyren, and H gathered about him ſome two thouſand inhabitants of the countrey, was the cauſe of their overthrow: and as touching himſelf, being bound by the Governour of that countrey, and afterwards ſent unto the Emperour, he ſaid it was I that had ſent him arms and money. But Veſpaſian knew his falſhood, and condemned him to death, and commanded him to be executed. After this, mine enemies objected divers crimes againſt me in regard that I was in good reputation: but God ſo wrought that I eſcaped them all. Moreover, I received in gift from Veſpaſian an ample poſſeſſion in Iudæa, and at that very time I forſook my wife, becauſe her manners pleaſed me not, although ſhe were the mother of my three children, of whom two are deceaſed, and the third, who was called Hircanus, is yet alive. After this I married a wife that was born in Candy, and was by nation a Iew, and by birth noble, and one of the I greateſt reputation amongſt the inhabitants, endowed with as laudable manners, as any other vertuous woman whatſoever; as her after-life moſt plainly expreſſed. By her I had two ſons, Juſtus, who was the eldeſt, and Simonides, who alſo was ſirnamed Agrippa. Thus farre as touching my domeſtical affairs. That bounty which I recieved from the hands of the Cæſars, hath alwaies continued mine. For after Veſpaſians death, Titus, who ſucceded him in the Empire, continued the ſame favour which his father had ſhewed me. For although I were oftentimes accuſed, yet were not mine adverſaries believed. Domitian, who ſucceeded him, augmented mine honours. For he puniſhed thoſe Iews that accuſed me, and gave order that the Eunuch and ſlave whom I kept to teach my ſon, and by whom I was accuſed, ſhould be puniſhed. He granted me exemption alſo from all the tributes of Iudæa, which is one of the K greateſt honours that man may receive. And as touching Domitia the Emperours wife, ſhe alwayes continued her good affection towards me. Behold here the ſhort recital of my whole life: whereby let each man conjecture of my manners as him liſteth.

TO THE RIGHT VVORSHIPFVL

his esteemed friend, M. ANTHONY PALMER Esquire.

SIR, my affection, that had rather been an Actor then an Orator; (do well, then speak well) hath pickt you out to be the Patron of this tragical History of the Wars of the Iews. The reasons that drave me hereunto, are neither the expectance of worldly benefits, nor the fruitlesse up-shot of ostentation; but your vertue (which is not beloved respectively, but onely for it self) hath created this good conceit in me, which (if you so please) your acceptance may continue. Now since, as the Philosopher supposeth, it is an action worthy a good man, to do good unto his friend; so it is no lesse commendable to accept an office of kindnesse from a friend. For by giving, we bewray our well-wishing; and by receiving, we proportion and continue friendship; upon this ground I pray you build the good entertainment of my present, and nourish this good custome in me (which was usual both amongst Grecians and Latins) I mean my Translation: which if it please you, I have my wish. As for my maligners, I expect no worse from them, then Jason the Thessalian, who being assailted and wounded by an enemy (who had an intent to kill him) had an impostumation opened, that saved his life: their stab and stroke of disgrace, shall cure and heal the hidden and neglected infirmities of my mind; and notwithstanding, I shall both Genio & ingenio live to love you, and lament their want of charity. Thus heartily commending me, I hastily take my leave, being tied prentice of late to other mens importunities.

Your loving Friend,

THO. LODGE.

FOR as much as the war which was enterprized betwixt the Jews and Romanes, hath (amongſt all other) been the greateſt that either hath been attempted in our age, or heard of in any other; either between Citie and Citie, or Nation againſt Nation: there have been ſome, who (rather building their diſcourſe on the vain and unprobable report of others, then their own judgements) have (according to the manner of Orators) made a Hiſtorie of their hearſay, and have filled their diſcourſes not onely with vanitie, but alſo with contradiction. Others there were (who for that they were witneſſes or actors of the ſame (have according to their own fancies preferred many lies; either to flatter the Romans, or exerciſe their hatred againſt the Jews: forging ſomewhiles accuſations, otherwhiles breaking out into prayſes, without any obſervation of Hiſtoricall veritie. For this cauſe, I Joſeph the ſonne of Matthias, by birth an Hebrew and a Citizen and Prieſt of Jeruſalem: who in the beginning of theſe wars bore armes againſt the Romanes, and afterwards (being thereunto forced by neceſſitie, was preſent at all thoſe things, which were attempted and proſecuted in thoſe wars; have thought good to diſcourſe in the Greek tongue (in favour of all thoſe who acknowledge the ſoveraigntie of the Romane Empire) all that which heretofore in my own language I have imparted to thoſe Barbarians that inhabite the Eaſt. For at ſuch time (as I have already ſpoken) as theſe moſt bitter and buſie wars took their beginning, the Romans were at civil wars among themſelves: and as touching the Jewes (who were in yeers valiant, and in wits turbulent) they being both ſtrong in power, and rich in money, did ſo inſolently abuſe the time, that being animated by the greatneſſe of thoſe ſeditions and troubles; they ſomewhiles ſwam in hope, ſometimes ſweltered in fear of poſſeſſing or loſing certain ſoveraignties in the Eaſt. For the Jews hope was, that all thoſe of their Nation (even they who inhabited the parts beyond Euphrates) would have both followed them in their rebellion, and ſeconded their follies wich their forces. Moreover, at that time the Frenchmen (who borderced upon the Roman) ſuffered them not to live in peace: and the Germanes alſo began to take Arms. Finally, after the death of Nero ſeditions reigned every where: ſo that by reaſon of the opportunitie of theſe times many men went about to make themſelves Kings, and the ſouldiers whetted on with the covetous deſire of gain, deſired nothing more then trouble and alteration. For which cauſe, I think it a matter both worthy reproof, and ill-beſeeming my reputation, if in ſo weightie affairs, I ſhould ſuffer the truth to be ſmothered in uncertainties, and ſhould permit the Parthians, Babylonians, and the furtheſt diſtant Arabians, and thoſe of our Nation inhabiting beyond Euphrates, together with the Adiabenites, to obtain the true knowledge of thoſe events by mine induſtrie; whileſt the Grecians, and divers of theſe, who have not born Armes with the Romans, being diſtracted with factions, and deceived by adulation, ſhould be ignorant hereof. Yet ſome of theſe there be, who (notwithſtanding their falſe informations) ſtick not to write Hiſtories, not onely void of all truth, truth, but also no wayes answerable to the subject which they undertake. For whilest they labour to G dignifie and extoll the Romans, they altogether suppress the fame and fortunes of the Jews: yet cannot I conjecture by what means they may be held great, who triumph in the conquest of men so obscure and abject. Nay whilest they thus extol the Romans valour in conquering the Iews, they nothing at all respect the continuance of the wars, nor the multitude of the Roman souldiers, nor the honour of their Captains; whose titles are much embased, if they (having laboured so much to conquer Jerusalem) should have any thing derogated from the honour and prosperitie of their attempts. For mine own part, I am not resolved to contradict those, who shall enhance the glory and noble actions of the Romans, neither to extol and dignifie the deserts of mine own Nation, but my resolution is in all truth and sinceritie to set down each occurrent, without respect or partialitie towards either part. In performance whereof, I will fashion my discourse according to the matter I entreat of, and as my grief and sorrow shall invite me, to lament the miseries of my countrey: For the civil dissention that dismembred the same, was the cause that brought it to confusion: and those tyrants that raigned amongst H us were such, who forcibly drew the Romanes with sword and fire to seek the desolation of our holy Temple. The truth whereof Titus Cæsar himself can justifie, who destroyed the same; who during all those wars still pitied the people, for that they (as he well perceived) were kept in awe by the seditious: and who oftentimes of his own accord deferred the surprizal of the citie, purposely protracting the siege, to the intent that in the mean time the authors of the sedition and bloody wars might have leisure to repent and submit themselves. Now if any man think that I write this, as one that exclaimeth against the tyrants and their thieveries; or that in bewailing the miseries of my lost Countrey, I accuse their villanies, and thereby transgress the limits of a History, let it be imputed to my grief, and so pardoned: For amongst all the Cities that ever were governed by the Romans, our Citie one- I ly attained to the top of felicity, which now alas is brought into extreme misery, captivitie and desolation. Nay, if all the misfortunes and calamities which the world from the beginning hath seen, be compared with the infelicitie and fall of the Jews, they are sleight and of no moment.

And to increase our sorrow, no forrainers, but our own familiar friends and countreymen have been the actors of our Tragedy. This considered, if any man of too severe and stoical judgement shall reprehend this my lamentation, let such a one attribute the deeds I recount, to the Historie which I write; and reserve the lamentations and sorrows thereof to me, who am the Historiographer: although in my mind I may justly challenge the smooth-tongued Grecians, for that (notwithstanding, these our so miserable and memorable wars hapned in their dayes, in respect whereof all other former troubles were obscure and of no rekning) they have restrained their tongues and pens; and under- K taken an overcurious silence, to the end they might carp at these with greater libertie, who undertake the publishing thereof: whom though in learning and eloquence they both exceed and out-strip, yet are they inferiour unto them in the matter and subject they intreat of. For they forsooth decipher and set down the valiant acts of the Assyrians and Medes, as who should say, the ancient Writers had but coldly and scarce conceitfully handled the same: and yet God knoweth, they come so far behind those ancient Authors in their writings, as they neither second them in sense, nor equal them in understanding. For such as in times past published any worthie Historie, endeavoured to write that which they themselves had seen: and for that each of them were eye-witnesses of those affairs they committed to writing, they more effectually performed all that which they promised; the rather, for L that they accounted it to be an act of dishonestie, to report and publish lies in stead of a Historie. And truely in my opinion that man is both worthie commendation and praise, who striveth by his studious endeavours, to register not onely the occurrences of times past, but also those memorable events that have hapned in his dayes: and he only and truely is to be accounted industrious, not that altereth and pruneth at his pleasure another mans works, but he that of himself compileth a Historie, whereof no man hath before time written. For mine own part (the rather for that I am a stranger) I have been inforced to my no small labour and expence, to refresh the memorie and truth of these events in the ears of the Greeks and Romans. For as touching their own learned men their mouths are alwaies open to gains and controversies, and to this purpose their tongues still run on pattens; mary, if they come to a History wherein they should both tell truth, and with great labour enquire of those things that are past, here are they mum, the travel is too tedious, the bit is in their teeth, so that they leave M the matter to their performance, who are incapable and unapt both in style and studie, to register the noble actions of royall Princes.

Since therefore the Grecians make no account of the truth of History it behoveth us both to esteem and honour it. Now to discover unto you the original of the Jews, what their estate hath been in times past, and after what maner they departed out of Egypt, to shew what Countries they conquered, and what Colonies they planted, were in my judgement both impertinent and to little purpose; considering that divers of mine own Nation have before my time made and written an exact History of the noble attempts of our Ancestors: yea, many Greeks also have translated these mens writings gin my History in that time where these Writers and our own Prophets ceased, and set down at large all those Wars that hapned in my time: and as for those things that exceed my knowledge and remembrance, I will onely touch them briefly, and in a word or two. First, how Antiochus sirnamed Epiphanes, took the Citie of Jerusalem, and possessed the same for the space of three yeers, and six moneths: and finally, how he was driven out of that Countrey by the Asmoneans. After this I will set down the dissentions that hapned amongst Antiochus successors for the Kingdome, and how by this means they drew Pompey and the Romans into the managing and medling with their affairs.

How Herod likewise the son of Antipater, being assisted by Sosius, utterly overthrew and canceld their felicitie and authoritie: and how in Augustus Cæsars time, and after the death of Herod, B and during the government of Quintilius Varro, a sedition was raised among the people: and how in the twelfth yeer of Neros reign the war began to take head and continuance. That likewise which hapned in Cestius time, and what warlike executions the Jewes performed in their first attempts and revolts, how they strengthned the Cities and Forts about them, and Nero (hearing of the great overthrow which his Army received under Cestius their General, and fearing lest he should lose all) made Titus Vespasian, the General of his Army: who being attended by his eldest son, came into Judæa, accompanied with as great a company of Romans as he could possibly gather; what number of their allies invaded and spoyled Galilee, what Cities they surprized in that place, either by forcible assault, or by any other composition. Besides all these things, I will expresse what order and discipline the Romans observe in their wars, and wherein they are accustomed to exercise their souldiers.
C I will note down also the places and nature of the Countrey of Galilee, and the description of Judæa, together with the Mountains, Lakes, and Fountains thereof, with all the properties of the same; not forgetting those miseries which the captive Cities suffered: neither how they were surprized. All which (together with all those evils and miseries which during those troubles befel me) will I discover and discourse withall truth and diligence, the rather in that I publish them in their ears, who are no wayes ignorant of them.

After this I will set down how upon the declining and downfall of the Jews) Nero died, and how at such time as Vespasian had undertaken the expedition to Jerusalem, he was withheld from the action, to receive and enjoy the imperial dignitie: and how at that instant when he returned himself into Egypt to establish that estate, the Jewes began to mutiny among themselves, how many D Tyrants arose among them, who hatched much civil discord and debate in their government. Again, how Titus departing out of Egypt, came the second time into Judæa, and ranged over the Countrey, and how and where he levied and encamped his Armies. How and how oftentimes the Citie hath been vexed by sedition, especially at such time as he himself was present. What onsets he gave, and how many Mounts he raised in begirting the Citie with a treble wall: the strength and provision of the Citie, the scituation and plat-form of the Temple, and the Altars therein: the Rites and Ceremonies which were used upon festival dayes, the seven Purifications and offices of the Priests: the garments also of the high Priest, and the holy sanctuarie of the Temple. All which I will recount without any dissimulation, or swerving from the truth of History. After this I will relate what cruelty the Tyrants used against their own Countreymen, and what humanitie the Romanes shewed E unto strangers, and how oftentimes Titus (who desired the safety both of the Citie and Temple) provoked and invited the seditious to mutual amitie. Furthermore, I will report how the people of the Jews (after these many and grievous wounds which they both suffered and sunk under, sometimes by war otherwhiles by sedition, & many times by hunger) were at length overthrown to their utter confusion. Neither will I omit the slaughter of such as revolted, neither the punishment inflicted on those that were captive: but I will set down how the Temple was burned against Cæsars will, and what an infinite masse of sacred treasure was devoured by the fire.

The humanity of the Romans towards the Jews.

But to shut up the Historie, I will annex the surprizal of the Citie, and what signes and wonders hapned before the same: the captivitie also of the Tyrants themselves, and the number of those that were led away into captivitie: and what misery every one of them endured: how the Romanes continuing their wars, utterly raised the fortresses of their captives: Finally, how Titus in travel-
F ling thorow the whole Countrey established a form of government therein; and afterward returning into Italy, triumphed with much honour. All these things have I comprehended in seven Books, endeavouring as much as in me lieth, to flie and avoid all occasion of reproof and reprehension from those men, who knew these affairs, and were actors in the wars. All which I have done for their sakes, who rather affect truth, then follow their pleasure: and according to that order and form I have proposed, I will begin and prosecute my Stile and History.

CHAP. I.

How Jerusalem was destroyed by Antiochus.

The yeer of the world. 3682. before Christs nativity, 162.

AT such time as Antiochus, sirnamed Epiphanes, made war against Sextus Pompeius for the whole government of Syria, there arose a sedition among the Jews: wherein every one endeavoured himself to have the Soveraigntie over others; and those of chiefest authoritie and nobilitie amongst the rest, disdained to submit themselves to such as were their equals. At that time a certain man called Onias (who was one of the high Priests) having gotten the upper hand, did drive the sonnes of Tobias out of the City; who flying to Antiochus for refuge, besought him in all humilitie that he would leade his forces into Judæa; offering themselves to be his guides in that expedition and voyage. Antiochus (who long before that time desired such an occasion) easily condescended to their request; and levying a great army, entred their Countrey, and took the

A the city by force, and slew the most part of them, who favoured Ptolomey: and giving his souldiers liberty to sack the City, he himself spoiled the Temple also; and for the space of three years and six moneths, forbad all sacrifices and ceremonies, which before-time were accustomed and used in that place. Whereupon Onias the high Priest fled unto Ptolomey, and having obtained a grant of a peice of ground from him, within the liberties and precinct of Heliopolis, he built a town and Temple in that place, resembling the City and sanctuary in Jerusalem.

But neither was Antiochus satisfied with the unexpected surprize of the City, nor with the pillage and slaughter of the citizens, but was so far transported by his passions, and incensed
B with the remembrance of those evils which he sustained during the siege of the City, that he compelled the Jews to forsake the customes of their countrey; commanding them from that time forward to use no more circumcision of their children, but that they should immolate swine upon the Altar: which when all of them joyntly refused to obey, the most constant among them were for that cause put to death. Bacchides being made chief of the garrisons by the appointment of Antiochus, what with his innated cruelty, and the impious commandement that was left him, omitted no occasion to further his wicked impiety, insomuch as he particularly tormented such as were of noble birth and qualitie: that each day for the most part, he represented unto them the fresh face and memorie of the desolation of their citie: till all of them at last being provoked and whetted on through the grievousnesse of that which both themselves and others indured, addressed themselves with confidence to C prosecute their revenge. At length Matthias the son of Asmonaus, one of the Priests, who was born in a village called Modin, accompanied with his five sons and his own household armed with swords, slew Bacchides: and fearing the power and multitude of the enemies garrisons, speedily retired himself into the mountains. Thither resorted divers of the people unto him; for which cause he waxing more confident and courageous, came down from the mountains, and overcoming the Captains of Antiochus, drave them out of the borders of Judæa. At such time therefore as through his happy successe he became potent, and was by common consent of the people (for that he had delivered them from the subjection of strangers) made their Ruler: he died, leaving his eldest son who was called Judas, to succeed him in the government. Who fearing lest Antiochus would still continue wars against D him, gathered together an army of his countrimen, and was the first among the Jews that made a league with the Romans; and drave back Antiochus Epiphanes at such time as he enforced himself once more to invade the borders of Judæa, repulsing him with a great overthrow. And whereas the remembrance of this victory was yet fresh in mens minds and memory, he assaulted the garrison of the City: For as yet they were not destroyed (in which conflict he forced them to forsake the highest part thereof, which is called holy) and betake themselves into the lower part: and having obtained the Temple, he made every place clean, and compassed it with a wall, and made new vessels for the service in the Temple, and planted them therein, because those that had been before-time consecrated there, were prophaned. He builded likewise another Altar, and began to renew the accustomed sacrifice, E and observe the rites of religion.

Bacchides cruelty towards the Jews.

Ant. lib. 12. c. 8. Matthias confederated with others, maketh war against Antiochus.

Scarcely was the City brought to the former estate, but Antiochus died, who left a son and heir behind him, who was not onely inheritour of his Kingdome, but also of his hatred against the Jews: who having gathered together fifty thousand footmen, and almost five thousand horsmen, and fourscore Elephants, entred by the mountains of Judæa; and took a town named Bethsara, near which Judas met him in a place called Bethzachary, where the passage was something streight: and before the armies joyned battel, Eleazer, Judas brother, seeing one Elephant higher then the rest, bearing a great tower on his back, and adorned with golden furniture, thinking Antiochus had been there, ran from his companie, and
F breaking the ranks of the enemies, came unto the Elephant: but he could not reach him (whom he deemed to be the King) he was so highly mounted; for which cause wounding the Elephant in the belly, the Elephant fell upon him, and pressed him to death: which act of his had no other successe but this, that by attempting so great a matter, he gave a testimony that he preferred his renown, before his life.

Now he that governed the Elephant was but a private person, and although by hap Antiochus had been there, Eleazer had atchieved nothing else in this valiant attempt; but yet he adventured his life, under hope to perform some valiant exploit. And this act of his was a presage unto his brother of the event of the whole war that ensued. For the Jews fought stoutly, and a long time; but yet Antiochus army (being both more in number and more prosperous) obtained the victory, so Judas therefore after the losse of many of his company, fled unto the Gophonites, with thoſe of his ſide who eſcaped: And Antiochus went to Jeruſalem from whence after ſome ſtay, he departed for want of neceſſaries, leaving a ſufficient garriſon; as for the reſt of his army, he led them for the winter time into Syria. Yet notwithſtanding the Kings departure, Judas reſted not: but encouraged by many of his nation, who daily came unto him, and gathering alſo together thoſe who eſcaped out of the former battel, at a village named Adaſa, he fought with Antiochus Captains, where after much and many approbations of his valour in aſſaulting and ſlaughtering a great number of his enemies, he himſelf at length was ſlain, and within a few dayes after, his brother John alſo was betrayed, and ſlain by their treacheries who favoured Antiochus.

After him ſucceeded his brother Jonathan, who carefully ſtudied for the peace and ſecurity of his people, and fortified himſelf by the friendſhip of the Romans, and was reconciled to Antiochus his ſon; yet did none of all theſe things profit him, or acquit him from danger. For the tyrant Tryphon (who was tutor to Antiochus) laying wait for him, and ſeeking to ſpoil him of his friends, took Jonathan at ſuch time as he came with a ſmall company to Antiochus who was at Ptolemais, and binding him, led an army againſt Judæa: from whence being repulſed by Simon Jonathans brother, and overcome by him, in diſpleaſure and revenge thereof, he ſlew Jonathan.

But Simon valiantly beſtirring himſelf in the government and guide of the affairs of the common-wealth, took Zara, Joppe, and Iamnia (which were bordering towns: (and overcoming the garriſon at Accaron, he deſtroyed the city, and aſſiſted Antiochus againſt Tryphon who beſieged Dora, before that expedition which he made againſt the Medes. Yet would not the greedy mind of the King be ſatisfied, notwithſtanding that Simon had thus faithfully ſerved and aſſiſted him in the death of Tryphon: but that within ſhort time after, he ſent unto Cendebeus (who was the General of the army) commanding him to ſack and ſpoile Judæa, and to take Simon, and make him a ſlave. But Simon though aged in years, fought both youthfully and valiantly, and ſent his ſons with the moſt reſolute men he had, before againſt Antiochus, and himſelf with the reſidue of his army, aſſaulted another quarter of their enemies campe; and having laid many ambuſhes even in the mountains, he in every place was victorious: and after this his moſt famous victory, he was proclaimed high Prieſt, and delivered the Iews from the government of the Macedonians, under which they had been two hundred and ſeventy years. Finally, by the treachery of Ptolemæus his ſon in law, he was murthered at a banquet: who impriſoning his wife and two ſons, ſent certain men to kill the third ſon, whoſe name was John, otherwiſe called Hircanus. But the young man underſtanding the ſucceſſe of his fathers voyage, haſted unto the City accompanied with a great multitude; for he greatly hoped that the people would remember his fathers proweſſe, eſpecially becauſe Ptolemæus iniquity was hated of all men; Ptolemæus alſo haſted to enter the City at another gate: but he was ſpeedily repulſed by the people, who had already received Hircanus. After that Hircanus had obtained the office of the high Prieſt, which was left him by his father, and had offered ſacrifices unto God, he led forth his forces with all ſpeed againſt Ptolomæus, hoping to help and deliver his mother and brethren that were detained priſoners with him: and aſſaulting the caſtle, notwithſtanding that in all other things he had the better hand, yet was he overcome by juſt grief and compaſſion. For at ſuch time & ſo often as Ptolomæus perceived himſelf to be in danger, he brought Hircanus mother and brethren upon the walls, and beat them where he might behold them in their torments, threatning to caſt them down from the wall, except Hircanus would preſently depart. For which cauſe Hircanus was more moved with compaſſion & fear, then with anger & wrath. But his mother being no ways diſmaied with ſtripes which ſhe endured, nor with death wherwith ſhe was threatned, lifted up her hands to her ſon, beſeeching him that in regard of her miſeries, he would not be moved to ſpare ſo impious a perſon, for ſhe eſteemed her death threatned by Ptolomæus, dearer then immortalitie it ſelf; if ſo be he might receive juſt puniſhment for the villany which he had impiouſly committed againſt their houſe. But when John had perceived the reſolute mind of his mother and heard her intreaty, he was moved to aſſault the Caſtle, and ſtraightway ſeeing her beaten and torn, he relented with compaſſion, and was

In the mean while, Antiochus being grivouſly vexed at that which Simon had done unto him, ſent his Army into Judæa, and beſieged Hircanus in Ieruſalem, who opening Davids Sepulcher (who had been one of the richeſt amongſt all the Kings of Iudæa) took more then three thouſand talents of money from thence; and wrought ſo much with Antiochus, that upon the payment of three hundred talents of money, he made him raiſe his ſiege and depart
B the Countrey. This Hircanus was the firſt of all the Iews that with his own goods maintained out-landers and ſouldiers. But ſo ſoon as Antiochus had bent his power and forces againſt the Medes, he took handfaſt of that opportunitie he had offered him, to revenge himſelf, and preſently aſſaulted the towns of Syria, aſſuring himſelf he ſhould find them (as indeed they were) void of ſouldiers to defend them. Whereupon he took Medaba and Samea, with the places thereunto adjoyning, Sichem and Garizim, which border upon the Cuthæans, who inhabit the places adjoyning to the Temple, that is made after the imitation of that which is at Ieruſalem. Moreover, he took many Cities of Idumæa, and amongſt the reſt Doreon & Mariſa: and coming into Samaria (where now Sebaſte is ſcituated, which was buided by Herod) he beſieged it on every ſide, and left his two ſons Ariſtobulus and Antigonus, to continue the C ſiege, who diligently beſieged the place. There was ſuch a famine in the citie, that they were conſtrained to eat unaccuſtomed meats. For which cauſe, they required aid of Antiochus, ſirnamed Spondius, who willingly aſſiſted them, but he was overcome by Ariſtobulus and Antigonus, and was purſued by the aforeſaid brethren unto Scythopolis, whither he then retired himſelf: but they retiring again unto Samaria, beſieged the Citie, and at laſt taking it by force, deſtroyed the ſame, and led away their inhabitants captives. Whileſt thus Fortune favoured them more and more, they ceaſed not to purſue their good ſucceſſe, but led their Army to Scythopolis: and taking it, they devided and ſpoiled all the Countrey.

Of Ariſtobulus, Antigonus, Judas Eſſæus, Alexander, Theodorus. and Demetrius.

THis felicitie and good hap of John and his ſonnes, was accompanied with the envie of many of his Conntrey-men: and this diſcontent of theirs, was the cauſe of a mutinie. For divers of the Jews riſing up in Arms againſt them, were ſo much overruled by their ambitious paſſion, that they could not contain themſelves from the proſecution of an open and bloody war: wherein notwithſtanding they were put to the worſt. From that day forward John paſſed the remainder of his life in all felicitie and happineſſe; and after he had governed the Common-weal for the ſpace of thirtie three yeers, he departed this E life, leaving behind him five valiant ſons. He was a man truly happie, and ſo favoured by Fortune, that he had no occaſion to complain of her niggardice in bountie. Finally, he alone might juſtly boaſt himſelf of three excellent endowments: Firſt of all, that he was the Prince of his Countrey: Secondly, that he was high Prieſt: Thirdly, a Prophet, to whom God ſo ſpake, that he was ignorant of no future accidents. He foreſaw and foretold that his two eldeſt ſonnes ſhould not continue long in the government (whoſe lives are worth rehearſall, although they much declined from their fathers felicitie: (for the eldeſt ſonne Ariſtobulus, after his fathers death tranſlated the principalitie into a Kingdome; and was the firſt that put a Crown on his head; foure hundreth, eightie and one yeers and three moneths, after

As for Antigonus (who was his ſecond brother, and whom in appearance he ſeemed to love moſt intirely,) he made him partaker of his dignitie, and committed the reſidue of them to priſon. He impriſoned his mother alſo, for that ſhe had contended with him as touching the principalitie, which John had ſolely committed to her diſpoſe) and was ſo far given over to all kinde of crueltie, that he not onely kept her priſoner in bonds, but alſo put her to death by famine. But the revenge of his impietie was this, that he ſlaughtered his own brother Antigonus, whom he intirely beloved, and made both a competitor and partner with him in the Kingdome. For by reaſon of thoſe ſcandalous ſlanders, which his envious and malignant Courtiers contrived and invented againſt him, he commanded him to be put to death.

Ariſtobulus famiſheth his mother.

Ariſtobulus loved Antigonus very deerly.

Never-

The yeer of the world, 3861. before Christs nativity. 43.

Nevertheleſs, upon their firſt information, Ariſtobulus (overmaſtered by brotherly affection) gave them no credit; the rather for that he was certainly aſſured, that all things for the moſt part which were objected againſt him, were rather enforced upon envie, then alleadged on good ground. G

But when as Antigonus returned from the warre, attended with many teſtimonies of his valour and proweſſe, upon that feſtival time, wherein according to the cuſtome of our countrey, we celebrate the feaſt of Tabernacles; it hapned at that time, that Ariſtobulus fell ſick and was diſeaſed. Antignus therefore about the end of thoſe feſtival dayes being attended by his armed men, aſcended up into the Temple to offer ſacrifice, and the rather reſorted he thither in greater pomp and Majeſtie, becauſe he intended to honour his brother. Hereupon, certain curſed and wicked detractors repaired to the King, buzzing in his ears that this great guard of ſouldiers which accompanied Antigonus, and that his haughtie reſolution and Kingly preſence, was rather for a Soveraign, then a Subject: inferring hereby, that he entred the Citie in this Equipage, with an intent to murther him, not contenting himſelf to have the onely honour of the Kingdome, except he might reduce the power and poſſeſſion thereof into his own hands. Ariſtobulus though unwillingly, yet at laſt being won to beleeve them, deſirous (in ſeeming not to ſuſpect) to ſhew himſelf provident, commanded his guard to hide themſelves in a certain obſcure place under the ground: as for himſelf he took up his loding in a certain Caſtle, which in times paſt was called Bari, and afterwards Antonia: given his Archers this Commiſſion, that if Antigonus came unarmed, they ſhould let him paſſe; if otherwiſe, that they ſhould kill him. He ſent certain meſſengers alſo to Antigonus, requiring him to repair unto him diſarmed. But the envious Queen prevented this good intent of his by a ſubtil ſtratagem complotted and acted by thoſe, that with her conſpired againſt him. For ſhe perſwaded thoſe that were put in truſt to diſcharge this meſſage, to diſcover nothing of that which the King had commanded them: but to ſignifie unto Antigonus, that his brother having intelligence that he had made himſelf many accompliſhed and compleat Armours, with other fair and worthy furniture for the war in Galilee (which by reaſon of Antigonus, ſudden departure from that place, and his own inſtant infirmitie he might not behold) would count it no little favour and felicity to behold and ſee him in his warlike Ornaments. Which when Antigonus underſtood (who by reaſon of his brothers diſpoſition ſuſpected no miſchief) he armed himſelf, and reſorted unto him, intending to deſlight and content him with his muſters. But no ſooner arrived he in the ſtreight, which is called the Tower of Staton, but the guard of Ariſtobulus ſet upon him, and ſlaughtered him, yielding by this means a demonſtrative and certain teſtimony, that detraction diſtracteth and deſtroyeth all good nature and friendſhip, and that amongſt all our moſt accounted affections, there is no one ſo defended and fortified as may abate the edge of envie.

Antigonus ſuſpecteth not his brother. K

At this time alſo who would not wonder at a certain man called Judas? who being by birth an Eſſean, was bleſſed with this felicitie in his prophecies, that his predictions were neither touched with miſtaking, nor tainted with lying. This man perceiving how Antoginus paſſed thorow the Temple, cried out to his familiars who attended him in no ſmall number (for ordinarily divers of his diſciples did attend upon him;) Ah, how happy were it for me at this preſent, if I were dead, ſith that truth dieth before me; and ſome one of my predictions are found faulty and deficient? For behold Antigonus yet liveth, who ſhould this day have dwelt with death. The place which was deſtinated for his departure is the Tower of Straton, which is diſtant from this place ſome ſix hundreth ſtounds, and yet notwithſtanding, there are but four houres of the day to be paſt: now therefore is the time wherein my divination ſhall be falſified. The ſorrow which incontinently ſeized Ariſtobulus, for committing this hainous murther, augmented and increaſed his ſickneſſe in ſuch ſort, that his ſoul was continually troubled with the thought of his ſinne, and his body through extreme heat of paſſion dried up; and the grief that he felt was ſo vehement, that his entrails became exulcerate, ſo that he voyded bloud in great aboundance. And it ſo fell out by the divine providence, that one of his ſervants, who was deputed to that office, bearing out that blood which came from him, miſſed his way, and came to that place where Antigonus had bin ſlain, wherein as yet there appeared ſome ſignes and ſtains of the bloodſhed of Antigonus, on which he powred out the blood of the murtherer Ariſtobulus. Whereupon his eyes were ſuddenly filled with tears, ſo that in vehement agony of mind, he at laſt cryed out and ſaid: it is impoſſible, but that the great eye of the divine Majeſtie ſhould ſee my wicked acts, and the ſudden vengeance of my brothers bloodſhed ſhould purſue and overtake me. His wife after his death delivered his brother Alexander from priſon, and anointed him King, who was both the eldeſt, and ſeemed to be the moſt ſtayed among the reſt of his brethren. Who growing by this means to be both proud and potent, put one of his brethren to death, for aſpiring and hunting after the kingdome: as for the other that remained alive, in that he contented himſelf with a private and contemplative life, he kept him near about him. He made war alſo againſt Ptolomey that was called Lathyrus, who had ſurprized the City of Aſoth, and put a great number of his enemies to the ſword: nevertheleſſe, Ptolomeys ſide obC tained the victory, who retiring himſelf into the countrey of Egypt, by reaſon that his mother Cleopatra purſued him with open war; Alexander forcibly entred the City of Gadara, and the fort of Amathunt (which was one of the greateſt of all thoſe that were round about Jordan) in which place Theodore, Zenos ſon had hoorded up his chiefeſt and moſt precious movables, who ſuddenly ſetting upon him, recovered all that which was his, and furthermore laid hands on the kings carriage: in ſeizing which, he ſlaughtered many Jews, to the number of ten thouſand. But Alexander, after he had recovered this loſſe, invaded the frontire towns upon the ſea-coaſt, and won Raphia, and Gaza, and Anthedon, which afterwards by king Herod was called Agrippias. But after he had conquered and overcome theſe places, the common ſort of the Iews raiſed a mutiny againſt him during a certain ſolemne D and holy feaſt: for all mutinies and ſeditions are commonly raiſed at banquets: and it is thought that he could not have prevailed againſt thoſe treacheries, had he not been aſſiſted by the Piſidians and Cilicians, whom he hired to help him: for the Syrians, he refuſed to hire them, by reaſon of their natural hatred they bare againſt the Jews. Having therefore ſlain eight thouſand of the rebels, he warred upon Arabia; and overcoming the Galaadites, and Moabites (and impoſing upon them a tribe) he returned to Amathunt: and whereas Theodorus was daunted with his proſperous ſucceſſe, he finding the Caſtle without any to defend it, razed it unto the ground. After this, he preſently aſſaulted Obeda, king of the Arabians: who having laid ambuſhments in the countrey of Galaad, in a place fit for ſuch a purpoſe, diſcomfited him and his whole army, being driven thence into a deep valley where they were peſtered with a multitude of Camels.

E But Alexander eſcaped unto Jeruſalem, where the people who had conceived a hatred againſt him, being encouraged by his great loſſe and ſlaughter of men, began again to rebell: but then alſo he overcame them, and in ſix years ſpace, at ſundry battels he ſlew above fifty thouſand Jews: notwithſtanding, he never rejoyced in his victory, becauſe the ſtrength of his countrey was conſumed thereby. For which cauſe giving over his wars, he began to ſeek the peoples favour by ſweet and milde ſpeeches: but they ſo much hated his inconſtant and variable manners, that when he demanded of them what he might do to win their favors, they anſwered, If he would die, for that ſcarcely they would pardon him if ſo be he were dead, who had committed ſo many hainous crimes. And thereupon the Jews ſent unto Demetrius, ſirnamed Acærus for help, whom in hope of great rewards came and joyned F his forces with the Jews about Sichem: where Alexander met them both, with a thouſand horſmen and ſix thouſand footmen, that were hired (having at that time ten thouſand Jews his favourites) and of the contrary part there were three thouſand horſmen, & fourty thouſand footmen. Before the fight began, the two Kings ſent meſſengers one unto anothers Army, perſwading one anothers men to forſake their colours and Captains: for Demetrius hoped that Alexanders hired men would have forſaken Alexander and come unto him, and Alexander hoped that the Jews that followed Demetrius, would have left Demetrius and come to him. But when both parts perceived that the Jews continued obſtinate in their purpoſe, and the Greeks kept their fidelity, the two Armies encountred; in which encounter Demetrius had the upper hand (although Alexanders hirelings evidently ſhewed ſtrength

This revolting much displeased and discouraged Demetrius, for he now thought that Alexander uniting his forces, was able to bid him battel, and he feared that all the Iews would at that present follow Alexander: for which cause he returned home. Yet the rest of the Jews having thus lost the help of Demetrius, would not for all this desist from their rebellion; nay they so long warred with Alexander, till at last (the most of them being slain) he drave the rest into the City of Bemeselin, and when he had surprized and sackt the City, he led them captives into Ierusalem. But immoderate anger turned his cruelty into impiety: for having crucified eight hundred captives in the midst of the City, he killed their wives, and the children he massacred before their mothers faces; and this pitiful spectacle he beheld with pleasure, drinking and making merry with his concubines. Whereat H the people were so terrified, that the night after, eight thousand of the contrary part fled out of the countrey of Iudæa, who staied in banishment during the life of Alexander. Thus, after he had by those actions sought for the tranquility of his kingdome, which he obtained not but with long time and great difficulty, he ceased to make war against his countrey.

CHAP. IV.

Of the war of Alexander with Antiochus, and Aretas, and of Alexander and Hircanus. I

After this, Antiochus (who likewise was called Dyonisius, the brother to Demetrius, who was the last of all the race of Seleucus) raised up new broiles against Alexander, who fearing him because he had prepared war against the Arabians, drew a deep trench along that ground which lyeth between Antipatris, and the Sea-coast of Joppe: and before the trench he builded a very high wall, and raised towers of wood to hinder his enemies passage. But all this could not keep out Antiochus, but that burning the towers, and filling up the trenches, he entred and passed over them with his forces. And not tarrying at that time to revenge himself of him who had thus forbidden him passage, he presently K marched forward against the Arabians. But the king of Arabia retyring himself into certain places of his countrey which were fittest for defence, & returning suddenly to battel with his horsemen (who were in number 1000.) rushed hastily upon Antiochus souldiers, and found them unprovided; so that a hot skirmish began betwit them, in which the souldiers of Antiochus, whilest he lived, shewed themselves valiant (though they were on every side massacred by the Arabians) but so soon as he was slain (who was alwayes ready to assist those that were in danger) all of them fled: and the greatest part of them were slain in the battel and in flight; as for those that escaped, they fled into the town of Cana, where they all (except very few) died for hunger. After this, the people of Damascus being incited by the hatred they bare to Ptolomey the son of Mineus, sent for Aretas, and established him King over L Cœlosyria: who warring against Iudæa, and overcoming Alexander in battel, retired himself upon composition. Alexander having taken Pella, resorted once more to the town of Gerasa, in that he was desirous of Theodorus riches: and took the place, notwithstanding that it was fortified with three walls: and that upon every wall there was planted a garrison. He took Gaulan, and Seleucia, and that town which is called the valley of Antiochus. Moreover, having taken Gamala, which was a most strong Castle, and imprisoned the Governour thereof, who was called Demetrius, because he was a wicked person, he returned into Judæa, after he had spent three years in war: where for his prosperous successe he was joyfully received of his nation. But no sooner ceased he from war but he fell sick, and falling into a quartane ague, he thought that he should drive away his sickness, if he employed M himself in some businesse: for which cause being not rid of his disease, he applyed himself to war, and labouring above his strength, amidst those tumults yeelded up the ghost in the 37. yeer of his raign: leaving the kingdome to Alexander his wife, fully accounting that the Iews would in all things obey her, because that she alwayes by misliking and seeking to hinder his cruelty and iniquitie, had won the hearts of the people. Neither was he deceived; for she being admired for her piety amongst them, obtained the principality: the rather for that she was well acquainted with the customes of her countrey, & even from her

Now there was a certain ſect among the Jews, which were called Phariſees, who joyned themſelves with the Queen: theſe people were thought to be of the godlieſt ſort, and to be more skilful then other, in interpreting the Scriptures: and for that cauſe Alexandra favoured them the more, becauſe ſhe was ſuperſtitiouſly given to religion. Theſe having by little and little inſinuated themſelves into the favour of a ſimple woman, now did domineer at their
B pleaſure, diſplacing, diſpoſing, impriſoning, and reſtoring to liberty whom they pleaſed, for no other purpoſe, but that they might enjoy the profits and commodities of the kingdome; and Alexandra bare all charges. This Queen was alwaies deſirous of high attempts, and daily ſtudied to encreaſe her wealth: ſhe levied two armies, and hired a great many ſtrangers; whereby ſhe did not onely ſtrengthen her own countrey, but alſo made her ſelf to be feared of other nations. ſhe ruled others, but her ſelf was ruled by the Phariſees, who at laſt killed Diogenes, who was a gallant man, and highly in favour with King Alexander; affirming that through his counſell, the King commanded thoſe eight hundreth before mentioned to be crucified: and further, they perſwaded the Queen Alexandra, that ſhe ſhould put to death all others, through whoſe counſel Alexander her husband had been incited againſt thoſe
C eight hundreth. The Queen being blinded with ſuperſtition, thought it unlawfull to deny any thing which they requeſted: ſo that they put to death whom they pleaſed, till ſuch time as the chiefeſt of thoſe, who were in this danger, in humble wiſe came to Ariſtobulus, who perſwaded his mother to ſpare them for their dignity, and baniſh others, whom ſhe thought had deſerved puniſhment: who having obtained their liberty, diſperſed themſelves thorow the whole countrey. Now Alexandra ſent an army to Damaſcus, and becauſe Ptolomæus daily vexed the city, ſhe took it without doing any thing worthy of memory: ſhe did ſollicite Tigranes King of Armenia with gifts and promiſes, (who with an army had beſieged Ptolemais wherein Cleopatra was) but he for fear of troubles in his own countrey, in that Lucullus had entred into Armenia, withdrew himſelf from thence.

D In the mean time Alexandra being ſick, her youngeſt ſonne Ariſtobulus with his ſervants (which were many in number, all truſty, and in the heat of their young yeers) got all the Caſtles, and hiring ſouldiers with the money he found in thoſe Caſtles, he proclaimed himſelf King. But Alexandra, (pitying the complaints of Hircanus) impriſoned the wife and children of Ariſtobulus in a Caſtle neer unto the North part of the Temple, which in old time was called Baris (as we ſaid before) afterwards Antonius being Emperour, it was called Antonia, as in like manner Sebaſte and Agrippias, other Cities were named of Auguſtus and Agrippa. But Alexandra died before ſhe could revenge Hircanus of the wrongs which Ariſtobulus had done him. This Queen reigned nine yeers, and left Hircanus in poſſeſſion of all, whom during her life time ſhe had advanced to the Kingdome. But Ariſtobulus being both
E ſtronger in power, and more eſteemed in authority, encountred with his brother about Jericho, where many of Hircanus ſouldiers forſaking their King, fled unto Ariſtobulus: for which cauſe, both he and the remnant of thoſe thar followed him, were forced to flye into the caſtle called Antonia, where he found hoſtages to redeem them. For, (as we have already ſaid) Ariſtobulus with his wife and children were impriſoned in that place: leſt any worſe miſ-hap ſhould betide him, he concluded a peace, upon condition that Ariſtobulus ſhould be King, and that he as brother to the king; would content himſelf with other dignities. Upon theſe conditions, they were made friends in the Temple, where in the preſence of all the people, they in moſt friendly ſort embraced each other: which when they had done, they changed houſes, and Ariſtobulus went into the Kings Palace, and Hircanus unto Ariſtobulus houſe.

CHAP. V.

Of the warre between Hircanus and the Arabians; and of the taking of Jeruſalem.

Antipater perſwadeth Hircanus to flie to Aretas King of Arabia, and to crave his aſſiſtance to recover his kingdome.

NOw a ſudden fear invaded all the enemies of Ariſtobulus, when they ſaw him (contrary to all expectation) made king; and eſpecially Antipater, above all others, whom Ariſtobulus a long time had hated. This Antipater was an Idumæan born, and for his nobility and riches, was the chiefeſt and beſt reputed of his nation. This man perſwaded Hircanus to flie unto Aretas King of Arabia, and crave his help to ſet him in his kingdom. Furthermore, he perſwaded Aretas likewiſe to receive Hircanus, and to help him to recover his kingdome, ſpeaking much againſt the manners of Ariſtobulus, and praiſing Hircanus; adding that he being King of ſo famous a nation, ought to aſſiſt thoſe who were unjuſtly oppreſſed; and that Hircanus had manifeſt injury offered him, being forced to forſake his kingdome, which by the right of ſucceſſion was due unto him. After he had thus made his way, he in the night time took Hircanus, and fled with him forth of the city: and making all haſte poſſible, they arrived at a town called Petra, with ſafety (which is a town where the Kings of Arabia were accuſtomed to keep their Court) there he delivered Hircanus into the Kings hands, and through many gifts and entreaties, obtained the favour that he might be conducted into his Kingdome. And to the effecting of the ſame, Aretas gave him an army of fifty thouſand horſe and foot: which power, ſince Ariſtobulus was not able to reſiſt, he was overcome upon the firſt onſet, and was forced to flie unto Ieruſalem: and he had been ſurely taken, if Scaurus a captain of the Romanes by taking opportunity at thoſe troubles, had not raiſed the ſiege. For Pompey the Great, (who warred againſt Tigranes) ſent him out of Armenia into Syria: who comming to Damaſcus, found it newly taken by Metellus and Lollius; who diſmiſſing them from thence, and finding how matters ſtood in Judæa, haſted thither in hope of a booty. So ſoon as he entred into the confines of the countrey, both of the brethren ſent Embaſſadours unto him, deſiring him to take their parts: but Ariſtobulus having ſent him 300. talents, he neglected to do Iuſtice; for having received that ſumme, Scaurus ſent meſſengers unto the Arabians and Hircanus, threatning the diſpleaſure of the Romanes and Pompey, except they would preſently raiſe their ſiege: for which cauſe Aretas being much abaſhed, returned out of Iudæa unto Philadelphia, and Scaurus repaired unto Damaſcus. Yet ſufficed it not Ariſtobulus, that he had eſcaped from being taken, but that gathering all his forces together, he purſued his enemies: and joyning battell with them about Papyron, he ſlew ſix thouſand of them, in which number was Cephalon Antipaters brother. But Hircanus and Antipater being deſtitute of the Arabians help, were driven to hope for ſuccour even at their adverſaries hand. For which cauſe, as ſoon as Pompey after he had entred Syria came to Damaſcus, they in humble manner came to him, and giving him many gifts, proteſted unto him that which before they had done to Aretas; earneſtly requeſting him, that he would conſider the violence offered by Ariſtobulus, and reſtore Hircanus to the Kingdome: to whom both by years and manners it was due.

Mean-while Ariſtobulus ſlept not, but having corrupted Scaurus, came in as royall pompe as he could; but not abiding to debaſe himſelf, and thinking it diſparagement in more abject manner then beſeemed a King to ſeek his own commodity, returned from Dioſpolis. Whereat Pompey being angry, at the requeſt of Hircanus and his followers, he went againſt Ariſtobulus, accompanied both with the Roman Army and the Syrians, who aſſiſted them. When they had paſſed Pella and Scythopolis, and came to Corea (where the confines of Judæa begin) as they paſſed thorow the midſt of the countrey, they underſtood that Ariſtobulus was fled to Alexandrium (which was a Caſtle richly built and ſcituate upon a very high hill.) Pompey arriving in that place ſent meſſengers unto him, commanding him to deſcend; but he becauſe he was called in queſtion about the kingdome, determined rather to hazard himſelf, then obey. But when he ſaw that the people began to fear; and that his friends willed him to think of the power of the Romans, whoſe ſtrength he was no wayes able to reſiſt: he allowed their counſel, and came unto Pompey: where having alleadged many reaſons to ſhew that he had juſt title unto the Crown, he returned again into the Caſtle. And afterwards being urged by his brother to come and plead his title, he came and returned thither again, without contradiction from Pompey. Thus wauering he betwixt hope and fear, and doubting how the matter would go with him, he came to Pompey as it were to entreat him to pardon all. and returned again unto the mountain, leſt he ſhould ſeem to derogate any thing, from the Majeſtie of a King: yet becauſe Pompey willed him to depart from his Caſtles, and to warn his Governours thereof to do the like, (whom he had commanded to diſobey, except they received letters written by his own hand) in this he fulfilled Pompeys mind: yet being angry and diſcontented, he departed into Jeruſalem, and now fully determined to fight with Pompey. But Pompey not thinking it beſt to let him have time to prepare himſelf, followed him with all ſpeed, and ſo much the willinger, becauſe that neer unto Jericho he had news of Mithridates his death, even in the fruitfulleſt place of Judæa, where there are great ſtore of palms and balm. A and promising him money, and to yield himself and the Citie into his hands, he by this means appeased Pompeys anger. But he performed no part of his promise; for Aristobulus his associates would not suffer Gabinius (who was sent for the money) to enter into the Citie: For which cause Pompey being moved to displeasure, put Aristobulus in hold: and coming neer the Citie, he took a view at what place it might be easilieſt entred, for he did not lightly perceive how he might batter the walls, they were so strong. Moreover, there was a huge ditch before the wall, and hard by he beheld the Temple so strengthened, that although the Citie were taken; yet it might be a second refuge for the enemy. Whileſt thus he long deliberated what to do, there arose a sedition within the City, wherein Aristobulus confederates thought it meet to fight, and deliver the King out of prison: but those that favoured Hircanus, would that the gates should be opened to Pompey. At last Aristobulus friends having the B worst, fled into the Temple; and to the end that they might fight it out to the last, they cut down the bridge, by which men go out of the Citie, into the Temple. When the rest had received the Romans into the Citie, and delivered unto them the Kings Palace, Pompey sent a Captain called Piso with souldiers to seize the same; who leaving a garrison in the Town (seeing he could perswade none of them that were in the Temple to peace) prepared all places about it to batter it. All which time Hircanus and his friends shewed themselves ready to help them with councel, and to do whatsoever they were commanded. Pompey at the North side filled the ditch and valley with all kind of matter, which his souldiers carried: although that by reason of the huge depth, and for the depth, and for that the Jews made resistance, it was a thing hard to be done: and it had been left undone, had not Pompey (observing the seventh day, wherein the Jewes religion forced them to abstain from all labour) caused C it to be filled up those daies; forbidding the souldiers to fight at that time, to the intent he might fill the ditch more conveniently (for it was lawfull for the Jews onely to fight for their bodies upon the Sabbath.) At last when the ditch was filled, and the Towers were built upon the rampire, he beat the walls with those engines that he brought from Tyre; but they were beaten back by those who resisted from the top of the walls, who darted divers stones at them. Against the violent power whereof, the Towers that were builded in that quarter, being of a great and goodly building, resisted as valiantly, and as long as they possibly could. But the Romans found it but hard measure in this place, and Pompey admired the constancy of the Jews; who being amongst the thickest of their enemies darts, yet omitted not any ceremony: but (as though they had firm peace) they every day observed their ceD remonies, offered sacrifices and offerings, and most diligently observed all honour and divine service: yea in the very taking of the place, although every day they were killed at the Altar, yet did they not cease from the lawful rites of their religion. At last in the third moneth of the siege, whereas scarcely one Tower was beaten down, they brake into the Temple, and the first that attempted to climb over the wall, was Faustus Cornelius, Silas son, and after him two Centurions, Furius and Fabius with their Regiments; who compassing the Temple about (while some sought to hide themselves, and other some resisted) they slew them all. There were many Priests also among the rest; who, although they saw the enemies with naked swords rushing upon them, yet being nothing at all dismayed thereat, continued still their sacrifices; and were slain even whileſt they offered and incensed in the Temple: preferring the dutie they ought to religion, even before their own safetie. Many also were slain by E their own Countrey-men that favoured the adverse part: and many cast themselves down headlong upon the rocks; othersome in their fury having desperately fired all things upon the wals, burned themselves for company. So that there, twelve thousand Jews were slain, but very few Romans: yet many were hurt, and amongst all that Massacre, there was nothing so lamentable, as that the holy Sanctuary (which never any man saw before that time) was revealed to strangers. Finally, Pompeius accompanied with his followers, came into the Temple, where it was lawfull for none but the high Priest to come, and saw the candlesticks, lamps, table, censers, and all the golden vessels, and whatsoever was within the Temple. Moreover, he beheld the great quantitie of odoriferous drugs, which were kept in store in that F place, and two thousand talents of holy money: yet did he not take away these things, nor any thing else belonging to the Temple. But the day after it was taken, he commanded the Sacristans to purge and make clean the Temple, and to offer solemn sacrifice. He likewise proclaimed Hircanus high Priest (who had in all things shewed himself very forward, and especially at the time of the siege: as also for that he hindred a multitude of swains (who addressed for warre) from joyning themselves with Aristobulus: and therefore like a good Captain got he the good will of the people more by love, then by fear.

rich gifts, and imposed a Tribute upon Ierusalem, and took from that nation the cities which they had gotten in Cœlosyria: and appointed them to be governed by him who then was Prefident for the Romans; making them keep within the bounds of their own Countrey.
And in favour of Demetrius of Gadara (a libertine of his) he reedified Gadara which the Iews had destroyed: he delivered the Medeterranean cities from their government (for they had not as yet destroyed them, because they were suddenly prevented) namely, Hippon, and place, and called it Cæsarea: All these cities he restored unto the inhabitants, and made them under the rule of Syria. And of this place and Iudæa, and of all places from the borders of Egypt unto Euphrates, he made Scaurus Governour, leaving him two legions of souldiers.

Which done, he took his journey to Rome by Cilicia, leading Aristobulus and his Fa-

Of the warre of Alexander, with Hircanus, and Aristobulus. I

AT that time Scaurus took his journey into Arabia: but by the difficultie of the place he was so hindred, that he could not come to Petra, yet wasted he all the countrey adioyning to Pella: although whilest he staied to doe this, he endured much evill:
For there arose a great famine in his army, notwithstanding that Hircanus by Antipaters means sent them victuals. Scaurus also sent the same Hircanus as his familiar friend unto Aretas, to perswade him that by disbursing some money, he should work his peace. Upon whose motion Aretas condescended and gave him three hundreth talents, and so Scaurus with his army, departed out of Arabia.

In the mean time Alexander the sonne of Aristobulus (who in the way to Rome escaped K all Iudæa, which he hoped quickley to win yea the wall which was destroyed by Pompey at Ie-rusalem, had been builded up again as he hoped, had not Gabinius (who was sent into Syria, to succeed Scaurus) who had oftentimes before shewed his valour, at that time also with an army come against Alexander. Who fearing the worst, assembled all the forces that he could to make resistance, so that he had ten thousand footmen, and a thousand and five hundreth horsemen; he fortified also the commodious places of the Countrey, to wit, Alexandrium, Hircanium, and Machærunt, which were neer unto the mountains of Arabia. Gabinius sent Marcus Antonius before him with part of the Army, and followed after with the rest; and L certain chosen men out of Antipaters company, and other companies of the Iews, whereof Malichus and Pitholaus were made chief, joyned themselves with Marcus Antonius; and presently after them followed Gabinius with all his company, who all went to meet Alexander.

But Alexander perceiving himself unable to encounter with all their united forces, fled:
but drawing neer unto Ierusalem, he was constrained to hazard the fight; where losing to the thousand slain) he escaped with the rest. But Gabinius, as soon as he came to the Castle called Alexandrium, understanding that many had forsaken their places, he by promising them pardon sought to unite themselves unto him before the war began: but when he perceived that they hammered on no abject resolution, he slew the most of them; as for the rest, he shut them up in the Castle. In this battell, Captain Marcus Antonius did many things worthy of M redown, and although he had alwayes and at all times shewed himself valiant, yet there especially his valour appeared. Gabinius leaving some to winne the Castle, went unto the Cities, and strengthned those that were not yet assaulted, and reedified those that were destroyed, and by his commandment Scythopolis and Samaria, and Anthedon, and Apollonia, and Iamnia, and Raphia, and Marisa, and Dora, and Gadara, and Azotus, and many more began to be done, he returned to Alexandrium, and began a more urgent siege; whereat Alexander being terrified and made desperate, he sent Embassadors to him, beseeching him to pardon

A his offences, promiſing to render unto him the caſtles of Macherunt and Hircanium, which were in his power, and beſides them Alexandrium: All which Gabinius by counſell of Alexanders mother deſtroyed, leſt they might be occaſion of new warres. This woman accoſted and flattered Gabinius, for that ſhe feared leſt her husband and the reſt of the captives at Rome ſhould be any waies damnified. After this, Gabinius carried Hircanus to Ieruſalem; and committing the Temple unto his charge, he made others of the Nobility Rulers of the Common-wealth, and divided the whole nation of the Jews into five parts and Governments, whereof one was eſtabliſhed at Jeruſalem, another at Doris, the third at Amathunt, the fourth at Iericho, the fifth at Sephoris a City of Galilee: and the Iews being delivered from the government of one man onely, willingly ſuffered themſelves to be ruled
B by the Nobility. But ſhortly after, Ariſtobulus eſcaping from Rome raiſed new troubles: who gathering a great army partly of thoſe that deſired a change, partly of them that loved him before, took Alexandrium and began to compaſſe it again with a wall: but hearing that Gabinius had ſent Siſenna, Antonius, and Servilius againſt him with an army, he went to Macherunt; and forſaking thoſe that were not fit for warre, he took with him almoſt 8000. armed men, amongſt whom was Pitholaus Governour of them that wer revolted, who with 1000. men fled out of Ieruſalem. But the Romanes followed and purſued them: and joyning battell with them, Ariſtobulus with his men fought valiantly, till being by force overcome, the Romanes ſlew five thouſand of them, and almoſt two thouſand fled into a mountain; and the other thouſand breaking the ranks of the Romanes with Ariſtobulus, were forced to Macherunt; where the king hiding himſelf the firſt night amongſt the ruines,
C hoped that having reſpit, he might gather another army, and fortifie the Caſtle: but having for two daies ſuſtained the forces of the Romanes, although unable to do it; at laſt was taken: and with his ſonne Antigonus, who had been impriſoned with him at Rome, he was carried to Gabinius, and from thence to Rome; and the Senate put him in priſon: but his ſonnes they ſent into Iudæa, becauſe Gabinius writ that he had ſo promiſed Ariſtobulus his wife upon condition the caſtles might be yeilded. Now Gabinius being prepared to warre againſt the Parthians Ptolomeus hindred him, who returning from Euphrates went into Egypt, leaving Antipater and Hircanus his friends to diſpoſe of all things belonging to the war: for Antipater helped him with money, weapons, corn, and men, and he perſwaded the Iews
D who kept the waies that lead unto Peluſium, to ſuffer Gabinius to paſſe. Now in the other part of Syria, at the departure of Gabinius there began a commotion, and Alexander Ariſtobulus ſonne once more incited the Iews to rebellion, and having gathered a mighty power, purpoſed to deſtroy all the Romanes, that were in that countrey: which Gabinius fearing (who was returned out of Egypt at the beginning of theſe tumults) he ſent Antipater before, who perſwaded ſome of the rebells to be quiet, yet 30000. remained with Alexander. For which cauſe he was very forward to fight, and went out to battell: the Iews came againſt him, and neer unto Itabyrium they fought, where 10000. were ſlain, and the reſt were put to flight: and Gabinius returned to Ieruſalem through the counſell of Antipater: who having eſtabliſhed that eſtate, went from thence and overcame the Nabathæans in battell: he like-
E wiſe permitted Mithridates and Orſanes privily to depart, who were fled from the Parthians, ſaying that they had eſaped from the ſouldiers. In the mean time Craſſus, who was appointed to be his ſucceſſour, had Syria delivered him, who toward the maintenance of the Parthian wars, took all the gold that was in the Temple of Ieruſalem, and 2000. talents which Pompeius had forborn to do: who paſſing over Euphrates, was both himſelf and his whole army utterly overthrown: of which thing it behooveth us not to ſpeak in this place. After the death of Craſſus, the Parthians endeavoured themſelves to enter Syria; but Caſsius who ſucceeded him in the government, repulſed them: and having gotten the upper hand he ſpeedily reſorted into Iudæa, and taking Tarichea, he carried away about 3000. men captives; and put Pytholaus to death, for gathering a company of ſeditious people unto Ariſtobulus his part.
F He that cauſed and counſelled his death was Antipater, who was married unto a noble woman of Arabia called Cypris, by whom he had four ſonnes, Phaſælus and King Herod, Joſeph, and Pheroras, and one daughter called Salome; who ſought the friendſhip of all Potentates round about him by courteſie and hoſpitality, and eſpecially he got the good will of the King of Arabia by affinity, unto whoſe fidelity he committed his ſonnes, becauſe he had undertaken the wars againſt Ariſtobulus. But Caſsius made a truce with Alexander, and in the mean time went to Euphrates to hinder the paſſage of the Parthians, of which we will ſpeak hereafter.

Of the death of Aristobulus, and the warre between Antipater and Mithridates.

The yeer of the world, 3917. before the nativity of Christ, 47

After that Cæsar had forced the Senate and Pompey to flie beyond the Ionian sea, and by that means made himself sole master of all at Rome, he set Aristobulus at liberty, and with two legions of men sent him in haste into Syria, hoping through his means, speedily to win both it, and also all places adjoyning to Iudæa: but both the hope of Cæsar, and the forwardnesse of Aristobulus, was overthrown through envy: for he was poysoned by Pompeys favourites, and even in his own countrey his body lay unburied, which notwithstanding was preserved from putrefaction with honey, till such time as Antonius sent it unto the Iews, commanding them to bury it in the Kings sepulchre. His sonne Alexander also, was beheaded at Antiochia by Scipio, being first according to the tenour of Pompeys letters accused before the tribunal seat, of such things as he had committed against the Romanes, Ptolomæus the sonne of Minæus, who ruled Chalcis which was under Libanus, having taken his brethren, sent his sonne Philippio with them to Ascalon; and he violently taking away Antigonus and his sisters from the wife of Aristobulus, brought them to his father, and falling in love with the youngest, took her to wife: for which cause, he was afterward put to death by his father. For Ptolomæus having slain his sonne, married Alexandra; and for that affinity sake, was more carefull for her brethren. After the death of Pompey, Antipater sought all means to get Cæsars favour: and when Mithridates of Pergamenus was hindred by the Garrison at Pelusium to passe any further with an army into Egypt, and was by that means stayed at Ascalon, he perswaded the Arabians to assist him, the rather, because he was but a stranger, and he himself seconded him with almost three thousand armed Iews.

Moreover, he incited the Potentates of Syria, and Ptolomæus who inhabited Libanus, and Iamblicus, and another Ptolomæus to assist him; for whose sakes the cities of that countrey did willingly undertake the wars. And now Mithridates strengthned by Antipaters means came to Pelusium, and because they would not suffer him to passe, he besieged the city, in which siege Antipater shewed his valour: for making a breach on that side of the wall, where his quarter was, he first of all with his company brake into the city, and so Pelusium was taken. But the inhabitants of Onias countrey, who were Egyptians and Iews, suffered him not to passe any further: yet did Antipater handle the matter so discreetly with them, that they did not onely suffer him to passe, but also provided victualls for his army. Whereupon the city of Memphis would not fight, but yeelded of their own accord unto Mithridates: so that passing thorow Delta, he fought with the other Egyptians in a place called the tents of the Iews; and being with all his company in danger, he was rescued by Antipater, who marching along the river side, set upon and discomfited the left wing of the enemies battell, and rushing upon them that pressed upon Mithridates, he slew many, and pursued the rest that fled, till he got their tents, and all with the losse of fourscore men. But Mithridates flying, lost eight hundred men, and being against all hope preserved out of those wars, was without all envy a true witnesse before Cæsar of all that which Antipater had both done and deserved. Whereupon Cæsar redoubled his courage with praise and promises unto him, and made him forward to hazard himself for him. In a word, he proved and shewed himself a stout warriour, and having many wounds in every part of his body, he bare a badge and testimony of his valour and vertue. Afterward when the estate of Egypt was quiet, he returned into Syria, where he made him a citzen of Rome, and granted him the immunities thereof: and did so honour him in other things, and used him so friendly, that he made him a pattern for all to imitate: and for his sake confirmed Hircanus in the high Priesthood.

CHAP. VIII.

How Antipater was accused before Cæsar: of the Priesthood of Hircanus, and how Herod made warre.

Antigonus Aristobulus sonne cometh to Cæsar to accuse Pompeys friends for his fathers death.

AT the same time, Antigonus the sonne of Aristobulus repairing to Cæsar, against his will was a cause of Antipaters greater felicity: for coming to complain of his fathers death (who was as it was thought, through Pompeys envy poysoned) and to accuse Scipio of cruelty, which was used against his brother; whereas he should have abandoned all passion which moved him to mingle hatred with his miseries, contrariwise he accused Hircanus, and Antipater as though they had unjustly driven him

A him and his brethren out of their native ſoil, and grievouſly injured the people, to obtain their intent; alleadging that they had ſent aide into Egypt to Cæſars forces, not for good will, but for fear of ancient enmity, and that hereby they might acquit themſelves of the good will they bare to Pompey. At theſe words Antipater (caſting away his veſture) ſhewed the number of his wounds, ſaying, it was not needful to uſe words, to prove what affection he had born to Cæſar; for his very body ſhould ſhew it, although he himſelf held his peace: adding, that he admired the impudent boldneſſe of Antigonus, who being ſon to an enemy of the Romans, and a fugitive from the Romans, and ſtill continued his fathers purpoſe novelty and ſedition, ſhould dare to accuſe others before the Romane Emperour, demanB ding of him how he durſt hope to obtain any good thing, who ought to be contented with his life onely: alleadging that he craved not maintenance for that he wanted, but that he might raiſe a rebellion amongſt the Jews, and againſt them who ſhould beſtow any thing upon him.

Which when Cæſar heard, he ſaid that Hircanus was moſt worthy to be high Prieſt, and bad Antipater wiſh what dignity he would have: who leaving that to the pleaſure of the giver, he was made Governour of all Judæa. And moreover, he obtained to reedifie the razed walls of his countrey, and Cæſar commanded that thoſe honours ſhould be engraven in the Capitol, that it might be a token in time to come of Antipaters juſtice and vertue. Antipater having attended Cæſar out of Syria, firſt of all repaired the ruined wals of his countrey which Pompey had razed: and going thorowout all the countrey, he threatned the obſtinate, and C perſwaded the ſeditious to obedience, admoniſhing them, that if they obeyed Hircanus, they might live in wealth and peace, and enjoy happineſſe, and an univerſal felicity; but if they ſuffered themſelves to be led with the vain hopes of thoſe, who for their private commodities ſought for alteration, that when they ſhould find him in ſtead of a Procurator, the Lord of all; and Hircanus in ſtead of a King, a Tyrant; and the Romanes and Cæſar, in ſtead of friends, deadly enemies: for that they would not ſuffer his power to be overthrown, whom they themſelves had eſtabliſhed for King. But notwithſtanding he ſpake theſe words, yet (becauſe he ſaw Hircanus more dull, and not of ſo fervent a ſpirit as the care of a Kingdome required) he himſelf ſettled the eſtate of the couutrey, and made Phaſelus his eldeſt ſon GoD vernour of the army, and the Lord of Jeruſalem, and of his own living, and ſent Herod his youngeſt ſon to govern Galilee (although he was very young:) who being by nature of a valiant courage, found out a preſent occaſion to ſhew his brave mind; for he took Ezechias which was Captain of theeves, who as he underſtood was wont to prey upon the confines of Syria with a great multitude, and put him to death with many other theeves: which thing was ſo grateful unto the Syrians, that in all towns and villages they made ſongs of Herod, as though he had reſtored them to peace, and to their poſſeſſions.

At length, the glory of this fact came to the ears of Sextus Cæſar, who was Cæſar the Emperours kinſman, who then ruled Syria. Phaſelus alſo did ſtrive to overcome the towardneſſe and good reputation of his brother, by daily increaſing, & winning to himſelf the good wils of the inhabitants of Jeruſalem: ſo that during the time he governed the City, he did E nothing inſolently through might or power: for which cauſe the people honoured Antipater as their King, and reverenced him as Lord of all, yet was his fidelity, and good will never the leſſe towards Hircanus. But it is impoſſible that any man that liveth in proſperity, ſhould not be envied. For Hircanus, although beforetime he were moved ſomething at the glory of theſe young men, and eſpecially with the proſperous ſucceſſe of Herod, being often annoyed with freqent meſſengers, who ſpred his praiſe for every thing he did; yet in particular he was ſtirred up by many envious perſons, who are wont to haunt the Courts of Princes, who were grieved that Antipater and his ſons ruled without offence. Theſe men told Hircanus that he onely enjoyed the bare name of a King, and that Antipater and his ſons ruled all; and that he ſo long would permit and wink at them, till that at the laſt, they would make themF ſelves Kings; for they now did no more ſuch as pretend themſelves to be Procurators. But leaving that title, they took upon them the dignities of Lords and Maſters, without any regard or reverence towards him; for Herod had put to death a great multitude of Jews againſt the law, whereas neither by word of mouth, nor by writing, the King had given him any ſuch authority: and that Herod, if he were not a King, but a private perſon was to be brought into judgement, there to anſwer the matter, and ſhew the King a reaſon, and ſatisfie the laws of his countrey; which permitted no man to be put to death, before by law he was convicted. By theſe perſwaſions Hircanus grew angry: ſo that not concealing his wrath, he cauſed Herod to be ſent for to anſwer the matter: who both for that his father advertiſed him thereto: and becauſe he truſted to the equity of his cauſe, firſt leaving a Garriſon

For which cauſe Hircanus who loved Herod, & was willing ſo to do of his own accord, did acquit him. Whereupon, he ſuppoſing that he had eſcaped againſt the kings will, went to Damaſcus unto Sextus, purpoſing not to obey, if hereafter he were ſent for. Natheleſſe, Hircanus was once again incited by bad people againſt Herod,, who certified him that he was gone away in a rage, and that he would enterprize ſomething againſt him: which Hircanus believing, knew not what to do, ſeeing his enemy more potent then himſelf. Hircanus once more incited by the wicked.

Shortly after, Sextus Cæſar proclaimed him General of the army, both in Syria and Samaria: ſo that now he was greatly to be feared, not onely for that he was highly in favour with the commonalty, but alſo for the forces which he commanded. So that hereupon Hircanus fell into an extreme fear, verily perſwading himſelf that Herod with his whole army, would preſently come againſt him. Neither was his ſuſpicion in vain: for Herod angry at the pretended crime whereof he was accuſed; came with a great army to Ieruſalem, intending to depoſe Hircanus; which he had effected, had not his father and brother gone forth to meet him, and pacified him, intreating that he would account that terrour (wherein he had put his enemies) and his own indignation for a ſufficient revenge, and that he ſhould ſpare the King, by whoſe favour he came to be ſo potent: adding moreover, that he ſhould not think it a diſdain, that he was called to anſwer his accuſations; but ſeeing that he was acquitted of them, he ſhould ſhew himſelf grateful to the King. Neither ought he to revenge the diſcontent he had taken, that he ſhould ſhew himſelf unthankful to him who had ſaved his life. Moreover, he was to conſider the fortune of wars, together with the cauſe thereof, and think that the wars he now pretended, were very unjuſt; bidding him not to be too confident of the victory, being to fight againſt his own king, who had alwayes been gracious unto him, and never cruel; onely being as it were urged thereunto, by ſome of his councel, who being meerly envious, rather to ſatisfie their own miſlikes, then in regard of his diſgraces, framed a ſhadow of an accuſation, Herod pacified herewith, ſuppoſed it to be ſufficient for him to obtain the thing he hoped for, to have ſhewed his forces unto his nation. Marcus, Sextus ſucceſſour. Ant. l. 14. c. 2. Julius Cæſar ſlain by Brutus and Caſſius.

AT this time aroſe great and bloody civil wars amongſt the Romans, at ſuch time as Cæſar was traiterouſly ſlain by the treaſon of Caſſius and Brutus, after he had ruled the Empire three years and ſeven moneths. By reaſon of which murther their troubles daily increaſed, and the nobility being at variance amongſt themſelves, every one followed that courſe, that they thought moſt expedient for themſelves. Whereupon Caſſius preſently marched into Syria, to take poſſeſſion of the government of the army which was about Apamia, where he made Marchus and the legions that were at variance, and Baſſus friends: and raſing the ſiege from Apamia, and leading the army in his own perſon, he forced every City to be tributary; ſo that he grew to exact without meaſure. Whereas therefore he commanded the Jews to contribute ſeven hundred talents; Antipater, who feared his diſpleaſure, appointed his ſons, and other of his friends preſently to gather the money; and eſpecially among the reſt, he gave this charge to one Malichus a friend of his, being of neceſſity enforced thereunto. But Herod firſt of all got Caſſius his favour, who brought an hundred talents which he had collected out of Galilee, which was his part or Province: For this cauſe Caſſius accounted him as a dear friend. As for the reſt, he accuſed them of negligence, and was angry at the other Cities: So that for that cauſe he deſtroyed Gophna and Ammauntes, and other two of the baſeſt Cities, marching onward as if he intended to kill Malichus, for that he had been ſo careleſſe and negligent in gathering the tribute M

Yet Malichus after Cassius was departed, did no more remember how beneficial Antipater had been unto him, but oftentimes did treacheruosly lie in wait for to murther Antipater, who hindred and withstood his villanous pretence; notwithstanding that himself had often confessed that Antipater had saved his life. Antipater, fearing both his power and subtiltie, passed over the river Jordan to gather an Army, that he might revenge those treacheries. But Malichus being discovered, by his impudencie overcame Antipaters sons: for though many oaths and excuses, he won Phasælus chief of the Garrison in Jerusalem, and Herod also who was master of the Armory, that they should be a means to reconcile him to Antipater. Whereupon, Antipater intreating Marcus (who was Generall of the Army in Syria, and had determined to kill him, he was saved. The B reason that Marcus would have put him to death, was becaule Malichus sought to make an alteration.

Now Cæsar being young, and Antonius warring against Cassius and Brutus; Brutus and Cassius having gathered an Army in Syria, in consideration that Herod had stood them in stead where need required, they made him Procurator of all Syria; giving him a band of horsemen and footmen, Moreover, Cassius promised him, that if the wars had a happy end, he would make him King of Judæa. But it so came to passe, that the power and expectation which all men had of Herod, was the cause of Antipater his fathers death. For Malichus being hereby put in fear, hired one of the Kings officers for a certain sum of money to poyson Antipater; by which means he died, being thus unjustly rewarded for his good will toward wretched Malichus. He was a worthy man, and fit to govern, who had recovered the Kingdome being C loft, for Hircanus. Malichus (perceiving that the people was incensed against him, because they suspected that he had poysoned Antipater,) pacified and moderated their displeasure by denying the fact; yet to the intent he might be stronger, he gathered about him a Guard of armed men: for he thought that Herod would not let the matter slip so, but that he would presently come with an Army to revenge his fathers death. But by the counsel of his brother Phasælus (who sent him word that he should not openly be revenged upon Malichus, lest a sedition might arise among the people) he patiently permitted it so to be, and suffered Malichus to purge himself, and permitted him to be freed from suspition, and celebrated a most solemn funeral for his father: which done, he went unto Samaria, and appeased the sedition, wherewithall the Citie was disquieted. After this he returned to Jerusalem, intending in D that place to celebrate the festivitie, sending certain of his armed men before him, and appointing the rest to accompany him. But Malichus, who feared this approach of his, had solicited Hircanus to give order, that no stranger should intermingle themselves among the people, who were at that time purified.

But Herod contemning both him that commanded, and his commission entered the Citie by night: whereupon Malichus once more came unto him, and wept for Antipater. Herod, although he could very hardly bridle his displeasure, yet dissembled he the same: and sent letters unto Cassius, wherein he complained of his fathers death: the memory of whose hate being refreshed by this offence, he writ again unto Herod, willing him to revenge his fathers death; which that he might the better effect, he secretly commanded the Captains of his E Regiment that they should assist Herod. Now for that after the surprizal of Laodicea, all the best of the Citie came to Herod, bringing gifts and crowns, he appointed this for a fit time of his intended revenge. Now Malichus, suspecting that Herod would work revenge at Tyre, purposed secretly to get away his son, who was there a pledge, and he himself purposed to flie into Judæa: But despair of his own safetie urged him to greater matters; for he hoped to incite the Jews to take arms against the Romans, for that Cassius was now busie in the warres against Antonius: so that he thought he might easily depose Hircanus, and so make himself King. But he was prevented by the destinies: for Herod suspecting his purpose, invited him him and Hircanus to supper: at which time he made a shew as though he had sent one of his F servants, to cause a banquet to be prepared, but indeed he sent him to the Captains to foretell them that they might lie in wait for Ealichus: who remembring what charge Cassius gave them, came forth of the Citie unto the shore next adjoyning unto the town, all armed with swords; where compassing Malichus round about, they killed him with many wounds. Hircanus hereat astonished, fell in a swoune, and being scarcely come to himself, he demanded who killed Malichus? One of the Captains answered, that Cassius gave that commandment: whereupon he answered, Truely Cassius hath preserved me and my countrey, in killing him who was a Traitour to us both: but whether herein he spake as he thought, for that for fear he approved the fact, it is uncertain. And thus was Herod revenged upon Malichus

How Herod was accuſed, and revenged.

The yeer of the world, 3623. before Chriſts nativity, 41.

AFter Caſsius was departed from Syria, there aroſe another ſedition among them in Jeruſalem: for Fœlix came with an Army againſt Phaſælus, thinking ſo to be revenged upon Herod, for killing Malichus. It chanced that Herod at that time was at Damaſcus with Fabius a Roman Captain, who coming to aſſiſt Phaſelus, by the way fell ſick; ſo that he could not ſuccour him: but it ſo fell out, that Phaſalus without any help, did of himſelf overcome Fœlix, and therewithall reproved Hircanus as ungratefull, who had both favoured Fœlix, and ſuffered Malichus his brother to take and keep his Caſtles, (for already had he ſeized many of them, and eſpecially one of greateſt ſtrength called Maſſada) yet all theſe did not protect him from the violence of Herod, who was no ſooner recovered of his ſickneſs, but preſently he took all the reſt, and Maſſada: and at Hircanus humble ſute, permitted him him to depart from thence. He alſo chaſed Marion the Tyrant of the Tyrians out of Galilee, who occupied three Caſtles in that Countrey: as for all the Tyrians that he tooke, he ſpared their lives, and ſent ſome away mith rewards; whereby he got the good will of the Citie, and the hatred of the Tyrant. This Marion was made Tyrant of Tyria by Caſsius, who through the means of ſuch like inſtruments, had gotten into his hand all Syria: and Marion for the hatred he bare to Herod, took with him Antigonus, Ariſtobulus his ſon: and by Fabius his means, whom Antigonus had gained unto himſelf for money, he alſo got Ptolomæus to aſſiſt him in this expedition. Now Ptolomæus, who was father in law to Antigonus, furniſhed him with all neceſſaries: Herod likewiſe preparing himſelf againſt them, gave them battell in the entrance into Judæa, and got the victory: and having put Antigonus to flight, he returned into Jeruſalem, where he was honoured by all men for his deſart in that victory, ſo that even they that before deſpiſed him, by reaſon of his affinitie newly contracted with Hircanus, ſought his friendſhip and familiaritie. This Herod long before this time had a wife which was a noble woman of that Countrey, named Doris, and had by her a ſon named Antipater; but he then married Mariamme, Alexanders daughter, who was Ariſtobulus his ſon, and Hircanus his neece, by reaſon whereof he came to be familiar with the King. But when Caſsius was ſlain neer unto Philippi, Cæſar departed into Italy, and Antonius into Aſia; at which time the chief of the Jews came and accuſed Phaſalus and Herod, alledging that they by force got unto themſelves the rule and diſpoſition of the Countrey, and left Hircanus onely the bare name of a King. But Herod being then preſent, ſo won and wrought himſelf into Antonius favour by a great ſum of money, that he permitted not his enemies to ſpeak one word more; who thereupon returned home. Afterward a hundred men of the moſt honourable amongſt the Jewes, repaired to Daphne neer to Antiochia unto Antonius (now doting on the love of Cleopatra) who being choſen from amongſt the reſt, becauſe of their eloquence and Nobilitie of birth, propounded an accuſation againſt the two brethren. Meſſala preſented himſelf to return them anſwer, being aſſiſted by Hircanus whom he thought to be the fitteſt to govern their Common-wealth: who anſwered, Herod and his brethren. Whereat Antonius was exceeding glad (for he had been their fathers gueſt, and was moſt courteouſly entertained by Antipater, when he came with Gabinius into Judæa) and thereupon he made them both Tetrarchs, leaving unto them the rule of all Judæa: which when the Jewes Embaſſadours miſliked, he took 15 of them and put them in priſon, where he almoſt killed them, and rejected and derided the reſt: whereupon there aroſe greater tumults amongſt them in Jeruſalem. At laſt, the Jewes ſent another Embaſſage of a thouſand men unto Tyre, where Antonius ſojourned, with an intent to come to Jeruſalem with violence. Antonius hearing their exclaims, ſent out the Magiſtrates of Tyre againſt them, commanding them to kill all they could catch of the Jews, charging them alſo to confirm their authoritie, whom he himſelf had conſtituted Tetrarchs. But Herod and Hircanus went before them toward the Sea ſhore, admoniſhing them earneſtly to be contented, leſt they by this their indiſcreet proceeding, ſhould become not onely the cauſe of their own deaths, but alſo of War againſt their own Countrey; but for that they would not be reclaimed by theſe admonitions, Antonius ſent out certain armed men, who killed many of them, and wounded the reſt. Hircanus after this diſaſter both cauſed the dead to be buried, and the wounded to be cured; notwithſtanding all this, they that eſcaped would not contain themſelves in peace, but they ſo troubled the Citie, that Antonius in his diſpleaſure, ſlew thoſe that he had in hold.

CHAP. XI.

Of the war of the Parthians against the Jews: of the flight of Herod and his fortune.

The year of the world, 3023 before Christs Nativity, 41.

TWo years after this, Barzapharnes Governour of the Parthians, accompanied with Pacorus the Kings son, seized upon Syria, and Lysanias who succeeded his father Ptolemæus, son of Mineus, promising a thousand talents, and five hundred women, perswaded him to put Antigonus in possession of the kingdome of Judæa, and depose Hircanus.

Ant. l. 14. c. 21. Lysanias perswadeth Barzapharnes to depose Hircanus, and enstate Antigonus.

B Pacorus induced by these promises, went himself along the Sea coast, giving commandement to Barzapharnes to passe through the midst of the countrey; but amongst the rest of the places bordering on the Sea, the Tyrians would not recieve Pacorus (notwithstanding that the Citizens of Ptolemais and Sidon had given him entertainment) wherefore he gave part of his horsmen unto one who was the Kings Butler, called Pacorus, as himself was; commanding him to passe into Judæa, and learn what their enemies meant to do, and to help Antigonus where need required. Who as they wasted the countrey about Carmelus, many Iews came of their own accord and joyned with Antigonus, shewing themselves very prompt to fight: for which cause he sent them before to take a place called Drymos; where having fought with his enemies, and put them to flight, he pursued them with all speed as far as Jerusalem: and his number being augmented; he came unto the kings house. But

C Hircanus and Phasælus met them with a strong company, and fought with them in the market-place: where the enemys was forced to flie, and part of them were by Herod shut up in the Temple; and he appointed sixty men to keep them, which he placed in the houses next adjoyning; but the people bearing a grugde to his two brethren, burnt them with fire: whereat Herod being angry (for that his men were consumed with fire) set upon the people, and killed a great many of them, and every hour one laid wait for another: so that every day some was murthered. Now the feast of Pentecost drawing nigh, all places about the Temple, and all the whole City was filled with people of the countrey, whereof the most part was armed, and Phasælus kept the walls, and Herod with a small company kept

D the Kings Palace, assaulting their enemies upon a sudden as they were in the suburbs, kild a great many of them, and put all the rest to flight: part of them he couped up in the City, others he shut in the Temple, and the rest between the uttermost Rampire. Whereupon Antigonus requested that Pacorus might come and conclude a peace betwixt them. Phasælus moved by these his prayers, received the Parthian into the City, and entertained him into his house, accompanied with five hundred horsmen, who came under a pretence to make peace; but in effect he resorted thither to help Antigonus; he craftily conspiring against Phasælus, perswaded him to repair unto Barzapharnes as an Embassadour to treat a peace; notwithstanding that Herod altogether disswaded him, willing him to kill the Traitor, and not to trust his subtiltie: adding that the Parthians were naturally unfaithful.

The year of the world, 3924 before Christ Nativity 40.

E Pacorus departing out of the City, took Hircanus with him that he might be the lesse suspected, and leaving some horsmen with Herod named * Eleutheri, he followed Phasælus with the rest. When they came near unto Galilee, they found the inhabitants at variance, and up in arms, and met with Barzapharnes (who craftily with pretence of courtesie and friendship hid his treachery) who after he had bestowed gifts upon them, and that they were retired, laid an ambush for them: whereof they had intelligence at such time as they came to a place of the Sea-coast named Ecdippon. For in this place they understood of the thousand talents that were promised, and how that Antigonus had given the Parthians more then five hundred women of those that were amongst them, and that oftentimes they had been laid wait for, and that they had been lately taken, but that delay was made till such time as Herod in Jerusalem, and Phasælus in the campe are in danger of their lives.

F Herod was surprized in Jerusalem, for fear lest he hearing what was become of them, might provide for himself. Now they might perceive that these were not onely words; for they might behold their keepers not far off; yet would not Phasælus forsake Hircanus, notwithstanding that Offilius often exhorted him to flie (unto whom Saranalla the richest among the Syrians had declared all the plat-forme of their treason:) but he chose rather to go unto Barzapharnes, and to upbraid him to his face, that he had treacherously laid wait for him: but especially, for that in regard of money he had suffered himself to be corrupted: whereas he himself would have given more for his life and liberty, then Antigonus had done for the kingdome. At these words the Parthian with oathes, and protestations craftily freed himself from suspition, and no sooner repaired he to Pacorus, but presently the Parthians,

thians, who ſtayed behinde, and had charge ſo to do, laid hands on Phaſelus and Hircanus, who openly exclaimed againſt their falſhood and perjury. G

The yeer of the world,3914. before Chriſts nativitie,40.

In the mean time a Butler was ſent out for that purpoſe, who ſought to ſurprize Herod, and by ſome ſtratagem to toule him out of the City, who wrought by all the means he could, according as he was inſtructed. But Herod, who was alwaies wont to miſtruſt the perfideous practices of barbarous nations, being certain that thoſe letters which diſcovered the treaſons, were falne into the enemies hands, would not go forth; though Pacorus pretended a juſt cauſe, inciting him to ride out and meet them that brought the letters: wherein was contained neither the taking of Phaſelus, nor the treaſons, but onely what Phaſelus had done. But long before this, Herod by others underſtood, that his brother Phaſelus was taken; and Mariamme a very wiſe woman, Hircanus daughter, with many intreaties perſwaded Herod not to go forth: but that he ſhould beware how he truſted himſelf to the mercy of that barbarous people, who did now as it were openly aſſault him. Whileſt Pacorus was conſulting H with his complices, how he might privily effect his treaſons (ſeeing it was not poſſible openly to circumvent a man of ſo great wiſedome) Herod in the night time, whileſt his enemies neither knew, nor ſuſpected his intent, took his neereſt kinsfolk, and fled into Idumæa: which being once known, the Parthians followed him. For which cauſe, he made his mother, his brethren, and the young maiden eſpouſed, and her mother and youngeſt brother to keep on their journey, and he with his ſervants warily aſſaulted the Parthians; and having in every aſſault killed a great number of them, he haſted towards the Caſtle of Maſſada, and in his rerreat ſuſtained more harme by the Jews, then by the Parthians: who as they had been alwaies troubleſome, ſo now ſome threeſcore furlongs from the town, ſet upon him; where Herod obtaining the victory, killed a great many of them, and in remembrance of that valiant act, he builded upon that place a moſt rich palace for the King, and erected there a I moſt ſtrong tower, which by his own name he called Herodium. And when he fled, many joyned with him: but when he came to Threſa, a town of Idumæa, his brother Joſeph met him, and perſwaded him to leſſen the number of his followers: for Maſſada would not receive ſuch a multitude, (for the number of the multitude was above nine thouſand:) for which cauſe Herod according to his counſel diſmiſſed thoſe that were unfit for his turn, and ſent them into Idumæa, giving them neceſſaries for their journey. As for thoſe that were choſen men, and fit for his purpoſe, he retained them with him, and ſo was he received into the Caſtle: where leaving eight hundred ſouldiers to defend the women, and proviſion ſufficient for thoſe that were within, he himſelf went unto Petra, a City of Arabia.

Now the Parthians at Jeruſalem began to ſack the houſes of them that were fled, and the K Kings palace; they onely abſtained from Hircanus money, which did amount to more then three hundred talents: as for other mens goods, they found not ſo much as they expected; for Herod, long before that time ſuſpecting the infidelity of the Parthians, had carried all his riches and jewels into Idumæa, and every one of his followers did the like. When the Parthians had taken the ſpoil, they were ſo impious, that they left no place of the whole countrey free from their tyrannous war. They deſtroyed the City of Marſa alſo, and bound Phaſelus and Hircanus, and delivered them to Antigonus to be ſcourged, who preſently with his teeth bit off Hircanus ears, to the end, that if by ſome alteration, he chanced hereafter to get looſe, he might be no more high Prieſt: for none might offer ſacrifice that wanted any L member of his body. But Phaſelus his fortitude prevented the cruelty of Antigonus; who having neither weapon, nor his hands at liberty, beat out his own brains againſt a ſtone, and dyed; demonſtrating himſelf by that act, to be the true brother of Herod, and that Hircanus had degenerated: he dyed manfully by a worthy death, and anſwerable to ſo famous a life. Yet ſome reported that he recovered after that hurt, and that Antigonus ſent a Chirurgion under pretence to cure the wound, who filled the ſame with venemous medicines, and ſo killed him. Well, be it as it was, it was in him gallant reſolution.

It is reported likewiſe, that underſtanding before his death by the means of a certain woman that Herod, was eſcaped, he ſpake theſe words; now I ſhall die with a courage: who leave behind me one that will take vengeance of my enemies, and ſo he dyed. Although the M Parthians had not yet received the women (which was the chief thing they lookt for) yet leaving them, they eſtabliſhed Antigonus in Jeruſalem. and led Hircanus priſoner into Parthia. But Herod with all ſpeed haſted into Arabia, as if his brother had been yet alive, to the intent he might borrow money of the King of Arabia, wherewith he onely hoped that the cruelty of thoſe barbarous Parthians might be mitigated toward Phaſelus: for his opinion was, that although the Arabian had now forgot his fathers friendſhip, and were hard hearted, yet at leaſt he would lend him money, ſeeing it was to redeeme his brother, whoſe

For Herod took with him a sonne of his brothers into Arabia that was seven yeers old, and purposed to have given three hundreth talents for his ransome, and had made the Tyrians intercessors for him to the Parthians: but fortune prevented his endeavours, so that his love and care for his brother prevailed nothing. He found also that the Arabians had now cast away the league of amity: for Malichus their King sent to him as he was yet in the way, charging him with all speed to depart out of his dominions framing an excuse that the Parthians had sent Embassadours unto him, to request him to drive him out of his countrey; but indeed the cause was, that he should repay that which Antipater had deserved, nor recompence his sons now comfortlesse, for those good turns
B that he had received at their fathers hands: and those who counselled him to this, were such as offered to forswear those summes, which Antipater had put them in trust with, who were the chiefest men about him. For which cause, Herod perceiving the Arabians to be his foes for that which he thought would have procured him friendship, answered the Messenger according as grief moved him, and took his journey towards Egypt: and the first night he lodged in a countrey temple, to the intent that those of his company that were behind him might overtake him. The next day coming to Rhinocolura, his brothers death was told him; where, after he had there mourned his fill, he went forward.

Herod perceiveth the Arabians to be his enemies.

Now the King of Arabia (though too late) repented himself of that which he had done to Herod, and sent speedy messengers after him, to will him to return, repenting himself that
C he had so injuriously intreated him. When Herod was come to Pelusium, the watchmen of the city would not permit him to passe: for which cause he himself in person went to the governours, who reverencing the fame and dignity of the man, conducted him to Alexandria; whither he no sooner resorted, but Cleopatra received him very honourably, intending to make him the generall of her army which she was preparing at that present. But he neither regarding the offers and requests of the Queen, nor yet discouraged by the hard winter season, nor the dangers of the seas, took his journey towards Rome; and being in great danger of shipwrack neer unto Pamphilia, both he and the rest of the passengers were inforced to cast away the most part of their loading: with much adoe he arrived safe at Rhodes, which had been sore molested by Cassius wars; there was he entertained by certain of his friends,
D Ptolomeus and Saphinius: and although his money grew scant, yet there he builded a great Galley with three ranks of oars, and in it (being accompanied with his friends) he sailed to Brundusium, and from thence went presently to Rome. Where first of all (in regard of familiarity between his father and him) he went to Antonius, declaring unto him both his own calamity, and the miserable desolation of the whole countrey: and how leaving his deareſt friends besieged in a Castle, himself in humble manner through the stormy winter seas was come unto him, humbly craving succour at his hands. Whereupon Antonius compassionating his calamity, and remembring his familiarity with Antipater, and contemplating the vertue of Herod who stood before him, determined upon the present to make him king of the Jews, whom before he himself had made Tetrarch: for he loved not Herod
E so well, but ho hated Antigonus as much: for he held him both for a seditious person, and for an enemy to the Romanes. Now to the accomplishing of this, he found Cæsar farre more ready then himself, who called to mind the service that Antipater did in Egypt under his father, and his entertainment and friendship in all things: and beside all these, he was wrought and wonne by Herods courage and valour. For which cause, he procured the Senate to be assembled; at which time Messala, and after him Aratinus, in the presence of Herod recounted his fathers deserts and fidelity towards the Romanes, declaring Antigonus to be an enemy; not onely becaus that not long before he had revolted, but for that now lastly in despight of the Romanes he had by the assistance of the Parthians usurped the Kingdome. Upon which considerations the Senate being moved, and Antonius affirming it to be expedient for F the Romane warres, that Herod should be created king, the whole Senate condescended: and after the Senate was dismissed, Antonius and Cæsar went forth with Herod between them, and the Consuls went before accompanied with other Magistrates to offer sacrifice, and to register the decree of the Senate in the Capitoll. And Antonius feasted Herod the first day of his reign.

Ant.l. 14.c.23 Antigonus getteth Maſſada.

AT this time Antigonus beſieged thoſe that were left in the Caſtle of Maſſada, who had great ſtore of victuals; and wanted nothing but water. For which cauſe Joſephus, Herods brother purpoſed to flie unto the Arabians with two hundreth of his deareſt friends, for that he had intelligence that Malichus repented him that he had given Herod no better entertainment. Yea he had forſaken the Caſtle, had not great ſtore of rain falne that very night, wherein he intended to flie: for the wells and ciſterns being now filled with water, there was no cauſe to flie: ſo that voluntarily iſſuing out of the Caſtle, he aſſaulted Antigonus ſouldiers, and killed very many of them; ſometime in open warre, and ſometime by policy: yet fought they not alwaies with fortunate ſucceſſe, but returned ſometimes with loſſe. In the mean time, Ventidius (who was generall of that Romane army which was ſent to expulſe the Parthians out of Syria) after he had repulſed them, reſorted into Judæa, under pretence to ſuccour Joſeph and the reſt that were beſieged, but in effect to get Antigonus money. When as therefore he drew neer unto Jeruſalem and had received the money he looked for, he departed with the greateſt part of his army, leaving Silo behind him with a few to colour his pretence: and Antigonus hoping for a ſecond ſupply from the Parthians, free'd Silo not to moleſt him for the preſent, ſeeing he was in great poſſibility. By this time Herod having ſailed from Italy to Ptolemais, and gathered a great army of ſtrangers and his own countrey-men together, came into Galilee againſt Antigonus, being aſſiſted with the forces of Ventidius and Silo, whom Delius who was ſent from Antonius, perſwaded to eſtabliſh Herod in his kingdome. But Ventidius was buſie in appeaſing the broyles that the Parthians had made in the cities, and Silo was corrupted by Antigonus: yet did not Herod want aid, for every day the further he marched into the countrey, the more his army increaſed, for all Galilee (a very few excepted) yeelded unto him. Whereupon he purpoſed firſt of all to go to Maſſada, to deliver his friends that were there beſieged, but Ioppe hindred his purpoſe; which for that it was an enemy town, he thought it beſt to take it before he went further, leſt that whileſt he was going to Jeruſalem his enemies ſhould have a place behind him to flie unto. Now Silo joyned armies with Herod, rejoycing that he had found occaſion to reſiſt, becauſe he was perſecuted by the Iews; whom Herod with a looſe wing of his army and a ſmall company of men, terrified, and preſently put to flight, and ſaved Silo alſo who had much adoe to make reſiſtance againſt them. This done, and Ioppe taken, he haſted to Maſſada, and the people of the countrey (ſome of them for his fathers ſake, otherſome for his own, and many for both) joyned themſelves unto him: and many alſo came unto him for hope, becauſe he was now king; ſo that now he had a very puiſſant army: but Antigonus hindred his jouruey, by planting certain ambuſhes in places convenient where Herod was to paſſe, and yet for all this he little harmed him.

Herod intendeth after he hath taken Maſſada and Joppe, to beſiege Jeruſalem.

Herod begirteth Ieruſalem with a ſiege, and proclaimeth the cauſe of his coming.

Herod having eaſily taken Maſſada, and reſcued his friends from thence, he went to Jeruſalem; where both Siloes ſouldiers, and many of the city came and followed him, being now terrified with the greatneſſe of his forces: there pitching their tents at the Weſt ſide of the town, they that guarded that part aſſaulted them with darts and arrowes; and others iſſuing by troups forth of the city, aſſaulted the fore-front of the army. Whereupon Herod cauſed one to go about the walls of the city, and to proclaime how that he was come for the good of the whole city, and that he would not take revenge of any, though he were his open enemy, and that he would pardon even them that had been moſt ſeditions. But when Antigonus his followers with loud exclamations hindred the criers voice from being heard, leſt any man ſhould alter his mind: Herod preſently commanded his men to beat the enemies off from the wall, who with their arrows ſpeedily forced all that were in the towers to flie. At this time Silo was detected to have been hired with money: for he ſolicited many ſouldiers to cry out, that they wanted all things; and to aſk money and victualls, and to crave to be diſmiſſed and ſent into ſome place of opportunity, there to abide during the winter, nay he himſelf ſought to be gone. But Herod went unto the captains that ſerved under Silo, and called many of the Souldiers together requeſting them not to forſake him at that exigent, whom Cæſar, Antonius, and the whole Senate as they knew had ſent thither, promiſing them that within one day he would relieve all their neceſſities. In the mean time Herod reſted not; for taking with him ten companies (five of the Romanes, and five of the Jews, amongſt whom were mixed three hundreth that B were hired, and beſides them a few horſemen) He came to Jericho, where he found the citie without inhabitants, and 500. with their wives and families had placed themſelves upon the tops of the mountains; whom when he had ſurprized, he permitted them to depart. But the Romanes brake into the city, and ſacked it, where they found the houſes ſtored with all manner of riches: and the King leaving a garriſon at Iericho, returned. He ſent likewiſe the Romane ſouldiers to the cities which were on his ſide, to wit, Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria, that they might abide there till winter was paſt. Antigonus alſo through Silo his means (whom he by money had made his friend) obtained that a part of his army might (during the winter time) abide at Lydda, for Antonius ſake: and the Romanes being now diſcharged from the warres, abounded in all things.

C All this time Herod was not idle, for accompanied with two thouſand footmen, and five hundreth horſe, he went about Idumæa, and ſent alſo his brother Joſeph, leſt by Antigonus his means the people ſhould rebell. And he himſelf having carried his mother and the reſt of his kindred, whom he took from Maſſada, into Samaria; and having placed them where no danger might betide them; himſelf went into Galilee, to ſubdue that part of the countrey, which as yet was not in his hands, and to expell from thence the garriſons left by Antigonus, And when he was come to Sephoris, notwithſtanding it ſnew mightily, he eaſily took it; for the garriſon before he aſſaulted it, fled; and finding there great ſtore of proviſion, he refreſhed his ſouldiers, which now with winter weather were ſore tyred, and then ſent them againſt the theeves, that lay lurking in dens and caves; who making often incurſions upon the coun-

Wherefore firſt of all he gave the ſouldiers the fruit of their labours, and diſtributed to every one of them an hundreth and fifty drachmes of ſilver, and unto the Captains more, and ſo ſent them where they ſhould paſſe the winter. Alſo he writ unto his youngeſt brother Pheroras to provide neceſſaries for them in the market; and to build a wall about the Caſtle of Alexandrium: which he performed.

In the mean-while Antonius paſſed the time about Athens, and Ventidius ſent for Silo and Herod to aſſiſt him in the war againſt the Parthians, charging them, that before their coming they ſhould ſettle the eſtate of the Jews. At laſt, Herod deviſed a way ſcarcely heard of before; for he put the valianteſt of his men into coffers, and ſo let them down into the edge of the caves, and they killed the theeves and their families, and caſt fire at them that reſiſted. And Herod ſeeking to ſave ſome of them, cauſed a cryer to bid them come unto him: but there was not one that willingly came unto him, and thoſe that were forced choſe rather to die, then be his captives. Herod having thus taken the caves, and ſlain thoſe that were in them, leaving a part of his army, ſo much as he thought might ſuffice to repreſſe any that ſhould attempt any rebellion, and making Ptolomæus chief over that part; returned into Samaria, carrying with him three thouſand footmen, and ſix hundreth horſemen againſt Antigonus. IN the mean ſeaſon Herods affairs in Judæa went backward: for he left his brother Joſeph Governour of all, commanding him to do nothing againſt Antigonus till his return. For he little truſted to Machæras help, becauſe of the parts he had played before. But Joſeph underſtanding his brother to be farre off, not regarding what charge was left him, M

After

A After Antigonus had obtained this victory, there was such a change in Galilee, that those who favoured him, took the chiefest of Herods favourites, and drowned them in a pond. Also there arose a great change in Idumæa; where Machæra repaired the walls of a certain castle called Githa. All this while Herod heard nothing of the news; for after Samosata was taken, Antonius made Sosius Governour of Syria, leaving order with him, that he should help Herod against Antigonus, and so he departed into Egypt. Sosius sent two companies of souldiers with Herod into Judæa to help him, and he himself with the rest of the army followed. When Herod was at Antiochia neer Daphne, his brothers death was manifested unto him in a dream: And whilest he was troubled thus, so that he leapt out of his bed, even at the same instant the B messengers who brought tidings of his death, entred into the house: and weeping a little for grief, as it were deferring his sorrow till another time, he went towards his enemies; so that he hasted above his strength. When he came to Libanus, he took eight hundreth inhabitants of that mountain to help him, and joyned unto them one of the Romane legions; and not expecting the day time, with them he entred into Galilee, and meeting with his enemies, he forced tham to flie unto the place from whence they came: and every day he assaulted their Castle: But before he could take it, being wearied with cruell winter, he was constrained to lead his army into the next village. Within a few daies his number being increased by one other legion which Antonius sent, he put his enemies in such a fear, that they in the night time fled and forsook the Castle. And now he hasted to Jericho to be re- C venged upon those that killed his brother: where there befell him a most strange accident, from the which being against all hope delivered, he perswaded himself that God bare an especiall love unto him. For when many nobles that night had supped with him, supper being ended, and every one being gone forth, incontinently the house wherein he supt fell down: Herod took this as a Præsagium both of the dangers and prosperous successe he was to have in his wars. And the next morning early he removed from thence, and about 6000. of the enemies descending from the mountains, assaulted the vantguard, but they durst not joyn battell with the Romanes, but molested them standing afarre off with stones and darts, and they wounded many: so that also Herod himself passing along, was wounded in the side with a dart. Antigonus desirous to shew himself most potent, as well in multitude of men, as also in courage, sent Pappus a friend of his, with an army into Samaria, who there got the D victory of Machæra. Herod went about the enemies countrey and took there five towns, and destroyed two thousand of the inhabitants, and firing the houses, he returned to his army neer unto a village called Cana.

The yeer of the world, 3927. before Christs Nativity, 37.

Herod certified of his brothers death in a dream.

Herods dining room fell after he had forsaken it and gone to bed.

Every day there came flocking unto him a very great number of Iews, both from Iericho and from other parts of the Countrey, some of them hating Antigonus, othersome loving Herod for his valiant deeds: for many without any reason desired an alteration. Whilest thus he hasted to fight, Pappus with his men neither fearing the multitude, nor strength of their enemies, came fiercely upon them, and offered battell. The battell being begun, the others a while abstained, onely Herod remembring his brothers death, ventured more then the rest, to the end to be revenged upon them that were the authors thereof: and so he easily over- E came the enemies army; and still assaulting the fresh men, he put them all to flight. There was a mighty slaughter: for many being forced to flie into the village from whence they came, he pursued them and slew an infinite number. Lastly, rushing amongst the enemies that fled, he brake into the village, where all the houses were full of armed men, and every house top full of men to defend it: and because he easily overcame those that were abroad, he overthrew the houses, and so forced them that were within to come forth. Others he killed in companies with the ruines of the houses wherein they were; and if any one chanced to escape, the souldiers without that were already armed, with swords kil'd them: so that there were such heapes of dead bodies, that they who had the victory could not passe thorow the streets for them. The enemies were so discouraged with this overthrow, that the whole F multitude of them (seeing those that were slain in the village) fled away: and Herod by the benefit of his good fortune had even then come to Ierusalem, had not winter stormes hindred him, which was the onely cause that he at that time got not a full conqueſt; and that Antigonus was not utterly overthrown, who through fear and desperation was purposed to leave the city. But Herod towards night having given his friends leave to depart to rest their weary bodies, being himself heated with his armour, after the manner of souldiers, went to wash himself, accompanied onely with one Page. And before he came to the bath, one of his enemies met him having a sword drawn in his hand; and then another; and afterwards a third; and after them more: and these escaped out of the battell, and came to the bath to hide themselves; and seeing the King there, they were sore afraid, and sought to

The next day after, he beheaded Pappus, who was the Generall of Antigonus his army, and sent his head to his brother Pheroras, who was made ruler of his army, in revenge of his brother that was slain: for Pappus was he that slew Joseph.

there his trusty friends that would not slack their businesse, he went into Samaria to visit his betrothed, which was the daughter of Alexander, who was son to Aristobulus, who (as we before made mention) was espoused unto him: and he wedded her even in the time of the sige, as who should say, now he contemned his enemies: after his marriage rites were performed, he returned to Jerusalem with a far greater army: Sosius also seconded him with a great army of footmen, and horsemen, whom he sent before him thorow the midst of the countrey; and he himself came after by Phœnicia. Now when all his whole army was assembled together, to the number of about some eleven legions of footmen, and six thousand horsemen, besides the Syrians that came to help him; which were no small number, he laied his assault and battery to the northermost wall; and the rather because he thought himself I

Mean-while those Jews that were within the city were diversly troubled: for a multitude of the weaker sort, gathering themselves together about

But those who were hardiest among them, joyning themselves together, robbed and took away from the rest what they could, but in especial they took victuals from that part that was next the city: so that they neither left meat for horses nor men, and the valianteſt of them all being set to defend the walls against those that besieged them, hindred the adversary from erecting their rampires; so that they K still found some new device to hinder the force of their engines; neither did they any waies prevail so much as by their mynes which they made. As for the theeves, the King sought to represse their incursions, by placing an ambush of men to intercept them; by which means he relieved the want and scarcity of victuals, by fetching provision from places far distant: But notwithstanding they in their fight failed in no sort to expresse their incredible valour; yet did that military experience which the Romans had, over-master them by ods. Natheless, notwithstanding the emminent danger wherein they were plunged, they fought with them in open field: but where it chanced that the Romans by digging two several mynes, brake all at once into the midst of them; yet suddenly repaired they the breach that was L made in the wall, and fortified the other part thereof. In a word, they neither spared hands nor engines, but were all of them determined to fight it out even unto the last cast: and al-

Those places that neareſt adjoyned the Temple, were the first of all that they intercepted, and the whole army entering the city, it was lamentable to see how in every corner the people were massacred: for the Romans being displeased that the siege continued so long time, became more cruel, and Herods army endeavoured to let no one of the adverse part escape. By which means many were slain, both in the narroweſt places of the streets, as also in their own houses: yea even M

At that time also Antigonus neither respecting his former condition, nor his present estate, came and prostrated himself at Sosius his feet, beseeching him to be merciful unto him; but Sosius nothing compassionating his calamity, cruelly derided him, and called him Antigona: yet did he not permit him to depart free as a woman, but put him in prison.

Now when Herod had conquerd his enemies, he endeavoured to the utmost to appease the fury of the souldiers; for all the whole multitude were desirous to see the Temple, and

A the holy veſſels therein: but he reſiſted them, appeaſing ſome by threatnings, reclaiming others by force, and the reſt by intreaties, ſuppoſing that it had been better for himſelf to have been conquered, then by obtaining the victory, to miniſter a means whereby thoſe things ſhould be diſcovered which were not lawful to be revealed. He therefore preſently repreſſed the ſouldiers from ſacking the city, inveying much againſt Soſius, and objecting againſt him, that the Romans would deſolate the city both of men and money, and leave him King of a place without ſubjects: adding further, that he eſteemed not the Empire of the whole world to be a recompence for ſuch a maſſacre of his citizens. Hereunto Soſius replied, that in equity the ſouldiers were to have the ſacking of the town, in recompence of B that labour they had ſpent in the ſiege. But Herod gave him this anſwer, that he had rather recompence every man out of his own treaſury: and by this means he redeemed as it were the reliques of his deſolate countrey: and in the end performed that which he had promiſed. For he bountifully rewarded every ſouldier and captain, according to his merit, and gave Soſius a Kingly reward: ſo that no man went away without money. This done, Soſius dedicated a golden crown unto God, and ſo departed, leading Antigonus captive with him, to the end to preſent him unto Antonius. This man deſirous to continue his life, and entertaining himſelf with this cold hope even until the laſt, received in the end that reward which his faint heart deſired, and was beheaded.

Herod being now King, made a diſtinction between the citizens, and thoſe who had favoured him, he uſed very honourably, and put thoſe to death who had followed Antigonus: and
C when money failed, he diſtributed all his Kingly ornaments, and ſent them to Antonius and his company. Yet did he not quite redeem himſelf from all annoyances: for Antonius being now captivate through Cleopatra her love, in all things yeelded unto her deſire: and Cleopatra having raged ſo againſt her own kindred, that ſhe had not left one of them alive, now turned her fury upon ſtrangers, and accuſing the Nobility of Syria unto Antonius, ſhe perſwaded him to put them to death, that ſhe might thereby the eaſier obtain their poſſeſſions. Afterward, her covetous mind ſought to effect the like againſt the Arabians, and the Jews alſo: inſomuch that ſhe ſecretly went about to cauſe the Kings of thoſe places, Malichus & Herod,
D to be put to death. Antonius made a ſhew as though he would have granted her requeſt; yet he thought it great impiety to kill good men, and ſo great Kings: yet notwithſtang, he no more accounted them his friends, but took a great quantity of ground from the limits of both their countries, and a vineyard in Jericho, where Balme grew; and gave her all the cities on this ſide the river Eleutherus, (Tyre and Sidon onely excepted.) Now when ſhe had obtained the dominion of theſe cities, ſhe followed Antonius unto Euphrates, who ſet forward to make war againſt the Parthians, and afterward by Apamia and Damaſcus ſhe came into Judæa: where Herod, having ſomething pacified her angry mind with great gifts, obtained to pay her yearly two hundred talents for that part of his countrey, which Antonius had given her; and ſeeking by all means poſſible to get himſelf an intereſt in her favour, he conducted her unto Pelluſium: and not long after, Antonius returned out of Parthia,
E and brought Artabazes, the ſon of Tigranes, captive, and gave him to Cleopatra: for all the money and riches which he had got, and the captives likewiſe, were beſtowed on her.

Of the treacherous practiſe of Cleopatra againſt Herod; of Herods war againſt the Arabians, and of a very great Earthquake.

F ABout ſuch time as the Actiack warre was a foot, Herod prepared himſelf to attend Antonius; ſeeing for the preſent all troubles were pacified in Judæa, and he had already got the Caſtle of Hircanion, which Antigonus ſiſter had in her poſſeſſion. But Cleopatra craftily prevented him in this his journey; ſo that he could not go with Antonius: for ſhe deſiring the ruines of both the Kings (as was before mentioned) perſwaded Antonius that he ſhould cauſe Herod to make warre againſt the Arabians: whom if he overcame, then ſhe ſhould be made Queen of Arabia; and if ſo be himſelf were overcome, then ſhe ſhould be Queen of Judæa: intending hereby, that one of theſe Potentates ſhould ruinate the other. But this practice of hers was greatly to Herods gain: for firſt of all, making head againſt thoſe of Syria that were his enemies, with all the power of horſmen he could make, which was very many, and meeting them at Dioſpolis, he overcame them, though they valiantly reſiſted: who having the overthrow, ſtirred up a mighty army army of the Arabians to help them, so that an infinite company was gathered together about Cœlosyria, expecting the Jews near unto the city called Canatha. Where king Herod meeting them, purposed not to fight unadvisedly, but to compasse his own army round about with a wall, but his army remembring their former victory, would not be counselled, but violently assaulted the Arabians, and at the first onset put them to flight. Herod pursuing his enemie, was greatly endangered by the treason of the inhabitants of Canatha (who were set on by Athenio, that was one of Cleopatras captains, who had alwaies born him ill wil) for the Arabians encouraged by their help, returned again to battel; and they two joyned their forces together, and set upon Herod in stony and difficult places, and put his army to flight, and slew many of them: and those that escaped fled into a little village hard by, called Ormiza; where the Arabians compassing them about, took both the men and their tents with all their furniture. Not long after this overthrow of Herods souldiers, he came and brought help, but too late, and to little purpose: but the cause hereof was, for that the captains of his army would not obey his commandment: for if they had been obedient, Athenio had not had opportunity to work him that injury; yet was he revenged upon the Arabians, and daily made incursions upon their borders, and ceased not to invade and spoil them, until by many, he had cried quittance with them for their one victory.

The Arabians defeat Herods army.

The Actian war between Antonius and Augustus.

While thus he pursued his enemies, a great calamity befell him in the seventh year of his reign, and in the midst of the Actian war: for about the beginning of the spring time, there chanced a great earthquake, which slew an infinite multitude of beasts and thirty thousand people: yet the army had no harm, for it lay in an open place. With the report hereof, the Arabians were highly encouraged (for such as report an evil occurrent, do alwayes redouble the misery thereof in relating it) for which cause, the Arabians, making account that all Judæa was overthrown, and that there was no man left alive to resist them, entred into Judæa, assuring themselves to conquer the countrey: and before their coming, they slew the Embassadors of the Jews that were sent unto them. Herod perceiving his countrimen terrified by the sudden approach of their enemies, and not oney broken, but wearied with the greatnesse and continuance of their calamities, rowzed up their drooping spirits that were tired with suspect, and encouraged them on this wise: "I see no reason of your present "fear, neither do I admire, that you were terrified with the punishment of Gods indignation: "but it is a cowardly mind to be daunted by the coming of your enemies, who are but men; "and whose violence, if your selves please, ye may represse. For mine own part, I am so "far from being discouraged by the approach of mine enemies, that I rather think that God "hath of his providence sent this earthquake as a bait to allure and incite the Arabians to "invade us, to the end, that through our means he may punish them: for the cause that moveth them to assault us, is not the trust they repose in their own valour and great army, but "it is our misery that inviteth them. Yet who knows not that the hope is frustrated that is "founded not upon a mans private vertue, but upon another mans misfortune? there is no-"thing assured in humane affairs, in respect either of prosperous successe, or adverse fortune "which a man may perceive to alter upon all occurrents, as we our selves may witnesse by "our own experience. For in the first conflict ye overcame; in the second ye were overcome; "and now the third time (for ought I can conjecture) they, thinking themselves sure of the "victory, shall by us be overcome: for they who misdoubt nothing; are rash in their pro-"ceedings, whereas they that are fearful and timorous, providently seek to prevent their "dangers: so that I am encouraged to hope for victory even by your fear.

Another calamitie of Herods.

Herods oration to his dismaied souldiers.

Fear giveth confidence.

"For when as you were too confident, and against my will and direction rushed in upon "your enemeis, Athenio found opportunity to hurt us: but now sith I perceive in your minds "a certain remisnes and a forecast, it is an evident token unto me of an assured victory. It "behoveth you therefore not onely before the conflict to continue your accustomed minds, "but also in the conflict to shew that ye are men, armed both with hearts and hardinesse; to "the end, that our impious enemies may well see, that neither any humane calamity, nor di-"vine punishment can daunt the courage of the Iews, whilest their breath is in their bodies: "and that never a one of you all will suffer the Arabians to dominear over your goods and "possessions, whom many times you have almost made your slaves. Be not therfore terrified "with this motion of a body that hath no soul: neither yet perswade your selves, that the "earthquake portended any massacre, for even the elements themselves by their own nature "are subject to such defects, and portend no other mishap, but that which they bring with "them. Perhaps the plague, and famine, and earthquake have some tokens demonstrating "them before they come: but when they are once come, they signifie nothing else; but at "last, end and cease of themselves. But say we should be overcome, can war enforce more harm

A "harm againſt us, then the earthquake hath done? Truly, it is an evident token of our e"nemies ruine, and that by their own cauſe, who moſt cruelly, contrary to the law of all "nations, butchered our Embaſſadours, offering to God ſuch ſacrifice for the good ſucceſſe
"of their wars. They cannot hide themſelves from the ſight of God, and from his mighty "power, but preſently they ſhall feel puniſhment for their offence, if filled with the coura-
"gious ſpirit of our nation, we be ſtird up to revenge that impious violating the law of all "nations, and ſo every one march on to fight, not for his wife and children, or countrey, but "to revenge the murther of our Embaſſadours: who will lead our army, and know better
"then we that are alive to direct the ſame. For my own part (if you will be ruled by me) I B "wil be the firſt that will lead you, and will hazard my ſelf for you: for you know full well,
"that if your valour be not eclipſed by ſome headlong raſhneſſe, there is nothing that may "make head againſt you.

Herods perſuation.

After he had by theſe or ſuch like perſwaſions founded his ſouldiers, and found them in ſome ſort encouraged thereby, he offered ſacrifice to God. And perſently after, with all his army he paſſed over Jordan: and pitching his tents at Philadelphia, not far from his enemy, he made a ſhew to aſſault a Caſtle that was between them and him, and ſo skirmiſhed with them a far off, deſirous to draw them to the battel: for the enemies had ſent to entercept the Caſtle, but Herods forces gave them the repulſe, and in deſpight of them to kept the hill. Thus every day made an offer to fight, braving the Arabians: and ſeeing they would not come to the ſhock (for they were in great fear, and Athenus their General for very fear was
C ready to give up the ghoſt) he aſſaulted them in their trenches, and caſt down their rampier, ſo as they were conſtrained to come forth to battel, without any order; and their horſmen, and footmen were confuſedly mixt together. And although the Jews in number were inferiour unto them, yet they were inferiour to the Jews in courage: yet they became now more hardy, becauſe they diſpaired of the victorie: and ſo long as they ſtood to it, they had no great loſſe; but when they turned their backs, then many were ſlain by the Jews, and many periſhed being troden on by their fellows. Thoſe that eſcaped, were forced to retire themſelves into their trenches, where Herod beſieged them: and although they were all readie to be put to the ſword, yet was there ſuch penury of water, that for drink they were all like to periſh. For which cauſe, they ſent Embaſſadours to the King, offering him fiftie talents to let D them go: but he contemned them, and ſo much more earneſt was he, by reaſon that their want of water was ſo great, that coming out by flocks of their own accord, they offered themſelves to the Jews: ſo that in this ſort there came forth four thouſand in five daies, and the ſixth day the whole multitude (deſpairing of their lives) came out to fight, with whom Herod conflicting, ſlew about ſeven thouſand. Having in this ſort weakned the Arabians, that he had now extinguiſhed all their ſtrong men, the countrimen admired him, and were ſo much daunted at his puiſſance, that they wiſhed him for their Ruler.

E How Herod was exalted to the Kingdome.

INcontinent after this his proſperous ſucceſſe, there did betide unto him a ſea of cares and griefs, in reſpect of the love which he bare unto Antonius, whom Cæſar had now lately overthrown at the battel which was fought at Actium: yet was he more afraid then hurt by this his ſuſpition: for Cæſar accounted not Antonius fully conquered, ſo long as Herod and he kept together. Wherefore, the King timely foreſeeing thoſe danders that might enſue, went to Rhodes, where at that time Cæſar abode: in which place, in the habite of a private man, and without a Crown, but with a Kingly courage, he preſented himſelf before him, and with unfaigned conſtancie ſpake unto him in ſuch manner as followeth; "I ſhip, and withall put a Crown upon his head, and made a decree, and ſealed it, teſtifying how he had remitted all things done by Herod,and confirmed him in his kingdome, and rehearſed many things therein, greatly tending to Herods praiſe. Herod(having firſt pacified Cæſar with many gifts)requeſted him to pardon Alexander,one of Antonius his friends, who earneſtly and in humble manner deſired the ſame: but Cæſar being verie angrie, anſwered, that he for whom he entreated, had greatly and many times offended, and ſo repeld Herod Herods gratulation toward Cæſar. with this anſwer.

Afterward,Cæſar,travailing into Egypt through Syria,was entertained by Herod with all I royal pompe poſſible: and that was the firſt time that he ſhewed himſelf to take part with Cæſar,when near unto Ptolemais he took a view of the ſouldiers with*Cæſar*,and made a banquet for him and all his friends, and feaſted the whole armie likewiſe. And in as much as he travailed to Peluſium thorow drie grounds,when they returned again,he provided water for them,and furniſhed the armie with all neceſſaries: ſo that both Cæſar and the ſouldiers thought the kingdome a ſmall recompence for his deſerts. For which cauſe, after he came Cæſar increaſeth Herods dominion. into Egypt, and that Antonius and Cleopatra were now dead, he did not onelie increaſe his honour,but alſo reſtored unto him that portion of his countrie which was taken away, and given to Cleopatra:and beſides that,Gadara, and Hippon, and Samaria,and other cities about the ſea-coaſt; to wit, Gaza, and Anthedon,and Joppe, and Stratons tower; and moreover K gave him four hundred Galathians, which before were Cleopatra her guard: and there was nothing that ſo much moved Cæſars liberalitie,as the courageous mind of him unto,whom he was liberal. After the firſt Actian ſolemnitie,he added unto Herods dominion Trachon and Batanæa, and Auranitis bordering upon it. For this cauſe Zenodorus (who for money hired Liſanias his houſe) continually ſent theeves out of Trachon to rob the people of Da-maſcus: who in humble manner went to Varus (who was at that time Governour of Syria) entreating him to inform Cæſar of their calamitie. Cæſar underſtanding thereof, writ

my went to thoſe places which were moſt ſuſpected, and rid the countrey of the theeves, L and took the territory from Zenodorus: and Cæſar(leſt it ſhould again be a refuge for theeves to ſpoil Damaſcus) gave it to Herod, and made him ruler over all Syria. And ten yeers after,returning to his own countrey, he commanded the Governours to do nothing without Herods counſel: and after Zenodorus his death, he gave him all the countrey between Trachon and Galilee. But that which Herod eſteemed above all the reſt, was, that Cæſar loved him beſt of all next to Agrippa: and Agrippa loved him moſt of all men next unto Cæſar. Thus now he touched the very top of felicitie, and ſo increaſing in high mind, he imployed himſelf chiefly to pietie.

Of the Cities and buildings reedefied and built by Herod, and of his liberality towards ſtrangers, and of his felicity.

The yeer of the world,3947 before Chriſts nativity,17. IN the fifteenth year after his reign he repaired the Temple,and encloſed twice ſo much ground as was before about the Temple with a ſtrong wall,whereon he bejoynnig, which he built even from the foundation. The Caſtle was ſo rich and ſumptuous

that

A that it was equal unto the Kings Palace, and in the honour of Antonius, he named it Antonia. He builded himſelf alſo a Palace in the upper part of the city, and in it two houſes, huge, and richly adorned: ſo that the Temple was not to be compared unto them. And calling them by his friends names, he termed one of them Cæſarea, and another Agrippa; whoſe names and memories he did noy onely ſolemnize, and write in his private houſes, but alſo throughout the whole countrey, and in every part of the city. For in the countrey of Samaria he compaſſed a town with a wall, which was about twenty ſtounds, and called it Sebaſte; and he ſent thither ſix thouſand inhabitants, giving them a moſt fertile ſoil and demeans. There alſo amongſt other buildings, he erected a very huge Temple, and dedicated
B it to Cæſar, and gave the inhabitants of that place eſpecial priviledges. About the Temple was there a piece of ground containing three ſtounds and a half. For this monuments ſake, Cæſar added unto his dominion another countrey; for which cauſe he erected another Temple unto him, near unto the head of Jordan, of white marble, in a place called Panium, where there is a mountain riſing an infinite height into the air, at the ſide whereof there is an obſcure valley, where there are high rocks, that (by drops of water falling on them) are made hollow: ſo that the water, ſtanding in their concavity till they run over, falleth down with a ſtream of ſuch a length as is admirable. At the foot of this valley on the outſide, there ſpring certain fountains, and many think this to be the head of the river Jordan;
C which, whether it be true or no, we will declare hereafter.

The year of the world, 3947. before Chriſts Nativitie, 17.

At Jericho alſo (between the caſtle of Cyprus, and the other ancient Kings houſes) he erected other buildings, fairer and more commodius for them that came thither, calling them after the names of his friends. Finally, there was no convenient place in the whole kingdome, wherein he erected not ſomething in honour of Cæſar: and having in every place of his own kingdome deviſed and dedicated Temples unto him, he in Syria alſo where he ruled did the like, founding in very many Cities, Temples, which he called by the name of Cæſar. And perceiving, that amongſt the cities of the ſea-coaſt, there was one called Stratons tower, which being very old, was ruinated; and for the ſcituation thereof deſerved reparation and coſt: he repaired it all with a white ſtone, and built a very royal Palace therein, wherein chiefly he ſhewed a mighty mind. For this city ſtanding in the midſt between Dora and
D Joppe, there was no port or haven in that coaſt: ſo that whoſoever ſailed from Phænicia into Egypt, were in great danger, by reaſon of the violent winds that blew from Africa; which blowing but a very eaſie gale, inforce the water with ſuch a violence againſt the rocks on the ſhore, that the waves, rebounding back again a good way within the Sea, make the whole ſea tempeſtuous. But the king, with his liberality & coſt overcoming nature, builded a port or haven in that place, far bigger then that of Piræum, and within it made moſt ſafe ſtations for ſhips. And although the nature of that place was altogether contrary to his intent, yet he ſo overcame that difficulty, that the ſea could do that building no harm: and it was ſo gallant and beautiful to behold, as though there had been no let any way to hinder the adorning thereof. For having meaſured out ſuch a place (as we have ſpoken of) for the E port, he laid a foundation in the bottome twenty ells deep of ſtone, whereof moſt of them were fifty foot long, nine foot thick, and ten foot broad, and ſome bigger; and all the bottome of the haven where the water came, was laid with theſe ſtones. Which done, he raiſed a wall of two hundred foot; whereof an hundred foot was builded to break the violence of the waves, and had a name according to the uſe it ſerved for. The other hundred foot ſerved for a foundation of the wall whereof the haven was compaſſed, which was repleniſhed with many goodly towers, the greateſt and faireſt whereof he named Druſius, after the name of Cæſars kinſman. There were very many vaults alſo to conduct ſuch things into the town as were brought into the haven, and about them a paved place for them to walk in, that came out of the ſhips: The entrance thereunto was on the North ſide; for by reaſon of the ſci-
F tuation of the place, the North wind there is the calmeſt.

The fountain-head of Iordan

Herod makes a greater port then that of Piræum.

An apt deſcription of an haven.

Before the entrance were three great coloſſus held up on every ſide with pillars; they which are on the left hand, are propt up by a tower being a ſolid rock of ſtone. But at the entrance on the right hand were two huge ſtones joyned together, which make a greater tower then the other. There is alſo a houſe adjoyning unto the haven built of white ſtone; The ſtreets of the cities coming to that place, are of one bignes & proportion. Upon a hil oppoſite to the mouth of the haven, was there builded a temple very beautiful and exceeding great, which he dedicated to Cæſar, wherein was placed Cæſars coloſſus, fully as great as Jupiters at Olympus: for it was made after that example, equal to that at Rome, and that of Iunoes at Argos. The city he builded for the inhabitants of that Province, and the port or haven for ſea-fearing men. The honour and credit he attributed to Cæſar; and by his name called it

Cæſarea.

Cæsarea. He also made other buildings, as the Market, the Theater, and the Amphitheater, G which are worth the memorie. And he everie fifth year ordained certain sports, and called them after the name of Cæsar. And himself first proposed very ample rewards in the 192.
Olympiade, insomuch that he not onely gave royal gifts to the victors, but also to the second and third after them. He repaired Anthedon also, which was destroyed by the wars, and called it Agrippium: and loving Agrippa very dearly, he caused his name to be engra-ven over the portal he builded in the Temple. Neither was he unmindful of his parents:
for in the richest soil of the whole Kingdome he built a city for a monument of his father:
and by his name called it Antripatris, being a very rich soil, both for trees and rivers. At Jericho also he built a very gorgeous and strong Castle, and called it Cyprus, in honour of his mother. He likewise built a tower in memory of his brother Phasælus, at Jerusalem, and H called it Phasælus his tower (of the compasse and beauty of this tower we will speak hereafter.) He also called another city Phasælus, which is scituate in a vally beyond Jericho, towards the North.

Herodium.

Having thus eternized the memory of his friends and kinsfolk, he did not forget to do the like to himself: for he built a castle on a mountain near Arabia, having on one side a strong place of defence, and this castle he called Herodium after his own name. By the same name also he called a tombe, which he builded sixty stounds from Jerusalem, artificially made in manner of a womans dug, which he richly adorned; for within compasse of the top of it, he caused round turrets to be placed: and round about it he builded Princely houses, gallantly adorned both within and without. He also brought water from a great way off, with great cost and charges, and made a pair of stairs of pure white marble, to go up, which I had two hundred steps. For the whole hill was made by art, and it was made of an exceeding height: at the the foot thereof likewise he built another Palace, and houses to receive his friends and their carriges, so that this castle, for the abundance of all necessary places, seemed a city, and yet was it all the Kings palace. Having erected thus many buildings, he shewed his brave mind in strange cities, likewise: for at Tripolis, and Damascus, and Ptolemais he builded publike baths, which are called exercises. He builded the wall of Biblus; and seats, porches, temples, and markets at Berytus and Tyre: at Sidon and Damascus he builded a Theater, and a water-conduit at Laodicea, a Sea-town. At Ascalon he built fountains or lakes very sumptuous, and baths with pillars, that for greatnesse and gallant work were mira- K culous. To other places he gave woods and ports: and to many cities he added fields, as though they had been fellow-cities of his kingdom. Also, toward the maintenance of baths he gave a yearly annuity for ever: as namely, to those at Cous, to the intent he might be an eternal benefactor. Moreover, he gave all poor people corn; and he often and in sundry places gave the Rhodians mony to build a Navy of ships. At his own proper cost he repaired Pythium, which was burnt with fire. What should I say of his liberality which he extended to them of Lycia and Samia? or the magnificent gifts which he used towards all the people of Ionia; yea, all things that their hearts could desire: wherby he relieved all their necessities?
Nay, both the Athenians, and Lacedemonians, and Nicopolites, and the citizens of Perga-mus in Misia, received very many benefits at his hands. He paved also a large street in Anti- L ochia of Syria, which was in length twenty stounds, and that with fair marble. This street before that time was so full of durt, that no man could go thorow it; and all along it he built galleries, that people might go dry thorow it in rainy weather.

Some one may say, that these benefits he thus bestowed, were done for the proper use of those people on whom he bestowed them; but no man can deny, but that which he did for the citizens of Elis: was not onely common to those of Achaia, but to all the world, where the games, called Olympica Certamina, were solemnized. For Herod seeing them decay onely for want of maintenance, and that this was the onely remainder of all the ancient monuments of Greece, he not onely in his person at that time became one of the proposers of rewards in that Olympiade which he assisted when he went to Rome; but also gave a yearly M stipend to maintain the same, lest for want it should be left off. It is not to be told what debts and tributes he remitted, for he delivered the Phasælites and Balaneotes, and other towns of Cilicia, from the payment of a yearly tribute: yet was he not so liberal to them as he would have been, fearing lest the envy of some might accuse him of some further meaning, if he should be more bountiful to the cities then those that were the owners thereof. He exercised his body likewise in exercises fit for so valiant a mind: for he was a very skilful hunter, wherein he had alwayes his purpose, by reason of his skill in riding; so that in one day he killed fourty wilde beasts. That countrey hath many Boars, but it hath more store of Harts

CHAP. XVII.

Of the diſagreement between Herod and his ſonnes, Alexander and Ariſtobulus.

B BUt his private and domeſtical ſorrows, ſeemed to envy him in his publick felicity, & moſt adverſe fortune befel him through the means of a woman, whom he loved as himſelf. For being now made king, he put away his wife, which he firſt married (which was a Lady born in Jeruſalem, whoſe name was Doris) and married Mariamme the daughter of Alexander, who was Ariſtobulus ſon, which cauſed troubles in his houſe, both before, but eſpecially after he returned from Rome. For he baniſhed his eldeſt ſon Antipater, whom he had by Doris, out of the City, onely for his childrens ſake that he had by Mariamme; licencing him onely at feſtival times to come C unto the City in regard of ſome ſuſpicion of treaſon intended againſt him. And afterward he ſlew Hircanus his wives uncle, (notwithſtanding that he returned out of Parthia unto him) becauſe after he ſuſpected that he intended ſome treaſon againſt him; whom Barzapharnes after he had taken all Syria, took away priſoner with him. But his own countreymen that dwelt beyond Euphrates, in commiſeration redeemed him from thraldome; and had he been counſelled by them, and not come unto Herod, he had not been killed: but the marriage of his neece cauſed his death: for, for that cauſe, and eſpecially for the love of his native ſoil, he came thither. That which moved Herod to kill him was, not for that he ſought the kingdome, but becauſe he had right unto the kingdome. Herod had five children by Mariamme, two daughters, and three ſonnes. The youngeſt was ſent to Rome to ſtudy, D where he died. The other two he brought up like Princes, both for their mothers nobility ſake, and for that they were born after he was King. But that which above all other was moſt forcible, was the love he bare to Mariamme; which from day to day tormented him more violently, in ſuch ſort, that he left not any part of thoſe griefs which this his beſt beloved enforced againſt him. For Mariamme hated him, as much as he loved her: and having a juſt cauſe and colour of diſcontent, and moreover being emboldned by the love which he bare her, ſhe every day upbraided him, with that which he had done unto Hircanus her uncle, and unto her brother Ariſtobulus. For Herod ſpared him not, although he was a child; but after he had made him High Prieſt in the ſeventeenth yeer of his age, he preſently put him to death, after he had ſo honoured him: who when he came to the altar clothed in ſacred attire E upon a feſtivall day, all the people wept: and the ſame night was he ſent to Jericho, and drowned in a lake by the Galatians, who had received commiſſion to perform the murther. Theſe things did Mariamme daily caſt in Herods teeth, and upbraided both his mother, and ſiſter, with very ſharp and reproachfull words: yet he ſo loved her, that notwithſtanding all this, he held his peace. But the women were ſet on fire: and that they might the rather move Herod againſt her, they accuſed her of adultery, and of many other things which bare a ſhew of truth: objecting againſt her, that ſhe had ſent her portraiture into Egypt unto Antonius; and that through immoderate luſt ſhe did what ſhe could to make her ſelf known unto him, who doted upon womens love, and was of ſufficient power to do what wrong he F pleaſed.

Hereat Herod was ſore moved, eſpecially for that he was jealous of her whom he loved, bethinking himſelf upon the cruelty of Cleopatra, for whoſe ſake King Lyſanias, and Maliſchus King of Arabia were put to death; and now he meaſured not the danger by the loſſe of his wife, but by his own death which he feared: For which cauſe being drawn by his affairs into the countrey, he gave ſecret commandment unto Joſeph, his ſiſter Salomes husband (whom he knew to be truſty, and one who for affinity was his well-willer) to kill his wife Mariamme, if ſo be Antonius ſhould have killed him. But Joſeph not maliciouſly, but ſimply to ſhew her how greatly the King loved her, diſcloſed that ſecret unto her: and ſhe when Herod was returned, and amongſt other talk with many oathes ſware, that he never loved woman but her, indeed (quoth ſhe) it may well be known how greatly you love me by the commandment you gave to Ioseph, whom you charged to kill me. Herod hearing this which he thought to be secret, was like a mad man, and presently perswaded himself, that Ioseph would never have disclosed that commandment of his, except he had abused her; so that hereupon he became furious, and leaping out of his bed, he walked up and down the Palace: whereupon his sister Salome having fit opportunity, confirmed his suspition of Ioseph. For which cause Herod growing now raging mad with jealousie, commanded both of them to be killed. Which done, his wrath was seconded by repentance; and after his anger ceased, the affection of love was presently renewed: yea so great was the power of his affection, that he would not beleeve she was dead, but spake unto her as though she were alive, untill in processe of time being ascertained of her funerall, he equalled the affection he bare her during her life, by the vehemency of his passion for her death. Mariammes sonnes succeeded their mother in her wrath, and recogitating what an impious act it was, they accounted their father as a mortall enemy, but before, and after they went to study at Rome, and especially after they came again into Iudæa. For as they increased in yeers, so did the violence of their mind increase. And they being now marriageable, one of them married the daughter of their aunt Salome, who accused their mother; the other married the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. And now to their hatred was there joyned a liberty to speak more freely against them, and by this occasion of their boldnesse many were animated to calumniate them: so that some did openly tell the king, that both his sonnes sought to work treason against him, and that the one of them prepared an army to help the other, to revenge the death of their mother; and that the other (to wit, he that was sonne in law to Archelaus) purposed to flie, and accuse Herod before Cæsar. Herod giving eare unto those calumniations, sent for Antipater whom he had by Doris, to the end he might defend him against his two sonnes, and sought to advance him above them. But they thought this alteration intollerable; seeing one, whose mother was but a private woman, so preferred: and they moved with their own nobleness of birth, could not contain their indignation, but upon every occasion shewed themselves offended; yet were they every day lesse accounted of. As for Antipater, he wrought himself into favour: for he knew how to flatter his father, and raised many slanders on his two brethren, partly invented by himself, partly divulged by some of his favourites, whom he set awork about the matter, till that at last he put his brethren out of all hope of having the kingdome. For he was now by the Kings Will and Testament declared King, so that he was sent as a King unto Cæsar, in a kingly habit and pomp, onely he wore no Crown: and in time he so prevailed, that he wrought his mother into Mariammes stead; and with flatteris and calumniations so moved the King, that he began to deliberate about the putting to death of his sonnes. For which cause, he conducted his sonne Alexander with him to Rome, and accused him before Cæsar, that he had given him poyson. But he with much ado, having obtained liberty to plead his own cause, and that before an unskilful Judge, yet more wise then Herod or Antipater, he modestly held his peace in all things that his father had offended in: and first of all he purged his brother from danger of that crime, and taking the whole matter upon himself, he in very good sort acquitted himself thereof. And afterwards he inveighed against Antipaters subtilty, and complained of those injuries, which had been offered him, having beside the equity of his cause, sufficient eloquence to acquit himself, for he was a vehement Orator, and knew well how to perswade. Last of all, he objected that his father having a desire to put both him, and his brother to death, had laid an accusation upon him; whereat the whole audience wept, and Cæsar was so moved, that not regarding the accusations that were laid unto them, he presently made Herod and them friends, upon these conditions, that they in all things should be obedient unto their father; and that their father should leave the kingdome to whom he pleased.

Hereupon Herod returned from Rome, and though he seemed to have forgiven his sons; yet laid he not his jealousie and suspition aside. For Antipater still urged his argument to make Herod hate his other two sonnes, though for fear of him that reconciled them, he durst not openly shew himself an enemy unto them. Afterward Herod sailed by Cilicia, and arrived at Eleusa, where Archelaus received him very courteously, thanking him for the safety of his sonne in law, and very joyfull for that they were made friends: for he wrote unto his friends at Rome with all speed possible; that they should be favourable unto Alexander, when he came to plead his cause. And after this entertainment, he conducted Herod unto Zephyrius, giving him gifts to the value of thirty talents, and so took his leave of him. Herod as soon as he came to Jerusalem assembled the people together, and being assisted by his three sonnes, he shewed unto them the cause of his going to Rome, and blessed God, and thanked

A Cæſar, who had appeaſed the diſcord of his houſe, and that had made his ſonnes friends; which he eſteemed more then his kingdome: and I (quoth he) will make their friendſhip firm. For Cæſar appointed me king, and gave me leave to chuſe whom I pleaſed for my ſucceſſour, for the which I give him hearty thanks. And now I here conſtitute all three of my ſonnes kings: which purpoſe of mine, firſt I beſeech Almighty God, and ſecondly you to favour: for the one of them for his yeers, the other for their nobility of birth, have right to the Crown and kingdome: which is ſo large, that it may ſuffice many; ſo that you for your parts reverence them whom Cæſar conjoyned, and I their father ordained, giving them not unfit, nor unlike honours, but ſuch as they have deſerved. For a man cannot do a greater pleaſure unto him whom he honoureth above his yeers, then he ſhall give diſcontent unto him whom he diſhonoureth. For which cauſe, I will conſtitute to every one of them ſuch B friends and wel-willers, as with whom they be moſt converſant, and of them I will require pledges of a concord and unity amongſt them. For I know that diſcords, and contentions ariſe by malice of thoſe who are converſant with Princes, and that if they be well diſpoſed, they will increaſe friendſhip. And I requeſt not onely theſe, but alſo all ſuch as bear rule in my army, that they hope in me onely for the preſent: for I give not my ſons the kingdome, but the honour and dignity thereof; and they ſhall have pleaſure as though they were kings themſelves, yet I my ſelf will bear ſway, although I am unwilling to do it. Let every one of you conſider my age, my courſe of life, and piety: for I am not ſo old that any one may quickly deſpair of me, nor I have not accuſtomed my ſelf to ſuch kind of pleaſure, as is wont to ſhorten young mens dayes; and we have been ſo religious, that we are in great hope of long life. But if any one deſpiſe me, and ſeek to pleaſe my ſonnes, ſuch a one will I puniſh. I do not forbid them to be honoured, whom my ſelf have begotten, for that I envy them: but becauſe I know well that ſuch applauſes nouriſh pride and arrogancy in the fierce mindes of young men. Wherefore if all they that apply themſelves in their ſervice, conſider that I will be ready to reward the good; and that thoſe who are ſeditious, ſhall find their malice to have an unprofitable event at their hands, whom they ſo flatter: I eaſily perſwade my ſelf that all men will be of my mind, that are of my ſons mind. For it is good for them that I reign, and that I am friends with my ſonnes. And you O my good ſonnes, retain in your minds that ſacred nature, which maketh the very bruit beaſts to entertain natural affection: then reve- D rence Cæſar who reconciled us: and laſt of all obey me who requeſt, and entreat that at your hands, which I might command, namely, that you remain brethren. And I will now give yon both Kingly attire and honour, and I pray God that if you will continue and remain friends, I may continue in this mind.

Herod giveth not the Kingdome to his ſons, but the honours of the kingdome.

Herod converteth his ſpeech to his ſonnes.

After he had thus ſpoken, he ſaluted them very lovingly, and diſmiſſed the people, ſome praying that it might be as he had ſaid: others (who deſired alteration) made as though they had heard nothing. Yet for all this, the diſſention amongſt the brethren was not appeaſed, but each of them miſtruſting worſer events, departed from one another. For Alexander and Ariſtobulus ſtomacked the matter, that Antipater had his deſert confirmed, and Antipater was grieved that his brethren ſhould have the ſecond place after him; yet he E could ſo craftily carry himſelf, that no man could perceive his hatred towards them. And they derived of a noble race ſpake all they thought, and many endeavoured to ſet them on; and others as friends inſinuated themſelves into their company, to learn what news: ſo that Alexander could not ſpeak a word, but preſently it was carried to Antipater; and from him to Herod with an addition; ſo that when Alexander ſpake any thing ſimply, meaning no harm, it was preſently interpreted in the worſt ſenſe poſſible: and if he chanced at any time to ſpeak freely of any matter, preſently it was made a great thing. Antipater ſuborned men to ſet him on, that ſo his lies might be ſhadowed with colour of truth; and that if he could prove any one thing true, all lies and tales elſe divulged, might thereby be juſtified to be true. Now all Antipaters familiars were either naturally ſecret or elſe he ſtopped their mouthes with bribes, leſt they ſhould diſcloſe his intents: ſo that one might juſt- F ly have tearmed his life a ſecrecy of malice. All Alexanders friends were either corrupted by money, or flattering ſpeeches, wherewith Antipater overcame all, and made them theeves, and proditors of ſuch things as were either done or ſpoken againſt him: and himſelf doing all things, he dealt ſo warily, that at laſt thoſe calumniations came to Herods ear: and he counterfeited his brothers perſon, and ſuborned other tale-carriers, telling what they could againſt Alexander; and pretending good will towards his brother, at firſt fainedly reproved them, and afterwards ſeriouſly alleadged their ſayings as accuſations: ſo that hereby Herod was very wroth, but turned all as though Alexander went about treaſon, and ſought to kill his father: and nothing made ſo much credit be given to theſe calumniations, as that Antipater

Herod by his words did not utterly extinguiſh the hatred between his ſonnes.

colourably excuſed his brother. Herod incenſed hereat, every day withdrew his affection more and more from the two brethren, and daily encreaſed his love towards Antipater. The nobilitie alſo were inclined after the ſame manner: partly of their own accord, & partly for that they were ſo commanded: ſo did Ptolomæus the chiefeſt of all the nobility, and the kings brethren, and all his kindred; for all mens expectation was upon Antipater. And that which grieved Alexander the more, was, that all theſe miſchiefs, wrought to his overthrow, were done by the counſel of Antipaters mother: for ſhe being a ſtepmother, was cruel, and hated them being born of a Queen, far more then a ſtepmother doth her ſons in law. And although all men followed Antipater for the hope which they had of him, yet were they alſo compelled thereunto by the kings command, who gave an eſpecial charge to their deareſt friends, that none ſhould follow Alexander or his brother, ſo that he did not onely terrifie thoſe of his own kingdome, but alſo thoſe of other forraign nations. For Cæſar had given him ſuch authority: for he gave him licence to take any one that was a fugitive from him, out of any City, although it were not under his dominions. And the young men were ignorant of the offences laid unto their charge, and ſo were more eaſily entrapped being unaware of them: for their father did not openly tell them of any matter, but they every day perceived their fathers good will towards them to decay, which ſo much the more encreaſed their grief. In like manner Antipater by little and little moved Pheroras their uncle, and Salome their Aunt againſt them, daily conſulting with his wife, whom he ſhould incite againſt them.

Glaphyra Alexanders wife increaſed his conceived ſuſpition by her words.

Now Glaphyra Alexanders wife encreaſed their malice every day, recounting her own nobility, and bearing her ſelf above all that were in the whole kingdome: for ſhe derived her pedigree by the fathers ſide, from Timenus; by the mothers ſide, from Hyſtaſpis his ſon called Darius: inveying very much againſt the baſeneſſe of Herods wives, and his ſiſter, who were choſen for their beauty, and not for their nobility of birth. For Herod (as we have ſaid) had many wives, both for that it was lawful by the cuſtome of their countrey, and becauſe Herod delighted in many; and all of them hated Alexander, for Glaphyras pride and contumelious ſpeeches. And Ariſtobulus made Salome his enemy, although ſhe was his wives mother: for ſhe was before moved by Glaphyras ſpeeches, and he often upbraided his wife with her baſe birth, ſtill telling her that he had married a private woman, and his brother Alexander a Queen. And his wife often with weeping tears told this to her mother: adding moreover, that Alexander and Ariſtobulus threatned, that if they got the kingdome, they would make their other brethrens mothers weave with their maids: and that they would make them notaries of villages, deriding them that they applied themſelves to learning. Salome moved hereat, could not contain her ſelf, but told all to Herod, who eaſily believed her, becauſe ſhe ſpake againſt her ſon in law. Moreover, another accuſation was laid to their charge, whereat the king was greatly moved: for he was informed that Alexander and Ariſtobulus did often bewail their mother, and lament her hard hap with ſighes, and curſed him: and that often when he beſtowed ſome of Mariammes clothes upon his latter wives, they threatned that in ſhort time, in ſtead of Princely attire, they ſhould wear a black habit. Whereupon Herod, though he feared the conſtant minds of the young men, yet becauſe he would not take away all hope of amendment, he called them unto him (for he was to ſail to Rome) and as a king threatned them in few words, and like a father gave them many admonitions, and requeſted them to love their brethren, promiſing them forgiveneſſe of their former offences, ſo that hereafter they amended all: But they beſeeching him not to believe accuſations forged againſt them upon malice, and anſwering that the effect of matters would eaſily acquite them, requeſted him not ſo eaſily to believe tales, but refuſe to give malignant people opportunitie and recourſe unto him: for that there would alwayes be ſome, that would maliciouſly invent tales to tell, whileſt there was any one that would give them the hearing and believing thereof. For they knew that Salome was their enemy, and Pheroras their uncle, and both of them bare cruel minds, and were hard-hearted; and eſpecially Pheroras, who was fellow with his brother of all, ſaving onely the Crown, and had his own revenues amounting to an hundred talents a year, & received all fruits of the whole countrey beyond Jordan, which was given him by his brother. Herod alſo had obtained of Cæſar, to make him Tetrarch, & had beſtowed upon him a Princeſſe for his wife, eſpouſing unto him his wives ſiſter, after whoſe deceaſe he eſpouſed unto him his eldeſt daughter, and gave him three hundred talents with her for a dowry. But Pheroras fell in love with his maid, and forſook a Princeſſe: whereat Herod being angry, married his daughter unto his brothers ſon who was afterwards ſlain by the Parthians, but Herod preſently pardoned Pheroras offence. Divers before this time were of opinion that in the life time of the Queen, he would have poyſoned Herod;

A Herod; and Herod although he loved his brother very well; yet becauſe many who had acceſſe unto him told him ſo, he began to miſdoubt: and ſo examining many that were ſuſpected, laſtly he came to Pheroras friends, and none of them confeſſed it: yet they confeſſed that he was determined to flie unto the Parthians with her whom he was ſo in love withall, and that Coſtabarus, Salomes husband was privy thereunto, unto whom the King married her, after her firſt husband for ſuſpicion of adultery was put to death. Salome her ſelf was not free from accuſation: for Pheroras accuſed her that ſhe had contracted matrimony with Syllæus, who was Procurator to Oboda, King of Arabia, who was a great enemy of the Kings: and ſhe being convicted both of this, and all things elſe, whereof her brother Pheroras accuſed her, yet ob-
B tained pardon, as likewiſe Pheroras did: ſo that the whole tempeſt of all their family was turned againſt Alexander, and light upon his head.

The yeat of the world, 3976. before Chriſts Nativity, 8

The King had three Eunuches whom he loved dearly, and every one known by their offices: for one of them was his butler; the other was his cook; and the third got him to bed, and lay with him; theſe three Alexander with great gifts overcame. Which the King underſtanding, by torments forced them to confeſſe it, and declared with what promiſes they were thereto by Alexander induced, and how he had deceived them; affirming that there was no truſting to Herod who was a ſhameleſſe old man; and that he died his hair, to make himſelf to ſeem young: and that he in deſpite of him would be his Succeſſour, and then he would be revenged upon his enemies, and make his friends happy, and eſpecially them: and that the whole Nobility did ſecretly obey him, and the Captains of the army and Govern-
C ours did privily come unto him. Hereat Herod was ſo terrified, that he durſt not preſently divulge their confeſſions, but night and day he ſent ſpies to learn what was ſaid or done; and whom he ſuſpected, them he preſently killed; ſo that his whole Kingdome was full of iniquity. For every one as his malice moved him, fained calumniations, and many deſirous of blood-ſhed, abuſed the Kings wrath as they pleaſed againſt their enemies, and credit was given to every lie, and no man was ſo ſoon accuſed, but preſently he was puniſhed; and he who preſently before accuſed others, was now accuſed himſelf, and carried to be puniſhed with him whom he accuſed. For the Kings perills ſhortned the time of triall for their lives, and he became ſo tyrannous, ſo that he afforded not a good look unto them that were not accuſed, and ſhewed himſelf moſt fierce and violent even to his deareſt
D friends: that he baniſhed many out of his kingdome, and railed againſt ſuch as he had no power over. Antipater increaſed this miſchief more and more, and gathering together a great company of his friends, he omitted no kind of calumniation. The king likewiſe was terrified by the rumours and tales of pick thanks, that he thought alwayes that he ſaw Alexander before him with a drawn ſword. For which cauſe he ſuddenly took him and caſt him in priſon, and tortured his friends, many of wich died in torments, becauſe they would not confeſſe more then in conſcience was true: others not able to endure the torments, were forced to confeſſe that Alexander and his brother Ariſtobulus thought to have wrought treaſon againſt their father, and that they expected their time till he went a hunting; reſolving in themſelves that having killed him, they would preſently flie to Rome. Although theſe
E and ſuch like calumniations were no waies probable, yet extremity of pain forced men ex tempore to invent them, and the King willingly beleeved them, as it were comforting himſelf thereby, in that he might not be thought to have impriſoned his ſonne unjuſtly. Alexander perceiving that it was impoſſible for him to aboliſh his fathers ſuſpition, thought it be better to yeeld himſelf guilty: and ſo wrote four books againſt his adverſaries, and confeſſed the treaſon: affirming that he had many partakers therein, namely, Pheroras and Salome. who were the chief; avouching that before that time he had had the uſe of her body in the night time: and how though himſelf was unwilling, yet ſhe forced him thereunto. Now the books came unto Herods hands, which charged the greateſt amongſt the Nobility with moſt hainous matters. Archelaus fearing his ſonne in law and daughter to be in great F danger, ſpeedily came into Judæa, and ingeniouſly appeaſed the kings wrath: for ſo ſoon as he came unto Herod, he cried, Where is that wicked ſonne in law of mine, or where may I ſee the face of that wretch that goeth about to murther his father, that I may tear him in pieces with mine own hands, and marry my daughter anew to a better husband? For although ſhe be not privy to his counſell, yet is ſhe defiled, for that ſhe was wife to ſuch a man; Nay I admire thy patience who art in ſuch danger, and ſuffereſt Alexander yet to live: for I came thus haſtily out of Cappadocia, thinking he had been put to death, to talk with thee concerning my daughter, whom I married to him for thy ſake and honour. Wherefore now let us take counſell what to do with them both: and ſeeing thou art too father-like and not able to puniſh thy ſonne, thy treacherous ſonne; let us change rooms, and let speeches began somewhat to relent, so that he appeased his wrath toward Alexander, and encreased it towards Pheroras; for he was as it were the subject of the whole book. Who perceiving the King so to trust to Archelaus friendship, that he was led by him to do what he pleased; leaving Alexander, he in humble manner came to Archelaus, seeking impudently for succour at his hands, of whom he had not deserved any favour. "Archelaus answered him that "he knew no waies to obtain his pardon, who was guilty of so hainous crimes, and convicted

"manifestly to have practised high treason against the Kings own person, and to be the cause

"of all these miseries that had now befallen the young man, except that he would lay aside all "subtle dealing, and denying of his fact, and confesse the crimes whereof he was accused; and "so in humble wise go unto his brother who loved him dearly, and crave pardon; promising
"him that if he would so do, he would do him what good he could. Hereupon Pheroras obeyed Archelaus his counsell, and putting on a black attire, he in a pitifull manner and with tears prostrated himself at Herods feet, and craving pardon obtained it, confessing himself to be a most wicked and vile person, and to be guilty of all that which was objected against him, and that the cause which moved him to do all these things, was the frantick and mad fits he fell into, for the love of that woman. Now when Pheroras became his own accuser, and a witnesse against himself, then Archelaus endeavoured to mitigate Herods wrath towards him, and excuse his faults with fit examples: for he alleadged that his brother attempted greater matters against him, whom notwithstanding for natures cause he pardoned: adding that in every kingdome as in mighty bodies, alwayes some part began to swell, which notwithstanding was not presently to be cut off, but to be cured by easie means.

Pheroras by Archelaus means pacifieth Herod.

Archelaus using many speeches unto Herod to this purpose, at last quite appeased his wrath toward Pheroras, still counterfeiting himself to be angry with Alexander, affirming that he would take his daughter away with him, till at last he forced Herod of his own accord to entreat for the young man, requesting him again to despouse his daughter unto him. Archelaus after much entreaty answered, that he was willing that the King should bestow his daughter upon any, save Alexander, for he greatly esteemed the law of affinity. Herod replied, that if he did not divorce his daughter from Alexander, he should think that he bestowed his sonne upon him: for they had no children, and his daughter was dearly loved of the young man; so that if he would permit her to stay still there, for her sake he would pardon all Alexanders offences. Hereto Archelaus with much ado agreed, and so was reconciled unto his sonne in law, and he unto his father. Yet Herod affirmed that he must needs be sent to Rome to speak with Cæsar, for he had written the whole matter unto Cæsar. Thus Archelaus craftily delivered his sonne in law from danger, and after his reconciliation was made, they spent the time in feasting and mirth. Upon Archelaus departure, Herod gave him seventy talents, and a Throne of pure gold, adorned with precious stones, and Eunuchs, and a concubine named Panichis; and rewarded every one of his friends according to their deserts. And all the Kings kindred by the kings appointment and consent, bestowed rich gifts upon Archelaus, and both he and all his Nobility accompanied him to Antiochia.

Archelaus compelleth Herod of his own accord to be entreated for Alexander.

Herod dismisseth Archelaus & his friends with great presents. Ant. l. 16. c. 11.

Not long after, there came one into Judæa farre more subtile then Archelaus, who both disanulled the reconciliation made for Alexander, and caused his death also. This man was a Lacedemonian born named Eurycles, who by money sought to have obtained the kingdome. This man brought unto Herod rich gifts, as it were for a bait of that he intended; he had so behaved himself in Greece, that it could no longer tolerate his excesse: and Herod again rewarded him with farre greater gifts, then those were that he gave him: but he esteemed his liberality as nothing, except he bought it with the blood of Princes. For which cause he circumvented the King, partly by flattering him, partly by praising him fainedly, and especially by his own craft and subtilty: and quickly perceiving his inclination, he both in word and deed sought to please him; so that the King accounted him among his chiefest friends, Eurycles the Lacedemonian secretly accuseth Alexander to his father, & is the cause of his death.

A friends. For both the King and all the Nobility honoured him the more for his countrey sake, in that he was a Lacedomonian. But he very easily perceiving the feeble stay of Herods house, and the hatred between the brethren, and how the King was affected towards every one of them he first of all entertained himself at Antipaters house, making a shew in the meanwhile of good will towards Alexander, pretending and protesting, that in times past he had been Archelaus companion; and by this means he quickly crept into favour with him, as an approved friend: which was the cause that he was suddenly entertained for a faithful man; He presently likewise brought him into friendship with Aristobulus; & having founded every mans disposition, he accommodated himself to all humours: and to begin withall, he became Antipaters pensioner, and a traytor to Alexander. And he often used hot words to An-
B tipater, as it were chiding him, that he being eldest of the brethren, so slenderly looked after them, who pretended to put him besides the Crown, which was his right. He many times likewise used the like words to Alexander, admiring him who was born of a Queen, and husband to a Queen, and yet would permit such a one who was descended of a private woman, to succeed in the kingdome, especially seeing he had such occasion and opportunity to effect the contrary: for he might assure himself of Archelaus his help in any thing. Alexander supposed he had spoke as he thought, because he counterfeited friendship with Archelaus: so that he misdoubting nothing, disclosed unto him all his mind concerning Antipater, saying, that it was no wonder though Herod disinherited them of the kingdome, sith beforetime he had slain their mother.

Eurycles by fained friendship deceiveth Alexander.

C Eurycles, counterfeiting himself both to pity them, and to be sorrowful for their mischance, enticed Aristobulus to speak the like: and having animated them both to complain in this sort against their father, he presently went to Antipater, and disclosed to him all their secrets, forging also the treachery which those two brethren intended against him, which was to dispatch him with their swords. For this cause Antipater gave him a great sum of money, and commended him to his father, and being hired to effect the death of Alexander and Aristobulus, he himself became their accuser: Whereupon he came to Herod, and told him how in regard of those benefits he had received at his hand, he would now bestow his life upon him, and the light of this world for recompence of his hospitality; affirming that Alexander had lately stretched out his hand with his sword drawn to kill him, and he onely was
D the cause that he performed it not, staying his hand, and promising him to assist him in the matter: adding that Alexander used these speeches; that Herod was not contented to enjoy a Kingdome which was another mans right, nor yet as it were to dismember his kingdome after Mariammes death, but he would also leave the kingdome, belonging unto their ancestors, unto a pernicious bastard, Antipater: and for that cause he would revenge Hircanus and Mariammes death: And that it was not convenient to receive the kingdome, from such a father without blood; and every day he had occasion given him so to do: for he could speak nothing without calumniation. For if any mention were made at any time of any ones Nobility, presently he was upbraided without cause, for his father would presently say, There is none noble but Alexander, whose fathers base birth is a shame and discredit unto
E him. And that going a hunting, if he held his peace, his father was offended; if he praised, then it was said, he mocked: so that in every thing, he found his fathers affection turned from him, and that he was onely favourable to Antipater: so that he would die with all his heart, if he failed of his purpose; if he kild him, his father in law Archelaus would work his safety, to whom he might easily flee. And after, he would go to Cæsar (who as yet knew not Herods manners) for he would not stand before him then, as he did before, being terrified because his father was present; neither would he onely speak of his own wrongs, but of the wrongs of the whole nation, who were oppressed by exactions even unto death. And then he would lay open in what pleasure, and after what sort, the money gotten with blood was consumed: and who, and what kind of men they were, that were thereby enriched; and what was the cause of the affliction of the City: and that there he would bewail the death
F of his uncle, and his mother, and unfold all Herods wickednesse: which being once made manifest unto the world, no man would account him a murtherer of his father. Eurycles having falsly reported this of Alexander, fell presently to praise, and extol Antipater, affirming that he onely loved his father, and hindred such practices.

The king, yet not throughly appeased for that which had past, grew into an exceeding agony, and Antipater once again suborned other false witnesses against him, who affirmed that they were wont to have secret talk with Iucundus and Tyrannius, who somerime were Generals of the Kings horsmen, who were then displaced for some offence they had committed.

Another false accusation of Alexander and his brother, moves Herod to indignation mitted. Whereupon Herod being very angry, presently tortured them: and they affirmed, G

The year of the world, 3956. before Christs Nativity 8. that they were ignorant of all that which was laid to their charge. But there was found and brought to the king a letter, as though it had been written by Alexander, unto the Governour of the castle of Alexandrium; requesting him, that he would receive him and his brother Aristobulus into the castle, when he had killed his father, and to assist them both with weapons and other necessaries. Alexander affirmed, that this letter was counterfeited by Diophantus, the kings Secretary, who was both bold, and could counterfeit any ones hand; and having counterfeited many, was at last for the same put to death.

Diophantus the kings secretary, writeth fained letters in Alexanders name.

Herod caused the Governour of the Castle to be tortured, but he confessed nothing that was laid against him: and although he had no good proof of any thing, yet he commanded H his two sons to be kept in hold. He likewise called Eurycles (who was the bane of his house, and the breeder of all the mischief) author of his safety, and one who had well deserved at his hands, and gave him fifty talents: who, departing from Iudæa before matters were well known, went to Archelaus, and faining that he had reconciled Alexander and Herod, he received there a piece of money. From thence he went into Achaia, and spent that he had evilly gotten, in as bad manner as he got it. Lastly, he was accused unto Cæsar, that he had caused dissension in all Achaia, and spoiled the Cities: for which cause he was banished. And this was the punishment which was inflicted upon him for Alexander and Aristobulus troubles.

Cous Evaratus. It is not amisse here in this place, to compare Evaratus of Cous, unto this Eurycles: who being a dear friend unto Alexander, and arriving about the same time that Eurycles did, being I put to his oath, sware that he heard the young men say nothing: yet his oath nothing prevailed nor profited them poor souls. For Herod would onely hear and give ear unto accusations; and he highly esteemed them that would believe them with him, and shew themselves moved thereat.

Ant. l. 16, c. 12. Moreover, Salome increased his cruelty towards his sons: for Aristobulus minding to bring her into the same trouble with him self, who was his mother in law and his Aunt, sent unto her, willing her to look to her self, as though the King was minded to put her to death. Who being now called in question for the matters whereof she was before accused, to wit, that she purposed to marry with the Kings enemy, Syllaus the Arabian, to whom she privily K revealed the kings secrets: this was the utter ruin of the young men, wherewithall they were overthrown, as it were with a violent tempest. For presently Salome went unto the King, and told him that Aristobulus had admonished her of: and he being now outrageous, caused both his sons to be bound and imprisoned in several places. Then sent he Volumnius, who was the General of his army, and Olympus, one of his familiar friends, unto Cæsar, to carry the informations against his sons in writing: who saying to Rome, after their arrival delivered the kings letters. And Cæsar was very sorry for the young men, yet he permitted the father to do what he would with his children: and so wrote unto him, that he should have licence to do what he thought good: yet he signified unto him, that he should L do better to call his Nobles together, and let them make enquiry concerning the treasons: and then if he found them guilty of those things whereof they were accused, to put them to death.

Ant. l. 16. c. 13. Herod gathereth a councel against Alexander and Aristobulus. Hereupon Herod, according to Cæsars letters and appointment, came unto Berytum, and there gathered an assembly to sit in judgment; the chief in that judgment, were the Governours that Cæsar in his letters appointed. Saturninus and Pedanius Embassadours, & with them Volumnius, Procurator; next, the Kings kindred, and Salome and Pheroras: and then the Nobility of Syria, Archelaus onely excepted, who because he was father in law to his son, Herod suspected him to be partial. But he suffered not his sons to come into judgment: for he knew that the very sight of them would have moved all men to compassion. And more- M over, if they were permitted to speak for themselves, that then Alexander would easily have acquitted them both: for which cause they were kept in Platan, in a Castle of Sidonia. The king beginning his Oration, was as vehement, as though they had been present against whom he spake: and he was half afraid to object any treason against them, for that he had no proof thereof: and therefore he prosecuted their opprobrious words, injuries and offences, which they had committed against him, the which he affirmed to be more grievous then death.

Herod accuseth his sons in open judgment.

Herods sentence against his sons. At last (when no man contradicted him) he began to lament, as though by overcoming in such sort, himself was also overcome, and thereupon requested every one to give their verdict. And first of all Saturninus condemned his sons, but not to dye: saying, that he had three sons present, and he thought it not lawful to adjudge other mens sonnes to death.

The

A The two Legats alſo affirmed the ſame, and many followed their advice: But Volumnius was the firſt that pronounced the ſorrowful ſentence: after whom all the reſt followed, ſome to flatter Herod, ſome for hatred they bare him, but none for any indignation againſt the young men. Then all Judæa and Syria expected an end of this tragedy; yet no man thought Herod to be ſuch a tyrant, as that he would have put his two ſons to death. Herod cauſed his ſons to be brought to Tyre, and from thence by ſhip he conveighed them to Cæſarea, bethinking himſef what death he ſhould put them to. In the mean time, there was an old ſouldier of the Kings, named Tiro, who had a ſon belonging to Alexander, and highly in his favour, and he himſelf greatly loved the two young men: who being very much grieved in mind
B at that which had paſt, went about, crying, that juſtice was troden under foot, truth oppreſt, that nature was confounded, and the life of man full of iniquity; and whatſoever elſe, griefe put into his mind, who nothing eſteemed his own life. At laſt, this Tiro came boldly to the King, and ſaid unto him: "O King thou ſeemeſt to me moſt unhappy, who doſt give credit "to wicked and vile perſons againſt the deareſt ſons. For Pheroras and Salome thou be-"leiveſt, before thine own children, whom notwithſtanding thou haſt often found to have "deſerved death; and thou perceiveſt not that they do this, to the intent to make thee want "lawful ſucceſſours, and leave thee none but Antipater, whom they with their hearts would "have King, becauſe they can rule him as they liſt. But bethink thy ſelf (O King) how all "thy ſouldiers will hate him for the death of his two brethren; for there is no man that doth "not pity the two young men, and many of the Nobility are diſpleaſed hereat. After he
C had ſpoken this, he named them who were diſpleaſed: whereupon the King commanded them, and him, and his ſon to be laid hold on: and preſently one of the kings Barbers, named Tryphon, ſhewing himſelf to be in I know not what fury, came forth, and ſaid unto Herod: Tiro perſwaded me to kill thee with my razor, promiſing me, that if I would ſo do, Alexander would give me great rewards. Herod hearing this, cauſed Tiro and his ſon, and the Barber to be tortured: and they denyed all, and the Barber affirmed nothing more then he had already ſaid. Then he commanded Tiro to be more tormented. Whereupon his ſon, moved with compaſſion towards his father, promiſed to diſcloſe all the matter to the king, ſo that he would pardon his father: who being releaſed of his torments, preſently declared how D his father through Alexanders means and procurement: was purpoſed to have killed him. Many that were preſent thought this was a devtce of the young man, to free his father from torments: and yet others were perſwaded that it was true. Upon this, Herod made a ſpeech unto the people, wherein he inveighed againſt the Governours of his army, and Tiro, and made the people arm themſelves, and kill both them and the Barber with ſtaves and ſtones. Now he ſent his ſon unto Sebaſte, which was not farre from Cæſarea, and there he cauſed them to be ſtrangled: and having quickly diſpatcht the matter, he cauſed them to be brought into the Caſtle Alexandrium, there to be buried with their mothers uncle. Of Antipaters conſpiracy againſt Herod his father.

Ant. lib. 17. cap. 21.

BUt Antipater now hoping without all controverſie to ſucceed in the kingdome, was generally hated of the whole nation: for it was openly known, that he by falſe calumniations had cauſed his brethrens deaths. And on the other ſide, he ſtood in no little fear of his brothers children, whom he perceived now to begin to grow to years: for Alexander had by Glaphyra two ſons, Tigranes, and Alexander; and Ariſtobulus had by Bernice, daughter to Salome, five children, to wit, three ſons, Herod, Agrippa, and Ariſtobulus, and two daughters, Herodias and Mariamme. Herod, after he had put Alexander to death, ſent away Glaphyra with her dowry into Cappadocia, and married Bernice Ari-
F ſtobulus his wife unto Antipaters uncle: for Antipater deviſed this match to become friends with Salome, whom he before-time hated and envied. He alſo by his great gifts ſought to get Pheroras favour, and the friendſhip of ſuch as were friends unto Cæſar, ſending to that end great ſums of money unto Rome. He gave Saturninus and all the reſt great riches in Syria. But the more he gave, the more he was hated of all men; for every one judged that he did not conſume ſuch wealth, for that he was liberal, but that he laviſhed it out for fear, ſo that he got not the love of them, upon whom he beſtowed it; and they to whom he gave nothing, were ſo much the more his enemies. Yet he became every day more bountiful, ſeeing, againſt his expectation, Herod made much of their children, whoſe parents he had ſlain; Intending to ſhew how much he repented their deaths, by the pity and compaſſion compassion he took upon their children. For assembling together his friends, he caused the children to be placed by him, and the tears standing in his eyes, he said, Hard, Cruel, and sinister fortune took away from me the fathers of these children: but I pity to see them orphans, and natural affection commendeth them unto me. Wherefore I will endeavour, that seeing I have been an unfortunate father, I may be a wiser and happier grand-father, & leave them who are most dear unto me, to reign after me. Wherefore brother Pheroras, I betroth thy daughter unto Alexanders eldest son, that for that cause thou maist be careful to provide for him, and assist him: and unto thy son Antipater I assure the daughter of Aristobulus, that so thou maist be a father to her who wants a father; and my son Herod, whose mothers uncle was high Priest, shall marry with her sister. And this is my will and pleasure touching this matter, and let no man who loveth me seek to alter this. And I beseech Almighty God, for the good of my countrey, and of these my nephews, to prosper these marriages, and to look upon these children with a more favourable eye then he did upon their fathers. Having thus spoken, he wept, and joyned the childrens hands, and courteously saluting every one, he dismissed the Councel.

Herod grievously bemoneth his sons, expressing the same by his commiseration toward their children.

Herod betrotheth his nephews.

Upon this, Antipater was amazed, and all the Orphans well perceived how sorrowful he was. For now he thought himself dishonoured by his father, and that his good fortune was endangered, seeing that Alexanders son was like to have both Archelaus and Pheroras the Tetrarch to assist him. Moreover, he considered how he was hated, and how the people did compassionate the children for that they were fatherlesse; and affected them, remembring their fathers who were dead, and were terrified at his wickednesse. Wherefore he attempted all means possible to break off the marriages, yet he feared to insinuate any thing to his father cunningly, who was now very severe, and wary, and mistrustful. And therefore went openly unto him to make his humble sute, and request him, that he would not leave him without honour, nor deprive him of that dignity, which before-time he had judged him worthy of, giving him onely the bare Title of a King, and leaving the substance of the kingdome in other mens powers. For it would be impossible for him to obtain the kingdome, if Alexanders son (beside Archelaus his favour) were by marriage made son in law unto Pheroras. Wherefore he earnestly besought him, that seeing he had a great many daughters, to change the marriages: for the king had nine wives, and by seven of them he had children; Antipater by Doris, Herod by Mariamme, daughter of the high Priest, and Antipas, and Archelaus by Malthace, the Samaritane, and his daughter Olympias, whom his brother Joseph married: and by Cleopatra of Jerusalem, Herod and Philip; and by Pallas, Phasalus: he had two other daughters also, Roxane and Salome: one of them by Phædra, and the other by Elpis. He had likewise two wives, by whom he had no issue, his cousin, and his neece; and beside these he had two daughters by Mariamme, sisters to Alexander and Aristobulus. Wherefore Antipater seeing his father had such choice of daughters, he requested the marriages to be altered.

Herods children by his seven wives.

The king, well perceiving his mind and purpose towards the Orphans, was very angry: and calling to remembrance the misfortune of his sons, whom he had put to death, he greatly feared, lest Antipater by some false accusations should overthrow them, and so with sharp words did drive him off for that time; yet afterward, he so flattered Herod, that he got the marriages to be altered. And first of all, he joyned Aristobulus daughter with Antipater himself, and his son to Pheroras daughter. Here one may see what Antipater could do by flattering speeches: for Salome in the like matter could not speed, although she was his sister, and procured many times Julius Cæsars wife, to speak for her, that she might marry with Syllæus the Arabian: yet was she not permitted so to do, But Herod sware that he would account her as an utter enemy, except she would desist from that purpose, and afterward against her will he married her unto one Alexas, a friend of his: and one of her daughters to Alexanders son, and the other to Antipaters uncle.

Herod is perswaded by Antipaters flatteries to break off the marriges.

Ant. l. 17. c. 3.

As for Mariammes daughters, one of them was married to Antipater, his sisters son, the other unto Phasælus, his brothers son. When Antipater had quite overthrown the hope of the Orphans, and joyned affinitie as he thought good, he now held himself on a sure ground: and adding confidence to his malice, he became intolerable to all men, And seeing he could not avoid their hatred, he now sought by fear to work his own safety; & so much the more, because Pheroras now assisted him, as one that was confirmed, and established for king. Also the women in the Court fell at variance, and raised a new broil: for Pheroras wife with her mother and her sister, and the mother of Antipater did use themselves very insolently in many things, abusing also two of the kings daughters very contumeliously; to which matter she was chiefly set on by Antipater, who hated them, having the others at his command, onely

A onely Salome hindred their agreement: who went unto the King, and told him that their meetings were not for his profit.

The women understanding how she had informed the King, and that Herod was offended thereat, they came no more together openly, and abstained from their wonted familiarity, and in the Kings hearing, fained themselves to fall out one with another. Antipater also made the same shew, so that he stuck not openly to offend Pheroras: notwithstanding, they had meetings & banquets in the night, and the unity was the more confirmed because they perceived themselves to be noted; for Salome knew all this, and told it to the King. The King was very angry, and especially against Pheroras wife, whom chiefly Salome blamed: and having called together his kinred and friends, he laid many accusations against her before them; and told them how contumeliously she had behaved her self toward his daughter, & B that she hired the Pharisees against him, and that by her poyson, she had made his brother his enemy. And turning himself unto Pheroras, he asked him whether he had rather have him for his brother, or have his wife. And he answering, that he had rather die then lose his wife; Herod doubtful what to do, turned him to Antipater, and commanded him never to talk with Pheroras, nor his wife, nor any one belonging to them after that time. But he obeyed his fathers command openly in shew, but secretly lay in their house: and fearing that Salome should perceive it, he by his friends in Italy caused himself to make a voyage to Rome, by letters brought to Herod, wherein it was commanded, that shortly after the receit thereof, Antipater should be sent to Rome unto Cæsar. Wherefore Herod using no delay, sent him presently, furnishing him with all things necessary; and a great sum of money; giving him likeC wise his last Will and Testament to carry with him to Cæsar; wherein was written, that Antipater should be king, and after him Herod, the son of Mariamme, daughter of the high Priest. But Syllæus the Arabian, neglecting Cæsars commandement, at the same time sayled to Rome, there to contend with Antipater, about matters which were before in controvesie between him and Nicholaus. He had also a great contention with Aretas his King, whose friends he had slain, and also Sohemus, the most potent in all the town of Petra: and seeing Fabatus, Cæsars Procurator, he used his favour also against Herod. But Herod giving Fabatus a great sum of money, alienated him from Syllæus, and by this means dispatched that which Cæsar commanded: and because Fabatus restored nothing to him, he accused him that he was Procurator, not for Cæsar, but for Herod: wherewith Fabatus was moved; and being as D yet in great estimation with Herod, he did disclose Syllæus his secrets, and signified to the King, how that Syllæus corrupted Corinthus, one of his guard, whom he willed to be taken and kept in hold. And the King followed his counsel: for this Corinthus, though he was alwaies brought up in the Kings Court, yet was he born in Arabia. Wherefore he presently took him, and two other Arabians that were found with him; one of them was Syllæus friend and the other, Phylarchus: who upon their examination, confessed that Corinthus, for a great sum of money was hired to kill the King. After this they were sent to Satunius, Governour of Syria, and from him to Rome.

How Herod should have been poysoned, and how it was known.

HErod still urged Pheroras to forsake his wife: for he knew not how to punish her, having many matters against her: at last he was so moved, that he banisht his brother and her. Pheroras taking this injury patiently, departed into his Tetrarchy, taking an oath that his banishment should endure so long as Herod lived, and that whilest he lived, he would never come any more to him; Insomuch, as he would not come at his brother to visit him when he was sick, notwithstanding he was often sent for, when (as he thought) he lay now on his death-bed, & would gladly impart something unto him: but contrary to all hope he recovered, and afterwards Pheroras fell sick. At which time Herod shewed his patient and humble mind: for he went unto him, and very kindly sought help for him; F but he was too far spent, for a few dayes after he died: and although Herod loved him untill his dying day, yet was it bruted abroad, that he poysoned him. Herod caused his body to be brought unto Ierusalem, and commanded all his nation to mourn, and buried him with a sumptuous funeral. And thus one of the murtherers of Alexander, and Aristobulus came to his end: but shortly after, the revenge of that wicked fact did fall upon Antipater, who was the chief author thereof: it did but begin with Pheroras. For certain that belonged to Pheroras came in mournfull wise unto Herod, and complained unto him, how that his brother Pheroras was poysoned, and that one of his wives gave him meat that was not seasoned after the accustomed manner: which when he had eaten, he presently fell sick. And that two dayes before his death, there came a Witch out of Arabia, who was sent for by his mother and sister, to give Pheroras a love portion, and she instead thereof, through Syllæus inducements, gave him poyson, for she was of Syllæus acquaintance. A Witch of Arabia.

The king daunted with so many suspicions, caused divers of Pheroras maids, and libertines to be put to torments, and one of them impatient herein, exclaimed in this wise: O thou God, ruler of heaven and earth, revenge us upon Antipaters mother, who is the cause of these our evils. When the king understood thus much, he ceased not to search out the truth: and then the women disclosed Antipaters familiarity with Pheroras, and his women, and their secret meetings: and that Pheroras and Antipater, after they came from the king, used to drink with them all night long, not suffering any servant or maid to be in the room with them; H and one of the Libertines wives revealed this. And when every one of the maids were tortured a part, all their examinations agreed; so that now it was evident, wherefore Antipater had compacted to go to Rome, and Pheroras beyond the river Jordan. For they were often wont to say, that Herod having killed Alexander and Aristobulus, now he would come to them and their wives: and that it was unlike that he would spare any one, who spared not Mariamme and her sons: and therefore it was best to flee as farre as it was possible from such a beast. And that Antipater was wont often to complain unto his mother, that now he grew gray-haired, and his father waxed young and lusty; and that it might so chance, that he should never live to be king; or if ever his father died, he should enjoy the pleasure of the kingdome but a short time. And moreover, the heads of Hydra, that is to say, Alexanders, and Aristobulus sons, began to spring up again: and that his father had injuriously cut off all hope I from his sons, appointing none of them to succeed him, but the son of Mariamme: wherein he was perswaded that he doated, if so be he thought his will should be of force; for he would take such an order, that he would have none of all his progeny alive, and that Herod was the greatest hater of his sons of any father in the world: and was not therewithall contented, but he also hated his own brethren. Furthermore, that he not long ago gave him an hundred talents, that he should have no conference with Pheroras: and when Pheroras asked wherein they hurt him, Antipater answered, I would to God that he would take away all men else, and leave onely us two naked, so that he would grant us life; but quoth he, it is impossible to escape this dangerous beast, who will not suffer men openly to shew friendship to one another. Lastly, though we now secretly meet, yet if we bear the hearts and K hands of men, the time will be when we may talk and meet openly. The maids in torments disclosed these speeches, and that Pheroras was determined to flee with them into Petra. Herod believed all their sayings, and the rather for that which was said concerning the hundred talents. For he said nothing of them to any one, but to Antipater.

Doris, Antipaters mother is spoiled of her jewels, and thrust out of the Palace.

And first of all, he bent his fury against Doris Antipaters mother: and taking from her all the ornaments which he had bestowed upon her, and bought with many talents, he banisht her. When his wrath was some what appeased, he released Pheroras maids from torments: & now he became timorous and fearful, and prone to any suspition, torturing many that were innocent, for fear he should let any escape that were guilty. Hereupon he set upon Antipater the Samaritane, who was Procurator for his son Antipater; who through torments confessed, that his son Antipater had procured poyson out of Egypt to kill him, by the means of a friend of Antiphilus; which poyson Theudion, Antipaters uncle, took of him, and delivered to Pheroras: whom Antipater charged to dispatch Herod whilest he was at Rome, far from suspition, and that Pheroras gave his wife the poyson to keep. Wherefore the king calling for her, commanded her to bring forth that which was delivered unto her. And she, making as though she would have gone forth to fetch it, cast her self down from a house top, thereby to prevent the torments, which, if she were convicted, they would inflict upon her. But by the providence of GOD (as it should seem) it came so to passe that she fell not on her head, but on her side, and so escaped death, to the end that God might inflict punishment upon Antipater. And being brought unto the king, so soon as she began to come to her self (for M she was amazed with the fall) the king demanded of her, wherefore she had done so, and sware unto her, that if she would truly disclose all, he would pardon her for all; but if she told an untruth, her body should be torn in pieces with torment, and not be buried. She a while held her peace, and at last said: Wherefore should I keep any thing secret, seeing Pheroras is dead, to save Antipater, who hath caused all our overthrows? Hear O king, and God be witnesse of the truth hereof, who cannot be deceived: When I sate weeping by Pheroras as he lay a dying, he called me unto him and said; See wife, how much I am deceived concerning

AFter all this, Bathyllus joyned himſelf with Antipater, as it were to adde the laſt hand unto all his practices. This Bathyllus, was one of his libertines, who brought another ſort of poyſon, to wit, of Aſpes, and the poyſon alſo of other Serpents; that if the firſt proved too weak, and took not effect that then Pheroras, and his wife ſhould make an end of the King with theſe. And beſide, theſe ſhamefull practices of his againſt his father; he alſo had letters which he had counterfeited againſt his brethren. For Archelaus and Philip, two of the Kings ſonnes, were at that time at Rome to ſtudy, who were very toward young men: and for that Antipater feared they might be ſome hinderance to him, in that which he expected, he haſted by all means poſſible to make them away, And the better to effect this purpoſe, he counterfeited Letters in his friends names that were at D Rome, and he for money got others to write, that theſe two young men uſed in taunting wiſe to rail againſt their father, and openly to complain of the death of Alexander and Ariſtobulus: and that they took it in bad part that they were ſent for home (for their father ſent word that they ſhould come away) and thereat Antipater was moſt troubled. For he before his departure from Judæa to Rome, procured ſuch like letters to be forged againſt them at Rome; and ſo delivering them to his father, that he might avoid all ſuſpition, ſeemed to excuſe his brethren, affirming ſome things that were written to be lies; other things to be offences, whereunto young men were prone. At which time he gave great ſummes of money to them, in whoſe names he had counterfeited the letters againſt his brethren: hereby as it were hiring them to be ſecret. He gave them alſo rich apparel, and Tapiſtry of curi-
E ous work: alſo ſilver and gold cups, with many things more, to the end that by the precious gifts and rewards which he beſtowed, he might have all things kept cloſe; ſo that at his return he made his fathers account that he had ſpent two hundreth Talents, the greateſt portion whereof, was conſumed in following the Law againſt Syllæus, Antipaters ſmall faults were hid by a greater; for all they that had been tortured, give evidence againſt him, how that he practiſed his fathers death, and the letters witneſſed how again he went about to make away other two of his brethren: and yet for all this, none of thoſe who came out of Judæa to Rome, bare him ſo much good will as to give him intelligence what troubles were in the Court at home, although it was ſeven moneths after he was convicted, before he came to Judæa from Rome. Peradventure they who were minded to tell him all, were forced to hold
F their peace, by the ghoſts of them who were put to death.

At laſt, he ſent letters from Rome to his father, that now he would ſhortly return home, and that Cæſar had diſmiſſed him very honourably. The King deſired greatly that the Traytor were in his power: and fearing that if he had an inkling of any matter, that he would looke to himſelfe, fained great kindneſſe towards him, and ſent back again unto him very loving and familiar letters, willing him to haſten his return: for if he made haſte, it might be he ſhould obtain pardon for his mothers offence: for Antipater underſtood that ſhe was baniſhed.

Ant. li. 18. cap. 8. Antipater is ſolicited by Herod with many kind words to haſten his return.

The yeer of the world, 3961. before Christs Nativity 3.

About this time he received a Letter at Tarentum, whereby he understood the death of G
Pheroras; and greatly lamented it, which divers thought well of. Yet as far as one may conjecture, the cause of his grief was, that his treason went not forward as he wished, and he did lament Pheroras so much, as though he had lost one to effect his treachery. Moreover, he feared, lest that which had passed should come to light, and lest the poyson should be found: yet when he came to Cilicia, and there received his fathers letters, which before we mentioned, he then made great haste homeward: yet when he came to Celenderis, he began earnestly to think upon his mothers mishap, his mind as it were, presaging some sinister fortune. And the wiser sort of his friends about him, councelled him not to go to his father, till such time as he were certain for what cause his mother was banished and divorced. For it was to be feared, that he should be accused also of the same that was laid to his mothers H charge: but the unwiser sort being more desirous to see their countrey, then to bethink themselves what was expedient for Antipater, admonished him to make haste, lest that his long delay should breed any suspicion in his father, and lest thereby he should give occasion unto malignant people to raise up slanders. For (said they) if any thing had passed against you, it was in your absence, and were you in presence, no man durst do nor speak against you; and it were a very unwise part for uncertain suspicions, to deprive himself of certain felicitie, and not to return speedily unto his father, and receive the kingdome at his hands, who had him in whom onely his hope was. This counsell (for fortune would have it so) Antipater followed, and so arrived in the haven of Cæsarea passing Sebaste, where contrarie to his expectation, he fell into great sorrow and admiration: for all men eschewed his company, and no man durst come neer him. For, although that he was alwaies hated of them, I
yet then they had libertie to shew their hatred. Many abstained from coming to him for fear of the King: and now the rumour of those things which Antipater had done was known in every Citie, and to every man, onely Antipater himself was ignorant thereof. For there was never any man brought thither with more majestie then he, when he was to sail to Rome: nor never any man more basely entertained at his return. And now understanding of the massacre at home, he craftily made himself ignorant thereof; and notwithstanding, that he was almost dead for fear, yet in his countenance he counterfeited confidence. For he could not now possibly make any escape, nor rid himself out of those present dangers: and yet he heard no certain news of matters at home, nor there: for the King by an Edict had forbidden all men K to give him notice thereof: So that many times he comforted himself thus: that either all matters concerning him were yet secret, or if any thing was come to light, that he by policy, and impudencie could acquit himself thereof; for these two were his refuge and hope. Being thus determined, he went into the ~~Kings~~ Palace alone, without any of his friends and followers; which at the very first gate were most contumeliously repulsed. And by chance Varus the Ruler of Syria was there within: then he boldly going in to his father, came neer unto him, as though he would have saluted him. But Herod stretching forth his hand, and shaking his head; Cried out, O thou that hast attempted to murther thy father, dareſt thou yet presume to offer to embrace me, who art guiltie of so many treacheries! God confound thee, wicked wretch, and come not neer me till thou hast cleared thy self of all that which is laid against thee: for thou shalt have justice, and Varus shall be thy Judge, who is by good fortune now here. Go, and premeditate how to acquit thee against to morrow, for I will give thy subtill and craftie brain some time to do it. L

Hereat Antipater was astonished with fear, that he was not able to reply any thing, but so went his way. Presently, his mother and his wife came unto him, and told him all the proofs of treasons against him. Then he calling his wits together, bethought himself how to answer every point. The next day the King called an assembly of his friends and kinsfolks, and to them admitted Antipaters friends: and he and Varus sitting in judgement, commanded all proofs to be brought, and witnesses to appear: amongst whom were certain of Antipaters mothers servants, lately apprehended, who had Letters from her to carry unto him, to this effect: Forasmuch as all those things are known unto thy father, beware, that thou return M not unto him, before thou hast obtained some Warrant of thy safetie from Cæsar. These and others being brought in, Antipater also came in with them, and prostrating himself before his fathers feet, he said, I beseech thee O father, bear no prejudicate opinion against me, and lend me an open ear, whilest I purge my self: for if thou please to give me leave, I will prove my self guiltesse. But Herod with a vehement voice commanding him to hold his tongue, spake thus unto Varus: I know, Varus, that both thou, or any other just and indifferent Judge, will adjudge Antipater to have deserved death: and I fear me lest you also should disdain me for my bad fortune, and think me worthy of all calamities, who have begotten Herods accusation against Antipater.

A gotten ſuch ſons as you ſee. And yet this ſhould move thee ſo much the more to pitie me, who have been ſo mercifull and carefull for ſuch wicked caitifs. For I had already appointed thoſe young men that are dead to be Kings, and brought them up at Rome, and gotten them Cæſars favour: but they whom I had ſo much honoured, and exalted unto the Crown: became traytors againſt mine own life, whoſe death was much available to Antipater. "For "his ſecurity, I ſought therein, becauſe he was a young man, and the next that ſhould ſucceed "me: but this cruell beaſt, being more then full gorged with my ſufferance and patience, hath "emptied his ſtomach even upon my ſelf, and thinketh my life too long, and is grieved that I "live to be old, and hath atempted to make himſelf King, not any other way, but by murther-"ing his father. And for what cauſe did this come to paſs? for that I recalled him out of the B "field, where he was contemptible; and caſting them off whom I had begotten of a Queen, "appointed this to be heir of my kingdome. I confeſs unto thee Varus my errour: for I incited them againſt me, becauſe that for Antipaters ſake, I deprived them of their right. For "wherein had I ſo well deſerved of them, as at this mans hands? unto whom, being yet alive, "I committed the ſway and rule of my kingdome, and openly in my Will and Teſtament "declared him to be my heir and ſucceſſor, whoſe charges I with my own money have ſtill "ſupported, notwithſtanding, that I had beſtowed upon him the yeerly revenues of fiftie "Talents. And lately when he was to ſail to Rome, I gave him three hundreth Talents, and "commended him unto Cæſar, as the onely man of all my houſe, who had preſerved his fa-"thers life. And what was their offence, if it be compared with Antipaters? and what proof "was their of that, for which they ſuffered? none but that which this man treacherouſly in-C "vented. Nay, I may boldly ſay ſo of him, who hath attempted to murther his father, and "now doth hope to colour all again with craft and deceit: Beware Varus, that he deceive not "thee: for I know this beaſt, and I even now ſee by his fained tears, how probable a tale he "will tell. This fellow once warned me, that whileſt Alexander lived, I ſhould beware of him, "and not put every one in truſt with my perſon. This is he who was wont to go before me "in my bed chamber, and look about in every corner, leſt ſome ſhould have lien in wait to "have affected any treaſon againſt me. This is he who was wont to go before me in my "bed-chamber, and look about in every corner, leſt ſome ſhould have lien in wait to have "effected any treaſon againſt me. This is he who watched me in my ſleep, and through whom "I thought my ſelf ſecure: who comforted me when I mourned for them that were put to D "death. This is he who cenſured the good will of his brethren when they were alive. This "was my defender and champion. O Varus, when I remember his crafts and ſubtilties, and all "his counterfeitings, I ſcarcely think my ſelf alive, admiring how I eſcaped the hand of ſuch "a traitor: and ſeeing that fortune ſtirreth up thoſe of mine own houſe againſt me, and that "thoſe whom I moſt eſteem of, are my greateſt enemies, I will bewail mine own fortune, and "alone lament mine own deſolation; and not one that have thirſted after my bloud ſhal eſ-"cape, although proof be brought againſt every one of my children. And thus his heart being "ſurcharged with ſorrow, he was forced to break off his ſpeech: and preſently he command-ed Nicholaus, one of his friends, to ſhew all the proofs and evidences.

All this while Antipater lay proſtrate at his fathers feet, and lifting up his head, he cried E aloud: "Thou thy ſelf, O father, ſufficiently purgeſt me. For how ſhould I be one who "ſought to murther thee, when thy ſelf doſt confeſs, that I alwayes have preſerved thee from "all dangers? Or if, as thou ſaieſt, I did it fainedly, was it probable that I would be ſo circum-"ſpect in other affairs, and at other times, and now in ſo weightie a matter, play the part of a "tooliſh and ſenceleſs man? Nay, I might well think, that although ſuch a thought might "have been kept ſecret from men, yet it could not be hidden from God, who ſeeth all things. "Was I ignorant what befell my brethren, whom God ſo puniſht for their wicked intents "towards thee? Or what ſhould cauſe me to envie at thy life? The hope of the kingdome? "Why? I had the kingdom. Or a ſuſpicion of thy hatred towards me? I knew thou lovedſt "me. Or any fear which I had of thee? Nay: in obeying thee, I was feared of others. Perhaps F "want might cauſe me thereto. Much leſs, For who might ſpend more then I? Truly if I had "been the wickedſt perſon in the world, or the cruelleſt beaſt upon the earth, yet ſhould I "have relented, being overcome by the benefits of ſo loving a father; ſeeing, as thy ſelf haſt "ſaid, thou didſt recall and prefer me before ſo many ſons. And thou yet alive, didſt proclaim "me King, and made me a ſpectacle to all men for to emulate, through the benefits thou "beſtowedſt upon me. O wretch that I am! O unhappy time of my abſence out of my coun-"trey! what a head did I give to envie, and what opportunitie to malicious and deceitfull "people? Yet, O father, it was for thy ſake, and about thy affairs that I went to Rome, that "Syllæus might not triumph over thy old age. Rome can witneſs my piety, and Cæſar the

The venome tried upon a condemned man.

Then Varus when he had commanded Antipater to make answer unto those things, and that he said nothing more, then God is a witnesse of my innocency, he called for the poyson, and gave it to one that was condemned to die, who having drunk thereof, presently died. Then Varus talked secretly with Herod, and what was done there in that Councell he wrote unto Cæsar. Yet notwithstanding when Herod had sent Antipater to prison, he sent messengers unto Cæsar, to shew him his hard fortune and calamitie. After this it was proved that Antipater wrought treason against Salome. For one of Antiphilus servants came from Rome, and brought letters in the name of Acme, who was one of Julia her maids, which she writ unto the King, telling him that she found a letter of Salomes amongst Julias letters; and so for good will she had sent it him: and the letters which she affirmed to be Salomes, contained many bitter invectives against Herod, and many accusations. But these letters were written and fained by Antipater, who for money had perswaded Acme so to do, as we have said: for the letter which she writ to Antipater evidently shewed it to be so; for she wrote as followeth: K

Another proof against Antipater.

I have written unto thy father as you requested me, and sent also other letters: and I assure my self he will not spare his sister, if he do but read the letters; and you may do well, seeing I have performed all your requests, that now you would be mindful of your promise. This letter against Salome and others, being found to be counterfeited, the King began to doubt that Alexander was made away by such counterfeited letters; and he was very angry that he had almost put his sister L to death, through Antipaters device. Wherefore he no longer delayed to punish him for all, yet he was hindred by a great sickness from accomplishing his purpose. He also sent letters unto Cæsar concerning Acme the maid, and Salomes false accusation, and changed his Testament, and blotted out the name of Antipater, and in his room wrote Antipas, leaving out Archelaus and Philippus, who were the elder brethren, because Antipater had accused them. And he bequeathed unto Cæsar a thousand talents, beside many other rich gifts: and to his wife and children, and kindred, and libertines, about five hundreth, and gave every one a great gift, either in ground or money, and honoured his sister Salome with most rich gifts. And thus he corrected his Will.

Herod intendeth Antipaters punishment, and therefore blotteth his name out of his Testament.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Golden Eagle, and of Antipaters and Herods death.

Ant. lib. 17. cap. 8.

Herods disease encreased, partly through age, and especially for his grief and sorrow; for he was now threescore and ten yeers old; and his mind was so troubled by the death of his children, that though he were in health, yet he took no pleasure in any thing; and his sickness was so much the more grievous unto him, because that Antipater

was

A was yet alive; for he purposed to put him to death when he was recovered of his sickness: To encrease his calamitie, there arose a tumult amongst the people. For there were in the Citie two Sophisters, who made a shew as though they were very skilfull in their Countrey laws, and for that were renowned all over the countrey. One of them was named Judas who was son unto Sepphoræus: the other was called Matthias, sonne unto Margalus. These two were followed by a great many young men, so that when they expounded the law, they had an assembly like a great army, all young men. These two hearing, that the King partly by grief, and partly by his disease was very like to die, spake unto their acquaintance, saying, that it was now a fit time wherein God might be revenged, and those things which were made against their Countrey laws, taken away: for it was a great offence to God to permit the Images or shapes, or likeness of any living thing to be in the Temple. This they said, because the B King had set a golden Eagle upon the chiefest porch of the Temple, which the Sophisters now willed the young men to take away, saying, that it was meritorious, although danger might ensue thereon, yea, even to die for their Countrey laws. For they that died for such a cause, should have their souls immortall, and enjoy everlasting blisse: and that many unwise men, ignorant of that doctrine, so loved their lives, that they chose rather to die by sickness, then to spend their lives in a vertuous quarrel. Whilest they said thus, there was a rumour spred that the King was now at the last cast: whereat the young men being incouraged, about noon when many were walking in the Temple, they let themselves down from the top of the Temple with great ropes, and so with hatchets cut down the Eagle: Whereof C the Captain of the souldiers being advertised, accompanied with a great many souldiers, went speedily to the Temple, and took almost fourty of the young men, and carried them to the King. Who first of all asked them if they were so bold as to cut down the golden Eagle: and they confessed they had done it: then he demanded by whose commandement? they answered, By the commandement of their Countrey laws. After this, it was asked them, why they who were presently to die were so joyfull? They answered, For that after death they hoped to enjoy many good things and eternall blisse. The King hereat greatly moved with anger, overcame his disease, and went forth and made a speech to the people, wherein he inveighed against them as Church-robbers, and that under pretence and colour of their Countrey Lawes and Religion, they attempted great matters, and adjudged them as impious people worthy of death. The people fearing that he would torture many to learn who D favoured that act, requested him that first the authours of that crime, and then those that were found guiltie therein would receive punishment: and that he would remit the offence to all the people besides. The King with much adoe entreated, caused the young men that let themselves down in cords, and the Sophisters to be burned, and the rest which were taken in that act, to be beheaded. After this, the Kings sickness spred over his whole body, and he was afflicted with most grievous pain: for he had a vehement Ague, and an Itch over all his body, which was intolerable, and a dayly Collick, and his feet were swollen, as though he had the Dropsie: his belly was swollen, and privie members putrified, so that wormes bred in the putrified places. He was also short-winded, and he was grievously tormented with difficultie of breath, and a convulsion of the whole body: so that some said that this was a punishment laid upon him for the death of the two Sophisters. Herod notwithstand- E ing, he was afflicted with so many and grievous sicknesses, yet was he desirous to live, and sought remedy whereby he hoped for health. At last he passed over Jordan, where he used the warm waters of Calliroe which run into the lake of Asphaltites, and are so sweet, that men use to drink of them. There the Physicians caused his body to be bathed in hot oyle, and it was therewith so dissolved that his sight failed, and he was as though he were dead: whereat those that were about him being troubled, with their cries caused him to look up, and now despairing of life, he willed fiftie drachmes to be distributed to every souldier, and great sums of money to the Captains and his friends.

As he returned, when he came to Jericho, he was in very great likelyhood to die of melan- F choly, and there he devised a wicked fact: for he caused the chief men of every town, and village in all Judæa to be assembled together, and then he shut them up in a place called the Hippodrome: and calling unto him Salome his sister, and Alexas her husband; I know, quoth he, that the Jewes will make feasts for joy of my death, yet if thou wilt do my command, I shall be mourned for, and I shall have a Princely funeral. Therefore so soon as I have given up the ghost, cause souldiers to compasse these men, whom I have here in hold, and kill them all: for that all Judæa, and every household thereof shall against their will bewail my death. As thus he commanded this to be done, the Legates came which he had sent to Rome, bringing him letters, wherein was shewed how Acme Julia her maid, was by Cæsars command put to death, and Antipater condemned to die: yet Cæsar writ that if his father had rather banish him, he would condescend thereunto also. Herod with this news was something refreshed, yet presently with pain he was overcome: for he both was troubled with a vehement cough, and almost pined with fasting, so that he thought to hasten his own death; and taking an apple in his hand, he called for a knife: for he was accustomed to cut the meat which he did eat; and then looking about him, lest any standing by might hinder him, he lifted up his arm to strike himself. But Achiabus his cousin ran hastily unto him, and stayed his hand: and presently there was made great lamentation throughout the Kings Palace, as though the King had been dead. Antipater having speedy news hereof, was glad, and took courage, and promised the Keepers a piece of money to let him go. But the chiefest of them did not onely deny to do it, but also went presently to the King, and told him all what Antipater requested. Herod hearing this, lifted up his voice with more strength then was meet for a sick man, and commanded his guard to go and kill Antipater, and bury him in the Castle called Hircanium. And then again he altered his Testament, and writ Archelaus his eldest son, who was brother to Antipas, for King, and appointed Antipas for Tetratch. Five dayes after the death of his son Antipater, Herod died: having reigned thirty and foure yeers, after he slew Antigonus, and thirty seven yeers after the Romanes had declared him King. And in all other things he was as fortunate as any man; for he being but a private person, got the Crown and kept it, and left it unto his posterity: but in his household affaires, he was most infortunate. Salome, before it was known that the King was dead, went forth with her husband, and released all those that were in hold, whom the King commanded to be slain; saying, that the Kings minde was altered, and therefore he gave them all licence to depart: and after their departure the Kings death was published to the souldiers, who together with the other multitude were assembled in the Amphitheater at Jericho. Where Ptolomæus Keeper of the King's Seal, made a speech unto them, and began to say, that Herod was now happie; and comforted the multitude, and so he read unto them a Letter which the King left, wherein he earnestly requested the souldiers to favour and love his successour. After the Epistle read, he recited the Kings Testament, wherein Philip was appointed heire of Trachon, and the places thereunto adjoyning; Antipas designed Tetrarch, and Archelaus King. Him also he commanded to bear his ring unto Cæsar, and withall notice and intelligence of the estate of the Kingdome, whereof he had been governour, fast sealed in writing: for he appointed Cæsar to be overseer of all his Ordinances, unto whose pleasure he left the performance of his Testament.

This done, every one was busied about the Kings funeral: where Archelaus spared no cost, but buried the King with all royal pomp possible. The Beere whereon he was carried, was adorned with gold and precious stones: upon it lay a bed wrought with purple, whereupon was laid the dead corps of the King covered also with Purple, with a Crown on his head, and a Diademe of pure gold, and a Scepter in his right hand. About the Beere were his sons and kinsfolk: and the Guard, and Bands of Thracians, Germans, and Gauls, all went before in order, as though they had gone to wars. The rest of the souldiers in warlike order, did follow their Captains and Leaders, and five hundreth servants and libertines carried perfumes. And thus the corps was carried the space of two hundreth furlongs into the Castle named Herodion: where, as himself had appointed, it was interred. And this was the end of King Herod.

CHAP. I.

Of Herods successour Archelaus, and how he entred into the Temple, and the mutinie that arose for the revenge of those that were executed, for taking down the golden Eagle.

F ARchelaus being appointed successour in the kingdom of Herod late dead, necessitie constrained him to go to Rome, which journey gave occasion of new broils. For after that for seven dayes space he had celebrated his fathers funeral, and largely feasted the people (for this is a custome amongst the Jews, which bringeth many of them to povertie; yet he that doth not so, is reputed impious) he went unto the Temple attired in a white garment, where he was with great joy received of the people; and he himself sitting in a tribunal seat, and a Throne of gold, did very courteously admit the people to his presence: and thanked them for their diligent care used in his fathers fune-

he said, that he would not take upon him the Authority or name of a King, till such time as his succession was approved by Cæsar, who by his fathers Testament was Lord and Master of all: and for that cause he withstood the souldiers at Jericho, when they would have crowned him. But he promised, that if he were confirmed King by those who were in authority, he would largely recompence both the souldiers and the people for their good will; and that he fully purposed to be better unto them then his father was. The multitude hereat greatly rejoyced, and made present trial of his mind and purpose; for some cried out, requesting that the tribute might be no more exacted. Others desired that the yeerly payment might ceas. Others requested to give all prisoners libertie. Archelaus in favour of the people granted all their requests: and then offering sacrifices, he banquetted with his friends: when H suddenly after the noon time of the day, a great multitude desirous of alteration (the common lamentation for the Kings death being ceased) began a private mourning, bewailing their mischance whom Herod had put to death for pulling down the golden Eagle from off the Porch of the Temple. This sorrow was not secret, but the whole Citie did resound with laments for them, that were thought to have lost their lives for the Temple, and their Countrey Lawes. They also cried that revenge was to be taken upon them, whom Herod for that fact rewarded with money. And that first of all, he who by Herod was constituted high Priest, was to be rejected, and another more holy and devout to be put in his place. Archelaus, although he was hereby moved to revenge, yet because he was presently to take such a journey, abstained from it, fearing lest that if he brought the multitude into hatred of him, they might hinder him. Wherefore he sought rather by admonishing them, then by I force to reclaim those that were seditious, and sent the Governour of the souldiers to request him to be pacified. But the authours of that sedition so soon as he came to the Temple, before he spake one word, threw stones at him; and in like manner they used others sent after him, to appease them (for Archelaus dispatcht many messengers unto them) whom they spitefully intreated, making a shew that if they had been more in number, they would not have been appeased. Therefore when the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which the Jews call Easter, wherein an infinite number of sacrifices were appointed; an innumerable multitude of people came out of all villages thereabout, for devotion sake to that solemnitie: and they who so lamented the death of the Sophisters, remained in the Temple, seeking by all means to nourish their sedition. Which Archelaus fearing, sent a band of souldiers and a K

And when they had so done, they presently went and offered sacrifice, as though that no hurt had been done. But Archelaus perswaded himself that the multitude would not be appeased without slaughter: wherefore he sent unto them the whole Armie, the footmen into the Citie, and the horsemen into the field, who invading the seditious people as they were sacrificing, slew of them almost three thousand, and scattered the residue into the mountains there adjoyning. and proclaimed by vertue of his command, that every one should depart home to his house; so every one notwithstanding the holinesse of the day, departed. But he accompanied with his mother Popla, Ptolomæus and Nicholaus his friends, went unto the Sea-coast, leaving Philip for Governour of the kingdome, and over his houshold: with them departed Salome and her children, and the Kings brethren and kindred, under pretence to assist Archelaus to the Crown, but indeed it was to informe Cæsar of that which was done in the Temple against the law.

When they came to Cæsarea, they met with Sabinus Governour of Syria, who was com-for the love of Varus, neither entred the Castles, nor shut up Herods treasure from Archelaus, but promised, that he would let all alone till Cæsar understood thereof. But so soon as one of them that hindred him was gone to Antiochia, and the other, to wit, Archelaus, to Rome; he still remaining at Cæsarea, now hasted unto Jerusalem, and took the Kings Palace: where calling for the chief of the guard, and the Purveyors, he exacted of them an account, and sought to take into his custodie the Castles and strong holds. But the Captains of the garrison, mindfull of the charge which Archelaus gave them, kept unto themselves the custodie of all, affirming that they kept them more for Cæsar then Archelaus. At this time

Antipas

A Antipas made a claim to the Crown, alledging that Herods firſt Teſtament was of more force then the laſt, and that he in the firſt was declared King; and both Salome and many more of his kindred, who ſayled with Archelaus, promiſed him their aid. He took with him his mother, and Ptolomæus, brother unto Nicholaus, perſwading himſelf, that they for their truſtineſſe and royaltie unto Herod, would ſtand him in great ſtead: for this Ptolomæus was Herods deareſt friend. He had alſo great confidence in Irenæus his Orator, becauſe he had an excellent grace in pleading, in ſo much as he refuſed the counſel of them who ſought to perſwade him to yield unto Archelaus, both for his age, and for the laſt Teſtament of his father. Now he was welbeloved of all his kindred at Rome, becauſe they hated Archelaus, and eſpecially thoſe that deſired to live at libertie, and either to be governed by the Romanes, or elſe to have Antipas for their King. And to further him the more, he uſed Sabinus letters unto Cæſar, wherein Archelaus was accuſed, and Antipas commended. Therefore Salome, and the reſt of their complices, brought the accuſations unto Cæſar. And after them Archelaus delivered all that which he had done, in writing, and withall, his fathers ring by Ptolomæus; and the reaſons of that which he had done, he ſent incloſed unto Cæſar. Cæſar pondring with himſelf what both parties alledged, and the greatneſs of the Kingdom, and large revenues, and number of Herods children, reading alſo the letters of Varus and Sabinus, he called the chief of the Romans to counſell. Wherein Caius the ſon of Agrippa, and his daughter Julia, by his aſſignment, ſate in the firſt place, (this Caius was Cæſars adopted ſon) and ſo he licenced the parties to plead their rights. Then Antipater, Salomes ſon, being the moſt eloquent of all Archelaus adverſaries; offered himſelf to be his accuſer, for that Archelaus ſeemed now in words to contend for the Kingdome, which he had already poſſeſt himſelf of: and that he did now C trouble Cæſars ears with vain cavillations, whom he would not wiſh to judge of his lawfull ſucceſſion. For after Herods death, he ſuborned ſome to put a Diadem upon his head: and then ſitting in a Throne of gold in Kingly manner, he partly changed, partly advanced the orders of the ſouldiers, and granted unto the people their requeſts, which could not be effected but by a King. He had alſo ſet at libertie many men, who for great crimes were impriſoned by his father: and having done all this, he came now unto Cæſar, to crave the ſhadow of the Kingdome, the ſubſtance and body whereof he already occupied: ſo that herein he left nothing unto Cæſar, but a bare Title. Moreover he alledged that Archelaus did but counterfeit ſorrow for his fathers death, faining himſelf to mourn in the day-time, and in the night he would be drunk, and rioted. Finally, he ſaid, that the ſedition of the people came D by hatred thereof. But the force and drift of his ſpeech was altogether bent to declare the multitude ſlain about the Temple: for he ſaid, that they onely came againſt that feſtivall day to offer ſacrifice, and that they themſelves were ſacrificed, as they were offering their ſacrifices which they brought: and that there were ſuch heaps of dead bodies in the Temple, as never by any forrain wars were ſlain the like. Therefore Herod foreſeeing his crueltie, never judged him worthy of the Kingdome, till ſuch time as his memorie failed him: and that now being more ſick in mind then body, he knew not whom he named his Succeſſour in his laſt Will, eſpecially, for that he had nothing wherein he could blame him, whom in his former Will he appointed his Succeſſour, when he was in health both of mind and body. Yet (quoth he) put the caſe Herod in his extremitie knew what he did, yet (ſaid he) Archelaus hath deprived himſelf of all Kingly dignitie, having committed many things againſt the Lawes. For E (ſaid he) what will he be after he hath received authoritie from Cæſar, who before he received any, hath murthered ſo many? Antipater having ſpoken much to this effect, and at every accuſation taking witneſſe of his kindred that ſtood by, ended his ſpeech.

Then Nicholaus ſtood up, and firſt of all, he ſhewed that the ſlaughter of them in the Temple was neceſſary. For they, for whoſe death Archelaus was now accuſed, were not onely enemies of the Kingdom, but alſo of Cæſar: and for other crimes objected, he ſhewed how that they were done even by the councell and perſwaſion of the adverſaries. He alſo requeſted, that the ſecond Teſtament might be of force, for that therein Herod requeſted Cæſar to be a confirmer of his Succeſſor. For he who had ſuch remembrance, as to leave the performance F of his Will, to the diſcretion of him who was Lord of all: did neither miſtake himſelf in appointing his heire, nor yet was deprived of his ſenſes, ſeeing he knew by whom he ſhould be eſtabliſhed. When Nicholaus had ended his ſpeech, and declared all that he thought might make for Archelaus, Archelaus comming into the middeſt of the Councell, proſtrated himſelf at Cæſars feet: whom Cæſar courteouſly taking from the ground, ſhewed that he was worthy to ſucceed his father. Yet did he not pronounce a definitive Sentence: but the ſame day, the Councell being diſmiſſed, he deliberated with himſelf, according to the

CHAP. II.

Of the fight and massacre at Jerusalem, between the Jews, and the Sabinians.

Ant. l. 17. c. 14. Before such time as Cæsar determined any thing concerning this matter, Malthace the mother of Archelaus fell sick and died; and many letters came out of Syria, signifying that the Jews had rebelled. Which Varus fore-seeing after the departure of Archelaus from thence, went unto Jerusalem to represse and resist the Authours of that sedition: and because the multitude would not be quiet, he left one legion of the three which he brought out of Syria, in the Citie, and so he returned unto Antiochia. But Sabinus coming afterward to Jerusalem, was the cause that the Jewes began a new broyl. For one while he forced the Garrisons to render to him the Castles, another while he rigorously made search for the Kings treasure: and he was not onely assisted by those that Varus left there, but also he had a great multitude of his own servants all armed, to further his avarice. And in the feast of Pentecost (so called, because of the number of seven weeks) the people assembled themselves together, not for Religion sake, but for anger and hatred: so that there was an infinite multitude of people which came out of Galilee and Idumæa, and Jericho, and the Countreys beyond Jordan. Yet the Jewes which were inhabitants of the Citie, surpassed the rest both in number and courage: and they therefore parted themselves into three Bands, and made three Camps: one upon the North part of the Temple; the other on the South part, neer unto the Castle called Hippodromus; the third on the West part neer the Palace, and so they besieged the Romanes on every side. Sabinus greatly fearing them, both for their multitude, and for their courage, sent many letters unto Varus, earnestly requesting him with all speed to bring succour: for if he did not, the whole legion would be extinguished. He himself got him into the highest Tower of the Castle Phasælus, which is so called by the name of Herods brother, whom the Parthians killed; and from thence he gave a signe unto the souldiers to issue out suddenly upon their enemies: for himself was in such a fear, that he durst not come down to the souldiers of whom he was Governour. The souldiers obeying his command, issued into the Temple, and there fought a sore battell with the Jewes; who having no body to assist them, being unexperienced in Warlike affairs, were soon conquered by them that were skilfull. At last, many Jews got upon the Porches, and cast darts at them from the toppe thereof, so that they killed many: but the other could not revenge themselves of them, who fought against them from so high a place; neither could they sustain the force of them who joyned battell with them; till at last they fired the Porches, which for greatnesse, and curious work were admirable. And so, many were either destroyed with the sudden fire, or else leaping down amidst their enemies were by them slain; others going backward, were cast headlong from the wall; others despairing of life, killed themselves with their own swords; and they who privily came down the walls, and assaulted the Romanes, being astonished with fear, were easily overcome: till at last, all being either put to the sword, or cast down through fear, the Treasure dedicated to God, was left destitute of Keepers; so that the souldiers tooke away thereof about foure hundred Talents, and that which they left, Sabinus got.

But this losse of men, and money stirred up many more Jews, and those more Warlike then the first against the Romanes; who besieging the Kings Palace, threatned all their destructions, unlesse they would presently depart from thence: promising Sabinus and the legion leave to depart if he so liked. Part of the Kings souldiers, who of their own accord fled unto them, did assist them. But the most Warlike and valiant amongst them were three thousand of Sebaste, whose Rulers were Rufus and Gratus; one, Leader of the footmen, and the other of the horse-men; both which, although they had had no souldiers with them, for their valour of body, and Counsell, might yet have been a great help unto the Romanes in those Warres. The Jews earnestly continued the siege, and assaulted the Castle walls, crying upon Sabinus to depart, and not to hinder them now after so long time to have their Countreys libertie. Sabinus though with all his heart he wished himself away, yet durst he not trust them; but he suspected that their courtesie, was but a plot to entrap him: and on the other M

A side hoping that Varus would come and help him, ſtill indured the danger of the ſiege. At the ſame time there were tumults in many places of Judæa, and many through opportunity of the time aſpired to the kingdome. For in Idumæa two thouſand old ſouldiers, who had born arms under Herod, gathering together, and having armed themſelves, came and fought with the Kings forces, whom Achiabus the Kings couſin reſiſted in the ſtrongeſt Villages; alwayes eſchewing to fight in the open field. At Sephoris alſo a Town of Galilee, Judas the ſon of Ezechias, the Captain of the thieves, who before was taken by King Herod, and had waſted that countrey, gathered together a great multitude, and brake into the Kings Armory, and armed all his company, and fought againſt them who affected the royall dignitie. Alſo beyond the river, Simon, one of the Kings ſervants, being fair and of a huge ſtature, put a Crown upon his own head, and gathering together a company of thieves, went about with B them unto Jericho, and burned the kings Palace, and many fair and ſumptuous houſes there, and ſo got a great prey by burning the houſes: and he had ſurely fired all buildings of account, had not Gratus Captain of the Kings footmen, made haſte to meet him with the bowmen of Trachon, and the moſt warlike men of Sebaſte, where many footmen were ſlain. But Simon though he fled into a ſtreight valley, yet he overtook him, and cut him overthwart the neck, and ſo he fell dowe. In like manner other of the Kings Palaces neer Jordan by Bethara were burned, by a multitude of others gathered together in bands from beyond the river. At this time a ſhepherd named, Athrongæus preſumed to uſurp the Crown: he was thereunto induced by the courage he bare, and the diſdain of death. With this reſolution he armed his foure brethren, and every one of them had a company armed, and they were as C his Captains and Champions to make incurſions: and he like a King medled onely with great affairs, and then he put a Crown upon his head; and thus he continued a long time waſting the Countrey, and killing eſpecially the Romanes, and alſo the Kings ſouldiers; ſo that none of the Jews eſcaped if they were in hope to gain by them. They alſo preſumed to meet a company of the Romanes at Ammaus, who carried Corn and Armour unto the legion, where they killed with darts one Arius a Centurion, and fourtie of the moſt valiant amongſt them: and the reſt, being in like danger, through the help of Gratus with the ſouldiers of Sebaſte eſcaped. When they had done many things in this manner againſt the inhabitants and ſtrangers, at laſt three of them were taken: the eldeſt by Archelaus, and the two other who were eldeſt after him, fell into the hands of Gratus and Ptolomæus; and the fourth yielded himſelf unto Archelaus upon compoſition: And thus at laſt they came to their end. D And all Judæa by their example was filled with thieves.

WHen Varus had received the letters of Sabinus, and of the nobles with him, fearing the whole legion, he haſted to ſuccour them: Wherefore he came to Ptolemais with two other legions, and four Cornets of horſemen, where he willed the Kings forces and the Nobles to meet him. Moreover, as he paſſed by Berytum, they accompanied him with fifteen hundred armed men. Aretas alſo the King of Arabia, E for the hatred he bare to Herod, was come with a great number of horſemen and footmen. Aſſoon as the hoſt was aſſembled, Varus incontinently directed part of his Army into Galilee, adjoyning thereto, and appointed a friend of his the ſonne of Caius for their Governour, who preſently put them all to flight againſt whom he was ſent; and having taken the Caſtle of Sephoris, he fired it, and made the inhabitants thereof bond-ſlaves. Varus with the reſt of the Army went into Samaria, and took it; yet he did the City no harm, becauſe he found that amiddeſt all thoſe tumults they had been quiet. When he had pitched his Tents at a Village called Aun, which was in the Poſſeſſion of Ptolomæus, the Arabians ſacked it, for they hated them who loved Herod. From thence they went to Sappho, another ſtrong borough, F which they in like manner ſacked and deſtroyed, with all the fruits, and revenewes they found there. All which was filled with the ſlaughter and fires which the Arabians made, there was no end nor hinderance of their avarice. Alſo Varus commanded Ammaus to be burned, being angry for the death of Arius, and the reſt that were ſlain there: and the inhabitants thereof were ſcattered, every one by flight ſeeking to ſave himſelf. From thence he went to Jeruſalem, and at the ſight of him the Jews fled and ſcattered themſelves, ſome here, ſome there, all about the Countrey: they that remained in the Citie excuſed themſelves, that they were not conſenting to that tumult, but that for the celebration

But first Josephus, Archelaus his cousin, with Gratus and Rufus came to meet him, leading the Kings Armie, and the Sebastians, and the Roman souldiers adorned in their accustomed apparel, Sabinus durst not be seen of Varus, and therefore got him out of the town before, and went unto the sea-coast. Varus divided his army, and sent it into the fields against the authors of that tumult: and those that were brought unto him who were in lesse fault, he committed to prison, and those who were the chiefest, he crucified to the number of two thousand

But they without any fight, through Achiabus counsel, yielded themselves to Varus. And he pardoned the common souldiers, and sent the Captains to Cæsar to answer the matter. Who pardoning most of them, yet punished some that were the Kings kinsmen, (for some of them were akin to Herod) because they altogether rebelled against their King. Varus having thus quieted the estate of Judæa and Jerusalem, leaving the same legion that was there before, departed to Antiochia.

NOw Archelaus had a new process at Rome against the Jews, who before the sedition with the leave of Varus, were gone to Rome to crave the libertie of their countrey. These who came as Embassadours in their countreys behalf, were fiftie in number, and they were assisted by more then eight thousand Jews that lived at Rome. Wherefore Cæsar called a Councel of the Nobilitie of Rome in the Temple of Apollo, which was scituate upon mount Palatine, and joyned to Cæsars private Palace, which was most sumptuously adorned: and the multitude of the Jewes appeared with the Legats against Archelaus, and his friend. Archelaus kindred neither came with him, nor with the rest of the Jews: with him K

they would not joyn, for envie; and with the Jewes they durst not, for shame. Amongst them also was Philip the brother of Archelaus, whom Varus sent in courteous manner to assist his brother; or if that it pleased Cæsar to divide Herods Kingdome amongst his children, that then he might have a part. The adversaries were commanded to shew what Herod had committed contrary to the Laws: First of all they answered, that they found him not a King, but the most cruel Tyrant that ever was, and that he murthered many; and those whom he left alive endured such misery, as they thought themselves far unhappier then those that were so butchered. After this, Nicholaus ſtood up againſt them, and firſt of all acquitted the Kings of the crimes laid to their charge: and then reproved his Countreymen, for that they would not be eaſily Governed, and by their own nature would not, except they were forced, obey their King: and he alſo blamed the kinſman of Archelaus, who joyned with his accuſers. Cæſar having heard what both parts could ſay, diſmiſſed the Aſſembly. And within few daies after he gave Archelaus half of the Kingdome, under the title of an Ethnarch, promiſing him moreover to make him King, if he behaved himſelf well: the other half he divided into two Tetrarchies and gave them to the reſt of Herods ſonnes: one unto Philip; the other unto Antipas, who contended with Archelaus for the Crown. Antipas his part lay from Galilee beyond the river Jordan. the revenues whereof was two hundreth talents a year. And theſe cities were given him, over which he was Lord, Stratons tower, Sebaſte, Joppe and Jeruſalem. The reſt, Gaza, and Gadara, and Hippon, Cæſar took from the kingdome, and joyned them to Syria. Archelaus yeerly revenues amounted to four hundreth talents a year. Cæſar alſo (beſide that which Herod left her) made Salome Lady of Jamnia, Azotus and Phaſælis, and the Palace at Aſcalon, all which amounted to threeſcore talents a year. But Cæſar made her houſe ſubject unto Archelaus his C Ethnarchy. And having diſtributed unto the reſt of Herods kindred that which in his teſtament he left them, he gave his two daughters that were virgins, over and above, five hundreth thouſand drachmes of ſilver, and married them unto Pheroras ſonnes: and having divided Herods patrimony amongſt them, he alſo diſtributed that which Herod bequeathed unto him, amounting unto a thouſand talents, leaving himſelf onely ſome jewels of ſmall value, which he reſerved in honour and remembrance of the dead.

AT the ſame time a certain young man, a Jew born, brought up by a Libertine of Rome in the town of Sidonia, being very like unto Alexander whom Herod put to death, went to Rome, having one of his Countreymen for his companion, who knew very well the eſtate of the Kingdome: by whom he receiving inſtructions, affirmed, that they who ſhould have put him and Ariſtobulus to death, being moved to compaſſion, let them go, and took two others in their room like them. With this tale he deceived many Jews living in Creete, where he was honourably received, and from thence he ſailed to Melos, where he was yet entertained with greater pomp: and enriching himſelf, he uſed ſuch means, that he got his hoſtes (which gave him entertainment) to ſail with E him to Rome, and after arriving at Dicæarchia, he received all manner of rich gifts of the Jews which dwelled there and there by his fathers friends was honoured as a king. For he was ſo like unto Alexander, that they that had ſeen Alexander, and knew him well, would have ſworn he had been Alexander. Wherefore all the Jews at Rome deſired to ſee him, ſo that an infinite multitude followed him whitherſoever he went in the ſtreets, and they ſo doted upon him, that they carried him in a horſelitter, and at their own proper coſt and charges prepared for him a royal train.

Of the baniſhment and death of Archelaus.

Archelaus being now made Prince, remembred the diſcord paſt, and in revenge thereof he tyrannized not onely over the Jews, but alſo over the Samaritanes: and in the ninth year of his reign, the Jewes and Samaritanes ſent Ambaſſadours againſt him unto Cæſar: and finally he was baniſhed and ſent to Vienna, a City of Gallia, and all his patrimony was confiſcate to Cæſar. Before he was ſummoned to appear before Cæſar, he reported that he had a marvellous dream: for he ſaw nine great ears full of corn devoured by oxen; and preſently ſending for Prophets and Chaldæans, he demanded what that dream betokened. Some interpreted it one way, and ſome another: but one Simon an Eſſean told him that the eares of corn betokened years, and the oxen ſignified the changes and mutations of this world, for as much as in labouring the land, they turned up and altered it: and therefore he was to reign ſo many years as there were ears of corn in number; and then, after he had bidden many mutations, he ſhould die. Five dayes after this interpretation, Archelaus was ſent for to Rome, to anſwer that before Auguſtus, whereof he was accuſed. I alſo thought it worth rehearſing, to ſet down the dream of his wife Glaphira, daughter to Archelaus King of Cappadocia, who was firſt married unto Alexander brother unto this man, and ſon to King Herod, by whom he was put to death, as we have ſaid before: after whoſe death ſhe was married to Juba King of Lybia, and he being dead, ſhe returned home to her father: and living in her widowhood at home with her father, Archelaus the Ethnarch beholding her, was ſo inflamed with her love, that preſently being divorced from his wife Mariamme, he married her. Who ſhortly after ſhe came into Judæa dreamed that ſhe ſaw Alexander her firſt husband ſtanding before her, and ſaying unto her, It had been enough for thee to have married the King of Lybia: but thou not contented therewith, comeſt again to my houſe, greedy of a third husband; and which is worſt of all, now married to mine own brother. I will not conceal nor diſſemble this injury which thou doeſt me, but I will recover you againſt your will. And ſhe ſcarcely lived two daies after ſhe had recounted this dream. H I K

Of Simon the Galilean, and the three ſects amongſt the Jews.

After that Archelaus his dominions were made a Province, a certain Romane knight called Coponius was made Governour thereof, receiving authority from Cæſar to puniſh and put to death, in his time a Galilean named Simon, who incited his Countreymen to revolt, reproving them for paying tribute to the Romanes, and for being ſubject to any mortall men, but God. This Simon was a Sophiſter, having a ſect of his own deviſing, nothing like other ſects. For there are three ſects of Philoſophers amongſt the Jews: one is that which the Phariſees do follow; another which the Sadduces do follow; the third is that which the Eſſeans follow, which is the moſt famous of the three. The Eſſeans are Jews born, but they are moſt friendly to one another, who beſide all other pleaſures do eſchew witchcraft; neither do they ſuffer themſelves to be led with their own affections, but account it a great vertue to abſtain from all vices and to keep chaſtity. For they refuſe marriage, and account other mens children, put to them to be taught whil'ſt they be young, as their kinſmen, whom they do diligently inſtruct in their manners and opinions; not for that they condemn marriage and propagation of mankind, but for that they think men ſhould avoid womens intemperance, for they think that none of them keep themſelves truely to one man. Alſo they contemne riches, and all things with them are common, and no man amongſt them is richer then other. And they have a law amonſt themſelves, that whoſoever will follow their ſect, he muſt make his goods common L M

Three ſects among the Jews, of which the Eſſeans were the beſt.

The Eſſeans doctrine of marriage.

Among the Eſſeans, goods are common.

A common to them all: for ſo neither any amongſt them ſhall ſeem abject for poverty, nor any great for riches ſake, but they have as it were all equall patrimonies like brethren. They account it a ſhame to uſe oyl: and if any man againſt his will be anointed therewith, they uſe all diligence to wipe it away: for they account homelineſſe beſt; and all their clothes are white. They have amongſt them procurators, to overſee and uſe all things for their common benefit, and every one ſeeketh the good of all, who are choſen from amongſt them by a common conſent. They have not one certain city, but are in many cities: and if any of their ſect come unto them from another place, they give him any thing they have, as if he himſelf were owner thereof. And in brief, they go boldly in to thoſe, whom they never in their lives did ſee before, as though they were very familiarly acquainted with them: and therefore when they take a journey they onely arme themſelves againſt theeves, and carry no-
B thing with them elſe. In every city there is one of them appointed, whoſe office is to have a care of the gueſts, and ſee that they neither want cloathes nor any thing elſe neceſſary for them. All children under government, brought up by them, go apparalled alike, and they never change their apparell nor ſhoes, except they have clean worn their firſt apparell, or that by reaſon of long wearing they will do no more ſervice. They among themſelves neither buy nor ſell: but every man that hath any thing that another wanteth, giveth him it, and taketh that of him which himſelf needeth: yet every one of them may take any thing he hath need of from whom he pleaſeth, without anie change. Above all, towards God they are very religious: for before the ſun riſe they have no prophane talk, but they make certain vowes and praiers after the cuſtome of their Countrie, as it were praying that it may riſe
C upon them. After this, every one is diſmiſſed to practiſe the art he knoweth: and when every one hath diligently laboured till five of the clock, they all gather themſelves together again, and being covered with linen clothes, ſo they waſh their bodies with cold water: and having thus purged themſelves, they have a ſecret aſſembly, unto the which no man that is not of their ſect is admitted: and ſo they come into the refectorie as into a holy Temple, all ſitting down with ſilence, and the baker ſetteth everie man in order a loafe, and the cook every man a meſſe of pottage of one ſort: then before meat the Prieſt giveth thanks, and no man may taſte any meat before they have made their praiers unto God. Likewiſe when dinner is ended, they pray again: for both before and after they give thanks unto God the D giver of all, and then putting off that apparel as ſacred, they apply themſelves unto their work till evening. This done, they do as before, cauſing their gueſts to ſup with them, if by fortune any come. Their houſe is never troubled with cries or tumults, for every one is appointed to ſpeak in his turn: ſo that they who are without the houſe, eſteem their ſilence as ſome ſacred miſtery. The cauſe hereof is their continual ſobriety, and that every one is limited how much he ſhould eat or drink. And although that in all other matters they are ruled by their Governour, yet in theſe two, to wit, compaſſionating and helping, they may do as they think good: for every one may when he pleaſeth, help thoſe whom he thinketh deſerve help: and when they pleaſe, give meat to them that are in need. Yet may not they give any thing to their kindred without the leave of their Governour. Theſe men give not place to anger, but refrain from wrath, keep their promiſe, and maintain peace, and ac-E count every word they ſpeak of more force, then if they had bound it with an oath; and they ſhun oathes worſe then perjury: for they eſteem him condemned for a liar, who is not believed without he call God to witneſſe. They ſtudy diligently ancient Writers, chiefly gathering out of their writings, what is moſt convenient for the ſoul and the body. Out of them they learn remedies for diſeaſes, and medicinable hearbs, and what is the proper effect of every ſtone. Thoſe who are deſirous to be of their order, do not ſtraightway converſe with them, but for a year before, they live out of their Colledge, and have the ſame diet, giving them alſo a little hatchet, and ſuch a girdle, as is before ſpoken of, and a white garment. But at the yeers end, if they perceive him to be continent, then they take him into their refectory, and he is made partaker of purer waters (to the end he may continue chaſte)
F yet is he not admitted in common amongſt them: for two years after this his trial, they obſerve his life and manners: and at laſt, when he is thought worthy, then is he admitted to their common company. And before he be received to the common table, firſt he proteſteth with great and ſolemn oathes, that he will worſhip God, and obſerve juſtice and fidelity towards all men, and neither willingly hurt any man, nor injure any one for another mans command, but that he will alwaies hate the wicked, and aſſiſt the good, and ever keep his faith to all, but eſpecially to his ſuperiours. For no man can obtain the power of principality without the will and good pleaſure of God: and that if he be put in authority over others, he never will abuſe it to the prejudice of thoſe that are under him, and neither ex-

Adding moreover, that they will never deliver any doctrine, ſave that which they have received; and that they will avoid theft, and diligently keep the books of their doctrine, and the names of Angels. And with theſe oathes they try, and as it were arme thoſe who enter into their order. Thoſe of their congregation, who ſhall be condemned, they thruſt out of their company: and whoſoever is ſo puniſhed, for the moſt part dieth a miſerable death; for having once taken his oath, it is not lawful for him to take meat of any ſtranger; ſo that feeding on graſſe like beaſts, at laſt he periſheth through famine. For which cauſe oftentimes they moved with compaſſion, receive many into their order again, even ready by famine to yield up the ghoſt; judging them to have endured penance enough for their offences, who with famine were almoſt brought unto deaths door. They are very ſevere, and juſt in their judgement; and to decide any matter, there is never fewer of them then a hundreth, and that which by them is agreed upon, is an irrevocable ſentence. Next after God they reverence the lawmaker, inſomuch as if one revile him, they forthwith condemne him to death. They greatly reverence old men, and a multitude: ſo that if ten of them ſit together, no man of them muſt ſpeak without he be licenced thereto by nine of the company. They alſo muſt not ſpit in the midſt of the aſſembly, nor on the right hand. And they are more ſevere then any other Jews in obſerving the Sabbaths: and they do not onely abſtain from dreſſing meat that day, but alſo they may not remove any veſſel out of his place, nor go to the privy. Upon other daies they dig a pit a foot deep into the ground with the hatchet, which (as we before ſaid) every one at his entrance into their order hath given him, and then covering themſelves diligently with their garment, leſt they ſhould do injury to the light of heaven, in that pit they eaſe themſelves; and then cover their ordure with the earth they took out of the pit: and this they do in moſt ſecret places.

The Eſſeans circumſpect in juſtice.

The Eſſeans reverence the Sabbaths.

And although this purging of their bodies be natural, yet do they by waſhing purifie themſelves after it, as after great uncleanneſſe. Furthermore they amongſt themſelves are divided into four orders, according to the times which they have taken to follow this exerciſe of life; and they who are juniors, are ſo far different from the ſeniors, that if they do but touch one of them, they preſently purifie themſelves, as though they had been profaned by a ſtranger. They are long lived, ſo that moſt of them live a hundreth years, which I judge is by reaſon of their well ordered diet and their temperancy. They contemn adverſity, and by counſel and diſcretion overcome torments. They preferre an honourable death before life. And the wars which the Jews made againſt the Romanes, ſhewed what courage and hardineſſe they have in all things. For being then compelled by breaking of the members of their bodies, and fiery torments, and all kind of tortures which were laid upon them, to revile their lawmaker, and to eat any meat forbidden: yet could they not be forced to any of theſe, neither would they intreat the torturers, nor ſhew any ſorrow amidſt their torments. Nay, in the very midſt of their griefes and paines they ſcoffed at their tormenters; and laughing, joyfully yielded up their ſouls as though they hoped to receive them again. For it is an opinion amongſt them, that the body is corruptible, and that the matter thereof is not perpetual: but yet the ſoules remain for ever immortall; who paſſing out of a moſt pure and ſubtile air, wrap themſelves in bodies as in priſons, being as it were drawn thereunto by a natural inclination. And when they are delivered out of theſe carnal bonds, then preſently as freed from a long bondage, they joyfully mount a loft. And of the good ſoules they ſay, as did the Grecians; that they live beyond the Ocean ſeas in a place of pleaſure, where they are never moleſted with rain, nor ſnow, nor heat, but have alwaies a ſweet and pleaſant air coming out of the Ocean. But the wicked ſoules (as they ſay) go into a place very tempeſtuous, where there is alwaies as it were winter weather, alwaies full of lamentations of thoſe who for ever are to be puniſhed. But I judge that the Greeks are of this opinion, when they ſay there is an Iſle for the vertuous, whom they call Heroes and half-gods: and that the ſouls of the wicked go to a place in hell, where it is feigned, ſome to be tormented, as Syſiphus, Tantalus, Ixion, and Titius. Which they did firſt invent for this purpoſe, becauſe thoſe who are of good diſpoſition, are made better in this life, by hope of ſome reward in the life to come: and the wicked are (as they thought) hereby reſtrained for fear of eternall torments, which if they continue in wickedneſſe they ſhall endure. This is the Eſſeans Philoſophy touching the immortality of the ſoul: wherein they propoſe an inevitable allurement to thoſe who have once taſted of their Philoſophy. There are alſo ſome among them, who promiſe to foretell

The Eſſeans prophecy.

There is another colledge of theſe Eſſeans, agreeing with the former, both in apparrel, meat, and kind of life, and obſerve the ſame laws, and ordinances; onely they differ in the opinion of marriage, affirming that they who abſtain from marriage, do cut off the greateſt part of mans life, to wit, ſucceſſion of mankind. For (ſay they) if all men ſhould follow that opinion, preſently all mankind would periſh: yet notwithſtanding theſe people are ſo continent, that for three years ſpace they make trial of the women they are to marry; and when they have proved them fit to bear children, then they marry them. None of them muſt lie B with their wives when they are with child, to ſhew that they do not marry to ſatisfie luſt, but for to have children. When their wives waſh themſelves, they are covered with a garment as the men are: and this is the manner and cuſtome of this ſect. Of the two former ſects, the Phariſees are ſaid to be moſt skilful in Interpreting the Law, & are of opinion that all things are to be attributed to God, and Fate, and that every man may of his own power do good or ill, yet (ſay they) deſtiny helpeth in every action: and that the ſouls of men are all incorruptible, but onely the ſouls of good men, go into other bodies, and the ſouls of wicked men, are ſent into everlaſting pain. But the Saduces deny Fate and deſtiny, and affirm that God is the author of no evil, avowing likewiſe that a man hath free will to do well or ill, and every man may chuſe whether he will be good, or bad: and they generally deny, both paines and rewards for the ſouls after this life. The Phariſees are ſociable and loving one to ano- C ther; but the Sadduces are at diſcord among themſelves, living like ſavage beaſts, and as uncourteous to their own ſect, as to ſtrangers. D Archelaus his Ethnarchie being now made a Province, the reſt of his brethren, to wit, Philip and Herod, who was ſirnamed Antipas, governed their Tetrarchies. And Salome dying, left unto Julia by her Teſtament the Toparchie which ſhee ruled, as alſo Jamnia and a ground ſet with palme trees in Phaſaelis. When Tiberius Cæſar after the death of Auguſtus was made Emperour of Rome, after that he had raigned ſeven and fifty years, ſix moneths, and two dayes, Herod and Philip remaining in their Tetrarchies, Philip builded a Citie near unto the head of Jordan in the countrey of Paneade, and called it Cæſarea; and another he built in the lower part of Gaulanitis, and named it Julias: Herod in Galilee built the Citie called Tiberias, and another in Peræa on this ſide Jordan, which alſo he named Julias. Pilate being ſent by Tiberius to be Governour over the Iews, cauſed in the night time, the ſtatua of Cæſar to be brought into Ieruſalem covered: which thing, within three dayes after cauſed a great tumult among the Jews; for they who beheld it, were aſtoniſh- E ed and moved, as though now the law of their countrey were prophaned: for they hold it not lawful, for any picture or image to be brought into the City. At their lamentation who were in the City, there was gathered together a great multitude out of the fields adjoyning, and they went preſently to Pilate then at Cæſarea, beſeeching him earneſtly that the Images might be taken away out of Jeruſalem, and that the laws of their countrey might remain inviolated. When Pilate denied their ſuit, they proſtrated themſelves before his houſe, and there remained lying upon their faces, for five dayes and nights never moving. afterward Pilate ſitting in his tribunal ſeat, was very careful to call all the Jews together before him, as though there he would have given them an anſwer: when upon the ſudden a F company of armed ſouldiers (for ſo it was provided) compaſſed the Jews about with a triple rank: the Iews were hereat amazed, ſeeing that which they expected not. Then Pilate told them, that except they would receive the Images of Cæſar, he would kill them all: and to that end made a ſign unto the ſouldiers to draw their ſwords. The Jews, as though they had agreed thereto, fell all down at once, and offered their naked necks to the ſtroke of the ſword, crying out that they would rather loſe their lives, then ſuffer their religion to be prophaned. Then Pilate admiring the conſtancy of the people in their religion, preſently commanded the ſtatues to be taken out of the City of Jeruſalem.

After this, he cauſed another tumult amongſt them, for they have a ſacred treaſure called Corban, which Pilate uſed to bring water in unto the City, four hundred furlongs off: for this this cause the people murmured; so that when Pilate came to Jerusalem, they flocked about his tribunall, crying and exclaiming. Pilate foreseeing that tumult, caused souldiers secretly armed to mingle themselves amongst the people in private apparell; and commanded them not to use their swords, but to beat those with clubs, whom they saw make such clamors. And when he had thus plotted the matter, sitting in his Tribunall, he gave a sign unto the souldiers; and presently the Jews were beaten; and many of them, partly with blowes, and partly trodden upon by the multitude, died miserably. The multitude amazed at the calamity of those that were slain, held their tongues. For this cause Agrippa sonne to Herod the Tetrarch, whose father Aristobulus, Herod the King put to death, went to Rome, and accused him to Cæsar. Tiberius not admitting his accusation, he remained still at Rome, and sought the favour of other Potentates there, and especially he reverenced Caius the sonne of Germanicus, he being yet a private person: and upon a certain day being with him at a banquet, he stretcht forth his hands, and openly began to beseech Almighty God that Tiberius Cæsar might quickly die, that he might see him lord of all the world. Tiberius having notice hereof by one of his familiar friends, caused Agrippa to be imprisoned; where he endured hard and straight imprisonment, untill the death of Tiberius, which was six moneths after. After he was dead (having reigned two and twenty years, six moneths, and three daies) Caius Cæsar, who succeeded him in the Empire, freed him from prison, and gave him the Tetrarchie of Philip, who was now deceased, and the Title of a king. When Agrippa came into his kingdome, Herod the Tetrarch began to envie his estate; and Herodias his wife still urged him forward to hope that he should be made a King: for (said she) thou wantest that dignity onely for slothfulnesse, because thou wouldest not go to Cæsar: for if Agrippa be made a King, being before but a private man, how canst thou doubt to be made a King, who art already a Tetrarch? Herod herewith perswaded, went unto Caius Cæsar, who greatly reproved his avarice, in so much as he fled into Spain; for Agrippa followed him to Rome to accuse him before Cæsar: and Caius gave unto him Herods Tetrarchie. And so Herod remained in Spain with his wife.

Of the pride of Caius, and of Petronius the President.

The year of the world, 4002. after Christs Nativity, 40

Caius Cæsar so abused himself and his authority, that he would be thought to be a god, and be so called. Also he put many noble men of his countrey to death. He likewise extended his impiety even unto Judæa: for he sent Petronius with an army to Jerusalem, commanding him to set his statues in the Temple; and if the Jews refused to receive them, that those who withstood him, he should put to the sword, and lead the rest away captive. Almighty God did otherwise dispose this proud commandment. But Petronius accompanied with three legions, and many assistants out of Syria, came with all speed from Antiochia to Judæa: many of the Jews would not beleeve any warre towards, notwithstanding that they heard a generall report thereof: and they that beleeved it, could not bethink themselves of any means to resist. Suddenly all were in a great fear: for the army was now come to Ptolemais, which City, is scituate by the Sea-shore in Galilee, in a fair field, and on the East side it is compassed about with mountains, distant from it threescore furlongs, which appertain unto Galilee; on the South side it is inclosed with the Mount Carmel, which is an hundreth and twenty furlongs off from it; on the North side it is invironed with an exceeding high mountain, which the inhabitants call the Tyrians ladder: this mountain is an hundreth paces distant from the City. Two miles from this city there is a river running by, called Beleus, a very little one, neer unto which is the sepulchre of Memnon, having adjoyning unto it a place of the compasse of an hundreth cubits, worthy of admiration. This place is as it were a round valley covered with sand like glasse, which when many ships coming together take away for ballace, so that they empty the place of it, that place is presently after covered with the like sand again. For there are windes, which as it were upon purpose, carry this sand from the higher places round about it thither, and whatsoever is within the mine of metall there; it is presently changed into chrystall or glasse. And that which in my mind is more to be wondred at, is, that the sand being turned into glasse, if afterward any part thereof be cast upon the brink of this place, it is again turned into ordinary sand. And this is the nature of that place.

Now the Jews with their wives and children gathered themselves together in the field, where the City Ptolemais is scituate, and humbly besought Petronius, first not to violate their countrey countrey laws; and next, to be good unto them. Petronius seeing the multitude of them who humbly sued unto them, and how earnestly they besought his favour, left his army and Cæsars statues at Ptolemais, and himself went from thence to Galilee, and at Tiberias called all the Jews, and the Nobility together, recounting to them the force of the Romane army, and Cæsars threatnings; adding moreover, that the Jews supplication was indeed a contumely, seeing all nations under the dominion of the Romans (the Jews onely excepted) had already placed Cæsars statues in their temples among the rest of their gods: and herein they did as it were revolt from the Empire, and injure the President. They answerd, it was against their laws and customes of their countrey: for it was not lawful for them to have the Image of God, much lesse of a man; and that they were not onely forbidden by the law to have an Image in the Temple, but also to have it in any other prophane place. Petronius suddenly answered: Well, I must do my Lords command; for if I do not, but spare you, I shall be justly punished: and not I, but he that sent me, will fight against you. For I my self, as well as you, must do as I am commanded. At these words the whole multitude cryed out at once that before they would see their religion violated, they would willingly suffer themselves to be destroyed. When the noise of the people was ceased, Petronius said; Are ye then prepared and minded to fight against Cæsar? The Iews answered, We every day offer sacrifices for Cæsar and the Romans. But if Cæsar would needs place his image in their Temple, he must first offer their whole nation for sacrifice: for they would willingly with their wives and children offer themselves to any that would kill them. Hereat Petronius greatly marvelled, being moved to compassion when he beheld the constancy of the Jews in their religion, and so great a multitude prepared to die for it. And for that time they departed, nothing being done. The next day following he assembled onely the Nobility of the Jews, one by one, compelling them to accord to Cæsars command, and speak publikely to the people, sometime admonishing them, otherwhile threatning them, and putting them in mind of the power of the Romans, and Cæsars indignation, and that he must of necessity do as he was commanded. But they were moved by none of these. And Petronius fearing the ground would be left untilled (for it was now seed time, and all the people had remained idle in the City for fifty dayes space) calling them together, he said, that he would go about a thing which might greatly endanger himself. For (said he) I will either (God working with me) appease Cæsars wrath, or else I will lose mine own life to save such a multitude as you are. And dismissing the people, who made daily prayers to God for him, he led the army from Ptolemais unto Antiochia, from whence he presently sent unto Cæsar in all hast, recounting unto him, with how great an army he went into Judæa, and that all the whole nation made supplication unto him: whose request and humble suit, if he denied, he must utterly destroy the men and their countrey; for they had constantly remained in their countrey religion, and vehemently resisted any new law. Caius writ an answer of these letters unto Petronius, threatning that it should cost him his life, because he made no more hast to execute his command. The messengers that brought these letters, were tossed in a tempest upon the Sea three whole moneths together: and others comming after them to bring news of Caius his death, had a prosperous wind: so Petronius received the letters of Caius Cæsars death twenty and seven dayes, before the other threatning letters came.

Of the Empire of Claudius, and of the reign and death of Agrippa.

Caius Cæsar being slain by treason, when he had reigned three years and six moneths, Claudius was made Emperour by the army which was at Rome. The Senate by the instigation of the Consuls Sentius Saturnius, and Pomponius the second, commanded three legions of souldiers to keep the City, during the Councel holden in the Capitol: and for Caius Cæsars cruelty they determined to fight against Claudius, intending to reduce the Empire to the ancient government; that as before-time, so for ever after, those should rule that the Senate judged worthy. It chanced that at this time Agrippa came to Rome, and the Senate sent unto him, requesting him to come and be one of their Councel. Claudius also desired him to take part with the army, intending to use his help where need required. Agrippa perceiving that Claudius was already as it were Emperour for his power, he took part with him: who presently sent him as Embassadour to the Senate, to tell them his purpose; how that first of all, the souldiers, whether he would or no, set him in that dignity, and it had been in him an undiscreet part, to have forsaken such an an offer at the ſouldiers hands, who did it for good will: nay, if he had refuſed it, his life ſhould be in continuall danger, for it was ſufficient cauſe of envy, that he had been elected Emperour. Moreover, he purpoſed to rule, not as a Tyrant, but as a moſt milde Prince: for he would be contented onely with the title of an Emperour, and do nothing without the common conſent of them all. And although he was not naturally inclined to modeſt and courteous behaviour, yet he had a ſufficient example to beware, that he abuſed not his authority, by Caius Cæſars death. Agrippa bare his meſſage to the Senate, who anſwered, (as though they truſted to their ſouldiers and learned councel) that they would not thruſt themſelves into wilful bondage. Claudius receiving this anſwer, ſent Agrippa again to tell them, that nothing could cauſe him to betray them, by whom he was made Emperour: and that he was forced to make war againſt them, with whom he was very loath to ſtrive, and therefore willed them to chuſe a place out of the City for the battel to be fought in: for it ſtood with no reaſon to deface the City with civil wars and maſſacres, for the obſtinancy of ſome few. Agrippa did alſo this meſſage to the Senate: and one of the ſouldiers that were for the Senate drew his ſword, and ſaid; Fellow ſouldiers, what ſhould move us to maſſacre our friends, and kindred, and parents, who follow Claudius? eſpecially, ſeeing we have an Emperour with whom we can find no fault, unto whom we ſhould rather go forth with intreaties; then with arms. When he had ſaid this, he paſſed thorow the midſt of the Court, and all the ſouldiers followed him.

The Senates anſwer to Agrippa.

The Senate, being thus left deſolate, and the Lords abandoned of their forces, began to be in great fear: and ſeeing it was no ſtanding out for them, they followed the ſouldiers, and went to Claudius. Before the City walls there met them ſome that endeavoured to ſhew themſelves dutiful to Claudius for his fortune ſake; having their ſwords drawn, and they almoſt killed five, before Cæſar underſtood the outrage of the ſouldiers: and they had done it, had not Agrippa ran and told him of the matter, ſaying, that if he did not preſently appeaſe the ſouldiers fury, now raging againſt the Citizens, all his Nobility would preſently be extinguiſhed, and he ſhould be left an Emperour of a deſolate place. When Claudius heard this, he repreſſed the ſouldiers fury, and very honourably received the Senate into his camp, and went forth preſently with them, and offered ſacrifice to God (as the manner is) for the good eſtate of the Empire. Alſo, he preſently made Agrippa King of all his fathers dominions, giving him likewiſe that which Auguſtus gave Herod, to wit, Trachonite and Auranite, and beſide them another kingdome, called the kingdome of Lyſania, and publiſhed this his gift, by an Edict unto the people, and commanded the Senate to engrave that donation in brazen Tables, and to place it in the Capital. Moreover, he rewarded his brother Herod, who was his kinſmen, with the kingdome of Chalcis, and married him to the Queen Bernice. Agrippa received greater revenews of his kingdome then he could deſire, which he ſpent not vainly, but in building ſuch a wall about Jeruſalem, as, had he finiſhed it, the Romans could never have taken it: but before he could end that work, he died in Cæſarea, having reigned three years with the title of a King, and other three years before, in the ſtate of a Tetrarch. He left behind him three daughters, which he had by Cypris, Bernice, Mariamme, and Druſilla, and one ſon by the ſame wife, named Agrippa; who, becauſe he was very young, Claudius reduced the kingdome into a Province, and made Ceſtius Feſtus Governour thereof. But after him, Tiberius Alexander, who nothing violating the laws of the nation, ruled them in peace. After this, Herod King of Chalcis departed; leaving behind him two ſons, which he had by his brothers daughter Bernice, to wit, Bernicianus and Hircanus: and by his firſt wife Mariamme, Ariſtobulus. His other brother alſo Ariſtobulus, died a private perſon, leaving one daughter, Jotapata. And theſe were the poſterity of Ariſtobulus, King Herods ſon, and Herod had Alexander and Ariſtobulus by Mariamme, whom he put to death: but Alexanders poſterity reigned in the greater Armenia.

Of divers tumults, in Judea and Samaria.

The year of the world, 4011. after the nativity of Chriſt, 49

After the death of Herod, who reigned in Chalcis, Claudius created Agrippa the ſonne of the former Agrippa, King of Chalcis in his uncles Kingdome: and Cumenus was made Ruler of the other Province after Alexander, under whom there were many tumults, and new calamities, which befell the Jewes. For when they were aſſembled together at the feaſt of unleavened bread in Jeruſalem, the Romane ſouldiers

A diers ſtanding in the porch of the Temple (for alwayes armed men kept that place upon feſtival daies, leſt the people gathered together ſhould make any tumult) one of the ſouldiers taking up his coat, turned his bare buttocks againſt the Jews faces, ſpeaking words as unſeemly as was his geſture. Whereat the whole multitude began to murmure; ſo that they flocked about Cumanus, requeſting him to puniſh the ſouldier for this miſdemeanour: and ſome of them, raſh young men, and as it were prone to ſedition, began to revile the ſouldiers, and threw ſtones at them. Then Cumanus, fearing that the whole multitude of the Jews would violently ruſh upon him, called unto him many armed ſouldiers, and ſent them into the porch of the Temple. The Jews being in great fear fled and left the Temple, and there was ſuch a throng, that as they ruſhed out to flee, above ten thouſand people were preſt and trodden to death: ſo that this feſtival day was turned into wofull lamentations and mournings in every place. This calamity was increaſed afterward by a company of theeves: for near

B Bethoron one Stephanus, ſervant unto Cæſar, carried ſome houſhold ſtuffe, which the theeves took from him in the high way. But Cumanus, ſending for thoſe in the villages next adjoyning, to make enquiry of theſe theeves, commanded them to be bound and brought unto him, becauſe they had not taken the theeves: in one of which villages a certain ſouldier finding the book of the holy Scripture, cut it in pieces and burnt it. Hereupon the Jews gathered themſelves together from all places, as though their religion were now violated: and drawn by the force of their ſuperſtition as with an engine, all of them at one call went to Cæſarea to Cumanus, there beſeeching him, that the ſouldier, who had blaſphemed God and their law, might not eſcape unpuniſhed. But Cumanus perceived, the Jews would not be

At laſt there aroſe a tumult between the Galileans and Samaritanes; for at a village called Geman, ſituate in the great field of Samaria, a certain Galilean, of the number of the Jews that came to the feaſt, was ſlain: for which fact many Galileans ranne to fight with the Samaritanes: and the nobility of the Countrey went unto Cumanus, requeſting him, before any more harm were done, to go into Galilee, and puniſh the authors of this evill. But Cumanus being buſied in greater affairs, ſent them away without granting their requeſt. When this murther was known in Jeruſalem, all the multitude left the ſolemnity of the day, and went

D into Samaria without any guide, refuſing to be reſtrained by the Nobility. Of this their tumult and ſedition the ſonne of Dinæus, called Eleazar, and one Alexander, were Captains; who with violence entring the borders of the countrey of Acrebatena, killed man, woman and child, ſparing no age, and burning the towns. When Cumanus heard this, he took a cornet of horſemen, called the Sebaſtians, to come and help them that were thus oppreſſed, and ſo took and killed many of them who took part with Eleazar. Now the nobles of Jeruſalem came out to the reſt of that multitude, which ſo waſted Samaria, clothed in ſackcloth and aſhes upon their heads, beſeeching them not to ſeek revenge upon the Samaritanes, as thereby to move the Romanes to deſtroy Jeruſalem, and to be merciful to their countrey, the Temple, their wives and children, and not at once hazard all, and overthrow their whole countrey and nation in revenging the death of one Galilean. The Jews hereby were

E pacified, and departed. At the ſame time many conſpired together to rob and ſteal (as moſt commonly people by long peace grow inſolent) ſo that they robb'd in every part of the countrey, and they that were moſt ſtrong and able offered violence to thoſe that were weaker. Then the Princes of Samaria went to Tyre, beſeeching Numidius Quadratus, being Governour of Syria, to revenge them of thoſe that ſo robbed and ſpoiled their Countrey. There was alſo the nobility of the Jews, and Jonathas, the ſonne of Ananus, who was high Prieſt who defended the Jews againſt the Samaritanes accuſation; affirming, the Samaritanes to have been cauſe of that tumult in killing the Galilean: and after, that Cumanus was cauſe of F the reſt of their calamities, who refuſed to puniſh the murtherers. Quadratus for that time ſent away both parties, promiſing them that when he came into their Countries, he would diligently enquire of the matter: and coming from thence to Cæſarea, he crucified all thoſe whom Cumanus took alive. And departing from thence to Lydda, he heard the Samaritanes complaints, and ſent for eighteen men whom he underſtood for certain to have been in that broil, and beheaded them, and ſent the two high Prieſts, Jonathas and Ananias, and his ſonne Ananus, with ſome of the Nobility of the Jews to Cæſar, and alſo the chief of the Samaritanes. He likewiſe commanded Cumanus and Celer the Tribune to go to Rome, and yeeld account unto Claudius for that which they had done in that countrey.

Cæsar at Rome hearing the allegations of Cumanus, and the Samaritanes (Agrippa was also there earnestly defending the cause of the Jews, as also Cumanus was assisted by many potentates) he pronounced sentence against the Samaritanes, and commanded three of their chief Nobility to be put to death, and banished Cumanus, and sent Celer the Tribune bound unto Jerusalem, that the Jews might draw him about the City, and then cut off his head. This done he sent, Fælix brother to Pallas to rule Judæa, Samaria and Galilæa. And he preferred Agripppa from Chalcis to a greater Kingdome, making him King of that Province whereof Philip had been Ruler, to wit, Trachon, Batanæa and Gaulanitis, adding thereunto Lysanias kingdome, and the Tetrarchy whereof Varus was Governour: And having reigned thirteen yeers, eight moneths, and thirty dayes, Claudius departed this life, leaving Nero to succeed him, whom by the perswasions of his wife Agrippina he adopted to the Empire, having a lawfull begotten sonne of his own, named Britannicus, by his former wife Messalina, and a daughter called Octavia, whom he married to Nero: he had also another daughter by Agrippina named Antonia How Nero abused his wealth and felicity, and how he slew his brother, mother, and his wife, and afterward raged against all his kindred, and how in a mad vain he became a player upon a stage, because it requireth a long narration, I will speak nothing thereof.

CHAP. XII.

Of the tumult in Judæa under Fœlix. I

The year of the world, 4018. after Christs Nativity, 56.

WHerefore I will begin to recount what Nero did against the Jews. He made Aristobulus, Herods sonne, King of the lesser Armenia, and joyned unto Agrippas kingdome four cities, and the ground belonging unto them: two of them, Abila and Julias, were in the countrey of Peræa; the other, Tarichæa and Tiberias, were in Galilee: and he made Fælix Governour over the rest of Judæa. This Fælix took Eleazar, Captain of the theeves, after he had robbed and spoiled the Countrey twenty years, and many more with him, and sent them bound to Cæsar: and he crucified a great number of them, who either were theeves, and his confederates, or else such as assisted him. The countrey was no sooner cleansed from these, but presently another sort of theeves arose in Jerusalem, called Sicarii, with short swords, who at high noon in the midst of the city killed many in every K place: and especially at the celebrating of holy feasts they mixt themselves with the multitude, having short swords under their coats, and therewithal killed those to whom they bare any grudge: and when men fell down dead, they among the rest complained of this wickedness. By this deceitfull means they were a long time unsuspected and unknown. And first of all, they killed Jonathan the high Priest, and after him every day some were slain; and the City was put in a fear worse then death it self: for each man every moment expected death, as though it had been amidst open warres: likewise every one cast a diligent eye upon those that came near him; also no man trusted his familiar friends: and yet were they murthered, whilest they were looking about them to escape danger. So cunningly did these theeves cover and conceal their actions. Moreover, there arose another sort of mischievous people, L who did not so much harm with their hands as the first, but with their impious counsel more, and did no lesse trouble the quiet estate of the City then did the theeves. These people being vagabonds and juglers, desiring alteration under pretence of Religion, made the people as it were mad: for they went into the wilderness, affirming, that there God would shew them tokens of their liberty. Fælix perceiving that their action tended to rebellion, sent an army of horse and foot against these people, and killed a great many of them.

But a certain Egyptian, a false Prophet, caused a farre greater Massacre among the Jews then that was: for being a Magician, he came into the Countrey; and calling himself a Prophet, he gathered unto him almost thirty thousand Jews, who were by his Magick arts seduced: and leading them from the wilderness to mount Olivet, he determined from thence to go to Jerusalem, and to drive back the forces of the Romanes, and to use his authority M over the people. He had for his guard those that came to follow him. Fælix foreseeing his intent, met him with his legions of armed Romanes: whom the other Jews assisting, and fighting against him, the Egyptian with a few fled, and many that were with him were taken and committed to prison, and the rest of the multitude dispersed themselves every one in his countrey. These being thus repressed, the other part (as it hapneth in a sick body) began to rise: for some of the Magicians, and the theeves being gathered together, they brought many unto misery, and as it were exhorted them to liberty, threatning present death to those that obeyed

At this time aroſe another tumult at Cæſarea, by a ſedition raiſed between the Jews that dwelt there, and the Syrians. The Jews challenged the City to be theirs, becauſe it was founded by Herod, who was a Jew. But the Syrians denying not but that the builder of the City was a Jew, yet they affirmed that it belonged to the Gentiles: for (ſaid they) it had not been lawful for the Founder to have placed in it ſhrines and ſtatutes, if he had meant that it ſhould have belonged to the Jews. So that hereupon there aroſe a great controverſy among the Jews and Syrians, inſomuch as the one fought againſt the other, and every day thoſe that were the hardieſt of both parts fought together. The Jews overcame them in riches and ſtrength of body, and the Grecians overcame the Jews by help of ſouldiers: for a great company of the Romane army came thither out of Syria, and they were ready to aſſiſt the Syrians, becauſe they were as it were of their kindred and conſanguinity. The Captains of the ſouldiers endeavoured to appeaſe the tumult, and took thoſe that were moſt ſeditious on both parts, and beat them, and caſt them in priſon. But the puniſhment of thoſe that were apprehended, terrified not the reſt: nay, they were hereby made more ſeditious. Furthermore, he did not onely take away by force mens goods from them under colour of Juſtice, and at his own pleaſure exact a greater tribute, but alſo freed and let looſe any one whom either the ſouldiers of the city took, or his predeceſſours had left in priſon, ſo that their friends would give a piece of money, and they onely who were not able to give money, were impriſoned as moſt hainous offenders. At this time, they in Jeruſalem that deſired alteration, began to take courage, and thoſe that were rich among them fee'd Albinus with money, to permit them to be ſeditious, and the common people that could not be in quiet, joyned themſelves with Albinus favourites: and each of them had a troop of theeves after him. goe to him to make any complaint against Florus. But when at the feast of unleavened bread Gallus came to Jerusalem, there met him a multitude of the Jews above 300000. all beseeching him to help and succour their afflicted countrey, and banish Florus who was the very plague of their nation, Yet Florus was so impudent, that being with Gallus, and hearing these cries against him he was no whit moved thereat, but laughed at it. Cestius for that time appeased the people, promising that hereafter he would make Florus more gentle unto them, and so returned to Antiochia. Florus conducted him to Cæsarea to stop his mouth with lies, devising with himself how to make the Jews rebel, and that he thought was the safest means to cloak his villanies: for if they continued in peace and obedience, he feared, that some of them would accuse him before Cæsar: marry, if he could make them revolt, then he hoped that their great fault would shadow his impieties. Wherefore to bring about his purpose, he every day oppressed them with new calamities, forcing them hereby to rebell against the Romanes. At this time the Gentiles of Cæsarea got the victory over the Jews, and brought letters to testifie that decree before Nero. This was the beginning of the wars of the Jews, in the twelfth year of Nero his Empire, and the seventeenth of Agrippas reign, in the moneth of May.

CHAP. XIIII.

Florus had no just cause for any of these calamities which he inflicted upon the Jews. The Jews dwelling at Cæsarea, had a Synagogue near a piece of ground that belonged to a Gentile dwelling in Cæsarea. The Jews often sought to compound with him for that piece of ground, offering him farre more then it was worth: but the Landlord of the soyl did not onely contemn their request, but also to their great grief in that place built Tavernes; so that he left them a very streight and narrow passage to go to their Synagogue. Some young men among the Jews, being very zealous, resisted the workmen, and would not suffer them to build. Florus, hearing this, commanded the Jews to let the workmen go forward in their work. The Jews not knowing what to do, especially one John, a Publican, offered Florus eight talents to hinder the building: he promised for that money to fulfil their request: and now having it, he presently departed from Cæsarea, and went to Sebaste without performing any thing, giving as it were occasion of sedition, and as though he had received money of the Nobility of the Jews to permit them to fight a certain time. The next day, which was the Jews Sabbath, when they were all assembled to go to the Synagogue, one of Cæsarea a seditious person, took a great earthen vessell, and set it even at the entry into the Synagogue, and upon it did offer birds. This fact so moved the Jews that they would not be pacified, because it was done in contempt of their religion, and thereby the place was profaned. One part of the Jews that was most modest and wisest, counselled the Jews to complain to them that were in authority: but those who for heat of youth were prone to sedition, began contumeliously to revile their adversaries. For the most seditious of the people of Cæsarea were also prepared to fight with them, and had caused that to be done before the Synagogue, onely to pick a quarrel, and so they fought together. Jucundus, General of the horsemen, that was left to keep all in quiet, presently came with souldiers, and commanded that vessel to be taken away, and so endeavoured to appease the tumult: but not being able to do it through the violence of them of Cæsarea; the Jews took the books of their law, and retired themselves to a place called Narbata, belonging to them, which was distant from Cæsarea threescore furlongs. Twelve of the chief of them, together with John the Publican, went unto Florus, being at Sebaste, to complain of the injury done unto them, requesting him to assist them, and modestly put him in mind of the eight talents they gave him. But he presently commanded them to be bound and imprisoned, because they had presumed to take and carry their law from Cæsarea. Hereat those of Jerusalem were greatly moved, yet they shewed it not. Florus, as upon set purpose giving occasion of rebellion, sent for seventeen talents out of the sacred treasury, pretending that it was to be employed in Cæsars affairs. At this the people was much troubled, calling and crying upon the name of Cæsar, praying that he would deliver them from Florus his tyranny. Some of them being seditious, began to curse Florus bitterly, and took a basket, and carried it about, and begged an almes for Florus, which they did in derision, as who should say, he were as miserable as beggars that have nothing. Florus for all this, left not his avarice, but was more earnest to rob the inhabitants of their goods. So that when he should

The people to pacifie his wrath, went out in courteous ſort to meet the army, ſhewing themſelves ready to give them the beſt entertainment they could, and to receive Florus with all honour and reverence. Florus underſtanding of them, ſent before him one Capito a Centurion, with fifty horſmen; commanding them to depart, and not to mock him with a pretence of honour, whom they had ſo hainouſly abuſed. And that if they were as good as their words, they ſhould flout and reproach him to his face; and not onely in words; but in B deeds ſhew, that they deſired liberty. Herewithal, the multitude being terrified, and alſo that the horſemen that came with Capito aſſaulted them with violence; every one fled before they ſaluted Florus, or did their accuſtomed duty unto the army: and going every one unto his houſe, they paſt the watchfull night in fear and ſorrow. Florus for that night lodged in the Kings palace. The next day he cauſed a tribunal openly to be placed, and the high Prieſt and all the chief of the Jews reſorted thither and ſtood before the tribunall. Then Florus ſitting in the tribunall ſeat, commanded them to bring forth preſently all thoſe, that had uſed any opprobious words againſt him, threatning to be revenged on them except they did it. The Iews made anſwer, that the people intended nothing but peace and quietneſſe, requeſting that they that had offended in words, might obtain pardon. For it was no marvell C in ſo great a multitude, if there were ſome raſh and fooliſh young men: and that it was unpoſſible to diſcern all that offended, ſeeing every one was now penitent for that which was done, and at leaſt for fear would deny it; and that if he were carefull to conſerve and maintain the quietneſſe of the nation, and preſerve the city ſtill to obey the Romanes, he then muſt rather pardon a few ſeditious for ſo many good mens ſake; then to revenge himſelf of a few wicked perſons, to hurt and moleſt ſo many that thought no harm. Hereat Florus wrath was increaſed, and preſently he commanded the ſouldiers to ſack the market place (which was the higher part of the City) where things were ſold, and put all they met, or found unto the ſword. The ſouldiers who were deſirous of gain, having now authority from their Ruler, did not onely ſack the place they were ſent unto, but alſo all houſes, and murthered the D inhabitants. All ſtreets and gates were filled with them that ſought to flie, and the dead bodies of them that did light into the ſouldiers hands: no ſort of ſpoyling was omitted. They alſo apprehended many of the Nobility, and brought them to Florus: and he cauſing them to be whipt, afterward hanged them up. And there were ſlain that day, of men, women and children (for they ſpared not infants) ſix hunded and thirty. Which did not afflict the Jews ſo much, as to ſee the ſudden cruelty and tyranny of the Romans; Florus then doing that none before durſt ever preſume to do: for he cauſed Knights before the tribunal ſeat to be whipped, and after hanged them up, who though they were Jews born, yet received they that dignity from the Romanes.

AT the ſame time King Agrippa was gone to Alexandria, to entertain Alexander, whom Nero ſent to be Ruler over Egypt; his ſiſter Bernice in the mean while remained in Jeruſalem, who ſeeing the cruelty of the ſouldiers, was much grieved: and often ſent the Leiutenants of their horſemen, and her own guard unto Florus, requeſting him to abſtain from the ſlaughter of the Citizens. But he neither regarding the multitude of them that were ſlain, nor the dignity of her that intreated, but onely his private gain, and what he could gather by oppreſſion and rapine, denied her requeſt: ſo that the rage of the ſouldier extended it ſelf alſo againſt the Queen. For they did not onely before F her face beat and kill all that came in their way, but they had alſo killed her, had ſhe not fled into the palace, where ſhe watcht all night, keeping a truſty guard about her, fearing that the ſouldiers would break in upon her. She came to Jeruſalem to fulfil her vow to God: for it is the cuſtome, that if any be afflicted with grievous ſickneſſe, or be in any other diſtreſſe, they muſt abide in prayer thirty dayes before they offer ſacrifice, and abſtain from wine, and ſhave their heads; which cuſtome Queen Bernice then obſerving, ſtood alſo barefoot before Florus his tribunal ſeat, to entreat him: whom he not onely contemned, but alſo put her in danger of life. This was done the 16. day of May. The day after, the multitude gathered together in the upper part of the City in the market place, and with great cries murmured that so many were slain, and especially used contumelious words against Florus: which the Nobility and high Priests (fearing their deaths) apprehended, beseeching them to abstain from such words as had already caused that calamity in the city, and not to provoke Florus unto greater indignation. And so the multitude was pacified for their sakes who entreated, and hoped that hereafter Florus would desist from such cruelty. Florus, when he saw the multitude quieted, was sorry: and that he might again provoke them, he assembled together the Nobility and high Priests, telling them that it would be an argument that the people did not seek alteration any more, if they would go in courteous wise, and meet the souldiers which were coming from Cæsarea, whereof were two legions. Having thus assembled the Iews together to go meet the souldiers; he also sent and commanded the Centurions not to salute the Iews, who came to meet them: and if therefore the Iews were offended, and gave any hard speeches, they should fall upon them with their weapons. The high Priests assembling the Jews together in the Temple; besought them to go, and solemnly to meet and entertain the souldiers, for fear of a greater inconvenience. Notwithstanding their counsell, those that were seditious, refused to do as they were requested: and others for grief of them that were slain, took part with the seditious.

Florus renewed the discontents of the people. Florus subtilty and treason.

The exhortation of the Priests and Princes to the people.

Then all the Priests, and Levites brought forth the holy vessels, and ornaments of the Temple, and with Harps songs, and musicall instruments came before the multitude, beseeching them to endeavour, that the honour and pomp of the Temple might still remain, and not to incite the Romanes through contumelious words to sack the Temple. There might you see the chief of the high Priests with ashes upon their heads, and clothes rent, so that their naked breasts were perceived; and calling every Nobleman by his name, and speaking to all the multitude, requested them not for a small offence, to betray their whole countrey to them, who still gaped after the destruction thereof. For what commodity should the Romanes reap by the Iews salutation, and what amendment of their miseries could they expect, if they did not go to meet them? Contrariwise, if they would go to them in solemn sort, then they took from Florus all occasion of Persecution, and saved their countrey from ruin, and themselves from further calamities. Adding that it was a great shame, that such a multitude should be led away with a few seditious persons, and that it was more fit that so many should force those few seditious people to obey them, and joyn with them in opinion.

The event sheweth Florus intent and counsell. The slaughter of the Iews.

With these perswasions they did mollifie the malice of the Iews, and also perswade many of the seditious people, some with threats, and some with reverence of themselves to be pacified, And so they going before, all the people followed, and went out to meet the Romane souldiers. And coming neer them they saluted them: who answering nothing again, those of the Iews that were seditious began to rail against Florus, by whose consent this was done: and presently the souldiers apprehending them, did beat them with clubs; and the rest flying, the Romane horsemen pursued them, and trode upon them with their horses. Many were slain by the Romanes, and more were killed in the throng, one of them tumbling upon another. There was a great throng in the gates of the City: for every one hasting and striving to get in, hindred themselves and others. Many died most miserably in that throng, and some were stifled, and some prest to death being trodden upon; so that their neighbours coming to bury them, could not know them. The souldiers also cruelly assaulted them, killing all that they could come unto, and forced the people to go in by the entrance called Bezetha, who desired to recover the Temple and the Castle called Antonia.

The seditious for fear lest Florus should seize their spoyles, fly to the Temple. Florus taketh the spoyles and entreth the Temple Florus seeing the Jews inexpugnable in the Temple. surceaseth his violence, and leaving a band behind him, goeth to Cæsarea Florus taking the souldiers with him, pursued them thither, striving to get the Castle; yet did he not prevail: for the people made resistance, and threw down stones from the house top, and killed many of the Romanes: who being overcome with darts cast from aloft, and could not resist the people, who on every side came against them, retired themselves unto the rest of the army at the Kings palace. Those that were seditious, fearing that Florus would again assault them, and by the Castle Antonia make an entrance into the Temple, they got upon the galleries that reached from the porch of the Temple unto Antonia, and beat them down, hereby to represse the covetousnesse of Florus, who greedily gaped after the sacred treasure, and strived to enter by Antonia into the Temple to take them: but seeing the porches beaten down, he offered no more violence. And calling together the high Priests and Nobility, he said that he was content to depart out of the city, but he would leave them as great a garrison as they would request. Whereunto they answered that nothing should be altred, if he would leave one company to keep all quiet: so he left not that, which a while before did fight against the people, because that the people would not easily brook them, for that which they had suffered at their hands. So Florus as he requested, changing the garrison with the rest of the army, departed to Cæsarea.

CHAP. XVI.

Of Politianus the Tribune, and how Agrippa made a speech unto the Jews, exhorting them to obey the Romanes.

The year of the world, 4030. after Christs Nativity, 68.

FLorus yet deviſed another way to ſtirre the Iews to rebellion: for he reported unto Ceſtius that the Iews were revolted, impudently belying them to have committed, that which indeed they endured at his hands. The nobles of Ieruſalem and Bernice certified Ceſtius of all that Florus had done: he receiving letters from both parties, delibe-
B rated with his nobles what to do. Some counſelled Ceſtius to go into Iudæa with an army, and puniſh the Iews, if they were revolted; and if they were not, then to confirm them in their obedience. Yet it pleaſed him better to ſend ſome about him thither before, to bring him true news of their eſtate, and what had hapned. So he ſent Politianus the tribune, who in his way met with Agrippa about Iamnia as he returned from Alexandria, and told him all, for what, and from whom he was ſent. Where alſo were preſent the Prieſt and the chief of the Iews, to welcome Agrippa, and having ſalured him as courteouſly as they could, they preſently bewayled the miſery which had befalne their nation, and the cruelty of Florus. Which although Agrippa diſallowed, yet made as if he were angry with the Iews whom he greatly pitied, purpoſing hereby to bridle their affections; that they perſwaded, that they that had no injury, might abſtain from revenge. So that all the better ſort, who for their lands and livings deſired quietneſſe, well perceived that the Kings reprehenſion was not of malice, but
C for their good.

Ceſtius Gallus. Preſident of Syria conſulteth with the Princes what were beſt to be done. Politianus is ſent to Ieruſalem, and meets with Agrippa.

The people of Ieruſalem went out to meet them threeſcore furlongs off, and received Agrippa and Politianus very courteouſly, yet the women lamented the death of their huſbands ſlain, and with their tears moved the whole multitude to ſorrow, who beſought Agrippa to have compaſſion on their nation; entreating alſo Politianus to go into the City, and behold what Florus had done: And ſo they ſhewed him the market place deſart, and the houſes deſtroyed, and by the means of Agrippa perſwaded Politianus to go round about the city as far as Siloa, onely with one man, and behold with his eyes what Florus had done, and
D that they were obedient to the Romanes in all things, and onely were enemies unto Florus who had uſed them ſo cruelly. Politianus having gone about the whole city, aſcended into the Temple, well perceiving many arguments of the Jews fidelity towards the Romanes: and calling the people there together, he praiſed their loyalty, and exhorted them ſtill to continue in like obedience, and worſhipped God and his rites, as farre as the law permitted him: and ſo he returned unto Ceſtius. The multitude of the Iews came to Agrippa, and the high Prieſts, requeſting them to ſend Embaſſadours againſt Florus unto Nero, and not to give an argument of rebellion, by not complaining of ſuch murthers: for Florus would make him beleeve that they had rebelled, except they went unto him to ſhew that Florus gave firſt occaſion; and it was certain that the multitude would not be quieted, if any one hindered that Embaſſage. Hereupon Agrippa thought that it would be an hatefull matter, to ſend Embaſſadours to Rome to accuſe Florus; and on the other part he perceived, that it was to no
E purpoſe to contradict the Iews, who were ready now to rebell: wherefore calling the people together, he made a ſpeech unto them, and ſeated his ſiſter Bernice in an eminent place in the houſe of the Aſmonæans. The porch wherein he called them together, was in ſuch a place that it overlookt all the higher part of the city, for there was onely a bridge between it and the Temple, which joyned the Temple and it together, and there ſpake he unto the Iews in manner following: "If I had perceived that you were bent to fight againſt the Ro-
"manes, or that the better part of the people were not inclined to peace, neither would I have "come unto you, nor have preſumed to have counſelled you in any thing. For it is in vain to "begin to declare unto you who you are, and against whom ye purpose to bear arms, I will G

"first divide, and separate such causes as you think inseparable. For if you seek onely to re"venge your selves upon those that have injured you, why do you then so extol liberty: or if "you think it not tolerable to obey any other; why then, these complaints against your rulers
"are superfluous. For although they were never so mild, still would subjection be intolerable.
"Call all things to mind, and consider what a small cause of war is given you. And first of all
"weigh with your selves, the crimes and offences of your Rulers: for you ought to shew your "selves humble, and dutifull to them that are in authority, and not exasperate, and provoke "them to wrath by reproachfull speeches. For in reviling them for small offences; you do in"cite them against you, whom you so revile: and that whereas before they did onely do you a "little injury, and that secretly, now being moved with bad speeches, they openly set upon
"you and destroy you. And there is nothing that so restraineth cruelty as patience; so that H
"oft-times the patience of them who have suffered injury, makes them that did the injury "ashamed thereof. Be it so, that they, which are sent into the Provinces, and appointed by the "Romanes for your Governours, are irksome to you, yet all the Romans do not oppress you, "nor Cæsar, against whom you would take armes. For they command no cruel Governours to "come to you, nor can they who are in the furthest part of the west, easily know what is done "in the East, nor hear thereof. And truely it is a thing most against reason to take arms for so "small a cause, especially, when they against whom you take arms, know nothing of the mat"ter. It is an easie way quickly to have redresse for these matters you now complain of. For
"there will not be alwayes the same Governour; and it is credible, that they who succeed this, "will be more gentle and courteous. But if you once begin to make war, it is not easie to end
"it, or sustain it without great calamities. And let them who so thirst after liberty, diligently I "advise themselves, that they do not bring upon their backs a greater bondage. For slavery "is a cruell thing, and it seemeth a lawfull cause to make warre, lest you be brought into it:
"yet he that is already in bondage and revolteth, is rather a perverse slave, then one who de-"sireth liberty. You should therefore have endeavoured to have resisted the Romanes, when "first Pompeius entred into this Land: but then our ancestors, and their kings farre exceeding
"you in riches, strength of body and courage, were not able to withstand a small part of the "Romane forces; and do you think who are their successours, and farre weaker then they,
"having succeeded them in subjection, that you are able to resist all the whole power of the "Romanes?

A nians do, who have greater cauſe then you to ſeek their liberty? What ſhall I ſay of the fifty cities of Aſia? do they not obey all one ruler, and the authority of the Conſul, without any garriſon? What ſhall I ſpeak of the Eniochians, Colchians, the people of Taurus, the inhabitants of Helleſpontus, and Pontus, and about Mæotis, who in times paſt had no Ruler of their own nation, whom now three thouſand ſouldiers keep in aw, and fourty long Gallies keep now peacably thoſe ſeas, never ſailed on before? What think you, the Bythinians, Cappadocians, and thoſe of Pamphilia, Lydia, and Cilicia, could ſay for their liberty, who notwithſtanding now peaceably pay tribute unto the Romanes? What of the Thracians? whoſe countrey is five dayes journey in breadth, and ſeven in length, far more hard and
B ſtronger then your countrey, where froſt would hinder them that ſhould aſſault them, yet do they obey two thouſand Romanes, who are in garriſon. After them the Illyrians, whoſe countrey reacheth unto Dalmatia, and Iſther, are kept in obedience onely by two legions, with help of whom they alſo reſiſt the Dacians. The Dalmatians themſelves, who having ſo often attempted their own liberty, being oftentimes conquered, and ſtill as their wealth increaſed, rebelling, are now in peace under one legion of the Romanes. Nay, if any one have cauſe to rebel, it is the Frenchmen, whoſe countrey is by nature of the place ſtrong, being on the Eaſt ſide compaſſed on the Alpes, on the North with the River of Rhene, on the South, with the Pyrenæan mountains, on the Weſt with the Ocean. Who notwithſtanding, having amongeſt them three hundred and five nations, who have amongſt them as it were the very fountain of felicity, and with their goods and commodities inrich the
C whole world: yet do they pay tribute unto the Romanes, and account their happineſſe to be builded upon the felicity of the Romanes, and that neither for want of courage nor nobility of blood, who fourſcore years long fought for their liberty; admiring the Romanes and fearing them, who ſtill gained more by fortune, then they did by warres: and now obey a thouſand and two hundred ſouldiers, having almoſt againſt every ſouldier a Citie.

Neither could the Spaniards, though gold grew in their countrie, keep themſelves from being ſubject to the Romanes. Nor the Portugals and the warlike Cantabrians, for all the diſtance of ſea and land between them and Rome. The Ocean, whoſe waves beating againſt the ſhoar, terrifieth the inhabitants adjoyning, could not ſtay them but they paſt it: and car-D ried an army beyond the pillars of Hercules, and paſſed the tops of the Pyrenæan montaines, which reach unto the clouds, and ſo made all thoſe people ſubject unto them: and for all that they were ſo warlike a nation, and ſo farre from Rome, they left onely one legion for garriſon. Which of you have not heard of the multitude of the Germanes? whoſe virtue and mightie bodies I think you have often ſeen. For in every countrie the Romanes have them for captives: yet they whoſe countrie is ſo large, having hearts far bigger then their bodies, and ſouls that contemn death, who are more cruel then brute beaſts; yet are they now limitted by the river Rhene, and kept in ſubjection by eight legions of Romanes; and thoſe that were taken were made ſlaves, and the reſt choſe rather to ſave themſelves by flight then fight. And you who have ſuch confidence in the walls of Jeruſalem, conſider the E walls of Britaine; whoſe countrey though compaſſed with the Ocean, and almoſt as great as our whole world, the Romanes ſayling in it, have conquered, and four legions keep that Iſland ſo populous. What ſhould I ſay more, when the Parthians, a moſt warlike people, who lately reigned over ſo many nations, and abound in ſo much wealth, are now compelled to ſend pleadges to Rome? Nay, you may ſee all the Nobilitie of the Eaſt at Rome, who with peace ſhadow their captivity; and almoſt all the nations under the Sunne trembling and dreading the Romane puiſſance: and will you onely war againſt them? Do you not conſider what befell the Carthaginians, who boaſting themſelves of that great Hanibal, ſprung from the noble race of the Phœnicians, at laſt were deſtroyed by Scipio? Neither could the Cyrenæans, who took their beginning from the Lacedemonians, nor all the race of the mar-
F maridans, which extended as far as the Deſarts (which are very ſcarce of waters) nor the Syrtes, nor the Naſamonians, nor the Moors, nor the innumerable multitude of the Numidians, have been able to reſiſt the power of the Romanes; who by force of armes have conquered the third part of the world, the nations whereof can hardly be numbred, which from the Sea Atlantick and Hercules pillars unto the Red Sea, containeth an infinite company of Æthiopians, and innumerable habitations of them: who beſides that they pay ſo much fruits and corn unto the Romanes, as for eight moneths in every year will keep and ſuſtain all the people of Rome do alſo pay tribute; and moreover aſſiſt them any way they can, and never murmure at it, as you do; and there is onely one legion left to keep them in obedience. But what ſhould I need to tell you of forreign examples, to ſignifie unto you the power of the manes, seing you may well perceive it, by that they did in Ægypt, hard by: which reaching unto Æthiopia and rich Arabia, and bordering upon India, having under it seven hundreth and fifty millions of people, besides the inhabitants of Alexandria (which is easie to be counted, by the tribute which is paid of every person by the Poul, living in their countrey, yet disdain not to live under the dominion of the Romanes, notwithstanding that they have a great enticement to rebell, to wit, Alexandria, which is both populous and very rich, in length thirty furlongs, in breadth ten, and payes more tribute in a moneth, then you do in a whole year; and besides their money, finde all Rome with corn four moneths in the year: and it is on every side compassed about either with a waste wilderneſſe, by which none can passe; or the fierce sea, which is boundlesse; or with great and strong rivers, or muddy and durty quagmires, and marish-grounds: all which little availed them to withstand the force of the Romanes. For two legions onely placed in the City, keep all the great countrey of Egypt, and the Nobility of Macedon in aw.

What associates will you have from some countrey not inhabited, to aid you against the Romanes? For all those that at this day dwell in any place of the world that is inhabited, obey the Romanes. Except peradventure some of you hope for help from beyond Euphrates, thinking that your countrey men of Adiabena will help you: but they will not entangle themselves in these dangerous wars, for an unreasonable cause; or if they would consent to so dishoneſt a deed, the Parthians will not suffer them. For they are careful to maintain their league with the Romanes, and would think it violated, if any under their dominions should war against them. It remaineth then, that you must onely trust that God will help you; but God doth assist the Romanes: for it is unpossible that such an Empire should continue without the help of God. Consider that this contempt of religion, although you were to warre against far weaker then your selves, yet were it hard to be dispensed with all; and it may so come to passe, that, that whereby you hope to make God your partaker, thereby you may make him your enemy: for if you observe the custome of Sabbaths, and in them do nothing, it will not be hard to conquer you. For so your ancestors have made experience by Pompeius, who ever deferred all his enterprizes untill that day, wherein his enemies were idle, and made no resistance. Now if in war ye transgresse your countrey laws, I know not then for what you should rebell, For truly all of you at this time are of that mind, that your country laws will not be changed. And I pray you how will you request help at Gods hands if wilfully ye break his laws? All that begin war, either trust in humane riches, or Divine succour; and they that war, having no probability to hope for any of these wilfully lead themselves into open captivity. What letteth you every man with his own hands to butcher his wife and children, and from consuming this goodly countrey with fire? For so you shall gain this, not to abide the shame of a conquest. It is good, O friends, it is good, whilest yet the ship is in the Haven, to foresee and provide for future tempests, and not then begin to fear, when you are amidst the waves and surges of the sea. They who fall into misery not fore-seen, are worthy to receive compassion: but they that run into wilfull calamity deserve no pity, but reproach. Unlesse perhaps ye think that the Romanes will fight with you, as you will condition, and that if they overcome you, they will not use you hardly, nor fire and destroy this sacred City, and all the whole nation as they have done others. If ye be overcome, who so escapeth unkilled, can have no place of refuge: for all nations either are already subject unto the Romanes, or fear that they shall be shortly. So that not onely you shall be in danger, but also all cities wherein any Jews remain. For there is no nation nor people in the whole world, among whom some of your countrey are not, who all shall be most cruelly put to death if you rebell: and for the wicked counsell of a few men, all Cities shall flow with blood of the Jews; and no man shall be punished for killing Jews, because of your offence. And if the Romanes do not execute all this outrage after your rebellion, then think how impious a thing it is, to rebell against so milde Governours. Take compassion, if not of your children and wives, yet at the least of this City, which is the mother City of all your nation. Spare these holy walls, and sacred Temple, and keep unto your selves the law and sacred things of the Temple: assure your selves that if the Romanes again overcome you, they will not spare these things, seeing you were no more gratefull unto them, for preserving them before. I protest before God, your holy Temple, and all the Angels of heaven, and our whole countrey, that I have kept back no counsel, which I think profitable for you. Now if you consider of those things which are profitable for you, ye shall live with me in peace: but if you follow your private affections, I will not be partaker of the miseries, and dangers, you thrust your selves into. When he had thus spoken, he wept, his sister Bernice standing by him, and by his tears mitigated a great part of their fury. Then they cryed that they Agrippa protesteth that he had omitted no counsel that he thought expedient for the Jews.

A they meant not to bear armes againſt the Romanes and Cæſar, but againſt Florus, for the injury he had done them. To this Agrippa anſwered, But your deeds ſhew that you fight againſt the Romanes: for you have not paid your tribute to Cæſar, and you have burned the porches belonging unto Antonia; now if you would hide your rebellion, repair with ſpeed the porches, and pay your tribute; for this fort belongeth not to Florus, nor the money. Herewith the people were content: and aſcending into the Temple with Agrippa and Bernice, they began to reedifie the porches, and the Nobility and Captains gathered the tribute in every village, and quickly brought fourty talents (for ſo much money was behinde.) And thus Agrippa appeaſed the beginning of theſe wars. After this he began to perſwade the people to obey Florus, till ſuch time as another were ſent to ſupply his place. Herewith B the multitude was ſo moved, that they contumeliouſly reviled the King, and threw ſtones at him, and drave him out of the Citie. The King ſeeing that their ſedition would not be quieted, complaining of the injurie done unto him, ſent the Nobilitie and all the Potentates to Florus, who was at Cæſarea, that he might chuſe whom he would amongſt them to gather the tribute thorow the whole countrie. And ſo he departed into his own kingdome.

Of the rebellion of the Jewes begun againſt the Romanes.

C AT this time ſome of the chiefeſt rebels aſſembled together, ſuddenly to aſſault a Caſtle called Maſſada, which at unawares they took, and killed all the Romanes, and in their places put a guard of their own companie. In the Temple alſo, Eleazar, ſonne of the high Prieſt Ananias, a bold and deſperate young man, Captain of the ſouldiers, perſwaded them who offered ſacrifices, not to offer any, but thoſe that were given by the Jewes. And this was the ground and cauſe of the wars that enſued. For they rejected Cæſars ſacrifices, that were wont to be offered for the good of the Romanes. And although the high Prieſts and people of account requeſted them not to omit that ceſtome of ſacrificing for their Kings and Governours, yet they refuſed ſo to do, truſting greatly to their faction; all the ſtrength of the Citie that deſired alteration, were of their D minds, and eſpecially Eleazar, who at that time was General as is before ſaid. Wherefore all the Potentates, high Prieſts, and chiefeſt of the Phariſees aſſembled themſelves; and perceiving into how great dangers thoſe rebells brought the Citie, they determined to make trial of the courage of the ſeditious people: wherefore they aſſembled them together before the brazen gate, which was in the inner part of the Temple toward the Eaſt. And " firſt of all, they greatly complained of their raſh and unadviſed rebellion, and that they " ſought to ſtirre up ſo great warres againſt their countrie, inveighing againſt the cauſe that " moved them thereto, as being without reaſon: telling them that their anceſtors for the moſt " part adorned the Temple with the gifts of Gentiles; never refuſing the offerings of " ſtrangers; and not onely not to have refuſed their offerings (for that were an impious fact) " but alſo placed in the Temple the gift that they ſent, which were yet to be ſeen. And that " E now onely to provoke the Romanes to war, and denounce it againſt them, they began to " alter Religion: and beſides other dangers alſo, to make the Citie ſeeme guilty of impietie; " as though it were ſuch a one, wherein none might offer ſacrifice but Jews, nor any but they; adore God. If we ſhould make ſuch a law againſt any private perſon, he had juſt cauſe to accuſe us of inhumanitie. But now the Romanes were deſpiſed, and Cæſar himſelf accounted prophane: and is was to be feared, that if the Jewes diſdained to accept of Cæſars offerings, Cæſar would hinder them from offering any: And that the Citie of Jeruſalem would " preſently be accounted as an enemy to the Empire, unleſſe they preſently accepted Cæſars " ſacrifice; and before ſuch time as they heard theſe news againſt whom this outrage was at-F tempted. And having thus ſpoken they brought forth the moſt learned amongſt the Prieſts " to recount from time to time how their anceſtors had alwaies accepted of the ſacrifices of " ſtrangers.

Againſt thoſe who refuſe forrain ſacrifices.

But none of the rebells gave ear unto any thing that was ſaid, and the Levites came not to ſerve at the Altar; as now preparing for war. When the Nobilitie ſaw that they could not appeaſe this ſedition, and that they themſelves ſhould firſt feel the Romanes power, they deviſed all means to pacifie the tumult, and ſend ſome as Ambaſſadors unto Florus: the chief whereof was Simon, the ſon of Ananias: other ſome were ſent to Agrippa, of which the nobleſt was Saulus, Antipas and Coſtobarus, who were alſo a kinne unto the King, requeſting them both to come with an army into the city, and ſuppreſſe the ſedition which was raised, before it went further. Florus was glad of these tidings, and desiring nothing more then war, gave no answer to the Ambassadors. But Agrippa willing to spare both parts, as well the good, as the rebels, and to preserve the Jews from the Romanes, and the Temple for the Jewes, considering it not meet for him to busie himself in such affairs, sent 3000. horsemen to aid the people against the rebels. Which horsemen were of Auranitis, Batanæa and Trachon, and made Darius their Captain, and Philip, son of Joachim, General of all the army. These coming into the Citie, the Nobility with the high Priests and the rest of the people that desired peace, received this succour in good part; and occupied the higher part of the citie; for the rebels kept the lower part, and the Temple: so that they instantly fought with darts aud slings, and shooting of arrows; and sometime one rushing upon another suddenly they skirmished together. The seditious were more valiant, but the Kings souldiers were more skilful in wars; who chiefly endeavoured to get the Temple, and expell out of it those who prophaned it. And the rebels with Eleazar endeavoured beside that which they had already, to get also into their hands the higher part of the city. Wherefore during the space of seven dayes, there continued a great conflict betwixt them, and either part kept that they had. When the celebration of the feast came, called Xylophoria, wherein every one carrieth wood to the Temple, to keep a fire continually upon the Altar; the rebels would not suffer their enemies to do their devotion.

War in Jerusalem between the seditious and those that favoured peace

Xylophoria a feast.

Now many of the theeves, who carried poyniards under their coats, went amongst the weaker multitude, and boldly followed their old practice. The Kings souldiers were overcome, and forced to leave the higher part of the city: and the rebels presently coming in set the Palaces of Ananias, Agrippa, and Bernice on fire, and forthwith went to the place where all the charters were kept, purposing there to burn all bonds and obligations of debters; thereby to defraud the creditors, and so to joyn all the debters with their faction, and stir up all the poor people against the rich. But the keepers of these publike writtings fleeing, the seditious persons set all on fire: and so having destroyed as it were the strength of the city, they addressed themselves against such as resisted their proceedings. Some of the high Priests and nobles hid themselves in vaults; others fleeing with the Kings souldiers into the higher Palace of the King, soon lockt up the doors after them; amongst whom was Ananias the high Priest, and Ezekias his brother, and they who (as is before spoken) were sent Ambassadors to Agrippa: and so the seditious were satisfied that day with the victory, and firing of the houses aforesaid.

The Kings souldiers are overcome.

The next day, which was the fifteenth of August, they assaulted the Castle Antonia: and besieging it two dayes, they took all that guarded it and killed them; and placed in it a Garrison of their own company. This done, they went unto the Kings Palace whither Agrippas souldiers were fled: and dividing their company into four parts, they began to cast down the wals: none of them that were within durst come out for fear of the multitude, but went up to the turrets of the Palace, and killed all those that offered to come up, and many of the theeves under the wals, with things that they cast down. This conflict continued day and night; for the rebels thought that those which were within could not hold out for want of victuals: and they within thought that the seditious being wearied would soon give over. In the mean season, one Manahemus, the son of Judas of Galilæa (that most crafty and subtill sophister, who reviled the Jews in Cyrenius time for paying tribute, and would be subject to any but to God) taking with him certain Nobles, went unto Massada, where King Herods armory was, and breaking into it, he armed the common people and other theeves; and having them for his guard he returned again to Jerusalem as King: and when he was made Prince of that sedition, he disposed of the battery of the fortresses. But they wanted Engines, neither could they openly undermine the wals of the adversaries, who continually cast down darts: wherefore, they began a myne a great way off, till it came under one of the towers which was supported by posts of wood, and they set fire on the wood supportting it, and went their way: so the supporters being consumed with fire, the tower presently fell down, and there appeared a very high wall within. For these within, perceiving their adversaries intent, perhaps by the shaking of that tower, presently builded this wall to keep out the rebels between them and it. The seditious, verily thinking that with the fall of the tower they should be victorius, when they saw another wall were amazed. And the Kings souldiers were sent unto Manahemus, and others that were chief of the rebels, requesting them to have licence to depart. Which Manahemus onely granted to the Kings souldiers, and those of his own countrey, who presently accepting thereof departed, and so left the Romanes in great fear. For they were not able to resist so great a multitude, and they thought it a shame to intreat that they might depart, thinking that it were dangerous for them, although it were granted. Wherefore leaving the lower place which was called Stratopedon, because it might easily

A easily be taken, they fled into the Kings towers, whereof one was called Hippicos, the other Phaſa'us, the third Mariamme. The rebels that were with Manahemus brake preſently into the lower part that the Romanes had forſaken, and kild all that they found there, and when they had ſackt it, they ſet it on fire: And this was done the ſixth day of September.

Of the death of Ananias the high Prieſt, Manahemus and the Romane ſouldiers.

B THe next day following, Ananias the high Prieſt was taken in one of the water Conduits of the Kings Palace, where he hid himſelf, and was there kild with his brother Ezechias by theſe theeves: and the rebels beſieged all the towers round about, and kept diligent watch, leſt any of the Romanes ſhould eſcape. But Manahemus, both for his good ſucceſſe in deſtroying the ſtrong holds, as alſo with the death of Ananias the high Prieſt, became proud and cruel: and thinking none ſo wiſe as himſelf, in thoſe affairs, became an intolerable tyrant. Now two of Eleazars companions roſe up and communed together, that it did not become them that rebelled againſt the Romanes (onely to recover their liberty) that they ſhould be traitors thereof to their own companions, who were of the ſame condition, and that they ſhould endure a King or Lord over them, who although he be no ſevere man, yet he was of more abject and baſe condition then they. If it were C ſo, that it were expedient to have one Ruler over all the reſt, they had rather have any one then Manahemus: and being thus agreed, they ſet upon him in the Temple, where he was praying with great pompe, apparelled like a King, and having about him a guard of his friends in armour. Now when Eleazar his followers ſet upon Manahemus, the people did alſo throw ſtones at him, and ſo ſtoned him, hoping that by his death the ſedition would be extinguiſhed. The guard of Manahemus at firſt made ſome reſiſtance; but when they perceived the whole multitude againſt them, every one ſhifted for himſelf as he could, & thoſe that were taken were put to death, and they that eſcaped were afterward ſought for: onely a few of them fled to Maſſada, amongſt whom was Eleazar, the ſon of Iairas, the ſon of Manahemus kinſman, and afterward in Maſſada became a tyrant. D But Manahemus fled into a place called Ophias, where he baſely hid himſelf: and being taken, he was drawn out from thence, and after many torments put to death, and with him all the Nobility that had aſſiſted him, as alſo Abſalomon, who was his onely helper. And in this matter (as I have ſaid) the people greatly helped, hoping hereby to have ſome end of that ſedition. But the Rebels did not kill Manahemus, to the end to extinguiſh ſedition, but to the intent to rob and ſpoile more freely.

The people with many intreaties beſought them to let the Romanes alone, whom they did beſiege, but they were ſo much the more earneſt againſt them: till they being no longer able to make reſiſtance, with the conſent of Metilius their Captain, and ſome other of more E authority, ſent unto Eleazar, requeſting him to give them licence to depart with their lives, and leave their munition to the Jews. Who accepting their petition, ſent unto them Gorion, the ſon of Nicodemus, and Ananias the Saducee, and Judas, the ſon of Jonathas, to confirme the promiſe of their lives. Which done, Metilius led away the ſouldiers: and whileſt the Romans had their weapons, none of the rebels durſt attempt any of their treachery againſt them: but as ſoon as every one according to covenant laid down their ſhields and ſwords, and ſo departed miſtruſting nothing, Eleazars guard ſet upon them, and kild them, who neither made reſiſtance, nor any entreaty for their lives, onely putting them in mind of their promiſe and oath. So they were all ſlain ſave onely Metilius, who greatly intreated for his life; and promiſing that he would become a Jew in religion, and be circumciſed, they ſpared him. Yet was this a ſmall loſſe to the Romanes, who onely had then but a very few ſlain F of their great and almoſt infinite army: and this ſeemed the very beginning of the Jewes captivity.

The Romans againſt all covenant and law are all ſlain, ſave Metilius.

When they ſaw themſelves to have given ſufficient cauſe of wars, and too great, and that the City was now ſo filled with iniquity, that the wrath of God did hang over it though there had been no fear of any harm to them by the Romanes, yet the whole city mourned, and was ſorrowful, and quietly minded, lamenting as though they themſelves ſhould anſwer for the ſeditions, for that murther which was committed on the Sabbath, when it is not lawful for the Jews to do any good work.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the great maſſacre of the Jews at Cæſarea, and in all Syria.

The yeer of the world, 4030. after the nativity of Chriſt, 68.

AT the ſame hour on the ſelf-ſame day, it hapned, as it were by Gods providence, that the inhabitants of Cæſarea did maſſacre the Jews that dwelt among them, ſo that at one time above 20000. were ſlain, and not one Jew left alive in all Cæſarea. For thoſe that eſcaped, Florus took, and brought them forth bound unto the people. After this maſſacre done at Cæſarea, the whole nation of the Jews waxed mad: and dividing themſelves into companies, they waſted and deſtroyed in ſhort time all the borders of Syria, and the cities there about, to wit, Philadelphia and Gebonitis, Geraſa, Pella and Scythopolis, and then they made incurſion into Gadara, Hippon and Gaulanitis, pulling down ſome places, and firing otherſome. And from thence they marched towards Cedaſa, a city of the Tyrians, and Ptolemais, Gaba and Cæſarea: and neither Sebaſte, neither Aſcalon could reſiſt them, but they alſo were conſumed with fire. Likewiſe they deſtroyed Anthedon, with Gaza, and moſt places adjoyning to theſe cities were ſacked, to wit, the fields and villages, and a mighty ſlaughter was made of them that were taken in theſe places. The Syrians made as great maſſacre of the Jews as this among them: for all the Iews inhabiting among them were murthered, not onely for an old grudge, but alſo for the avoiding of imminent danger. And all Syria was troubled in moſt grievous manner, and every city was divided into two parts, and either parts ſafety conſiſted in this, to prevent the other in murthering them firſt: the dayes were ſpent in bloodſhed, and the nights in fear, worſe then death it ſelf. For though they onely pretended to deſtroy the Iews, yet were they drawn to ſuſpect other nations, that followed the Iews religion; and becauſe they were as it were neuters, the Syrians thought it not good to deſtroy them: and again, for their agreeing in religion with the Iews, they were conſtrained to hold them as enemies. Many of the contrary part, who before ſeemed modeſt, were now through avarice incited to meddle in this murther; for every one took the goods of them that were ſlain, and carried them to other places as conquerers. And he was moſt renowned, that had ſtollen moſt, as having alſo kild moſt. There might you ſee in every part of the City the dead bodies of all ages unburied, old men and children, and women lying in moſt ſhameful manner, their ſecret parts being uncovered. Briefly, all the countrey was filled with exceeding great calamity, and the fear of miſery to come was unſpeakable.

The Jews ſpoil the villages & burn the cities of Syria.

All Syria full of miſerable calamities.

And theſe were the conflicts between the Iews and ſtrangers. But afterwards making incurſion upon the borders of Scythopolis, the Iews there dwelling were their enemies. For they conſpiring with the citizens of Scythopolis, and preferring their own commodity and ſecurity, before their kindred and conſanguinity, joyned with the Gentiles againſt the Jews, who for all that, were ſuſpected for their forwardneſſe. Finally, the Scythopolites fearing that they would aſſault the City by night, and excuſe their revolting by their great miſery, they commanded all the Iews, that if they would ſhew themſelves truſty unto the Gentiles, they with all their children ſhould go into a wood hard by: who forthwith did as they were wil'd, ſuſpecting nothing, and the Scythopolites were quiet for two dayes after, and did nothing: But the third night they ſent forth ſcouts to ſee what they were doing: who finding ſome of them aſleep, and others not reſiſting, they ſurprized them in a moment, and killed them all, who were in number thirteen thouſand, and afterward took their goods. I think it not amiſſe to ſpeak of the death of Simon, who was the ſon of Saul, a man of regard: he was a man of great courage, and ſtrength of body, both which he uſed to the great hurt of his own nation: for he daily killed many Iews, who dwelt near unto Scythopolis, and he alone often ſcattered divers companies, and put whole armies to flight; who had an end worthy of his deeds, and murthering of his countreymen. For when the Scythopolites had compaſſed the wood about, ſo that none could eſcape their hands, they killed the Iews in every part thereof. Simon drawing his ſword, made no reſiſtance to any of his enemies; for he ſaw that it was bootleſſe to ſtrive againſt ſuch a multitude. Then pitifully crying out, I receive, O Scythopolites, a worthy reward for that which I have done, who to ſhew my fidelity towards you, have kild ſo many of mine own countreymen: and it is a juſt plague that a ſtrange nation ſhould be falſe to us, who impiouſly forſook our own brethren. I will do therefore as a prophane perſon, killing my ſelf with my own hands, and this death will be a ſufficient puniſhment for my offences, and a full argument of my magnanimity, that none of my enemies may boaſt of my death, nor inſult over me. When he had thus ſaid, he beheld all his family

When he had ſlain all his kindred, himſelf remaining alive, he ſtretcht forth his arm, that they might ſee what he would do, and thruſt his ſword into his own body up to the hilts. Of another grievous ſlaughter of the Jewes.

AFter this ſo great a maſſacre of the Jews in Scythopolis, other Cities did alſo riſe againſt them, where they inhabited, and 2000. and 500. were ſlain at Aſcalon, and 2500 at Ptolemais, and Tyrians kild divers, and kept many in priſon: Likewiſe, they of Gadara, and Hippon ſlew the moſt valiant, and thoſe of leaſt courage they caſt into priſon. Alſo all other Cities, who either feared or hated the Jews, roſe up againſt them. Onely they of Antiochia, Sidonia, and Apamia, ſpared them that dwelt with them, and neither kild nor impriſoned any of them: perhaps they ſtood in no fear of them if they ſhould have riſen, becauſe their City was ſo populus: yet I think they ſpared them onely for pity ſake, becauſe they ſaw they were quiet, and not ſeditious. The inhabi-
C tants alſo of Geraſa did no harm at all to the Iews amongſt them: but when they deſired to depart, they conducted them ſafely to the end of their borders. In the kingdom alſo of Agrippa, much cruelty was ſhewed againſt the Jews: for he being gone to Ceſtius Gallus at Antiochia, left the rule of his countrey to one of his friends, named Varus, kinſman to king Sohemus; and there came unto him 70. of the chief Nobility of the countrey Batanæa, requeſting a garriſon, to repreſſe thoſe that ſhould attempt rebellion amongſt them. Varus ſent certain of the kings ſouldiers armed, and kild them all as they were coming to him. But he did this impiety without Agrippa his conſent, onely for avarice: and as it were emboldned by this fact, he ruinated the whole Realme, ſtill continuing ſuch cruelty and impiety againſt
D his nation, till ſuch time as Agrippa underſtood thereof, who, for Sohemus ſake, durſt not put him to death, but diſpoſſeſſed him of his place. In the mean while the Rebels took the fort called Cyprus, which is ſcituate above Jericho, and after they had kild the garriſon, they deſtroyed the fortreſſe. At the ſame time a tumult of the Jews laid ſiege before the Caſtle of Macheron, and perſwaded the ſouldiers left in garriſon, to yeed the caſtle: who, fearing that if they denied they ſhould be compelled hereto, delivered it unto them; upon condition, that they might quietly depart, and they of Macherunt placed a ſtrong guard within it.

How the Jews were ſlain at Alexandria.

THe Citizens of Alexandria had alwaies a quarrel againſt the Jews that lived with them, ſince the time that famous Alexander uſed their help againſt the Egyptians, and therefore permitted them to inhabit in Alexandria, and to have the ſame priviledges that the reſt of the Citizens had. And this honour was alſo continued with them unto the time of the ſucceſſours, and heirs of Alexander: who alſo gave them a certaine place in the City to dwell in, that there they might live more commodiouſly. The Gentiles having nothing to do among them, permitted them alſo to call themſelves Macedonians. And afterward, when Egypt was brought under the rule of the Romans, neither Caſar, nor any one elſe, did diminiſh the Jews dignity in that place, which Alexander had given F them. So that now there were daily conflicts between them and the Greeks: and although the Iudges on both parts ſtill puniſht them that were in fault, yet the ſedition more and more increaſed: and when all Cities elſe were filled with troubles, there the tumult was more vehement. For when the Alexandrians had called together the people to determine of an Embaſſage to Nero, certain Jews mingled themſelves amongſt the Greeks, and ſo went into Amphitheater: who being eſpied by their adverſaries, the Greeks cryed out, that the Jews were enemies, and came as ſpies, and ſo laid violent hands upon them. Some of them fled, onely three of them were taken by the Greeks, whom they drew to a place to burne them alive. All the Iewes of the City came to ſuccour them, and firſt they threw ſtones at them, and then taking fire-brands, they ran in a great rage into the Amphitheater, and threatned to burn all the people there assembled: which they had done, if Tiberius Alexander Governour of the City had not appeased their fury; who did not at first use force of arms against them, but sent their nobility to perswade them to cease, and not to incite the Romane army against them. But the seditious Iews refused this admonition, and mocked Tiberius: who seeing that they would not otherwise be appeased, sent two legions of armed Romans against them which were in the City, and with them 5000. other souldiers, who by chance came out of Lybia, to this massacre of the Iews: and Tiberius gave them charge, not onely to kill them, but also to fire their houses, and take their goods. The souldiers presently went into the place called Delta (for there the Iews were gathered together) and did as they were commanded, and not without bloody victory. For the Iews, gathering themselves together, put those amongst them that were best armed in the forefront, who held out for a long time; but when they began to flee, they were massacred like beasts, and some of them were killed in the field, some were burned in their houses, the Romans first taking what they found, neither sparing infants nor old men, but killing all ages. So that all that place flowed with blood; for there were slain 50000. Iews: and all the rest had been extinguished, had not Alexander (moved to compassion by their intreaties) commanded the souldiers to leave off; who being obedient unto him, pretently departed: but the people of Alexandria were hardly withdrawn from that massacre, because of the hatred which they had conceived against the Iews: and with much ado were withheld from tyrannizing over the dead bodies. And this befell the Iews of Alexandria.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the massacre of the Jews, by Cestius Gallus.

Cestius Gallus now thought it time to bestirre himself, forasmuch as the Iewes were now hated every where: and taking with him the twelve whole legions out of Antiochia, 2000. chosen footmen, and four companies of horsmen, out of every one of the other legions; and with them the Kings forces that came to help him, to wit, 2000. horsmen of Antiochia, 3000. foot all bowmen, and 3000. footmen sent by Agrippa, a thousand horse, and four thousand which Sohemus brought, whereof the third part were horse, the rest foot, and for the most part bowmen; he went towards Ptolemais: and many joyned themselves to them out of every City, who, though they were not so skilful in the war as the Romans, yet their hatred was more then theirs. Agrippa himself was there with Cestius, being Ruler of those he brought. There Cestius taking part of the army, went to Zabulon (which is the strongest City of Galilee, called also Andron, and parts the borders of the Iews from Ptolemais) and when he found it desolate for the inhabitants thereof fled into the mountains) who left it full of all riches; giving licence to the souldiers to sack it, he afterwads set it on fire, although he admired the beauty thereof (for it was built like Tyre and Sidon, and Berytum) and after spoiled all the territories about it. Likewise, when he had burnt all the villages there about, he returned to Ptolemais. The Syrians, and especially those of Beryth, staid still behind to get booties: which when the Jews understood, and that Cestius was departed, they took courage, and came and set upon them, and kild of them 2000. In the mean-while Cestius departed from Ptolemais, and went to Cæsarea, and sent part of his army to Joppe, commanding them to keep the town, if they could get it: and if the townsmen made any resistance, that then they should stay till he came with the rest of the army. Some of them went by sea, some by land, by which means they did easily take Joppe: so that the people thereof had neither time to flee, nor to prepare themselves to fight; and setting on them, they killed all men with their families: and thus sacking the town, they set it on fire, and there were slain 8000. and 40. In like manner he sent part of his horsmen to Narbatena in the Toparchy neer Samaria, who spoiled the countrey, kild a great number of the inhabitants, rob'd and burnt the villages, and carried away a great booty with them.

Of Cestius his battel against Jerusalem.

He sent also Cesennius Gallus, General of the twelfth legion, into Galilee, and gave him as great an army as he thought sufficient to conquer that nation, whom the strongest citie of Galilee called Sephoris courteously entertained, and other cities followed their example, Sephoris and other Cities of Galilee do friendly entertain the Romanes.

A example. They that were ſeditious and gave themſelves to robbing, fled into the mountain which is ſcituate in the midſt of Galilee againſt Sephoris, called Aſamon: theſe Gallus incountred with his army; who, ſo long as they kept the higher part of the mountain, eaſily reſiſted the Romanes, and killed above 200. of them: but when they ſaw the Romanes had occupied a higher place then that wherein they kept, they eaſily were overcome: for not being armed, they could not ſtand out, and if they ſhould have fled, they could not have eſcaped the horſemen, ſo that onely a few hid themſelves in difficult places, and above 2000. of them were ſlain. Gallus perceiving all Galilee in peace, and not minded to revolt, returned with his companies unto Cæſarea, and Ceſtius with his whole army went to Antipatris: where underſtanding that a great company of Jews were gathered together in the tower called Aphe-
B cy, he ſent ſome before to skirmiſh with them: but the Iews would not abide battell, and the ſouldiers burned their tents, and the villages adjoyning. Ceſtius went from thence to Lydda, and found the City deſolate, for all the people were gone unto Ieruſalem, becauſe of the feaſt of Tabernacles: and when he had killed fifty perſons whom he found there, he fired the town, and went no further: and going by Bethoron, he pitched his tent in Gabaus, which is fifty furlongs diſtant from Ieruſalem. When the Iews ſaw themſelves in danger, they left the ſolemnity, and prepared themſelves for warre: and having a great multitude, they went to fight, obſerving no order, altogether with indiſcreet cries, not regarding the Sabbath, which they hold in great eſtimation: and the ſame fury, that made them leave their devo-
C tion, made them alſo victorious in that battell; for they aſſaulted the Romanes with ſuch a courage, that they brake their battell aray: and killing all that reſiſted, they preſſed into the midſt thereof: and if a freſh ſupply both of horſe and foot had not come in time, all Ceſtius army had been in great danger. So that there were ſlain five hundreth and fifty Romane ſouldiers, and four hundreth of them were foot, and the reſt were horſemen, but of the Iews but two and twenty. The moſt valiant in this combate were Monobazus and Cenedæus kinſmen to king Monobazus of Adiabena, and next to them Paraides Niger, and Silas a Babilonian, who fled unto the Iews from king Agrippa, whom he had lately ſerved: and ſo the Iews being repulſed, returned into Ieruſalem; and Simon the ſonne of Giora invaded the Romanes, as they were returning towards Bethoron, and ſlew many of the rereward, and took many carts, and much baggage withall, which he brought into the city. Ceſtius ſtaied three

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the ſiege of Ieruſalem by Ceſtius, and of the maſſacre.

AGrippa perceiving the Romans to be in a greater danger, for that all the mountains were covered with infinite numbers of the Jews, he purpoſed to trie, if through few words he could perſwade them to deſiſt from war; or if any refuſed, to receive thoſe that were willing. Wherefore he ſent unto them Borcæus and Phœbus,
E whom they well knew, aſſuring and promiſing them pardon from Ceſtius, and from the Romans, of all that they had already done, if they would now lay down their arms, and joyn with them. But the rebels fearing that all the multitude, in hope of ſafety, would joyn with Agrippa, determined to kill the Legats, and ſlew Phœbus before he ſpake any word, and Borcæus being wounded, eſcaped. But the people were angry hereat, and with ſtones and clubs drave them into the town that were the authors of this fact. Ceſtius perceiving them at ods amongſt themſelves, thought that he had now a fit opportunity to aſſault them, and ſo came upon them with his whole army: and putting them to flight he purſued them unto Jeruſalem. And when he had pitched his Tents in the place called Scopus, he departed ſeven furlongs from the city, and did nothing againſt the city for three daies ſpace; perhaps
F hoping that they within would relent: and then ſending a great many ſouldiers into the villages adjoyning to fetch corn, the fourth day, which was the thirteenth of October, he came againſt the city with his army in battell aray. The people of the Jews were kept in awe by the rebels, who terrified by the Romane diſcipline, forſook the outmoſt parts of the city, and fled into the innermoſt part of the Temple. Ceſtius paſſing Betheza, burned Cænopolis and the new market place, and coming unto the higher part of the city, he pitched his tent neer the Kings Palace: and if at that time he had violently iſſued in at the walls, he had taken the city and ended the wars. But Tyrannus Priſcus Generall of the footmen, and many other rulers and captains of the horſemen, being hired with money by Florus, hindred that his purpoſe, whereby the wars were ſo prolonged, and a thouſand calamities befell the Jews. In the mean time many of the chiefeſt among the Iewes, and Ananus the ſon of Ionathus, called Ceſtius, as though they would have opened him the gates: but he was angry and ſcarce truſted them, till at laſt they delaied the time ſo long, that the rebels perceived this treaſon, and caſt Ananus down the wall, and with ſtones drave his complices into their houſes. Which done, they retired themſelves into the towers, from whence they beat back thoſe that ſcaled the wals. The Romans for five dayes ſpace aſſaulted the wals on every ſide, but all in vain; and the ſixth day, Ceſtius with many choſen ſouldiers and bowmen aſſaulted the Temple on the North ſide. The Iews valiantly made reſiſtance out of the porches, and often repulſed the Romanes approaching the wals: yet at laſt they, with the multitude of their adverſaries darts, were forced to give back. Then the Romans that went before, having their ſhields upon their heads, leaned againſt the wall, and they in the ſecond place held their ſhields againſt theirs in the firſt, and ſo in order until the laſt, thereby making as it were a covering as the Romans call it, or defence, that all their ſhot and darts could do them no harm; ſo that the ſouldiers did ſafely undermine the wals, and attempted to fire the gates of the Temple.

D vers Iews call for Ceſtius as if they intended to open their gates unto him.

The Romans cover themſelves with their ſhields, and undermine the wals and burn the Temple gates.

Now the ſeditious people were hereat greatly amazed, and many fled out of the City, as though it would preſently be taken. And the good were hereby encouraged, as much as the rebels were diſmaied, and came unto the gates to open unto Ceſtius, who had well deſerved at their hands. And truly if he had but a little longer continued the ſiege, he had taken the city. But I think that God being angry with the wicked, would not ſuffer the wars to be ended at that time: for Ceſtius neither regarding the good will of the people, nor the deſperation of the rebels, removed his army from thence; and having received no loſſe, very unadviſedly departed from the City: at whoſe unlooked for flight, the rebels took heart; and making after him, they killed the horſmen and footmen that came laſt. And when Ceſtius went to the Tents which he had fortified in Scopion. The next day he went further into the countrey; whereby he more encouraged the rebels, who following him, killed many of his rereward. Afterward, either end of the army being well ſtrengthned, the Iews aſſaulted them that were behinde, & the laſt durſt not caſt any darts againſt them, who wounded them on their backs, thinking that an infinite multitude had followed them: and they were not able to reſiſt them that aſſaulted them on each ſide, being as it were heavy, and not daring to break their order; on the contrary ſeeing the Iews ſo active, and apt to skip to and fro: ſo that the Romanes endured much harm at the hands of their enemies, and did them none; and thus were they beaten all the way along, and many of them killed, amongſt whom was Priſcus Captain of the ſixth legion, and Longinus the tribune, and Aemelius Iucundus Captain of a troup of horſmen. And ſo with much ado, they came unto Gabio; where they firſt pitcht their tents, caſting away much of their baggage, which might any way hinder them. Ceſtius ſtaied there two dayes, doubtful what to do: the third day he perceived his enemies to be encreaſed, & all places about to be filled with Iews: wherby he ſaw that his ſlow haſte was to his diſadvantage, and the number of his enemies would ſtill increaſe, if he made any longer abode there. Wherefore that he might flie ſpeedily, he cauſed the ſouldiers to caſt away all thoſe things that might any wayes be a hindrance unto them, & killed their Mules and Aſſes, and cattel, ſaving onely thoſe that bare munition: fearing that if he ſhould not deſtroy them, the Jews might make uſe of them againſt him, and ſo he led the army toward Bethoron. The Jews in large paſſages little moleſted his army: but when they were to paſſe a ſtreight, then they killed them of the rereward, and thruſt otherſome down into the valley, & all the army of the Jews were ſpred upon the eminent places, wherby the army was to paſſe, expecting to welcome them with their arrows. Where the footmen amazed, and bethinking how to help themſelves, the horſmen were brought into great danger: for they could not keep their ranks for darts and arrows, neither could they go to hurt their enemies, the aſcent unto the top of the mountains was ſo ſteep: and they were compaſſed on each ſide with rocks and deep vallies, ſo that if any went out of the way, he fell down and was killed, inſomuch as ther was no way to flie nor to reſiſt. Now not knowing what to do, they began to weep, and cry out as men in deſperation: and the Jews anſwered them with an encouraging one another to play the men: being glad of their enemies adverſity, and cruelly bent againſt them: and all the army of Ceſtius had there periſhed, had not the night come on and helped them, which by her darkneſſe gave leaſure to the Romans to flie into Bethoron. In the mean-while, the Iews kept all the places thereabouts beſieged, and guarded the paſſages. Ceſtius ſeeing it not poſſible to march openly, thought it beſt to flie, and choſe almoſt 400. of his ſtrongeſt ſouldiers, and ſet them in very eminent places, commanding them that when they were aloft, they ſhould cry as they did before, that the Iews might think that the

And thus they followed the Romans unto Antipatris: and ſeeing they could not overtake them, they returned, bringing with them the warlike inſtruments, and rifling thoſe that were ſlain, and taking whatſoever the Romanes had left behind; and ſo ſinging ſongs of victory, they returned unto Ieruſalem, having loſt very few of their company, and ſlain 5000. and 300. and 80. of the footmen of the B Romanes, and their helpers; and 900. and 80. horſemen. CHAP. XXV.

Of the cruelty of thoſe of Damaſcus againſt the Jews, and of Joſephs affairs in Galilee.

INcontinently after Ceſtius adverſe fortune, many of the chiefeſt amongſt the Jews daily fled and forſook the City, as a ſhip preſently ready to ſink. Coſtobarus and Saul two brethren, and Philip the ſonne of Joachim Generall of Agrippas army, fled out of C the City and yeelded themſelves unto Ceſtius. As for Antipas, who was alſo beſieged with them in the Kings Palace, he would not flie with the reſt, and ſo was killed by the Rebels. But Ceſtius ſent Saul, & the reſt of his company into Achaia unto Nero, to let him underſtand the cauſe of their flight, and to ſhew how Florus had cauſed all theſe wars: for ſo he hoped that Nero would bend his wrath againſt Florus, and quit him from danger. Then the people of Damaſcus underſtanding the death of the Romanes, deviſed how to deſtroy the Jewes which inhabited amongſt them: and they thought it was eaſie to be accompliſhed, for that the Jews were already aſſembled in the common baths, for fear of ſome ſuch matter: yet they miſtruſted their women, who all, except a few, were Jews in religion. D Wherefore they took great heed to conceal their intent from them: and ſo aſſaulting the Jews altogether in a narrow place, and having nothing to defend them, they put them all to the ſword, who were in number ten thouſand. The Rebels that ſo purſued Ceſtius, returned into Ieruſalem, and ceaſed not to joyn all unto them that favoured the Romanes, either by force or by flattery; and aſſembling themſelves in the Temple, they determined to chooſe a greater number of Captains. Wherefore Joſeph the ſonne of Gorion, and Ananus the high Prieſt, were appointed rulers of the City, and eſpecially to ſee the wals thereof repaired, Eleazar the ſon of Simon was put in no authority, notwithſtanding that he had in his cuſtody all preys and ſpoiles taken from the Romanes, and Ceſtius his money, and a great part of the publike treaſure, becauſe they perceived him through authority to wax proud, E and his attendants become ſtately. Yet in time Eleazar by money and craft perſwaded the people to obey him in all things. And they requeſted other Captains to be ſent into Idumæa, who were Jeſus the ſonne of Sapphas, and Eleazar the ſonne of the new high Prieſt: and they commanded Niger who was born beyond Iordan, to obey theſe Captains, who was therefore called Peraides, and was then Governour of Idumæa. And they neglected not to do the like by other regions: for Joſeph the ſonne of Simon was ſent to Iericho and Manaſſes beyond the river, and John the Eſſean to Tamna, every one to rule the government of his countrey as a Toparchy, Lydda, Ioppe, and Amaus, were annexed to John the Eſſean, and John the ſon of Ananias was appointed Governour of Gophnitis and Acrabatena. And Joſeph the ſon of Matthias was made Ruler over both Galilees, unto which was joyned Gamala the F ſtrongeſt city in that coaſt.

When Joſeph came to Galilee, which was committed to his protection, his firſt care was to get the good will of the inhabitants, knowing that it might much profit him, although in other matters he had offended. Then conſidering that he ſhould have moſt mighty and aſſured friends, if he made them partakers of his authority; and likewiſe get the love of the common people, if he did eſteem of thoſe things which they ſhould think well of; He choſe ſeventy of the moſt ancienteſt wiſe men amongſt them, and made them rulers over all Galilee, and elected ſeven Iudges over the leſſer towns to judge inferiour matters: for he reſerved all great affairs and criminall cauſes to his own hearing. Moreover, having ordained dained a form of justice that those seventy should follow, he took counsel how to work their outward security: And being assured that the Romanes would come into Galile, he compassed those places with strong wals that were fit for his purpose, to wit, Jotapata, Bersabea, Selamis, Pereccho, Japha, and Sigoph, with the mountain Itaburium, Tarichea, and Tiberias, Moreover, he fortified the caves near the lake Genesar, which is in lower Galilee, and in high Galilee Petra, which is also called Acheberon, and Seph, Jamnith, and Mero; in Gaulanites also Seleucia, and Soganes, and Gamala; he only permitted them of Sephoris to build their own walls, because he perceived them to be rich and prone to war of themselves. Likewise John the son of Levias, at Josephs command, built the wall of Giscala himself alone; but in all other places that were fortified, Joseph put to his helping hand, & told how they should be done. He leavied also an army of an hundred thousand, who were all young men, whom he armed with old armour, which he gathered from all parts of the countrey: and considering that the Romane army was invincible, for that they were all obedient unto their rulers, and expert in war, he could not instruct them in martial discipline, other occasions forcing him to the contrary: but calling to mind that the multitude of rulers made obedience, he ordained many Captains, and constituted divers sorts of souldiers, as the Romanes used to do; making some governours of ten, othersome over a hundred, and others over a thousand; and appointed likewise rulers over them. He taught them also how to give the sign of war, and how to sound the trumpet, both to call them to combate, and to retire: how to march in length, and cast in a ring, and alwayes to succour them that were most in danger: and to be short, he taught them whatsoever might either encourage them, or make them active: but especially he exercised them in feats of arms, imitating in particular the order of the Romanes, often telling them that they were to fight with men, who for strength of body and courage passed all nations of the world. Also he told them that hereby he should perceive whether they would be obedient in war, if now they abstained from such things as were usual to souldiers, to wit, robbing and spoiling their country men, and crafty and deceitful dealing; nor think the spoil of those with whom they conversed, to be their own gain: for those wars had alwaies best successe, where the souldiers carried good consciences; and they that were bad, should not onely have men, but God also for their enemy. And after this manner he daily exhorted them, and now he had appointed how many were to fight. For 60000. footmen, and 200. and 50. horsmen, and beside these 4000. and 500. whom he hired, were alwayes in readinesse, and 600. chosen men to guard his own person. And the hirelings only excepted, the rest of the souldiers were provided for, by the cities: for every city before mentioned, sent one half of their men for souldiers; and the other half they kept to provide victuals for them, that one part being employed in war, the other might do such businesse as the city required.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of Josephs danger and escape, and of the malice of John of Giscala.

John a notable dissembler, and a thirsty murtherer under hope of gain.

WHilest Joseph thus ordered the estate of Galilee, there arose a traitor born in Giscala, the son of Levias, whose name was John, a most subtil and deceitful Treacher, who by vile means was now become the richest man in that countrey, being before very poor; whereby for a while he was hindred from putting his villanies in practice: who could lye at his pleasure, and easily give credit unto lies, who thought deceit to be a vertue, which he used even towards his dearest friends; and a great counterfeiter of humanity: yet for the hope of gain became a cruel murtherer. He alwayes aimed at high matters, with an aspiring mind, and at first nourished his hope with small villanies. For first he was a thief after his own manner, and lived in woods and solitary places; at last he got him a company of audatious people like to himself, at first smal, but afterward he greatly increased it. He also had a great care to choose no idle persons, but such as were strong of body, valiant of mind, and skilful in martial affairs: of these he gathered foure hundred, the most of them out of Tyre, and the villages thereabout: and with them he wasted all Galilee, and put many in mind of the miserable wars to come. This man a long time before desired to be Governour of the army: and aspired to greater matters, onely the want of money hindred him; and perceiving that Joseph took delight in his industry, he perswaded him to suffer him to build the wals of that place where he was born, which was now desolate; and to accomplish this, he gathered great sums of money of the richer sort. Then he devised another shift; for having perswaded the Jews that were dispersed over all Syria, that

A that they ſhould uſe no oyl, ſave onely that which was made by their own nation, he cauſed divers veſſels of oyl to be brought unto the confines of Galilee, and buying four barrels for a piece of Tyrian money (which amounted unto four Attique groates) he ſold them again unto the Syrian Jews, the half of one barrel, for as much as all four coſt him. And for that Galilee abounded with oyles, and eſpecially at that time, he conveighed it to ſuch places where there was great want, and none was brought but by himſelf. By this means he gathered an infinite maſſe of money, which preſently he turned to his prejudice, who had given him licence ſo to get it. And thinking that if he could depoſe Joſeph, that then he might come to be ruler over Galilee, he commanded his followers to robbe and ſpoil more then
B they did before, and ſo to trouble the countrey, that he might either kill the Governour, if he ſought to redreſſe it at unawares; or if he let all alone, to accuſe him of cowardize to the people for ſo doing. Moreover, he had already given out ſpeeches, that Joſeph went about to betray Galilee to the Romanes, and deviſed many things to this effect to work Joſephs overthrow. It hapned that at that time, ſome of the village of Dabarita, who watched in the field, ſet upon Ptolomæus, who was factor for Agrippa, and his ſiſter Bernice, and ſpoiled them of all carriage, wherein was much coſtly apparell, and many ſilver cups, and ſix hundreth pieces of Gold. And for that they could not do this ſecretly, they brought all the whole bootie to Joſeph at Tarichea: who reprooving them for offering violence unto the Kings ſervants, commanded the things to be kept at the houſe of Aeneas, who was one of the richeſt men in the town, who ſhould reſtore them to the owner when time ſerved: wherein think-
C ing to do himſelf great good, he wrought himſelf much danger. For the thieves being offended that they received no part thereof, and ſeeing that Joſeph would reſtore to Agrippa and his ſiſter Bernice that which they had laboured to get, they went round about the villages in the night, and ſpred this falſe report in every place, that Joſeph was a traitor to his countrey, and with the ſame rumour filled the cities thereabout. So that early in the next mornig, 10000. armed men came againſt Joſeph. Finally, the multitude aſſembling themſelves together in the Theater at Tarichea, the greateſt part cried out in their choler and fury, that the traitor might be depoſed, otherſome that he might be burned, and John himſelf incited many, and with him one Jeſus the ſonne of Sapphias, who at that time was Go-D vernour of Tiberias. All the friends of Joſeph and his guard being terrified with ſuch a multitude fled, four onely excepted. But Joſeph in the mean while was aſleep: and had he ſlept a little longer, they had ſet his houſe on fire. Whereupon he aroſe, and the four that remained with him, counſelled him to flie: but he not diſmaied in that he was left alone, nor for that ſo great a multitude came againſt him, went boldly towards them with his garment all torn, and aſhes upon his head, holding his hands behind him, and his ſword upon his neck. Whereat they that bare him good will, eſpecially the people of Tarichea, were moved to compaſſion: but the countrey people and they whom he overlaid with taxes and tributes, curſed him; and bad him bring forth the publike treaſure, and confeſſe his treaſon: for becauſe of the attire and habit he came in; they thought he would not have denied any thing whereof he was accuſed, and that he came ſo to move them to compaſſion, and ſo to ob-
E tain pardon for his offence. This his humility ſtood him in good ſtead, for hereby thoſe that before were inraged againſt him, now began one to fall out with another in his behalf, when he promiſed to confeſſe the whole matter: and then obtaining licence to ſpeak he ſaid: "I was never minded to ſend back that money to Agrippa, nor to keep it unto my "private uſe. For (God forbid) that I ſhould ever hold him for my friend, who is your "open enemie, or that I ſhould ſo ſeek mine own profit, that I ſhould thereby damnifie "you all. But (O ye men of Tarichea) for as much as I perceived that your city eſpeci- "ally had greateſt need to be fortified, and that you were not able to build the walls, and "for that I feared the people of Tiberias, and others adjoyning, who ſtill gaped after this "prey, and wealth that was taken from Agrippa; I determined to get thoſe ſpoyles for you
F "to reedifie your walls. If ye miſlike this, I will bring out the treaſure, and give it to be di- "vided amongſt you: but if you like thereof, then it appeareth how you moleſt him who is "your benefactor.

This ſpeech of his well pleaſed the people of Tarichea, and diſpleaſed them of Tiberias; ſo that they breathed out threatnings againſt him. Thus they both left Joſeph, and fought one againſt another. He now having many partakers (for the people of Tarichea were almoſt fourty thouſand) ſpake more boldly unto the multitude, and rebuked their temerity; affirming that it was neceſſary to ſtrengthen Tarichea with that preſent money, and that he would alſo provide to ſtrengthen other cities, and that they ſhould not want money, if they would agree and conſpire together againſt them, from whom they ſhould take it; and not to offer violence violence unto him, who would endeavour to get it. So the reſt of the multitude being deceived, though they were angry, yet departed; and 2000. armed men offered to ſet upon him: but he being already retired into his houſe, they ſtood without, threatning him. Wherefore Joſeph uſed another device likewiſe to repreſſe theſe: and getting up into the top of the houſe, he beckned unto them with his hand to keep ſilence; and then ſaid, that he was ignorant what they requeſted at his hands: for he could not hear one for another, becauſe their voices were confounded through the multitude; but if they would ſend ſome into the houſe to talk friendly with him, he would do whatſoever they requeſted. The nobles and magiſtrates hearing this, preſently went into the houſe: whom, when he had led into the innermoſt part of the houſe, having ſhut the doores, he cauſed to be beaten, ſo long till that all their bowells appeared: the doores in the mean time being made faſt, the people ſtaied before the houſe, thinking that the cauſe of their long tarrying was, to alleadge reaſons to and fro; and preſently Joſeph opening the doores, put them forth amongſt the people all bloudy as they were: whereat they were ſo terrified, that leaving their weapons behind them they ran away Hereat John took occaſion to encreaſe his envy; and having ill ſucceſſe in this policy, he ſtill attempted other plots to bring Joſeph in danger: and counterfeiting himſelf ſick, he requeſted Joſeph to permit him to go to Tiberias, and uſe the hot baths for to recover his health. But Joſeph not having yet perceived his treaſon, wrote letters in his behalf to the governour of the town, willing him to be Johns Hoſt, and to let him want nothing that he needed: which he had in good ſort. And two daies after his arrival there, he went about the buſineſſe, which he came to effect, and enticed ſome with money, others with flatteries, to revolt from Joſeph. Silas whom Joſeph had made governour of the City underſtanding this, he preſently by letters gave notice thereof to Joſeph: who receiving them in the night, went to Tiberias, and was there early in the morning, and the reſt of the multitude came out to meet him: but John notwithſtanding he judged that he came againſt him, yet ſtill he counterfeited himſelf ſick in bed, and ſent a man of his acquaintance to excuſe his abſence for not coming to meet Joſeph. Then Joſeph aſſembled the Tiberians together in a place to ſpeak unto them, concerning that which was written unto him: and John ſent armed men thither with commandement to kill Joſeph. The people perceiving them to draw their ſwords, cried out: and Joſeph at their cry looking about him, and perceiving their ſwords even almoſt at his throat, he leapt down a little hill upon the ſhore, which was ſix cubits high, upon which he ſtood to ſpeak unto the people: and going into a boat with two of his guard which he found there, he went into the midſt of the lake, and preſently his guard taking their weapons aſſaulted the traitors. Joſeph fearing that a great conflict would enſue, and ſo the whole city for a few mens fault be deſtroyed, ſent to his ſouldiers, charging them onely to work their own ſafety and no more, and to kill none, not reprove any for that wicked fact: who forthwith obeying his command, ceaſed from fight.

But they that inhabited about the City. and heard of the treaſon, and by whom it was attempted, armed themſelves and came againſt John: but he before they came, fled to Giſcala, where he was born. In the mean while, all Galilee came and joyned with Joſeph, and there were many thouſands of armed men gathered together, affirming that they came againſt John, and to fire that city which had received him. But Joſeph thanked them for their good will, ſaying that he had rather conquer his enemies by policy, then by fire and ſword: and therefore requeſted them to be content. He alſo publiſhed an edict, wherein he declared that all thoſe that had rebelled with John, and did not forſake him within 5. daies next following, ſhould loſe all their livings, and their manſions ſhould be ſacked, and their houſes and family ſet on fire. Hereupon three thouſand preſently forſook John, and came and caſt down their weapons before Joſephs feet, proſtrating themſelves before him: ſo that there onely remained with John but one thouſand of fugitive Syrians. By whom John being aſſiſted, again went ſecretly to work, having ſo ill ſucceſſe by plain dealing: and ſo privily ſent meſſengers to Jeruſalem, who told that Joſeph had gathered a great army, and that except he were quickly prevented, he would come and uſurp the dominion over that mother City. But the people underſtanding before of Johns hatred, did not regard it: yet divers rich men and magiſtrates who envied Joſeph, ſecretly ſent money unto John, to hire ſouldiers that were ſtrangers, that he might war againſt Joſeph; and determined amongſt them, to diſplace him: and thinking that their decree was not ſufficient to effect it, they ſent moreover five hundreth and four thouſand armed men, and four of their principall nobility amongſt them, to wit, Joazar the Lawyer, and Ananias the Sadducee, & Simon & Judas the ſons of Jonathas all very eloquent and learned men, to withdraw the peoples mindes from Joſeph; giving them charge, that if he of his own accord came unto them, that then they ſhould permit him to Tiberias and Sephoris were recovered by Joseph.

NOw John, for fear of Joseph, kept himself within the wals of Giscala: and a few dayes after Tiberias revolted again, the inhabitants calling in Agrippa, who came not at the day appointed, and yet a few Romane souldiers shewing themselves, they revolted from Joseph. Joseph understanding this at Tarichea, having sent his souldiers to fetch corn, thought it not good to go alone against the Rebels, neither did he think it best to delay the time any longer, fearing that whilest he delayed, King Agrippa would come and possesse the town; for the next day, because it was the Sabbath, he could do nothing. Wherefore he thought to overcome the Rebels by policy, and so he commanded C the gates of Tarichea to be kept shut, that his intent might not be revealed unto them of Tiberias. Then taking all the boats that were in the lake, in number two hundred and thirty, and in every one of them four saylers, he hastily sayled to Tiberias: and when he came near the City, yet so far off, that the inhabitants thereof could not easily descry him, he left all the boats upon the water emptie, and taking onely seven of his guard with him, unarmed, he went near unto the city, that they might see him. When the Rebels perceived him, and thought that the boats had been full of armed men, they cast down their weapons, and held up their hands to him, beseeching him to spare the City. Joseph, after many threatning and bitter speeches, first, for that having undertaken wars against the Romans, they D with civil wars consumed their own forces: secondly, for that they had sought his life, who had wrought their safety, and that they were not ashamed to shut the gates against him, who had builded the City wals, yet (said he) if any would come and talk with him; and confirm a league of their fidelity unto him, he would not refuse them. So ten of the chiefest among them came unto him, whom he carried away in a fisher-boat far from the City, and sent for fifty Senators, as though he requested their promise also. And devising new causes, he still under pretence of agreement sent first for one, and then for another, as he thought good, till he had loaded all the boats: which done, he commanded all the boatmen with all speed possible to go to Tarichea, & put them in prison, so that he carried away all the councel, which were in number six hundred and two thousand people, all whom he brought to Tarichea in boats. But they which remained in the City, cryed with one voyce, that one E Clitus was cause of that revolt, and therefore besought Joseph to punish him for all. Joseph told them that he would put none of them to death, but commanded one of his guard called Levia, to come and cut off Clitus his hands: but he fearing to trust himself amongst all his enemies, refused to do execution. Clitus perceiving that Joseph was angry, and ready to come out of his own boat to do it himself, besought him to grant him one of his hands: which Joseph did upon condition, that he should cut off the other himself. So Clitus drawing out his sword with his right hand, cut off his left, being afraid of Joseph; and after this, he returned to Tiberias to bring it again under his subjection: and within a few dayes after, he took Giscala, and Sephoris, which were revolted, having given the spoils thereof to his souldiers, but yet afterward he restored all that was taken away, unto the people, and so F he did to the inhabitants of Tiberias and Sephoris: and by this means got the good will of them all.

all sorts of instruments for war, arrows and other weapons; so that all the City was busied herein, and trained their men in warlike discipline. All places were filled with tumults; but the graver sort were very pensive, and many as it were foreseeing the calamity that after ensued, burst out into tears: they that desired peace, received no comfort in any thing: all things were done at their beck, who were cause of all this war. And the estate of the City even then before the Romans came, was like a City to be destroyed. Now Ananus omitted that which was necessary for war, & laboured to reconcile the seditious faction of them that were called Zelous: but how he was overcome, and what his end was, we will declare hereafter.

Simon the son of Giora committeth great rapines, and murthers in Acrabatena and Idumæa.

Now one Simon the son of Giora in the Toparchie of Acrabatena, having gathered together a multitude of seditious people, robbed and spoiled all; and not onely brake into rich mens houses, but also did beat them grievously, openly exercising his tyranny. But when Ananus & the rest sent an army against him, he fled unto his fellow theeves of Massada, and there he stayed till Ananus, and the rest of his enemies were slain: and then he wasted Idumæa with the rest, so that the governours of that place were fain to put a garrison in every village: so great was the number of them that were slain by these theeves. And thus stood the affairs of the Jews.

Of Veſpaſians coming into Judæa, and of the maſſacre of the Jews.

The yeer of the world, 4031 after Chriſts Nativity, 69.

AFter that Nero underſtood of his evil ſucceſſe againſt the Jewes, he was ſeized with fear and aſtoniſhment; yet he diſſembled it as much as neceſſity would permit him. In the mean-while he ſet a good face on the matter, and made as though he were
B of more courage, ſaying, that that which hapned, was rather by the fault of his General, then by the valour of their adverſaries: thinking that it behoved him, who was Emperour, not to ſhew himſelf moved with a little bad news: and the greatneſſe of his Empire ſhewed he had a mind which yeelded to no misfortune. Yet it appeared by the vexation of his ſpirit that he was much moved, and in great care unto whom he ſhould commit the charge of the Eaſt, which rebelled; who both would conquer the Jews, and chaſtiſe the inhabitants about them, that bare the ſame mind as they did. At laſt, he found Veſpaſian, whom he thought onely meet for that purpoſe; a man who from his infancy had been trained up in wars, even until he was gray-headed, who had appeaſed the people of the Weſt, and helped them being troubled by the Germanes, and recovered it for the Romanes: as alſo he did Britany, which was unknown before; and for that cauſe made his
C father Claudius triumph, without taking any pains for it. Nero conſidered all theſe, and his prudence grounded in old age with his experience, who alſo had ſons in the flower of their age to be pledges for his fidelity, and that repreſented their fathers wiſdome, God, as it ſhould ſeem, even then diſpoſing ſomething of the whole Common-wealth, Nero ſent him to govern the armies in Syria, greatly encouraging him with fair ſpeeches and promiſes, as at that time need required.

Nero is amazed and afraid at the valiant acts of the Jews.

Nero ſendeth Veſpaſian to govern in Syria and direct his way.

Thus he departed out of Achaia, where he was with Nero: and he commanded Titus his ſon to lead the fifth and tenth legions from Alexandria, and he himſelf croſſing over to Helleſpont, went after by land into Syria, where he aſſembled all the Romane forces, and all
D the help of the Kings adjoyning that were confederates. But the Jews after Ceſtius unfortunate ſucceſſe, became proud of their victory, and could not contain themſelves; but like men toſſed at Fortunes pleaſure, they ſtill gave more occaſion of warre: and gathering all their warlike forces together, they went to Aſcalon, which is an old Citie ſeven hundred and twenty furlongs diſtant from Ieruſalem, which the Iews alwayes hated, for which cauſe alſo they firſt aſſaulted it. The Governours in this expedition, were three men excellent above the reſt for ſtrength and wiſedome, to wit, Niger of Pærea, Silas the Babylonian, and John the Eſſean. Now the Citie of Aſcalon had very ſtrong walls, but few men to defend it; for it had onely one company of footmen, and one band of horſmen, whom Antonius go-
E verned. The Iews made ſuch haſt, as though they had dwelt hard by. Antonius perſwading himelf that they would aſſault him, cauſed his horſmen to iſſue forth of the City: and neither fearing the multitude, nor the malice of his adverſaries, he valiantly abode the firſt aſſault of the enemies, and beat them back that attempted to aſſault the wall. So the Jews who were unskilful, having to do with them that were expert; and they being on foot fighting againſt horſmen, without order, againſt thoſe that were in good order; being lightly armed, againſt their adverſaries who were well provided, were eaſily repulſed.

Veſpaſian and Titus gather great forces againſt the Jews.

The Iews beſiege Aſcalon.

Antony fighteth with the Jewes.

Finally, they were more led by rage and wrath, then by good counſel; and they againſt whom they fought were obedient, and would do nothing without the commandment of their leader. For their firſt ranks being broken, they were forced by the horſmen to turn their backs; and turning themſelves to their own company, who turned toward the wall, became as it were enemies to themſelves. So that every one ſeeking to avoid the horſmen, F they were all diſperſed about the field, which was in every place for the advantage of the horſmen. This greatly helped the Romanes to kill ſo many Iews: for they that fled were eaſily overtaken by the Romanes, and killed; and others compaſſing divers of the Jewes about, ſlew them with darts; ſo that the Jews were in a great deſperation for all their huge multitude, as if they had been alone. The Iews endeavouring to overcom their misfortunes, were aſhamed to flie, and ſo fled not haſtily, hoping that fortune would change But the Romans not wearied in that which they did with great dexterity, continued the fight the moſt part of the day; ſo that there were ſlain of the Iews ten thouſand, and two of their leaders, John and Silas. The reſt, many being wounded, followed their General Niger, who fled into a little little town of Idumæa, named Salis: many of the Romans also were wounded in that fight. G

The year of the world, 4031. after Christs Nativity 69. But the Iews were not daunted with this misfortune, but the grief thereof much increased their courage: neither were they dismayed with the former losse of so many men within so short time; but rather calling to mind their great victory they had before, were drawn to undergo yet another mishap. Shortly after, before the mens wounds were healed, they gathered together all their forces, and went again to Ascalon in greater number and fury, but with the same successe, and skill in warlike affairs which they had before. For Antonius having Eight thousand Iews slain at Ascalon. warning which way they meant to com, placed an ambush in the way, and the horsmen setting upon them at unawares, they killed aboue eight thousand of them, before they could prepare themselves to fight: and all the rest fled, and Niger with them, shewing as he fled many arguments of a valiant mind: and for that the enemies pursued them, they fled into the safest tower of a town called Bezedel. Antonius knowing it to be in vain to stay about H the tower that was invincible, yet loth to let the General of their adversaries to escape, set fire on the wals; and so departing, triumphed, thinking that Niger had been burned. But he leapt into a deep vault in the Castle, and so escaped, and three dayes after he shewed himself unto his souldiers, who sought for him weeping, that they might have his body, for they thought him dead: whom against all expectation, seeing alive, they were very glad, as though Vespasian with his whole army cometh to Ptolemais. by Gods providence he escaped to be still their Leader.

Vespasian came to Antiochia, which is the mother City of Syria, and brought his army with him, which for greatnes, and happy successe, doubtlesse was the third in the whole world; and finding that King Agrippa did expect his coming, he hasted with all his forces from thence to Ptolemais. At this place there came unto him the Citizens of Sephoris a City of Galilee, who had no thought at all of rebellion: these both provident for their own safety, and well knowing the forces of the Romanes, before Vespasian came, submitted themselves unto Cestius Gallus, and received from him a garrison of souldiers; and now also courteously entertaining Vespasian, offered their help against their countreymen. To whom Vespasian at their request gave a guard of horse and foot, so great as he thought was able to resist the force of their enemies, if the Jews should attempt any thing against them. For he thought it would be a great help unto him in his war to come, to have Sephoris the greatest City of Galilee scituate in a strong place on his side, which otherwise might be a safeguard to the whole nation.

The description of Galilæa, and Samaria, and Judæa.

The description and scituation of the higher Galilee THere are two places named Galilæa, and one is called high Galilæa, and the other, low Galilee: and they are both compassed with Phœnicia and Syria. On the West Ptolemais, with the limits of his territorie doth part his borders, and the mount Carmel, which in time past belonged unto Galilee, but now unto the Tyrians. Unto which adjoyneth Gabaa, which signifieth the horsmens City: so called for, because King Herods horsmen were sent thither to inhabit. On the South part it joyneth to the Samaritanes, and Scythopolitanes unto Jordan. On the East part it bordereth upon Hippene, L

The length of lower Galilee reacheth from Tiberias unto Zabulon; near which is Ptolemais by the sea coast. In breadth it reacheth from the village Xaloth, scituate in a great field, unto Bersabe, where also begins the breadth of high Galilee, and reacheth unto the village called Baca, bordering upon the Tyrians; and the length thereof is from a village near Jordan named Thella, unto Meroth. And being of such

For the Galileans are from their childhood warlike, and never are daunted by fear or penury; for their countrey is most fruitful, set with all manner of trees, and very fertile, notwithstanding M the inhabitants take small pains in tilling the ground. All parts thereof are tilled by the inhabitants, and there is no waste part.

There are many Cities, and in every place there are villages populus and rich: so that the least village there, hath in it above fifteen thousand inhabitans. And although Galilee be lesse in compasse then the region beyond the river, yet it is more populus, fertiler and richer then the same: for it is all tilled, and all beareth fruit. But that beyond the water, though it

Samaria is ſeated between Judæa and Galilee, beginning at a town ſcituate in a place called Ginæa, and endeth in the Toparchy of Acrabatena, nothing differing in nature from Judæa. For both of them are full of mountains and fields, and good for tillage; full of trees abounding both with wilde apples and others: for they are of their nature dry, but have rain enough, and have paſſing ſweet waters, & abundance of good graſſe, and great ſtore of milch beaſts, and which is a great argument of

CHAP. III.

How aid was ſent unto the people of Sephoris, and of the military diſcipline of the Romanes.

D I Have already ſpoken of Iudæa as briefly as might be, and with what countrey it is environed. Now Veſpaſian ſent help unto the inhabitants of Sephoris, to wit, one thouſand horſmen, and ſix thouſand foot, Placidus the Tribune being their Governour: the horſmen divided themſelves into two companies, lodged in a great Plain, and the footmen were in garriſon in the City for to defend it, but the horſmen ſtayed without. Theſe horſmen made excurſions on every ſide, and greatly moleſted Joſeph, who was quietly bent, and alſo ſpoiled all that was without the cities, and alwaies repulſed the inhabitants, if at any time they took courage to revenge themſelves. Notwithſtanding, Joſeph aſſaulted the city Sephoris, hoping to take it: which be before ſuch time as it revolted unto the Romans, had compaſſed with ſo ſtrong wals, that the Romans themſelves could not Veſpaſian ſendeth help to the Sephorites, but filleth Galilee with ſword and fire.

E have taken it; ſo his hope was fruſtrate: for neither by force nor fair means would the Sephorites yeeld unto him. Hereat the Romans being angry, troubled the countrey more then before: who now neither night nor day ceaſed from deſtroying it, but robbed and ſpoiled all they found, and all men able to bear arms they ſlew, and made the reſt their ſlaves; Thus all Galilee was filled with fire and ſword, and no man eſcaped that calamity; onely they ſaved themſelves, that fled into the cities that Joſeph had walled.

Titus came to Alexandria being winter, ſooner then he was expected; and ſo received there the ſouldiers that he was ſent for: and having a proſpeous journey, he quickly came to Ptolemais; and finding his father there with two of the chiefeſt legions; to wit, the fifth and tenth, he alſo adjoyned that fifteenth legion that he brought with him. And there followed them eighteen companies, five out of Cæſarea, one troup of horſmen, and five companies

Titus bringeth a mighty army into Iudæa.

F of horſmen out of Syria, ten of theſe companies of foot had in every one of them a thouſand men, the reſt onely ſix hundred and thirteen, and in every troup of horſmen, were an hundred and twenty. The Kings alſo brought great aid: for Antiochus, Agrippa, and Sohemus, brought each of them two thouſand bowmen, and a thouſand horſmen: and Malchus King of Arabia, brought five thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe, and the moſt of his footmen were Archers; ſo that the whole army, together with the kings aid, amounted unto the number of threeſcore thouſand horſe and foot together; beſides them that followed the camp, who were a great multitude, and not inferious unto the ſouldiers in warlike diſcipline: ſo that one may admire the Romanes, who ſo train up their ſervants in time of peace, that they are very fit for wars. So that whoſoever well beholdeth their military diſcipline, he shall perceive that they gained not this their goodly Empire by chance and fortune, but by vertue: for they do not onely then begin to use weapons when they come to fight, but they practise military discipline before they need: and they are not idle in time of peace, but alwayes practise themselves therein without ceasing. Their exercises are like war it self, and every souldier is every day exercised in every sort of weapons, even as though they were fighting against the enemy; so that hereby they easily indure the burthen and travel of wars. For their disorder doth not make them forget what to do, neither doth fear dismay them, nor continuance of fight & war weary and tire them. So that whosoever they fight against, who are not so well provided in these affairs, as they are, they alwayes overcome them: and one may well call their practices amongst themselves, conflicts without blood-shed: and their wars indeed, conflicts with bloodshed. They are not easily overcome at unawares: for in what enemy-countrey soever they come, they fight not before they have fortified their camp about, which they do not rashly, neither do they pitch their tents in marish or high places, after a disordred manner, for if the place be unequal, they make it plain. And they proportion their camp four-square: for they have many Smiths, and all kind of workmen needful, which do still follow the army, to accomplish such businesse. And in the innermost part of the camp they make Tabernacles, whose outside resembleth a wall, with towers equally distant one from another, and between them engines of war to cast stones, and such like, that all kind of shot may be in readinesse. They also build four gates large and wide, both for their cattel easily to come in at, and also for themselves if need require, to enter in or issue out speedily.

The diligence and labour of the Romanes in providing things necessary for the wars.

The industry of the Romanes.

The order of the Romanes in their camp.

The reverence and obedience of the Romane souldiers to their Captains.

Within the camp, there are streets divided into certain spaces: in the midst their rulers, and amongst them all, the Generals tent like a Temple so that it seemeth a city, and a market full of shops made in an instant. There are also seats builded for the Governours to judge of controversies, if any arise between the souldiers and others. All this place & all things belonging thereto are made in an instant, partly by reason of the multitude, partly by the industry of such as work: and if need require, they compasse it with a trench four cubits deep, and as many broad. Thus the souldiers enclosed with arms, do live quietly in their tents, without disorder, and all things are done with good advice and order, whether they need water, or corn, or wood, for they must all go to dinner at the time appointed, and all sleep at once, and a trumpet giveth notice when to watch and guard, and nothing is done that is not commanded. In the morning, all the souldiers come unto their captains to salute them, the captains to the tribunes, and they all to the General, and he giveth them a watch-word, and telleth them what he thinketh good, and how they shall behave themselves towards those that are under them, whereby in fight they may demean themselves, and well know when to assault, and when to retire. When they go forth of the camp, a trumpet soundeth, & no man is idle, but at the first beck taketh away his tabernacle, & maketh al ready for their departure. Then the trumpet soundeth again, warning them to be ready: and having loden their beasts, with their baggage, they expect the sound again, as though they were to run a race, and at their departure they burn their camp, because it is easie to build the like again, and also lest afterwards it may advantage their enemies. When the trumpet hath sounded the third time, which is a sign to set forward, then they hasten those that are slow, lest they forsake their order. And a crier standeth on the right hand of their General, asking thrice if they be prepared to fight, and they as often answer that they are, holding up their right hands with a lofty courage: and so they marche on easily, every man keeping his rank, as though they were ready to give battel. The footmen have a head piece, a brest plate, and a sword on the left side, and on the right side a dagger. The footmen guarding the General, have a Javelin and a shield: the rest armed every one with bucklers and pikes. Moreover, they carry a saw, a basket, a fardle, a hatchet, also a cord, a sythe, a chain, and victuals for three dayes; so that the footmen are as much loaden as the cattel. The horsmen carry at their right side a long sword, in the left hand a dart, & a long shield hanging against the horseside, and a quiver with three darts, with broad edges, which are as big as a spear: they have also helmets and brest-plates like the footmen. And the Generals horsmen that guard his body, do nothing differ from the rest. That company alwaies leadeth, that the lot falleth unto. And these are the fashions of the Romans concerning their warlike discipline. They never do any thing unadvisedly in battel, but manage all things according to counsel; so that they either do not erre, or if they do, their fault is easily amended. For they think that bad successe after deliberation, is better then good fortune without it; and they think that therein fortune did but flatter them, to work them some great despight, by reason they have not deliberated: but that which is premeditated, although it have evil successe, yet it maketh them

A them wary against another time. And none of them accounts that good ſucceſs, which cometh by chance, and yet every one is comforted in their misfortune, for that they take good advice, By the military exerciſes they do not only make the bodies of their ſouldiers ſtrong, but their minds alſo more hardy: and their diligence is the greater by their fear. For their laws are capitall, not onely for them that forſake their order, but alſo for them that commit the leaſt enormitie or negligence; and their Generals are more ſevere then their laws: who onely by rewarding the good, purchaſe favour, leſt they ſeem cruell in puniſhing the wicked. Moreover, they are ſo obedient to their Rulers, that in peace they honour them, and in warre the whole Army ſeemeth one body united together: they ſo keep order, and are ſo ready to turn here or there, and ſo attentive to any command, and alſo diligent to note ſignes made unto
B them, and ſo quick to labour with their hands, that they are alwayes apt to do any thing, but ſlow to endure. Inſomuch that they know no place, where they have been overcome, either by number, or courage, or councel, or by the difficultie of the place, nor by fortune it ſelf: For they think victorie more certain then fortune. Therefore ſeeing that their deeds are ruled by advice and councell, and their commandments ſo well fulfilled by the Army, what marvell is it if their Empire in the Eaſt reach unto Euphrates, in the Weſt unto the Ocean, in the South unto Affrick, in the North unto Rhene and Danubius? ſeeing that one may juſtly affirm the poſſeſſion leſs then the poſſeſſors. This I have ſpoken, not to praiſe the Romans, but to comfort the conquered, and to terrifie thoſe that deſire alteration: and perhaps it may teach them who want good diſcipline, and are ignorant of the manners and cuſtomes of the Romans in their military affairs.

How Placidus aſſaulted Jotapata.

IN the mean time Veſpaſian living at Ptolemais with his ſon Titus, prepared his Army. But Placidus was already entred into Galilee and run thorow it, where he ſlew almoſt all he found who were of the weaker ſort of people and cowards: and ſeeing that thoſe of courage alwayes fled into the Cities that Joſeph had fortified, he turned his forces againſt Jotapata, which was the ſtrongeſt of them, thinking it might eaſily be taken by a ſudden aſſault, and that he thereby ſhould get great glory, and that by taking it great profit might D enſue, in that the people ſeeing the ſtrongeſt Citie ſurprized, they would not flie to any again. But it fell not out as he expected; for the people of Jotapata underſtanding of his coming, met him neer the town, and ſuddenly encountring the Romans, being a great multitude and well diſpoſed to fight, as thoſe that bare arms for the generall ſafetie of the Countrey, and the lives of their wives and children, they put the Romans to flight, wounding many, only ſeven being ſlain: for the Romans in flying, kept their ranks: and being armed round about, they were not dangerouſly wounded; but the Jews being unarmed, rather truſted to their Darts and Arrows then to handy blows. There were three Jewes ſlain, and a few wounded: and ſo Placidus when he ſaw himſelf repulſed from the town, he fled.

CHAP. V.

How Veſpaſian invaded Galilee and how at the very ſight of him the ſeditious fled.

VEſpaſian deſirous to take Galilee himſelf, departed from Ptolemais, making ſuch journeyes as ſouldiers ought to keep, which the Romanes are wont to follow. And he commanded thoſe that came to help him, and the bowmen, becauſe they were lighter armed, to goe before and repreſſe the enemies incurſions, and ſearch the Wood and Forreſt fit for ambuſhes, whereby they were to paſſe: after them followed part of the Romane footmen and horſemen: and after them their marched tenne by tenne out of every F hundreth; bearing with them their Armour, and the meaſures of their Camp. After them, followed men, whoſe office it was to mend the wayes, where they were bad, and cut down the Woods that were in the way, leſt with bad way the Army were tired. After them he ſent his baggage, and the baggage of the Rulers under him, and withall horſemen to guard it. And after them he himſelf followed, leading an Army of choſen footmen and horſemen, accompanied with his own guard of horſemen, and he had out of every legion ſixſcore men for his own guard. After followed they that carried the Engines to batter the walls of the cities, and other inſtruments, and with the Prefects and Tribunes, guarded with their choſen ſouldiers. After them other Enſignes, and the Eagle, the which the Romans hold for chief of all, becauſe it is the King of all Birds, and is moſt valiant and ſtrong wherefore they think it a ſign of dominion and victory, over all them againſt whom they bear it. After theſe ſacred Enſigns followed the Trumpets ſounding in warlike maner; and after them the Army marching ſix in a rank; and as the cuſtom is, a Centurion went by them to keep order: the ſervants were all with the footmen and baggage. After the laſt company who were hired, followed armed footmen and horſmen in great number. And thus Veſpaſian with his whole Army came unto the borders of Galilee: and there pitching his tents, he ſtayed the ſouldiers who were very eager to fight; as it were boaſting and ſhewing his Army to terrifie his adverſaries, and giving them time to repent, if any one would alter his mind before the war began, yet did he prepare to beſiege the walls and fortreſſes. The only ſight of him made many rebels fly, and daunted the moſt of them. For Joſephs ſouldiers who had pitched his tents a litle from Sephoris, when they knew that war grew on, and that they were preſently to fight with the Romans, they did not only fly before they fought; but alſo before they ſaw their enemies. Joſeph being left with a very few, knowing he was not able to abide the enemies; and that the Jews were diſcomfited, and that if he put any truſt in them, they would for the moſt part revolt unto the enemies; for that time abſtained from all war, and thought to get himſelf out of danger: and ſo accompanied with them that remained with him, he went to Tiberias.

CHAP. VI.

How Gadara was beſieged and taken.

Veſpaſian went unto Gadara, and took it at the firſt aſſault; for all able men fit for war were fled out of the city; and entring the city, he put all to death. For the Romans had no mercy, partly for the hatred they conceived againſt the Jews, and partly in revenge of that which had betaln Ceſtius. And they burned the city, and all towns and villages adjoyning: ſome of them being already deſolate, and the inhabitants of the reſt were made ſlaves. Joſeph fled into the city which he made choice of for his ſafegard, and filled it with fear. For the people of Tiberias thought he would neuer have fled, if there had been any hope of withſtanding the Romans: wherein they judged not amiſs: for he did foreſee what event thoſe wars would have, and that their only ſafety conſiſted in changing their rebellious mind. He himſelf, though he hoped to obtain pardon of the Romans, yet had he far more rather have died, then to have lived pleaſantly with them, againſt whom he was ſent, and ſo become a traitor unto his countrey committed to his charge. Wherefore, he determined faithfully to write all his eſtate, and the eſtate of the countrey unto the Nobility at Jeruſalem, and not to extoll the enemies forces too much, leſt they ſhould ſay he was a coward; nor yet putting them in any comfort, leſt perhaps they now penitent for that they had done, again by his letters ſhould be incited to go forward in their rebellious courſe: willing them preſently to write an anſwer, whether they thought it good to enter the league with the Romans; or if they would make war, then they ſhould ſend a ſufficient Army againſt the Romans: and having written to this effect, he preſently ſent men away to Jeruſalem, to bear theſe letters.

Ioſeph is afraid of the Romans and writeth to Ieruſalem.

CHAP. VII.

Of the ſiege of Jotapata.

Veſpaſian was very deſirous to take Jotapata, for that he knew many of his enemies were fled thither, and for that this was the ſtrongeſt refuge they had. So he ſent before, footmen and horſemen, to plain the wayes which were full of ragged ſtones, ſo that it was hard for footmen to paſſe, and altogether unpoſſible for horſemen: who within foure dayes effected that which they were commanded, and made a large way for the Army to paſſe: And the fifth day, which was the one and twentieth of March, Joſeph before they came, entred into the Citie, coming thither from Tiberias to encourage the Jews who were diſmayed. A certain run-away told Veſpaſian that Joſeph was come thither, willing him to haſten thither, for if he could take Joſeph, he might eaſily take all Judæa. Hereat Veſpaſian was very glad, and took it as good fortune, that the moſt prudent and potent of his enemies, ſhould (God at that time ſo working) put himſelf as it were in hold; and ſo preſently he ſent Placidus before with a thouſand horſemen, and with him Captain Ebutius, a man both ſtrong, valiant and prudent, and commanded them to compaſſe the Citie with a ſiege, leſt

A leſt Joſeph ſhould privily eſcape from thence. The day after he himſelf followed with the whole army, and about noon came to Jotapata, and leading his army unto the North ſide of the Town, he pitched his Tents upon a hill ſeven ſtounds diſtant from the citie. Upon purpoſe placing himſelf within the view of his enemies, that the very ſight of his Army might terrifie them: which he alſo did; for preſently every one was in ſuch a fear, that none durſt go out of the citie. The Romans being wearied all that day, would not aſſault the city: wherefore they invironed the Town with two ſquadrons, and the third, that conſiſted in horſemen, was placed without to intercept all paſſage, that none of the Jews could paſſe any whither. Hereby the Jews now in deſperation took heart; for in war nothing is more forcible then neceſſitie. The next day began the battery, and every Jew kept his quarter, and kept themſelves in

B order, and reſiſted the Romans before their walls. But when Veſpaſian ſent all the bowmen, and thoſe who caſt darts and other things to beat them off from the walls, and he himſelf with footmen aſſaulted the walls in another place where they might eaſily be entred: then Joſeph fearing the citie, accompanied with all the people iſſued out of the Town, and aſſaulted the Romans fiercely, and did drive them from the walls, ſhewing courage and ſtrength: and they themſelves ſuffered as much harm as they did unto their enemies. For as they were encouraged with deſperation, ſo were the Romans with ſhame, who were armed with military knowledge and ſtrength, and the Jewes onely with anger. And the fight continued all day even untill night; wherein many Romans were wounded, and onely thirteen ſlain: and of the Jewes there were ſix hundreth wounded, and ſeventeen ſlain. The next day alſo

Nothing is more effectuall in warre or more deſperate then neceſſity.

A fight betwixt the Romans and the Jews continued a whole day, and broken off by night.

C they met the Romans, and reſiſted them more ſtoutly then before, taking courage for that they the day before had reſiſted them contrary to their expectation: and all the Romanes fought more valiantly, aſhamed as it were of themſelves, in ſuffering the Jews to reſiſt them; thinking withall that they themſelves were overcome, if they did not quickly ſuppreſs their enemies. Wherefore the Romans for five dayes together ceaſed not to aſſault the Town, and the Jews ſtrongly rebatted them: and now neither the Jews feared their enemies, nor the Romans were diſmayed with the difficultie of taking the town. Jotapata is almoſt all ſcituate upon a rock, and compaſſed about with deep valleyes, which deſcend ſtraight down like a wall: ſo that one can ſcarcely ſee the bottome. There is onely acceſſe unto it on the North part, where it is ſeated upon a mountain going overthwart; which Joſeph incloſed with a wall,

The ſcituation of Jotapata.

D to the end it might be no paſſage for the enemies: all the reſt of the City is environed with high mountains, ſo that it cannot be diſcerned by any before they be hard at it. And Jotapata was thus ſtrengthened.

Veſpaſian determined both to ſtrive againſt the nature of the place, and hardineſſe of the Iews; and therefore called all his Captains together, and conſulted with them to begin a hot ſiege: at laſt they reſolved to rear a mount in that place where the Citie was eaſieſt to be entred. He ſent his whole Army to provide wood to do it, who cut down the mountains neer unto the Town: and great ſtore of wood and ſtone being brought, ſetting hurdles before them to bear off the darts and arrows, he began to raiſe a mount; ſo that they received little or no harm by darts caſt from off the walls: others brought earth from places thereabout, and no man was idle. The Iewes caſt continually great ſtones and all kind of darts upon that

E which defended them; which though they pierced not thorow, yet they made a great noiſe and terrified the workmen. Which Veſpaſian ſeeing, cauſed all Engines that did caſt ſtones, and darts, which were in number an hundred and threeſcore, to be placed againſt the walls, to beat the Iews from thence. And ſo they caſt ſtones, and darts, and fire, and arrows in great abundance: ſo that they did not onely beat the Iews from off the walls, but alſo out of the reach of their ſhot; for both the Arabian Archers, and thoſe that uſed ſlings and darts, and all the Engines continually played upon them. For all this the Iewes reſted not, but running out in companies as thieves, they tooke away that which defended the workmen, and then aſ-

F ſaulted them having no defence: and when they had beaten them away, deſtroyed and fired all that the Romans had wrought for their own defence and ſafeguard. At laſt Veſpaſian perceived that theſe damages happened, for that there was ſpace left between all theſe works, whereby the enemies had acceſſe to doe them ſuch harms: wherefore he united them together, and ſo hindred the privie excurſions of the Iews. When the mount was almoſt made, and the towers upon it finiſhed, Joſeph afraid to do nothing for the ſafeguard of the town, called all workmen neceſſary together, and commanded them to make the wall there higher; but they ſaid, it was unpoſſible for them to work, for the number of ſhot in that place. Then Joſeph made this device to defend them: he fixed ſtakes in the ground, and faſtned unto them hides of Kine and Oxen new ſlain, by which they were defended from ſhot, and fire; ſo that they labouring night and day raiſed the wall twentie cubits high, erecting alſo upon it many towers:

and by this means made it a ſtrong defence. Whereat the Romanes, who before thought themſelves ſure of the Town, were now greatly diſmayed both by this device of Joſephs, and alſo by the hardineſs of the Jews. G

CHAP. VIII.

Of the ſiege of Jotapata by Veſpaſian, and the diligence that Joſeph uſed, and how the Jews made excurſions againſt the Romans.

THis ſtratagem and the carriage of the Jews greatly moved Veſpaſian: for now they receiving courage in that defence, made aſſaults upon the Romanes of their own accord, and every day skirmiſhed, running out in companies, and like thieves, taking away whatſoever they lighted upon; and what they could not carry away, they ſet on fire. At laſt, Veſpaſian would not permit his ſouldiers to fight any longer: but determined now to beſiege it, and take it by want of victuals, purpoſing either to make them come and yield themſelves for lack of food, or if they held out, to famiſh them: and that it would be more eaſie to take it by force, if ceaſing a while from aſſaulting it, he afterward ſet upon it, they being in anguiſh for the danger they were in. Wherefore he commanded all paſſages to be kept, that none could goe out of the Citie, but they had great ſtore of Corn, and of all other things elſe, except Salt and Water, whereof they ſtood in great want: for there is never a fountain in the Citie, and they have little rain in Summer-time, ſo that the inhabitants were in great diſtreſs; for now there was hardly any water left in the Citie. Joſeph perceiving there was abundance of all things elſe, and that the Citizens were valiant, as alſo the ſiege like to continue long, he gave to every one water in meaſure: with which they were not contented, thinking it as good to want altogether, as to have it in that maner; and now they began to faint, as though they had ſuffered extreme drought. The Romanes perceiving this, being upon a high hill, over againſt the place whither all the Jews came together to receive water, they with their ſhot killed many that came thither, inſomuch that Veſpaſian hoped that within ſhort time their water would be ſpent, and they conſtrained to yield. But Joſeph to fruſtrate this hope, commanded a great many garments to be laid in water and hanged upon the walls, ſo that the water might run down on every ſide. When the Romans ſaw this, they were much grieved & afraid, for that they waſted ſo much water in mockery, and before had thought that they had wanted water to drink. And now Veſpaſian ſcorning to win the City by ſiege, purpoſed to aſſault it again by force. The Jews were very glad of this: and the Citie being in danger, rather wiſhed to be ſlain then periſh through hunger or thirſt. Joſeph deviſed alſo another way to get ſuch neceſſaries as he wanted, out of the Countrey: for there was a valley out of the way, and therefore not regarded by the Romans: wherefore Joſeph ſent men into the Countrey to his friends, for ſuch things as the Citie wanted, by this way, commanding them when they came neer the watchmen to hide and cover themſelves with hairie skins, that the watchmen might think them to be dogs: and this he uſed a good ſpace, till at laſt the watchmen perceived it, and ſo ſet a guard there to ſtop the paſſage. When Joſeph perceived the Citie could not hold out long, and fearing his own life, if ſtill he continued there, he treated with the chief of the Citie that he might flie. But the people perceiving his intent, flocked about him, and beſought him to take pitie upon them, and not forſake them, who had no hope but in him, affirming, that for his ſake they were all couragious and bold to fight; and if they were taken, yet he would be a comfort unto them, telling him that it did not become him to flie from his enemies, nor to forſake his friends, neither as it were, to leap out of a ſhip ſhaken with a tempeſt, into the which he came when the Seas were calm, for ſo by this means he would ſoon overthrow the Citie; and once gone, no man afterward could or durſt reſiſt their enemies, for in him was all their hope.

Joſeph kept it to himſelf that his purpoſe was to work his own ſafetie: for he told them the thing which he intended was for their good, affirming, that though he ſtayed ſtill in the citie, yet he could do them litle good: and if the citie ſhould chance to be taken, then he and they were like to periſh; but if he were abroad and not beſieged, he could do them great good; for he would preſently aſſemble all the people of Galilee, and come againſt the Romans, and ſo raiſe their ſiege; whereas now in ſtaying with them, he ſaw not wherein he did them any good, but rather incited the Romans againſt them, making them more earneſt to take the Town then they would be, onely becauſe he was there, that they might take him; but if they knew once that he were fled, they would not then be ſo earneſt in the ſiege. A Joſeph herewith could not perſwade the people, but they flocked faſter about him, and both young and old of all ſorts came and proſtrated themſelves at his feet, weeping, and beſeeching him to take ſuch hap as ſhould befall them, whether it were good or bad; not for that they envied his eſcape, but for that they hoped they ſhould receive no harm if he remained with them.

He then bethought himſelf that if he ſtayed with them, he fulfilled their requeſt; and if he denied, he feared they would force him. Wherefore being partly moved by compaſſion, he determined to ſtay; and being now, as all the Citie was, deſperate, he told them that now it was time to fight, ſeeing there was no hope of ſafetie: and that it was a goodly matter to ſpend their lives renownedly, and do ſome noble act to leave a remembrance unto their poſteritie of their valour: and went about it. And ſo iſſuing out of the Citie with the moſt valiant among them, when he had killed the watchmen, at the firſt encounter he came even unto the Romans Tents, and tore the skins that their Tents were made of, and fired others, and their Engines: and ſo he did the ſecond and third day, and for certain daies and nights afterward never ceaſed. When Veſpaſian perceived the Romans greatly endamaged by ſuch incurſions, and very loth to flie for ſhame, and not able to follow them being ſo loaden with their Armour, and that the Jews alwayes did ſome exploit before they retired themſelves into the Citie, he gave commandement unto his ſouldiers to leave their aſſault, and not to fight againſt men who deſired to die, affirming, that no men were ſtronger then thoſe in deſperation, and that if they found none to aſſail, their courage would ſoon be laid; like unto a flame of fire, when the matter that nouriſheth it is conſumed. Moreover, the Romans muſt ſeek C victory more warily, for that they fought not for neceſſitie, but onely to increaſe their Dominions: and after that, oftentimes they beat the Jews by the Arabian Archers, and with ſlings and darts, and other ſhot which never ceaſed, and ſo the Jewes by this means were repreſſed. But ſo ſoon as they were without the danger of the ſhot, they more furiouſly aſſailed the Romans, ſparing neither body nor mind, but continually fought by turns, and every one of the Citie aſſiſted them that ſo laboured.

How Veſpaſian did beat the walls of Jotapata with a Ramme, and other warlike Engines.

Veſpaſian thinking himſelf as it were beſieged, both for the long time which he had continued the ſiege, and alſo for the divers aſſaults and privie excurſions of the Jews; having now almoſt raiſed the Rampires as high as the walls of the Citie, determined to batter them with a Ramme. A Ramme is a huge beam like the maſt of a ſhip, whoſe end is armed with a ſtrong maſſive Iron, and made in the form of a Rams head: whereupon it takes his name, becauſe he butteth with his head. It hangeth on another beam with ropes, like the beam of a pair of ballances: the beam it hangeth on lying acroſs, is held up with two E props, which being drawn back by force of many men, and then jointly with all their forces ſhooved forward, it ſtriketh the wall with the head of Iron: And there is no wall nor tower ſo ſtrong, but though it abide the firſt ſtroke of the Engine, yet can it not hold out long. The Generall of the Romans thought good to uſe this means to take the Citie by force, for that the ſiege was dangerous, by reaſon that the Jews never reſted; ſo the Romans with all kind of ſhot, endeavoured to beat the Jews from off the walls that made any reſiſtance: and the Archers and they who uſed ſlings, were hard by: and when they ſaw that none of the Jewes durſt come upon the walls, they applied the Ramme unto them; and covered it aloft with hurdles and skins, both for to defend themſelves and the Engine, and at the firſt aſſault the walls were ſhaken, ſo that the Citizens cried, as though the town had been already taken. F Joſeph ſeeing them ſtill beat one place, and that preſently the wall would fall, deviſed a way to reſiſt the force of the Ram, and ſo he filled ſacks with chaff, and let them down off the wall juſt againſt that place, where the Ram ſtrook ordinarily, and ſo brake the force of the blows, the looſeneſs of the chaff making no reſiſtance; and ſo drowning or abating the violence of the ſtroke. By this means the Romanes were hindred: for whitherſoever they brought the Ram, thither did they upon the wals alſo remove the ſacks of chaff, and brake the force thereof: till at laſt the Romanes alſo deviſed away to cut the ſacks, taking long poles, and binding Sithes unto the end of them, and ſo cut theſe ſacks of chaff. And the Ram ſhook the wall, and the wall newly built was not ſtrong enough to reſiſt. Then Joſeph and his ſouldiers ſought to help themſelves by fireworks, and ſo they fired all that was made of drie wood in three ſeverall verall places, and withall the Engines, and Forts, and Mounts of the Romanes, who now had much ado to defend themselves: first, because that they were terrified with the valour of the Jews: and secondly, because every one had work enough to defend himself against the fire, which seizing upon drie matter with Brimstone and pitch wonderfully increased, so that in one houres space, it consumed all the works that the Romans had made with so great labour. There was a Jew the son of Samæus called Eleazar, who deserved eternall memory: this man was born at Saab in Galilee. This Eleazar took up a great stone, and cast it down with such force upon the Ram, that he brake off the head thereof; and nothing fearing, leapt down amongst the midst of his enemies, and brought it away into the Citie: at the last being unarmed, and as it were a mark for his enemies to shoot at, he received in his body five arrows; and as though he had not felt them, so soon as he had gotten up the wall where all might see him, he boldly stood still, and so through grief of his wounds having the head of the Ram in his arms fell down. Next unto him two brethren of Ramath in Galilee shewed themselves valiant, named Natiras and Philip, who assaulted the tenth legion of the Romans with such violence, that they brake their ranks, and put all to flight that sought to withstand them: which Joseph and those that were with him perceiving, took fire and burnt the Engines, works and defences of the fifth and tenth legions that were fled, and those that followed destroyed all Engines, and other matter that was left. In the evening the Romans erected the Ram against that part of the citie which before they had beaten: and one of the Jews shot an arrow from the wall, and wounded Vespasian in the sole of the foot, yet the wound was not great, for that the force of the arrow was spent before it came to him, having come a great way off.

Vespasian wounded in the sole of the foot by an arrow.

This fact greatly troubled the Romans, who seeing Vespasian bleed, presently spread these news through the whole Army, and almost all of them came running to see their Generall, and especially Titus, who feared his fathers death: so that the whole Army partly for the love of their Generall, and partly for the fear of Titus his son, were greatly troubled: but Vespasian presently freed the Army from all perturbation; and his son Titus from fear. For the grief of the wound being past, he shewed himself to all that were sorrowfull for him, and incited them to fight against the Jews more earnestly then before; and now every one as it were to revenge their Generall, despised all danger, and assaulted the walls, one exhorting another. Joseph and his associates, notwithstanding, that many of them were killed with shot, darts and arrows; yet they forsook not the wals, but with fire and sword, and stones fiercely assaulted them, that being defended with hurdles, battered the walls with the Ram, but to little purpose: for they were continually killed, being in sight of their enemies, and for that they could not see them, presently were stricken down, for their fire did make such a light, as though it had been day, so that the Romans easily perceived whither to direct their shot: And for that their Engines were not perceived afar off, the Jews could not defend themselves from the arrowes and stones that were shot against them, by which means many of them were slain, and the tops and corners of the Towers beaten down. And there was no man so well guarded, but he was slain by force of those stones; so that any man may know of what force that Engine is, by that which hapned that night. For one that stood neer Joseph upon the wall, was stricken with a stone, and his head carried from his body by violence of that blow three furlongs, as though it had been cast out of a sling: and the next day a woman great with childe was stricken on the belly with one of those stones, and the child carried forth of her from the place where she was stricken three furlongs; so great was the force of this Engine: Therefore the violence of the Engines was more terrible, and likewise the noise of darts, arrows and other shot. And many were slain on every side, and the bodies of those that were killed, stricken against the wall made a noise: and within the Citie was heard a pitifull lamentation, and weeping amongst the women; and without, a heavie mourning and cry of them, that were wounded to death; and all that part of the wall where the fight was, flowed with blood: so that now the multitude of dead bodies had so filled the ditch before the wall, that the Romanes might easily passe over into the Citie, and the mountains about did eccho with the cries of the Citizens: and all that night long nothing wanted, that either might by the eye or ear move terrour. And many stoutly fighting for Jotapata died most valiantly, many also were sore wounded: and notwithstanding the wall was continually battered, yet it was almost morning before it fell, being all night long beaten with the Ram. And then they of Jotapata repaired the breach with their bodies and armour, before the Romans could set bridges to enter it.

How Jotapata was again assaulted.

The yeer of the world, 4031. after Christs nativity. 69.

IN the morning Vespasian brought his Army to enter the breach, having given them but little rest after their whole nights labour: and desirous to make the Jewes that defended the breach, to forsake their place, before such time as he entred, he took the most valliant of his horsemen, and unhorsed them, being armed from the head to the foot, and placed them in three ranks; that they being so armed, might besiege round that part of the wall
B that was battered, and so take long pikes in their hands, so that as soon as the bridges were set, they should first enter the breach. After them he placed the strongest of his footmen: the rest of his horsemen he set round about the Citie upon the mountain, to the end that none might escape thereabout: after the footmen, he commanded Archers to follow with their arrowes ready in their hands, and them that used slings also, and other Engines for shot. And he caused other to scale the walls, where they were not battered, to the intent that the Townsmen, busied in resisting them, might leave the breach unmanned; and the rest being wearied and oppresst with the thicknesse of the shot, should of force forsake their standing. But Joseph, perceiving his intent, placed old men and children, and those that were already wearied upon those parts of the walls that were not battered: and himself with the stoutest of the Citie went to defend the breach, and placed six men before them, whom he chose out himself being
C one of them to sustain the first brunt of their enemies assault: commanding them likewise to stop their ears, to the end that they might not be terrified with the cries of the Army. He willed them also to defend themselves with shields against the darts & arrows, and gave back a little, till such time as the Archers quivers were emptied: and if so be that the Romanes should offer to make bridges, that then they with their instruments should resist; and that every one should now fight, not to defend his countrey, but as it were to recover it, being in a manner already lost; and imagine, that they now did see their aged men slain with their children, and their wives almost taken with their enemies, and now to revenge themselves upon those that hereafter would massacre their whole Citie: and thus he appointed men in both places. The weaker multitude, women and children, seeing the Citie compassed about D with three ranks of horsemen, and that the Romans with their swords drawn pressed against the breach, that all the mountains about did shine and glitter with their weapons that were placed there, and certain Arabians to serve the Archers with arrowes: they cried out as though the Citie were now taken, so, that a man would have judged them already amiddest their enemies swords, and not onely in danger to fall into their hands. Wherefore Joseph commanded the women to their houses, lest their cries should effeminate his souldiers minds; willing them likewise to keep silence, and threatned them if they did not: and so he marched to the breach, which place fell to his lot, and gave no heed to them that sought to scale the wals, but onely beheld a far off the force of the arrows.

When all the Trumpets began to sound, and the Air to be obscured with the multitude of E arrows; Josephs companions remembring the charge given them, stopped their ears, and armed their bodies against the shot of arrows: And so soon as the bridges were set against the wall, presently they ran; and before the Romans could enter upon them, they got them into their hands, and resisted them that sought to come upon them, shewing great prowesse and strength, and themselves no way inferiour unto the Romans, though they were in extreame danger, and the Romans in none: and did not give one foot back, till either they did kill, or were killed. But the Jews had not any fresh men to second them that were tired; and the Romanes, still as they were wearied, sent fresh supply, and joyning together their long shields, exhorting one another, they became as it were a wall or defence invincible; and F the whole Army like one body, did beat back the Jews, and so set foot on the wals. Then Joseph, in this desperate case, devised some way to repell this present calamity: wherefore he commanded the Jewes to fetch scalding oyle, which they had ready, and poure it upon the Romanes yet seething, who also cast the pans upon them. This device brake the ranks of the Romanes, so that with great pain and grief they fell from the wall, and tumbled down: for the scalding oyle easily got between their flesh and Armour, and scorched them like fire being easily heated, and long continuing hot by reason of the fatnesse; and the Romanes being loaden with helmets and brest-plates, could not flee; so that some leapt down off the bridge, and others for grief died; others would fain have retired themselves, but could not, because their enemies followed them so hard. But neither the Romanes wanted vertue and valour valour in adverſe fortune,nor the Jews prudence and good advice.For the Romans, notwithſtanding they were in intolerable pain,being ſcalded with hot oyl, yet did they freſhly aſſault them that hurt them,and every one did thruſt him forward that was before him, as it were deſirous to ſhew their courage. Then the Jews uſed another device to make them retire:for they poured fenugreek boyled upon the bridge, ſo that they ſlid down: and neither they that would have fled,nor they who did ſtrive to aſſault the Jews,could ſtand upon their feet, it was ſo ſlippery;and many falling down upon the bridge,were by their own company trodden to death; others did ſlide down upon the Rampier; and alwaies as they fell, the Jewes ſtruck them:and ſeeing that the Romans were retired from the place,ſo that now they were not forced to handy blows,they had leiſure to ſhoot arrows and darts againſt them. When Veſpaſian ſaw that his men in that fight indured much miſery, towards evening he cauſed them to retire,many being ſlain,and more wounded,and 6. men of Jotapata were ſlain, and above 300. wounded:this fight was upon the 20 day of June. But after that Veſpaſian had comforted his ſouldiers for that which had hapned,and perceiving that the were angry, and deſired to fight to revenge themſelves,ſo that they needed no exhortation; he raiſed the Rampier higher,and erected three towers 50. foot high,covering them aloft with iron, that ſo by reaſon of their weight they might ſtand ſtedfaſt,and not be conſumed by fire; and theſe he placed upon the Rampire,and in them Archers,and men that caſt darts and ſuch like: who not being perceived of them that were upon the wals,by reaſon of the highneſs of the towers,and the covering thereof,eaſily wounded them who were placed thereon.So the Jews when they could not avoid the arrows,nor be revenged upon them whom they could not ſee,nor yet fire the towers being covered with plates of iron,forſook the wals; yet alwaies encountred with them who ſought to enter.And the people of Iotapata thus reſiſted,notwithſtanding,that many every day were ſlain, and that they did their enemies no harm without great danger to themſelves.

How Japha was taken by Trajanus and Titus.

AT this time Veſpaſian underſtood that Japha, a City neer Jotapata, minded to rebell, encouraged ſo to do, for that they underſtood how they of Jotapata had held out contrarie to all expectation: wherefore he ſent thither Trajanus, Governour of the tenth legion,and with him 2000. footmen,and a thouſand horſe: who perceiving the Town able to reſiſt,and the inhabitants prepared for to fight, and come out to meet him, (for the town being for the ſcituation ſtrong enough,it was alſo compaſſed with a double wall)ſeeing this,he fought with them, and after a while put them to flight, and the Romanes following them,brake in with them at the firſt gate: which the Citizens perceiving, ſhut the ſecond gate, not ſuffering their own Citizens to enter in, for fear that the enemies alſo ſhould ruſh in with them, as they had done into the firſt gate. Truly, God gave that victory unto the Romanes, whoſe will it was, that all the warlike men of the Citie ſhould have their own gates ſhut upon them, and ſo fall into their enemies hands,who were moſt greedie to deſtroy them. For many came to the gates,and called thoſe that kept them by their names, pittifully intreating that they might come in: which whileſt they did, they were butchered like ſheep, being incloſed between two walls: their own Citizens, having ſhut one gate upon them, and the Romanes the other: and many thus encloſed periſhed with their fellowes ſwords,and an infinite number by the rage of the Romanes, having no courage to reſiſt and revenge themſelves. For the Treaſon of their own Citizens,and the terrour of their enemies together, utterly diſcouraged them,and ſo they died all in number 12000. not curſing the Romanes, but the Jewes their own Countrey-men. Trajane, thinking that the Citie was now deſtitute of fighting men, or if any were within, that they durſt not reſiſt being thus terrified,reſerved the taking of the Citie for the Generall, and ſent meſſengers unto him, requeſting him to ſend his ſonne Titus to make an end of the victorie. Veſpaſian,fearing that yet there would be ſome reſiſtance, ſent Titus with 500. horſemen, and 1000. foot who haſtening thither,placed Trajanus on the left ſide of the town,and himſelf on the right: ſo the Romans on every ſide ſcaled the walls, and the Galileans having a while reſiſted, preſently left them. Then Titus and his followers leaping down,preſently got into the City, and began a vehement fight with them that were aſſembled therein, ſome valiantly iſſuing out of the narrow ſtreets,and aſſaulting them, and the women caſting ſuch things as they could get, upon the Romanes, from the toppes of their houſes, and thus they held battell ſixe houres. How Cærealis conquered the Samaritans.

B THe Samaritans alſo were partakers of his calamitie, who aſſembled themſelves together in mount Garizin, which they accounted a ſacred place. But both their aſſembly and their courage did portend their wars: and not warned by their neighbours harmes, nor with any advice or judgement, conſidering their own infirmitie, and the Romans power, began to be tumultuous. Veſpaſian foreſeeing this, thought it good to prevent them: and although all the Region of Samaria had Garriſons in it, yet for all the great multitude aſſembled, it was thought that the Garriſons were able to keep them under. Wherefore, he ſent thither Cærealis, the Tribune of the fifth Legion, with ſixe hundereth horſemed, and three thouſand footmen. Cærealis thought it not the beſt way to goe unto the mountain, and fight with the whole multitude, becauſe a great many of their enemies were upon it: wherefore he commanded his ſouldiers to beleaguer the mountain about, at the foot thereof, and to keep them there all the whole day. There happened at that time C a vehement heat, and the Samaritanes wanted water: for it was then Summer, and the people had not provided themſelves of victuals, ſo that many in one day onely for want of drink died of thirſt, the reſt preferred death before the miſery they endured, and ſo fled to the Romanes: of whom Cærealis learned that thoſe that yet remained on the mount, were even diſmayed by the miſery they endured. Wherefore he aſcended the mountain, and compaſſing about the enemies with his Army, he firſt exhorted them to yield, willing them to ſave themſelves, promiſing them all their lives, if they would caſt down their weapons: but nothing prevailing with them, he ſet upon them, and killd them all, in number 11000. and 600. and this was done the 27. day of June. How Jotapata was taken.

THe Citizens of Jotapata indured this hard ſiege contrary to all expectation, and in the ſeven and fourtieth day, the Romanes mounts were raiſed higher then their walls: on the ſame day one of the Citie fled unto Veſpaſian, and told him in what caſe the Citie ſtood, and how few Citizens were left, and that with dayly watchings and fighting they were far ſpent, whereby they were not able to reſiſt any more, and that they E might be taken by policy if they were followed: for in the laſt part of the night, being weary, they ceaſed from their labour, and ſlept untill the morning: wherefore he perſwaded Veſpaſian to aſſault them at that time. But Veſpaſian knowing how faithfull the Jewes were one unto another, and how they contemned all puniſhment, gave litle credit to this run-away: for a litle before, one of Jotapata being taken, could not by any torments be compelled to confeſs, or diſcloſe the eſtate of the Citie, whom the fire nothing moved, and ſo at laſt he was crucified, laughing and ſcorning death: yet a probable conjecture which he had, perſwaded him to give credit ſomewhat to this Traitors words: and for that he knew no great harm could befall him, if he ſo aſſaulted the city as the Traitor willed, he commanded the F man to be kept, and made all his Army in readineſſe to aſſault the Town. So at the houre appointed, he made towards the wall with ſilence; Titus being the firſt, accompanied with one Domitius Sabinus, a tribune, and a few of the 15. legion: who killing the watchmen, entred into the citie, and after them Sextus Cærealis and Placidus, with their companies; ſo the Caſtle was taken, and the enemies were in the midſt of the town, and it was fair day-light, and yet the Townſmen knew nothing, being now faſt aſleep after their great labours and watchings: and they that did watch could ſee nothing, there was ſo thick a miſt by chance that morning, and the reſt never wakned till death was at their door; and that they perceived their calamitie and deſtruction. of the ſiege, did neither ſpare nor pitie any one: but driving the people out of the higher part of the Citie into the lower part thereof, they maſſacred them all, where they that would, could not fight for the narrowneſſe of the place: ſo being cumbred for want of room, and ſliding down the banks for haſte, their enemies ſtill purſuing them, they were eaſily ſlain. Many of Joſephs guard ſeeing this, that they could not fight, gathered themſelves together in a corner of the citie, and ſlew themſelves, that the Romans might not kill them. But ſome of the Watchmen, who firſt perceived the citie to be taken, fled into a Tower, and reſiſted a while (this Tower was ſcituate in the North ſide of the citie) and at laſt, being invironed with their enemies, towards Evening yielded, and offered themſelves to be ſlain. And the Romans might have boaſted that that victory had been without blood-ſhed on their part, had not Antonius a Centurion been ſlain treacherouſly. For one of them who fled into the Caves (as many did) requeſted Antonius to give him his hand, in token that he might come out ſafe and without danger: which he doing unadviſedly, ſtraightway the Jew with a ſpear ſmote him in the flank, whereof he preſently died. CHAP. XIV. I

How Joſeph was taken, and how he redeemed his life with deeds and words.

BUt eſpecially, above all others, the Romans made diligent ſearch for Joſeph, both for the hatred they bare him, and alſo becauſe Veſpaſian greatly deſired to get him, for that he being taken, the greateſt part of the Warres were then ended; ſo they ſought him among the dead, and amongſt thoſe that were hid; but he, (Fortune favouring him) when the Citie was taken, eſcaped from the midſt of his enemies, and lept into a deep Well, which had a large Cave on the one ſide, the which they above could not perceive; where he found fourtie principall men, who had proviſion for manie daies. The enemies being in everie place, he in the day time lay hid, and in the night he went forth to ſee if he could eſcape; and perceiving that all places about were diligently watcht for to take him, he returned again into the Cave, and lay there two daies; the third day, a certain woman that had been with them in the Cave was taken, and ſo he was deſcried. Then Veſpaſian ſent two Tribunes to him, to promiſe him ſafetie, and bring him before him; the Tribunes names were Paulinus and Gallicanus: But Joſeph would not accept their offer, fearing that becauſe he had been the Author of all the evils that the Romans had endured, that therefore they ſought him out to puniſh him; till Veſpaſian ſent unto Joſeph, Nicanor, the third Tribune, one of Joſephs acquaintance. Nicanor recounted unto him how milde the Romans were towards them whom they had conquered, and that the Roman Captains rather admired him for his vertue, then hated him. Moreover, that his Generall intended not to puniſh him (which if he pleaſed, he might do, whether he yield himſelf or no) but to ſave him, who was ſo valiant a man: adding alſo, that if Veſpaſian meant ill, he would never have imployed his friend in ſuch a meſſage, to uſe friendſhip (ſo noble a vertue) to ſo evill a purpoſe as to work Treaſon; and that he, though Veſpaſian had been ſo minded, would never have conſented to have betrayed his friend Joſeph, after Nicanors words, he began to ſtudy, as doubtfull what beſt to do. Whereat the ſouldiers being angry, began to caſt fire into the Cave; but Veſpaſian hindred them, being deſirous to take Joſeph alive. Nicanor ceaſed not to intreat him; and he perceiving how his enemies began to wax angry, and calling to mind the dreams he had in the night, wherein God foretold him of all the Jews calamities, and what ſhould betide the Roman Princes (for he could interpret dreams, and whatſoever God obſcurely ſhewed, being inſtructed in the holy books of the Prophets, and himſelf a Prieſt as his parents were.) So at that time being as it were filled with the Spirit of God, and recording the dreams and horrible viſions which he ſaw in his ſleep, he prayed ſecretly to God after this maner; O Creatour (quoth he) Seeing that it pleaſeth Thee to ruinate the Nation of the Jewes, and that all good Fortune is gone unto the Romanes, and that thou haſt choſen my ſoul to foretell future events, I yield unto the Romanes to ſave my life, proteſting, that I mean not to goe to them to play the Trayter unto my Countrey, but as thy Miniſter. And having thus ſpoken,

A spoken, he yielded himself vnto Nicanor. Bnt they who fled into the Cave where Joseph was, perceiving that Joseph yielded unto the Romans, flocked all about him, and cried out, How are our Counrrey laws violated? Where are those promises of God made to the Jewes? Where are those gallant minds that contemn and despise death; Art thou, O Ioseph, desirous to live, and see thy self to become a vile bond-slave? How soon hast thou forgotten thy self? How many hast thou perswaded to embrace death for their libertie sake? Truely, thou hast but a shaddow of valour and prudence in thee, if thou doest hope that they will save thy life, against whom thou hast so behaved thy selfe: or if they would save thee to desire life at their hands. But seeing the Romanes offer hath made the forget thy self; yet we, to preserve the honour and credit of our countrey, will lend thee our arms and swords, and so
B if thou be willing to die, die like the Generall of the Jewes: which if thou refuse to doe, thou shalt whether thou wilt or no, die like a traitor to thy countrey. When they had thus said, they all threatned to kill him with their swords, if he did yield to the Romans. Joseph feared their violence, and perswaded himself, if he died before he had put them in mind of Gods Commandments, that then he should die a traitor to God: wherefore he began to make a Philosophicall discourse unto them concerning this present estate what was to be done.

The yeer of the world, 4031. after mans Nativity, 69.

The Iews violence and expostulation against Ioseph.

Wherefore (O my friends quoth he) are we become murtherers of our selves? Wherefore do we make warre between things so united, are as the soul and the body? Will any man say that my minde is changed? Why the Romans know that it is a thing most honourable to die in warres, not any way, but according to the law of arms, to wit, by the Conquerers hand. If I intreat the Ro-
C mans to spare my life, then am I worthy to perish with mine own sword and hand: But if they, think good to spare their enemies, should we not think it good likewise to spare our own selves? Truely, it is meer folly to do that to our own selves, for the which we fight against them. I confesse, it is a commendable thing to die for ones libertie; but yet to die in fight, and by their hands who took away that libertie: but now, neither do they warre against us, nor kill us. He is not onely to be judged a coward, who refuseth to die when need requireth, but also he who will die when no need urgeth. Moreover, what with-holdeth us from offering our selves to the Romanes? Truely, fear of death. Shall we therefore make that certain our selves, which we fear at the Romanes hands? But some will say, How if not? then we are made captives: consider what libertie we now have.

Iosephs oration to his countreymen.

It is a goodly matter to die for liberty, but yet to die fighting.

You will say, it is the part of him that is valiant to kill himself: Nay truly, it is the part of a D very coward. For I think him to he a very timerous Seaman, who perceiving a Tempest coming, before it fall, sinketh the Ship wherein he is. Moreover, it is against the Law of nature, and the nature of all creatures to kill themselves, and thereby we should commit a hainous crime against God. There is no living creature that of his own seeking would willingly die: for every one feeleth in himself the strong and forcible law of Nature, whereby they desire to live: and for this cause we judge them for our enemies, that seek to take it from us; and punish them that do take it indeed: And do you think it is not a greater contempt for a man to despise his gift? For we of him receive our first being, and from him let us expect our ending. The body is mortall, framed of corruptible matter; but our souls are immortall, and there is a little part of God, placed in E our bodies. If any one abuse that which another man putteth him in trust with, presently we think him a perfidious and wicked man: and shall we think that if we cast away out of our bodies that which God hath put us in trust withall, and placed in the same that he shall not know of it, whom we have so abused? We hold those slaves worthy to be punished that run away from bad masters: and shall not we then be held for impious, who flee from so good a Master as God is? Doe ye not know that they, who according to the law of Nature depart out of this life, and render that to God which they received of him, when he who gave it requires it, shall leave behinde them a perpetuall name to their posteritie and family? And that unto those soules who are obedient unto their Creatour when he calls them, he gives a holy and sacred mansion in heaven, and from thence after a revolution of the heavens, departing, are again commanded to dwell in F chaste bodies? And that they who have wrought their own death, goe unto dark hell? and that God punisheth this their offence upon all their posteritie? Hence it is that God is displeased therewith, and it is forbidden by our most wise Law-maker: For if any amongst us kill themselves, it is decreed that till the Sun goe down they shall be unburied, yet we hold it lawfull to bury our enemies.

The similitude of a sayler. It is against the common course of Nature for a man to kill himself, yea, and a hainous sinne against God.

The soul is immortall, and a portion of God placed in our bodies.

God revengeth him on the author of injuries

Other Nations cause their right hands to be cut off, who have killed themselves: judging, that as the soul thereby was made a stranger to the body, even so by that fact was the hand made a stranger unto it. Wherefore, O companions, think on that which is decent, and not adde to our humane misery, impietie against God who created us. If we desire to be saved, let us save our selves: for for it is no disgrace to receive our lives at their hands, who are witnesses of so many valiant deeds G of ours. If we desire to die, let us die by their hands who have overcome us. I will not go into my enemies Camp, to be a Traitor against my self. For I bear not their minde who forsake their own company to flee to their enemies: for they flee unto them to save their lives, but I goe unto them to work mine own death, even the death of my self. And I would to God that the Romanes would break promise with mee; for if they kill me after they have promised to save my life, I shall willingly die, and with great courage, having their breach of promise and perjury for a comfort of the last victory.

Ioseph is in great danger to be slain.

Joseph spake much to this effect, to disswade his companions from killing themselves. But they stopping their ears with desperation, wherewith they had armed themselves to die, came furiously towards him with their swords drawn, upbraiding him that he was a coward, H and every one was ready to strike him. Then Joseph calling one by his name, and looking upon another with a countenance like a Governour, holding anothers hand, and intreating the rest distracted in such danger, at last escaped from being killed at that instant: for still as one came neer unto him to strike him, he turned his face upon him like some cruel beast, and some of them who remembred he had been their Captain in their extremitie, with reverence of his personage trembled, so that their swords fell out of their hands: and many lifting up their arms to strike him, of their own accord let their weapons fall. Joseph, notwithstanding his desperate estate, yet was he not void of counsell, but assisted by Gods providence, he hazarded his life, and spake unto them as followeth: Seeing (quoth he) that ye are all determined to die, let us cast lots who shall kill one another; and he, to whom the lot falleth, shall be kild by I him who next ensueth, and so the lot shall be cast upon every one of us, so that none of us shall be forced to kill our selves. For it were injustice, that when some of us be slain: the rest should repent themselves, and so escape. They all liked well of this, and alwayes he upon whom the lot fel, was slain by him that followed, as though they were now to die with their Captain: for death was more acceptable, because they thought Joseph should die with them. Now it hapned by the providence of God, that Joseph remained alive onely with one other, and then perswaded him who was left alive, to live, and not seek death, for fear the lot should fall upon himself: and for that if he survived, he should be polluted with the murther and slaughter of his own Nation. Thus Joseph, delivered both from the wars of the Romans, and also of his own Nation, went with Nicanor unto Vespasian.

K

Ioseph resorteth to Vespasian with Nicanor.

All the Romans came about him to see him, and pressing about their Generall, they made a great noise, some rejoycing that he was taken, others crying out to punish him, others striving to come neer to behold him better: and they who were afar off, cried out to kil their enemy: but those who were neer him and beheld him, remembring his prowesse, were astonished to see that change. And there was no Captain nor Ruler, bnt although before they were all moved against them, yet now beholding him, they all began to pitie him: and especially Titus, who being of a gentle disposition, admired Josephs valour, his constancie in adversitie, and his age, and thereby was moved to take compassion upon him, remembring what a manner of man he had been during the warres, and what he now was, being fallen into his enemies hands: calling also to mind the force and power of Fortune, and how small a stay the chance L of war had, and that no humane affairs had any stay or hold in them; wherefore he drew many mens mindes to pitie him, so that Titus was the chief author of Josephs life: yet Vespasian caused him to be carefully kept, as though he meant to send him to Cæsar. Which Joseph hearing, requested that he might speak a word or two with him alone. Then all but his sonne Titus departing, and two of his friends:

Ioseph hath Private conference with Vespasian.

to a greater punishment. After he had thus spoken, Vespasian gave small credit to his words, and only thought that Joseph fained these things of himself to save his life: yet by ittle and little he began to give credit unto him, because God put it in his mind to hope for the Empire: and foretelling his reigne by many signes and tokens, he also found Joseph to tell the truth in other matters. A to befall himſelf, that he might have avoided thoſe evils. Joſeph anſwered, that he foretold the citizens of Jotapata, that after ſeven and fourty dayes they ſhould be deſtroyed, and that the Romanes ſhould keep him alive in hold. Veſpaſian ſecretly enquired of theſe matters, and finding by the relation of the captives that it was true, he began to give more credit to that which Joſeph had told him concerning himſelf. So he commanded Joſeph to be kept priſoner, yet did he give him apparrel and divers other things in moſt kind manner: and Titus did greatly honour him. The fourth day of July Veſpaſian returned unto Ptolemais, and from thence he came into the ſea-coaſt unto Cæſarea, which is the greateſt City of Judæa, whoſe inhabitants are for the moſt part Greeks; ſo the Inhabitants received the army and the General with all friendſhip poſſible, both for that they loved the Romanes, eſpecially alſo for that they hated them who were deſtroyed; ſo that many intreated Veſpaſian to put

But Veſpaſian, judging this a rath petition, would make no anſwer unto it: and he left two legions to winter at Cæſarea; becauſe he ſaw it was a fit place, and ſent the tenth and fifth unto Scythopolis, becauſe he would not over-charge Cæſarea with the whole army. How Joppe was taken again

C IN the mean time, a great multitude being gathered together, who either were ſeditious perſons, or theeves or ſuch as had eſcaped out of the ruinated Cities, began to reedifie Joppe for their refuge, which Ceſtius beforetime had deſtroyed: and ſeeing that they could not rob nor ſpoil the countrey which was already waſted, and left deſolate by warres, they purpoſed to become Pirates: and ſo building ſhips for that purpoſe, they robbed the Phœnicians, Syrians and Egyptians, not ſuffering any to paſſe thoſe ſeas without danger. Veſpaſian underſtanding their intent, ſent horſemen and footmen thither: who finding the citie not guarded, got into it in the night time: which the inhabitants perceiving were ſo afraid, that they durſt not make any reſiſtance to expell

D the Romanes, but they all retired themſelves unto their ſhips, and there ſtayed all night, a flight-ſhot from the ſhoare. Joppe is naturally no road for ſhips (for it is ſcituated upon a turbulent ſhoare) and on every ſide hath very high and eminent rocks, which trouble the ſeas, and make huge waves: in this place (if we may believe the fable) one may ſee the ſignes of Andromeda's chains. When the North wind blowes, it ſtriketh the waves againſt the rocks, and ſo cauſeth a dangerous ſea, that it were far more ſafe to be in the midſt of the ſeas, then at that ſhoare when the ſame wind bloweth. The inhabitants of Joppe rode there all night, and by break of day the North wind began to blow fiercely, and drave ſome of the ſhips one againſt another, and others againſt the rocks: and many ſtriving againſt wind and weather, and ſeeking to get into the midſt of the Sea for fear of the rockie ſhoare, and their enemies

E there, were drowned; and they that eſcaped, neither had any place of refuge, nor hope of ſafety; for the tempeſt did drive them from the ſea, and the Romanes from the city, ſo that the air was filled with cries of the people expecting to be drowned, and with the noyſe and ſound of the ſhips beating one againſt another. So ſome of the inhabitants of Joppe were ſwallowed by the waves, others ſuffered ſhipwrack, ſome killed themſelves rather then to be drowned: many with the waves were ſtricken againſt the rocks, ſo that the ſea was bloody, and all the ſhoar was covered with dead bodies: and whoſoever eſcaped the ſea and got to ſhoare, the Roman ſouldiers there ready ſtanding, killed them. There were four thouſand and two hundreth dead bodies caſt upon the ſhoare. So the Romanes having without any

F fight taken the citie, they deſtroyed it: and thus was Joppe taken, and twice deſtroyed by the Romanes in a ſhort time. Veſpaſian builded there a Caſtle, and placed in it ſome few horſemen and footmen, to the end that none of the Jews ſhould come thither again to play the Pirates, and that the footmen might keep the Caſtle, and in the mean time the horſemen might go forth, and ſpoil all the towns and villages, and territories belonging to Joppe: which alſo they did. When the news of the deſtruction of Jotapata was brought unto Jeruſalem, many gave ſmall credit to it, partly for the greatneſſe of that calamity, partly for that no one man could ſay, that he had ſeen the deſtruction of the city: for none eſcaped that maſſacre to bring news, but onely report thereof was ſpread abroad; but at the laſt it was verified to be true by thoſe that dwelt near unto that place, and then they believed it, Many things alſo which were falſe, were reported as true. They all mourned for Joseph thirty daies, and hired many musicians to sing funerall songs for him. At last, truth discovered it self, and the true news of the destruction of Jotapata with the accidents there: also how Joseph was not slain, but lived with the Romanes, and that the Romanes honoured him with more then a captive could expect. Then the Jews began as much to hate him now living, as before they mourned for him when they supposed him dead. And some said he was a coward, others that he was a traitour unto his Countrey, and the whole City breathed out reproachful speeches against him. These heavy tydings encreased their rage, and this their adversity (which unto wise men had been a warning to provide lest the like befell them) made them more outragious; so that alwaies the end of one mischief was the beginning of another. To be short, now they were more incensed against the Romanes then before, as it were that they might also be revenged of Joseph. And this was the estate of the Citizens of Jerusalem.

CHAP. XVI.

How Tiberias was yielded.

Vespasian cometh unto Agrippas kingdome, and recreateth himself there, and feasteth twenty daies.

Vespasian was desirous to see the Kingdome of Agrippa (for the King had intreated him to go thither, partly to feast him and his whole army, partly to represse some troubles arising in his Kingdome, in the time of his absence) and so departed from Cæsarea upon the sea-cost and went unto Cæsarea Philippi, where he stayed, and refreshed his souldiers 20. daies; and himself also feasted, giving God thanks for his prosperous successe in the wars. This done he had intelligence that Tiberias and Tarichea were revolted (both which cities belonged unto Agrippa his Kingdome) and fully determining utterly to destroy the Jews which inhabited thereabouts, he thought it good to lead his army against these two places, especially that he might reward Agrippa for his good entertainment, by surrendring these cities unto him. Wherefore he sent his son Titus to Cæsarea to bring the souldiers there unto Scythopolis, which was the greatest of all the ten cities, which also is near unto Tiberias; whither himself being come, he expected his sons coming: and departing from thence with three legions, he pitched his tent in a place called Enabris, where the seditious people of Tiberias might behold his army; this place was thirty furlongs from Tiberias: from thence he sent Valerianus the Decadarch to entreat a peace with them, and sent fifty horsemen to accompany him: for he understood that the people desired peace, and against their will were forced to war, by some of the seditious amongst them. Valerianus coming near the City walls, lighted from his horse, commanding all his company to do the like, that they of Tiberias might not think that they came to fight, but in peaceable manner: but before he spake any one word, the boldest and strongest of the seditious persons, came out armed against him, having one Jesus the sonne of Tobias, who had been a Captain of theeves, for their Governour and Leader. Valerianus not presuming to fight without authority from his General, although he had been certain of the victory; again considering that it was great danger for so few to fight against a whole multitude, and withal terrified with the boldnesse of the Jews, contrary to his expectation, he fled on foot, accompanied onely with five other, leaving his horse and the rest behind him, whom Jesus and his followers took, and brought into the City, rejoycing as though they had taken them in fight, and not by treason. But the Senators and chief of the City, fearing what might ensue of this fact, went unto the Romanes, and together with King Agrippa came unto Vespasian, and prostrated themselves at his feet, beseeching him not to despise them, and not to think that the whole city were partakers with those few wicked persons, that so had merited his displeasure; requesting him to spare the people who alwaies had honoured the Romanes, but rather that he should punish the authors of that revolt and misdemeanour: who also had withheld the whole City, even untill now, to yeeld it self unto the Romanes; Vespasian moved by their entreaties, pardoned the City, though he was incited against them all for taking of Valerianus his horse; in that he perceived Agrippa was sorrowfull, for fear that the City should be destroyed, and so by them Vespasian promised the townesmen pardon. Then Jesus and his associates thinking it not safe for them to abide there, fled unto Tarichea. The next day, Vespasian sent before him Trajanus with certain horsemen into the Castle, to see if all the multitude desired peace: and finding the people to bear peaceable mindes, he with his whole army came unto the City. And the inhabitants opening the gates of their City, went to meet him

How Tarichea was beſieged.

B VEſpaſian departed from Tiberias, and pitched his tents betwixt it and Tarichea, and encamped himſelf: foreſeeing that there he ſhould have ſome trouble and long abode: for all rebells that deſired warre came thither, truſting both to the ſtrength of the city, and the lake adjoyning unto it called Geneſar. For this city was ſituate like Tiberias, under the mountains: and Joſeph had enclozed it with a wall on every ſide, where it was not compaſſed by the lake. But the wall though it were ſtrong, yet was it not ſo ſtrong as that of Tiberias: for Joſeph builded that in the beginning of the rebellion, having men and money at will; but that of Tarichea was built onely by the remainder of his liberality. The Taricheans had great ſtore of ſhips in the lake adjoyning, to the end that if they were overcome by land, they might flie by water: and therefore they had prepared their ſhips for battel by water if need ſhould be. But the Romanes purſued them ſo faſt, that they forced them to take their ſhips: and ſo being gone as farre from the ſhore, as that yet they might eaſily reach them with the ſhot of an arrow, they caſt anchor and diſpoſed their ſhips in warlike manner, and fought againſt the Romanes who were on ſhore, Veſpaſian underſtood that a great multitude of them were gathered together in a place neer unto the city: wherefore he ſent his ſonne Titus againſt them with 600. horſe-

E "ſome of you: let every one therefore once again conſider, who himſelf is, and with whom "he is to fight: and that although the Jews be bold and valiant enough yet they obſerve no "warlike order, and are unarmed, and ſo are more fitly tearmed a multitude then an army. I "need not ſpeak of your knowledg and skill in warres: nay for this onely cauſe are we train-"ed up in warlike diſcipline in the time of peace, to the end that our number ſhould anſwer to "the number of our enemies when we are to joyn battel: for what fruit ſhall we ſhew of this "our perpetual warlike order and diſcipline, if we dare onely fight with a rude multitude that "are no more in number then our ſelves? I think that you being armed are to fight with un-"armed, and being horſemen are to fight with footmen, and being guided by the advice of a "Captain, with them who have no head nor ruler: and that theſe things conſidered, do ſup-"ply in us the want of more men, and the contrary in our enemies doth as it were much di-

Victory doth not onely conſiſt in the multitude of men, be they ne-"ver ſo warlike, but alſo in a few, if they be valiant: for as they are few, ſo are they eaſily guid-"ed, and may eaſily come to help one another, not being peſtered; whereas huge multi-"tudes do more hinder one another then do good, and do themſelves more harm then their "enemies. So the Jews are led with deſperation, rage and fury, which indeed in proſperous "ſucceſſe are of ſome force, but in a deſperate fortune they are quickly daunted: but we are "led by vertue, and obedience, and fortitude, which both are of force in proſperity, and al-"ſo are good in adverſitie, Moreover we have greater occaſion to fight then the Jews have: "for they fight onelie for their countrie and libertie, but we fight for renown and Empire;

It becometh souldiers to obey their Captain.

Titus having thus spoken, as it were by Gods providence, all his souldiers took heart and courage, so that now they were sorry to see Trajanus come with 400. horsemen more before the fight was begun, as though their victory should be lesse renowned, because he came to help them. Vespasian also sent Antonius and Silo with 2000. archers, to take the mountain that was just opposite unto the town, and to beat them that defended the city off from the walls: and they did as they were commanded. Then Titus with all force possible, rushed with his horse upon the enemies: and all followed him with an huge cry, scattering themselves in such order as they occupied as much ground as the Iews, and so appeared more then they were. The Iews, though terrified by their discipline, yet they withstood the first assault: but in the end dismaied, and put out of order with their lances, and killed with the horsemen, every one fled as fast as he could into the City. And Titus killed some as they fled, others as he met them, and those he overtook, and many one for hast tumbling one upon another; and he prevented all that fled unto the walls, and drave them back again into the field, till at last the multitude prevailed, and so they got into the city. Now at their return into the City, there befell a great dissention: for the inhabitants considering their own estate, and the event of all former warres, and especially of this last fight, misliked of warre, and desired peace: but the strangers that had fled from other places thither, and were in great multitudes, would needs contend therein; and so one part began a mutiny against the other, as though they would presently one have taken arms against the other. Titus being not farre K from the wall, heard these tumults within the Citie, and cried out unto the Romanes; "This "is the hour (fellow souldiers) wherein God hath given the Iews into our hands: why do
"we deferre the time any longer? why do we not take the victory offered? do you not hear
"the cries within? they who escaped our hands, are at variance amongst themselves: the city
"is ours, if we make haste; and making haste, take courage: for nothing worth renown can "be atchieved without danger: and let us not onely prevent our enemies concord which ne"cessity will soon effect, but also our own forces before any fresh aid come unto us; that be"sides the victory we have, being so few over so huge a multitude, we may also divide the "spoil of the city among us. No sooner had he thus spoken, but presently he mounted upon L his horse, and rode into the lake, and so passed into the city, and all the souldiers followed him. They that defended the walls, were amazed at his boldnesse, so that none made resistance against him as he came: but Jesus with his followers leaving his quarter which was his to defend, fled into the fields, others flying towards the lake, fell into their enemies hands, who came that way against him, and so were massacred even as they were getting into their ships: othersome were slain as they did swim to overtake the ships that were new lancht from the shore: and there was a great slaughter of men all over the city. For the strangers that fled not, made resistance, and the Townes-men did not offer to defend themselves; for they abstained from fight, hoping for pardon, in that they were not against those proceedings: till at last Titus having slain the wicked, took compassion upon the Townes-men, and saved their M lives, and caused the slaughter to cease. They who fled into the lake, seeing the city even taken, ran away as farre as they could from their enemies. Titus sent horsemen to let his father understand what he had done. Whereof he having intelligence, being very glad for his sonnes valour and magnanimity, and for the atchieving of such a victory, whereby a great part of those warres was ended, he commanded the city to be guarded presently round about, to the intent that none might scape away alive. And the next day he came down unto the lake, and commanded ships to be built to pursue those that had escaped by it: and having many workmen and great store of matter to build them withall, his command was presently effected.

Of the lake of Genezar, and the fountain of Jordan.

The yeer of the world, 4031. after the nativity of Christ, 69.

THe lake of Genezar taketh his name from the countrey adjoyning unto it, the breadth thereof is fourtie furlongs, the length a hundred. The water of this lake is sweet and good to drink, and is more subtil then ordinarily pure water of marish places are, and it is very clear near the shoare, and more temperate to drink, then either that of the river or fountain, but it is alwayes more cold then one would judge such a lake to be of that largenesse: for the water being set in the Sun, doth not lose his coldnesse: which the inhabitants have used to do in summer evenings, to allay the natural coldnesse thereof. There are here many sorts of fishes, nothing like to fishes of other places, either in shape or taste. The river Jordan passeth thorow the midst of it. It is thought that Panium is the head and fountain of Iordan, but in truth it hath his original from Phiala, and from thence passeth under the ground: this place is a hundred and thirty furlongs from Cæsarea, towards that way which leads unto Trachon on the right hand. This water is called Phiala, by reason of his roundnesse: for it is as round as a wheele, and the water still keepeth within the brink of Phiala, never encreasing nor diminishing; and no man knew that this was the head of Iordan, till Philip the Tetrach of Trachon found it to be so; for he casting straws into Phiala, found them afterward carried unto Panium, which before that time was thought to be the fountain of Jordan. Panium, though it be naturally beautified, yet by Agrippa his cost and charges it was muchmore adorned. Jordan beginneth with a deep river out of this den, and passeth along the marish places, and durty lake of Semechonitis, and from thence 120. furlongs unto the City of Julia, and in the way divideth the lake Genezar, and passing a great way further into the wildernesse, at last it endeth in the lake called Asphalites. Upon the lake Genezar there bordereth a countrey of the same name, naturally beautiful and admirable; for there is no kind of plant which groweth not there, and the inhabitants have replenished it with plants and trees of all sorts, and the temperature of the air well agreeth with so divers trees; for there are an infinite company of Nut-trees, which of all trees especially require a cold soile: there are also abundance of Palmes, which desire great heat: likewise great store of figs and olives, which require a temperate air: so that one may justly say, that through the bounty of nature, so different and opposite qualities are here in one united; and at one time, as it were, all difference of seasons of the year conjoyned for good purpose. And it doth not onely nourish these fruits, but also conserveth them for ten whole moneths: there grow figs and grapes, which two one may well call the kings of fruits; all other fruits continue all the year long. For besides the temperature of the air, it is also watered by a fertile fountain called Capernaum: many think it to be an arme of Nilus, becaufe it hath fishes like a Corbe bred in a lake near Alexandria. The length of this countrey along the lake bearing the same name, is thirty furlongs, and the breadth twenty. And this is the name of the lake Genezar, and the countrey about it.

How the Taricheans were destroyed.

VEspasian having finished his ships, and furnisht them with as many men as he thought sufficed against them whom he was to pursue, he embarked upon the lake, and himself also went against them. The Taricheans could not possibly make any escape by land, although they would, and were not able to fight hand to hand with the Romans, for their small pyrate boats were not able to withstand their enemies great vessels; and besides that, they were not sufficiently manned, so that they feared to encounter with the Romanes who pressed all together upon them: yet notwithstanding some time they came about the Romane ships, and cast stones at the Romanes afarre off, and some time also came neer, and skirmished with them: yet they themselves alwaies had more harm then the Romanes; for their stones which they cast did onely rattle against the Romanes armour, but hurt them not, and they were killed by the Romanes arrows: and if at any time they were so bold as to come near the Romanes, they were slain before that they could do them any harme, or else drowned with their boats. And as many as attempted to wound the Romans, were slain with Javelins, and other with swords, the Romans leaping into their boats? and many were taken with their boats, the ships meeting one another G

They that were in the water and did lift up their heads to swim, were prevented with arrows or overtaken with Romane boats: and if in desperation they came swimming towards their enemies, their hands or heads were presently cut off. And thus some perished one way, some another, till at last they fled, and arrived upon the shore, their ships being compassed round about. So the Romanes kild many upon the lake, and many upon the land, and one might then have seen all the lake stained with blood full of dead bodies, for not one escaped alive.
A few daies after in that countrey there was a very odious stinch, and a horrible spectacle:
for the shores were all full of boats that had suffered shipwrack, and dead bodies swollen in the water: and those dead bodies taking heat, did putrifie and so corrupt the air all about, that not onely the whole countrey and inhabitants thought it a miserable affliction, but also the Romans who were the authors thereof. And this was the end of that warre by water. And the H number of them that were slain here in the city, was 6500. The fight being ended, Vespasian sate in a tribunall seat, and separated the strangers from the inhabitants, for that they seemed to be the authors of that warre: yet he deliberated with the Captains and Gover-nours, whether he should likewise pardon them: but they told him that their lives might endamage him; for said they, if thou send those men away and let them live, they cannot live peaceably, because they want abiding places; and are able to disturb and disquiet those to whom they shall flie. Vespasian for this cause judged them unworthy to live; assuredly knowing that if they were let go, they would fight against them who pardoned their lives, yet he deliberated what death to put them to. But he thought with himself the inhabitants would not patiently abide so many to be massacred, who had fled unto them for succour.
wherefore he sought to use no violence unto them, because he had promised them security. I
But at last he was overcome by the perswasion of his friends, who told him that all things against the Jews were lawfull, and that profit was to be preferred before honesty, seeing both could not be had: so licence being granted unto them to depart, they suspecting nothing, were commanded to take onely that way that leadeth unto Tiberias: and they fearing nothing, willingly obeyed that which was commanded them, not misdoubting the safety of their goods or money: but the Romanes had placed themselves on every side the way even unto Tiberias, to the intent that none might escape, and so shut them all in the city. Presenly after came Vespasian and enclosed them all in an Amphitheater, and so killed 1200. of them, who were all old men or young, and unable for service: of the rest that were all strong young men, he sent 6000. unto Nero at Isthmos neer Corinth. The rest of the multitude he sold in number 30400. beside others that he gave unto Agrippa: for he permitted him to do K what he would with those sorts that were of his kingdome: But Agrippa sold also those that were given him. The rest of them were fugitives and seditious persons of Trachon, Gaulanitis, and Hippenis, and many of Gadara, whose contempt of peace justly procured these wars. They were taken the sixt of the Ides of September.

How Gamala was beſieged.

The yere of the world, 4031. after Chriſts natiuity. 69.

AFter that Tarichea was conquered, all thoſe that from the time that Jotapata was ſurprized till this inſtant, had revolted from the Romanes, did now again unite themſelves unto them: ſo that the Romanes had now gotten into their hands all caſtles and towns, Giſcala onely excepted, and Itaburium, a mountain ſo called. With theſe two rebelled Gamala, a town over againſt Tarichea, and ſituate upon the lake, belonging to the kingdom of Agrippa, and alſo Sagane, & Seleucia: and theſe two laſt were both belonging to Gaulanitis, and Sagane appertained to the higher part called Gaulana, and Gamala unto the lower, Seleucia unto the lake Semechonitis, which is thirty furlongs in breadth, and threeſcore large, whoſe mariſhes reach even unto Daphne, which countrey is very pleaſant of it ſelf, and famous for that it entertaineth the ſtream called little Iordan, and at the foot of the golden mountain doth drive it into the great Iordan. Agrippa in the beginning of the rebellion, united Sagane and Seleucia unto himſelf: but Gamala, by reaſon of the ſituation apt to reſiſt, did not yeeld unto him, for it is far ſtronger then Jotapata. For, from an exceeding high mountain, there deſcended a hill very difficult for any to paſſe, riſing high in the midſt, and then deſcended lower and lower, both before and behind, ſo that it repreſenteth the figure of a Camel, which the Hebrews call Gamal, and ſo thereof it took the name, though the inhabitants do not keep the exact ſignification. Before it, and on either ſide are deep vallies, into the which a man can hardly deſcend, onely it may be taken and aſſaulted on that ſide where it joyneth unto the mountain, which alſo the inhabitants have made inacceſſible, by cutting out there a deep ditch. In that place the City was very well inhabited on the deſcent of the hill, and towards the South part it ſtood on ſo ſteep a hill, that it ſeemed as if it would have falne every hour, and the South hill ſerved the inhabitants inſtead of a Caſtle, being unwalled: for it was an exceeding high rock, and reached down even to the bottom of the valley in the town, & at the walls thereof there was a fountain. Although this city were of his own nature invincible, yet Joſeph compaſſing it with a wall, and with ditches and mynes, made it ſtronger. Wherefore the inhabitants of this place put far more confidence in their walls, then they of Jotapata did, yet were they fewer in number, and not ſo warlike people as they; but for the ſituation of the City, they eſteemed themſelves more then their enemies: for the city was full of men that fled thither by reaſon of the ſtrength of the place: ſo that for ſeven moneths they reſiſted them that were ſent by Agrippa to beſiege them. Veſpaſian departed from Ammaus, and pitched his tents before Tiberias, and ſo went unto Gamala, (Ammaus is interpreted hot waters, for there is a fountain of hot water which cureth many diſeaſes) and the City was ſo ſituate, that he could not beſiege it round about: wherefore he placed men to keep watch in ſuch places as it was paſſable, and obtaineſt the higheſt mountain, where his ſouldiers pitching their tents, laſtly entrenched themſelves. On the Eaſt part of the City in the moſt eminent place there was a caſtle, where the fifteenth, and fifth legions laboured againſt the town, and the tenth legion filled up the ditches and vallies. King Agrippa went unto the walls, and ſpake unto them that defended them, willing them to yeeld to the Romans; but one of them with a ſling ſtroke him on the right arm, and hurt him, and his familiar friends came about him to defend him. Then the Romans, for anger that the King was hurt, and for fear of ſuch miſchances to themſelves, now became earneſt to aſſault the town, perſwading themſelves that they would uſe ſtrangers and their enemies hardly, if it lay in their lot, ſeeing they had ſo evil intreated one of their own nation, for perſwading them unto what was profitable for them.

F Having quickly entrenched themſelves by reaſon of the multitude that laboured in that buſineſſe, and by reaſon that they were accuſtomed to ſuch like work, they began to place the engines againſt the town wals. Chares & Joſeph were two of the moſt potent men in the town: they therefore animated and armed their citizens, and brought them unto the wals, who trembled for fear. And although they well perceived that the city could not long hold out, ſeeing they wanted water, and many other things neceſſary to withſtand a ſiege; yet notwithſtanding, they exhorted the townſmen to be valiant, and ſo brought them unto the wals, and a while they reſiſted, notwithſtanding the ſhot: but at laſt, they were therewith ſo terrified, that leaving the wals, they fled into the City. Then the Romans did batter the wals with Rammes in three ſeveral places, and where the wall fell, there they iſſued in with trumpets trumpets and a great noise, and cryes, and fought with the townsmen, who in the first conflict so valiantly resisted them, that they permitted them not to enter any further into the town. At last being overcome both in strength and number, they all fled into the highest part of the City, and from thence they turned again upon the Romans, who pursued them, and drave them down into the vallies, and killed many, and divers in that straight passage were trodden to death by their fellows. The Romanes, seeing that they neither could flee, nor resist their enemies above their heads, fled into their houses, which adjoyned unto the Plain, and so filled them, that being overcharged, they fell down, and lighted upon other houses beneath them, which did bear them down also, and they likewise others situated beneath them. Many of the Romans this way perished; for being amazed, and not knowing what to do, they fled into their houses, notwithstanding they did see them shake and totter: and many seeking to escape, were maymed by some part of the ruins that fell upon their bodies, and many were choaked in the dust. The Citizens of Gamala rejoyced thereat, thinking that this aid was sent from God: and not regarding their private commodities, they ceased not to compel the Romans into their houses; and if any were in the narrow streets, them they slew with darts from above out of the high places. Thus the ruins afforded them stones enough, and their slain enemies swords and armour, which they took from them, being now half dead, and used them against themselves: many died, who cast themselves headlong from off the houses being ready to fall, and those that sought to flee could not easily escape; for being ignorant of the wayes, and there being such a dust that one could not see another, one of them killed another: and so with much ado finding passage, they went out of the City.

The Romanes fall down with the ruins of the Jews houses.

Many Romans slain and spoiled.

Vespasian, who was alwayes among the midst of these hurly burlies, was greatly moved to see the buildings fall so upon his souldiers; and forgetting his own safety, he secretly retired himself with onely a few into the higher part of the city, where he was left in great danger, having very few about him (for Titus his son was not there, being before this time sent unto Mutianus in Syria) and now he could not flee safely, nor yet had it been for his honour, if he could. Wherefore remembring all that he had done even from his child-hood, and his own vertue, he encouraged his men, and with them joyned arms, and covered themselves with their shields; and so as it were moved with some divine motion, defended themselves from all darts, arrowes, and stones, which were cast from aloft upon them, and so remained there, not terrified either by the number or might of his enemies, till at last, they wondring at his divine vertue and courage, asswaged their fury. And now perceiving his enemies to assault him but faintly, he retired back, till at such time as he got without the Citie wals.

Vespasians fortitude and warlike valour.

Vespasians fight with the Iews.

Many Romans perished in that fight, and amongst the rest, Ebutius a Decadarch, who not onely in that fight shewed himself valiant, but also in many wars before, and had done the Jews much harm. Also in that fight a certain Centurion, named Gallus, accompanied with ten souldiers, hid themselves in a house, and at supper-time he heard the people of that house talk, what the Citizens of Gamala were purposed to do against the Romans (this Gallus and they with him were Syrians) and in the night time he slew them all, and after he escaped safe unto the Romans. Vespasian perceived all his army sorrowful for that mischance, and so much the more, for that they never as yet had so bad a breakfast, & especially, for that they had forsaken their General, and left him in danger and distresse; wherefore he thought it good to comfort them, nothing speaking concerning himself, lest he should seem to finde fault with some in the beginning of his speech. Wherefore he told them, that it behoved them patiently to abide that which was common to all men, affirming that there was no victorie without bloodshed, & that fortune was mutable: and that he had already slain many thousand Iews, & now had payed a small bribe for his happie successe unto adverse fortune. And that as it did not become any but vain-glorious people to boast in their prosperitie, so it behoved none but cowards to fear and tremble in adversitie: For, said he, "fortune is very "mutable both to the good and bad, & he is a valiant man that is not moved by adversitie: "for he, having all his wits about him, can even in the midst of his troubles see where any "fault is, and amend it. Yet (quoth he) this hath not befalne us through the weakneſse of our "courage, or the valour and proweſſe of the Iews, but the difficulty of the place was the "cause that they should overcome us, and we be overcome. Wherefore one may well re-"prehend the too much rashneſse of your spirits: for when you saw your enemies flee into "the higher places, you should then have held your hands, and not to have pursued them "with so manifest danger to your selves, as every one might foresee in this pursuit; so you "having gained the lower part of the Citie, you might in time have drawn them to a sure

A and safe conflict: but you, being eager of the victory, did not respect your own safety. It is not the manner of the Romans rashly and unadvisedly to fight, who are wont to do all things orderly and advisedly: for the other is fit for barbarous people, and as you see proper to the Iews. Wherefore, let us call our own vertues to mind, and rather be angry for this that hath hapned (and so incite our selves to revenge) then sorrowful. And let every valiant souldier with his own hand comfort himself: so shall we both revenge the death of our friends, and be revenged of them by whom they were slain: and I my self (as also now I did) will expose my self to all dangers with you, and go first to fight, and come last from fight. With these and such like speeches he comforted his souldiers.

The Romane souldiers do all things with discretion

B The people of Gamala were of great courage, and much emboldned with their prosperous successe, which notwithstanding did not happen through their valour: but presently perceiving that now all hope of pardon was taken away, and that there was no way to escape, they were very sorrowful, and their hearts relented (for now victuals failed them) yet they omitted not to provide for their own safetie wherin they could; for the most valiant among them kept the breach, and the rest, other strong places about the wals which were yet unbattered. The Romans again built mounts, and attempted to assault the City, and many of the Citizens fled by the vallies where no guard was, and by secret vaults underneath the ground; and they who for fear lest they should be, taken remained in the City, perished for hunger: for all the victuals were reserved for them that fought, and they still continued in this calamity.

The Romanes once more attempt the assault of Gamala.

CHAP. II.

How Placidus took the mountain Itaburium.

DUring this siege, Vespasian made another expedition against them that kept the mountain Itaburium, scituate between the great field and Scythopolis, which is thirty furlongs high, and inaccessible on the North side. In the very top of this mountain there is a Plain twenty furlongs over, enclosed with a wall: all which wall being of so huge a compasse, Joseph had built in fourty dayes, they received all necessary provision from beneath, for they had onely rain water. Unto this place a huge multitude D were gathered, and Vespasian sent Placidus against them with six hundred horsmen, who could no waies get upon the mountain: wherefore he exhorted many of them to peace, putting them in hope of pardon: likewise many of the Iews came down unto him, as it were to entrap him, and assault him at unawares. Placidus for the nonce gave them fair speeches, hoping to get them down into the Plain: so they, as though they would have obeyed him, followed him thither, meaning when they came there, suddenly to assault him: yet Placidus his device took place. For when the Iews assaulted him, he fained himself to flee, and the Iews having pursued him a great way from the mountain, he turned again upon them, and wounded many on the backs as they fled, and killed some, and hindred the rest of the multitude from assending the mountain: so the rest left Itaburium, and fled unto Jerusalem, and E the inhabitants (now water failing them) yeelded to Placidus, and delivered the mountain unto him.

CHAP. III.

How Gamala was destroyed.

NOw the most presumptuous among the Gamalians fled and hid themselves, and the weaker sort did perish through famine: yet the most courageous that were left among them, defended the wall till the twenty seventh day of October. Upon which day, three souldiers of the fifteenth Legion, towards break of the day, undermined the F highest tower in their quarter, and entred into it; those that kept it, neither perceiving them when they came in, nor when they went out, (for it was in the night time.) These souldiers being weary lest any noise should be made, removed five of the greatest stones, and presently leapt away, and incontinently the tower fell with a hideous noise, and with the fall killed those that kept it; and many that kept watch in those quarters fled, being sore afraid; and they who sought to escape the Romanes, were killed; amongst whom one Joseph was stroken with a dart from a part of the wall that was falne down, and there dyed. They who were within the City were terrified with the noise hereof, and ran up and down as though all the enemies were already entred into it. And Chares Josephs companion, being sick, yeelded up the ghost, fear increasing his disease, and helping

Then Titus, as it were vexed at the misfortune of the Romans in his abſence, accompanied with 200. horſmen, and certain choſen footmen, entred the City, no man reſiſting him: and he being paſſed into the ſame, the watchmen then firſt perceiving it, cryed, To arms. Thoſe within the City fearing that Titus was entred, ſome took their children, ſome their wives, and fled into the Caſtle with pitiful cries and weeping: others met Titus, and were all put to the ſword: and they that could not get into the Caſtle, not knowing what to do, fell among the Romane watchmen: then the skies were filled with the cries of men dying, and the lower places of the city flowed with blood. Veſpaſian led his whole army againſt thoſe that fled into the Caſtle, which was of a huge height, and ſcarcely to be come unto, being all of ſtone, and full of ditches and deep dens, and compaſſed with ſteepy rocks: ſo the Iews did H drive down the Romans, that offered to come up unto them, partly with darts, partly with ſtones, which they rowled down upon them; and they were ſo high, that the Romanes arrows could not reach them. But at laſt, as it were by Gods providence, who would have it, a whirlewind aroſe, which carried the Romanes arrows amongſt them in the Caſtle, and the Iews arrows from the Romanes, and the wind was ſo violent, that it was not poſſible for them to ſtand upon thoſe high places: and ſo not being able to ſtand, nor to ſee thoſe that came againſt them, the Romans aſcended and took the caſtle; ſom reſiſting for their defence, others yeelding themſelves. The Romans now call to mind their fellowes that periſhed in the firſt aſſault, and ſo become more cruel. Many deſparing of their lives, caſt their wives, their children, and themſelves headlong down thoſe high places, into the deep vallies underneath. So that the cruelty that the Romans ſhewed againſt the people of Gamala, was not I ſo great as that which they uſed againſt themſelves; for there were onely four thouſand that periſht by the Romans ſword; and the number of them who ſo caſt themſelves down, was found to be five thouſand; and not one eſcaped, but two women that were ſiſters, and daughters to Philip, who was ſon to Ioachimus, a worthy man, and Governour over all Agrippas army under him; and theſe two were ſaved onely, becauſe at ſuch time as the City was taken, they hid themſelves: for they ſpared not infants, but many took them and caſt them down from the caſtle. And thus was Gamala deſtroyed the 23 day of October, which began to rebel the 21. day of September.

How Titus took Giſcala.

The yeer of the world, 4032. after Chriſts Nativity. 70.

NOw all the Cities and ſtrong places of Galilee were taken, Giſcala onely excepted: the inhabitants whereof deſired peace, for that they were husbandmen, and their riches conſiſted in the fruits of the earth, but there were many theeves in the City: to which vice alſo many of the Citizens were addicted. The people were incited to rebel by one Iohn, a witch; and a deceitful perſon, ſon to one Levias; who was of ſtrange manners, and bold to preſume any thing, and wonderfully atchieving all he took in hand, and he was known to all men for one that deſired war, to make himſelf mighty. This man was a Ring leader of the ſeditious perſons in Giſcala: and for fear of them, the L people, who perhaps otherwiſe would have ſent Legates to the Romans, to requeſt peace, were hindred and forced to ſtay, till the Romans came to war againſt them. Againſt theſe people Veſpaſian ſent Titus, and with him a thouſand horſmen; and the tenth legion toward Scythopolis: and he with the reſt went to Cæſarea, to refreſh them after their great labour, at the charge of the towns adjoyning; judging it neceſſary to comfort their bodies, and encourge their minds to ſuſtain manfully the wars that were to enſue: for he foreſaw that he ſhould have much ado to win Jeruſalem, both for that it was wont to be the Kings ſeat, and alſo becauſe it was the chief and head City of all the Nation. And his care in this point was ſo much the more encreaſt, for that he perceived many out of all parts fled thither; and M that it was naturally ſtrong, and alſo compaſſed with all moſt invincible walls: and beſides this, the boldneſſe and deſperate courage of the inhabitants, who although that they had had no wals at all, yet had been ſcarcely to be conquered: and therefore he thought it neceſſary to comfort his ſouldiers before the fight, like champions who ought to enter the field and fight couragiouſly.

Titus (coming on horſeback unto Giſcala) perceived that it might eaſily be taken: yet knowing that if it were taken by force, all the people ſhould be deſtroyed by the Romanes (and now he was weary of blooſhed) he compaſſionating the well diſpoſed people, which were

Titus his compaſſion towards thoſe of Giſcala.

A were otherwiſe like to periſh together with the wicked, attempted to take it by condition. Wherefore the walls being full of people, amongſt whom were many of the ſeditious, he told them that he marvelled what help they had or expected, or by whoſe advice, all other cities being now taken, they alone would abide the laſt brunt of the Romane forces, eſpecially when as they had already ſeen many towns, farre ſtronger then theirs, overthrown at the firſt aſſault: and contrariwiſe, thoſe who had yielded themſelves to the Romanes, lived in peace, and peaceably enjoyed all that was theirs. Which offer (ſaid he) I now alſo make unto you, and am not yet incenſed againſt you, becauſe that which you do is for your liberty: but if (quoth he) you do ſtill perſevere in this impoſſible courſe, my diſpleaſure ſhall be kindled
B againſt you. And if ſo be they refuſed this kind offer, they ſhould preſently perceive the Romane ſword to be ſharpned for their deſtruction, and incontinently ſhould find that their walls were but a mockery, and no waies able to reſiſt the Romane engines: where contrariwiſe, if they yeelded themſelves, and truſted to the fidelity of the Romanes, they ſhould be the moſt happy people of all Galilee. None of the townſmen were admitted to make anſwer, nor to come unto the walls: for the theeves were maſters of them; and a guard was placed at every gate, leſt any one ſhould go forth to ſubmit themſelves, or any horſemen ſhould be
C received into the city. Then John made anſwer, that he liked well of the conditions offered, and that he would either perſwade or compel the inhabitants to accept of them, yet he requeſted, that that day might be granted unto the Jewes: for it was the ſeventh day, wherein it was not lawfull for them to entreat of peace, nor make warre. For (as the Romanes knew) the Jews every ſeventh day ceaſt from all work: and which if they profaned, they who cauſed it to be abuſed, though it were Titus himſelf, were as great offenders as they who were forced to it. Moreover, ſo ſhort time could not prejudice the Romanes, to wit, one nights ſpace: for nothing he could effect in that time to endamage them, except onely by fleeing out of the City (which Titus might prevent by placing a ſtrong guard, and watch in every place thereabout) and that he thought it a great priviledge to be ſuffered to keep the cuſtome of his countrey; and that it was his part, who offered peace and ſafety to them that expected it, and alſo to keep their lawes whoſe ſafety he granted. With theſe and ſuch like D ſpeeches John ſought to delude Titus, being not ſo religious about the keeping of the Sabbath, as carefull for his own ſafety: for he feared that the City would preſently be taken, and he left alone, and ſo he determined in that night to flee, as the onely way to ſave his life. Truly God would have it ſo, that John ſhould then eſcape, to be the overthrow of Jeruſalem, and that Titus ſhould not onely grant him the time he requeſted to deliberate, but alſo that night ſhould pitch his tents neer Cydæſſa, by the higher part of the town, which is the ſtrongeſt village of all that are in the heart of the Tyrian ſoil, which the Galileans alwaies hated. In the night time John perceiving no Romanes to keep watch about the town, having now opportunity, fled not onely with the armed men about him, but alſo with many of the chief of the city, and whole families, whom he promiſed to conduct unto Jeruſalem. But E John fearing captivity, and careful for his own ſafety, having carried them twenty furlongs out of the city, forſook them: who being ſo left deſolate, began grievouſly to lament. For every one thought himſelf as near his enemies, as he was farre from the City and his friends: and ſtill every ſtep they thought their enemies at hand, ready to take them, and ever they looked back, as though their enemies heard the noiſe they made as they went, and ſo came againſt them; inſomuch that many ruſhed forwards on heaps, and many were killed in the way with the preſſe of them that followed; ſo that women and infants did periſh miſerably: or if they ſpake any thing, onely it was entreating their parents or their kinsfolk to ſtay for them.

But Johns exhortation took effect, wherein he cried unto them to ſave themſelves, and haſten unto ſuch a place, where they might be ſafe, and revenge themſelves of the Romanes,
F for the outrages which they that remained behind were like to endure: and ſo the multitude that fled, every one as he was able, diſperſed themſelves. Titus early in the morning came unto the walls to know whether they accepted of his offer. Then the people ſet open the gates, and with their wives and children came to meet him, all crying that he was their ſafety, and worker of their welfare, and that he had delivered their city out of captivity: alſo they certified him how John was fled, and beſought him to pardon them, and execute juſtice upon thoſe malefactors that remained in the city. And at their requeſt, he ſent certain horſemen to purſue John, but they could not take him, for before they came, he had gotten into Jeruſalem; yet they ſlew almoſt two thouſand of them that fled with him, and brought back again 3000. women and children. Titus was angry that he ſuffered Johns deceit to eſcape unpuniſhed: yet his anger was ſomething appeaſed, for that he perceived Johns purpoſe prevented, in that ſo many of his company were ſlain, and ſo many brought back their captives.

Thus he peaceably entred the City, commanding the Souldiers to break down a little piece of the wall, as it were to take possession of it, and so punish't the seditious rather with threats then torments. For he thought that many were accused onely for private hatred, and so were in danger to suffer being innocent: and he thought it better to let the wicked live in fear, then with them to destroy the guiltlesse. Thinking moreover, that hereafter they would be more quiet, either for fear of punishment, or for shame of their former offence, for which they were pardoned: and that if any man suffered unworthily, he could not afterward complain. Then he placed there a garrison, both to represse the seditious, and also to confirm them that desired peace. And thus was Galilee conquered after it had much toiled the Romanes.

CHAP. V.

Of the beginning of the destruction of Jerusalem.

SO soon as John was entred into Jerusalem, all the people flocked about him and those that came with him, enquiring what calamity had befaln them without the citie. Some of them being yet out of breath, and not able to speak, by signes discovered their necessity: yet amidst these their miseries, they boasted that it was not the Romane power that forced them to flee, but that they of their own accord fled thither to warre against the Romanes in a safer place, then that from whence they fled, was; for none but unadvised and rash-headed men would fight for such a city as Giscala and other places that were not able to resist, seeing that it behoved them all to reserve their vigour and strength to defend their Metropolitane citie. They also signified unto them how Giscala was taken by the Romanes, and that they departed in good sort away, though some reported that they fled. The people of Jerusalem hearing what these men reported, and how many were captives unto the Romanes, they fell into a great fear, as though that which they told did portend their ruine. But John nothing ashamed in that he had so shamefully forsaken them of Giscala who fled with him, went first to one, and then to another, inciting them all to warre under a vain hope, alledging the weaknesse of the Romanes, and extolling their own puissance, deceiving the simple people; and perswading them, that though the Romanes sought to revenge, yet could they never enter the walls of Jerusalem, who had so much ado, and endured such affliction in entring the little burges and villages of Galilee, against whose walls they had broken all their engines. These words of his, incited many young men to sedition: but all the wiser sort foresaw what was like to ensue, and even now mourned their lost citie. And in this case were they of Jerusalem: yet before this sedition in the city, the Countrey people began to be at discord among themselves. For Titus departed from Giscala unto Cæsarea, and Vespasian went from Cæsarea to Jamnia and Azotus, and took them both: and leaving there garrisons, he returned to Cæsarea, bringing with him a huge company of them who had yeelded unto him. All cities were at civill warres among themselves; so that when the Romanes did not war upon them, one part of the Jews in every city fought against the other, and there was a great dissension between those that desired peace, and the seditious people: and at first, this discord began onely in private houses; but in the end, every one joyning with them that were of their mind, they now began in companies to rebell openly. Thus every place was troubled with civil discord: and every where rash young men, who desired warres, prevailed against grave and wise old men, who foreseeing the calamity like to ensue, desired peace. At first, the inhabitants one by one robb'd and spoiled what they could; but at last in whole troops they joyned together, and robbed openly, and wasted all the countrey about: and they in their robberies shewed such crueltie, that the harm and injury they did unto their own countrey men, was altogether equall to the miseries which befell them by means of the Romanes; and they, who by these miscreants were spoiled, wished rather to have faln into the Romanes hands. But they who kept the city, either becaus they were loth to weary themselves, or else for that they hated the citizens or people, did nothing or very little succour them that fell into these theeves hands. At last the theeves assembled themselves together from all places, and joyning companies, they brake into Jerusalem. This city had no governour, and according to the custome of that Countrey, received all that came thither that were their countrey men; and so much more willingly at that time, becaus they thought that they that came thither, came of good will to help them: which onely was afterward the cause that the City was destroyed, setting aside the civil dissension. For a great multitude of people unapt to fight being there, consumed the victuals that would have sufficed for the fighting men: and beside the wars, they brought upon it famine and civil dissension. Then other theeves came out of the fields thereabout, & joyning themselves with those that were within the city, omitted no kind of villany: for not content to rob and spoil, they

The theeves trooping together in Jerusalem, spoil the countrey.

A cheyalſo attempted to commit murders, not onelie privily, or in the night upon mean men, but even in the day time they publikelie ſet upon the chiefeſt of the nobilitie. For firſt of all they took Antipas, who was born of the blood royall, a man ſo eminent amongſt them, that the publike treaſure was committed to his charge and cuſtody, and put him in priſon: and after him they took Sepha a worthy man, and ſonne to Raguel and Lævia, both of them of the Kings houſhold, and after them all that ſeemed to bear anie ſway, or were in authoritie amongſt the people. Great fear fell upon the Inhabitants, and everie one provided to ſave himſelf, as though the city were even now ſurprized by the enemies. But theſe people were not content thus to have impriſoned thoſe potentates, neither did they think it ſafetie for themſelves anie longer to detain ſuch men alive: for manie came daily unto them to viſit B them, and unto their houſes, who were able to revenge their injuries: and moreover they feared that the people would make a head againſt them, being moved with their iniquitie. Wherefore they determined to kill them: and to effect their purpoſe, they ſent one John a cruell murderer, who was the ſon of Dorcas: he accompanied with ten more all having ſwords went unto the priſon, and ſlew as many as they found there. To excuſe this cruell fact of theirs, they alleadged this, to wit, that all they who were ſlain in priſon had conference with the Romanes concerning the betraying of the citie into their hands, and that for this cauſe they had ſlain them, being traytors to their countrey: they alſo boaſted that this fact of theirs, had preſerved the citie, and that therefore they had well deſerved of it. The people was brought unto ſuch ſlavery and terrour, that the chuſing of the high Prieſt was in their hands to elect whom they pleaſed: ſo much was their inſolence increaſed. Thus they not re- C ſpecting the families, out of which it was onely lawfull to chuſe the high Prieſt, they now elected ſtrangers and baſe perſons to that ſacred dignitie, and ſuch as would be partakers of their villanies and impieties: for they who not deſerving it, attained to ſuch dignitie, were as it were bound unto their will in all things by whom they were ſo exalted. They alſo deviſed manie lies, to make thoſe that were in authority one at variance with another, thereby as it were to hold them occupied, who were able to reſiſt their enterprizes, till that being now ſatisfied with the blood of the citizens, they began to commit impiety againſt God himſelf, and with prophane and unpure feet to enter into the Sanctuarie. Then the people was incited againſt them by Ananus his meanes, who was one of the Prieſts, and the moſt an- D cient and wiſeſt of them all, who perhaps had ſaved the citie, had he eſcaped the hands of theſe miſcreants, But they uſed the Temple as a Caſtle and defence for themſelves againſt the people, and made the ſanctuarie a place for them to exerciſe tyrannie in. And that which increaſed the ſorrow of the citizens, was, that amidſt theſe calamities, their religion was alſo contumeliouſly abuſed: for theſe theeves, to try of what ſtrength and courage the people were, and their own forces, did elect by lot a high Prieſt contrary to their law: which as we have already ſaid, requireth that the high Prieſt ſhall be choſen by ſucceſſion. This deed of theirs they coloured with an ancient cuſtome, alledging that in time paſt the high Prieſt was choſen by lot, but indeed this their fact was an abrogation of the moſt firm cuſtome that was amongſt the people; and was onely a device to get all government into their hands by E eſtabliſhing Magiſtrates at their pleaſure.

Then calling one of the holy tribes named Eniachin, they caſt lots, & it ſo fell out that the lot fell upon one, whereby their iniquitie was diſcovered. This man whoſe lot it was to be high Prieſt was named Phanes, who was the ſonne of Samuel, a man not onely unworthy of that dignitie. but who had been ſo rudely brought up, that he never knew what the high Prieſt meant: this Phanes was born in a village called Apthaſis. Him, againſt his will they fetcht out of the field, and as it had been in a ſtage-play they graced him with another mans perſon, and preſently gave him inſtructions how he ſhould behave himſelf, putting upon him the ſacred attire of the high Prieſt, as though that ſo great impietie had been but a ſport. The reſt of the Prieſts, beholding a farre off the holy laws to be ſcorned, ſcarcely contained F themſelves from teares, and even groaned for ſorrow, that their ſacred dignities were ſo abuſed. The people could no longer indure this their tyrannie, but now every one addreſt himſelf to depoſe theſe ty rants. And thoſe that were moſt earneſt herein, were Gorion Joſephs ſonne, and Simeon the ſonne of Gamaliel, who went about the city to every one in private, and then in a publike aſſembly exhorted the people to be revenged upon thoſe tyrants, who took from them their libertie; and to addreſſe themſelves to purge the holy Temple from ſuch vile and unclean perſons. Likewiſe the beſt diſpoſed amongſt the Prieſts, to wit, Jeſus the ſonne of Gamala, and Ananus the ſonne of Ananus, often in publike Sermons reprehended the people, and upbraided them with their ſloath, in that they made no more haſt to deſtroy thoſe Zealous people; for ſo thoſe wretches termed themſelves, as though they had been

Then Ananus ſtood up amongſt the middeſt of them: and having often turned his eies to the Temple, and beholded it till the tears ranne down his cheeks, "Oh ſaid he, how farre better "were it for me to die, then to live, to ſee the Houſe of God thus filled with impiety, and the "Sanctuary, wherein none ſhould come but the high Prieſt, prophaned with the wicked feet "of impious perſons, being clothed in Prieſts apparell, and bear the name of the moſt authori-

An anſwer to their contrary opinion, who eſteemed the numbers and multitude of the enemy.

The Epilogue of Ananus Oration to the people.

Ananus thus exhorted the people againſt the Zealous, yet he knew well that it was great difficultie to overcome them, being luſtie young men, many in number, of great courage, and the more deſperate for the remorſe of conſcience of the horrible crimes, and execrable deeds which they had committed: for they deſpaired of all hope of pardon for their miſ-
D deeds. Yet Ananus thought it altogether intolerable, that the common-wealth ſhould be ſo over-ruled. After this exhortation the people cried out, that they were ready to go againſt the theeves, and to do as they were requeſted. Whileſt that Ananus ſelected out the moſt able men for warre, and ſet them in order, the Zealous came and iſſued out upon him, and (having intelligence of all his intents and proceedings by certain ſpies which they had appointed upon purpoſe) being enraged ſallied out, and in companies, ſometime all at once, other times in ambuſhes; ſparing none that they met with. Ananus quickly gathered together the people, who were more in number then the theeves: yet were they not ſo well armed as they; but what they wanted in arms, their courage did ſupply. For the citizens were armed with fury, ſtronger then armour; and they which were gone out of the Temple, with a more E deſperate boldneſs, then all the multitude how great ſoever it was. For the citizens thought it no abiding for them in the citie, except they could drive away the Zealous: and the Zealous thought that they could not eſcape tormens and death it ſelf, except that they were victors. So at laſt they joyned battell, each under their Captains and Leaders, and firſt of all both parties caſt ſtones one againſt another: and if any part fled, then the conquerours purſued them with drawn ſwords, and many were wounded and ſlain on both parts. Thoſe townesmen that were wounded, were by their friends carried into their houſes; but the Zealous that were hurt, went into the Temple and polluted the ſacred pavements with their bloud: ſo that their Religion was prophaned by their bloud. Alwaies the theeves in making excurſi-ons got the upper hand. Hereat the citizens being angry, ſeeing their number every day de-F creaſed, reproved the cowards: ſo that if any of their company offered to flie from the Zealous, they made him ſtand and reſiſt whether he would or no, not permitting him to paſſe away: and thus they bent all their forces againſt their enemies. At laſt, the theeves not able to make anie longer reſiſtance, by little and little retired themſelves into the Temple, and Ananus with his companie entred the temple by force with them, and brake the rank of his enemies. Then they in the outer Temple were in great fear and fled into the inner Temple; and ſhut the gates with all ſpeed. Ananus would not offer violence to the ſacred gates, and beſide that the enemies caſt darts from aloft: for he thought it a great offence againſt God, although he might have got the victorie, to introduce the people not being purified. Wherefore he elected ſix thouſand of the chief of all his men well armed, and appointed them to keep the porches, and others to ſucceed in their places while they took reſt. And manie of the better ſort of the citizens being by the chief of the Citie placed to keep watch there, hired other poor folks to watch in their ſteads. But John, who as before we have told, fled from Giſcala, wrought the ruin of all theſe. This man being full of deceit, and above all meaſure deſirous of rule, long ago intended to overthrow the common-wealth. This man from that time counterfeited himſelf to be againſt the theeves, and ſo day and night accompanied Ananus and the reſt, both in their conſultations, and when they went to viſit the watch, and he diſcloſed all their ſecrets unto the Zealous: and there was nothing decreed by the people, but he gave the theeves intelligence thereof before it was put in practice; yet he ſeemed to be very dutifull unto Ananus, and the reſt of the Nobility, hereby hoping to conceal his treacherie. But it fell out contrary to his expectation; for this his too much reverence cauſed him to be ſuſpected, becauſe they noted him to play the paraſite: and for that uncalled, he daily intruded himſelf into their conſultations, he was miſdoubted to bewray their ſecrets. For Ananus perceived that the enemies knew all their ſecrets, and Johns deeds did carry ſuſpition of treaſon, yet could they not eaſily remove him, his craft was ſuch: beſides this, he was boulſtered out by many noble men who were employed in theſe affairs. Wherefore they thought it good to requeſt of him an oath of friendſhip; which he denied not, but added moreover that he would be true unto the people, and neither diſcloſe any deed or ſecret counſell of theirs unto the enemies, and that he with heart and hand, would truly endeavour to ſuppreſſe the Rebels. So Ananus did no more miſtruſt him, becauſe of his oath, and admitted him afterward to all their counſels, nothing ſuſpecting him. Nay, they now truſted him ſo farre, that they ſent him for an Ambaſſadour unto the Zealous, to perſwade them to peace: for they were very carefull leſt the Temple through their deeds ſhould be defiled and prophaned, or that any of the Jews ſhould there be ſlain. But he, as though he had ſworn unto the Zealous and not unto the Citizens, entred boldly amongſt them: and ſtanding in the midſt of them, he recounted unto them that he had often for their ſakes undergone great danger, in ſuffering none of the townſmens ſecrets to be concealed from them, but declared unto them all that ever Ananus and his confederates determined againſt them; and that even now he was like together with them to fall into extream danger, except it pleaſed God as it were miraculouſly to aſſiſt them. For, ſaid he, now Ananus without delay will ſend unto Veſpaſian, and he will ſend his army in all haſte and take the City: and that he had appointed the next day following for purification to purifie the people, that ſo under pretence of piety he might let them into the city, or elſe they might enter in by force: and that he could not ſee how either they were able to endure a long ſiege, or to encounter with ſo huge an army: adding moreover, that it was Gods providence that he ſhould be ſent unto them to make a peace, when Ananus purpoſed ſo ſoon as they were unarmed to ſet upon them. Wherefore if they had any care of themſelves, they ſhould either entreat the watchmen that beſieged them to be good unto them, or elſe get ſome ſuccour from ſome place without the Temple. For (ſaid he) he that amongſt you hopeth for pardon if you be overcome, doth not remember what hath paſt, and what he hath done; but let them perſwade themſelves, they that have been injured, will not forget and forgive ſo ſoon, as he that injured them is ſorry for his fact. Nay, many times the repentance of malefactors maketh them more hated then before, and the wrath of men that are injured, is increaſed by authority, and licence to do what they pleaſe. And they might be ſure that the friends and kinſfolks of them that were ſlain, would alwaies lay wait to requite the injuries; and that all the people were incenſed againſt them for breaking the laws: ſo that although ſome few would take pity upon them, yet the greater company being moſt in number would prevail. With theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches John terrified the Zealous, yet durſt he not openly tell them what he meant by forrain help, notwithſtanding he meant the Idumæans. And that he might more enflame the theeves, he went unto the chiefeſt of them, and ſecretly told them that Ananus was cruelly bent againſt them, and breathed out many threatnings againſt them in particular.

CHAP. VI.

How the Idumæans came unto Jeruſalem, and what they did there. M

Eleazer one of the Zealous cauſeth the Idumæans to be ſent for.

AMongſt the Zealous there were two principall, Eleazar the ſonne of Simon, who above all the reſt was thought moſt fit to give counſell, and to execute that which was conſulted upon: and Zacharias the ſonne of Amphicalus, who both deſcended from the line of the Prieſts. Theſe two, underſtanding, that beſide the generall threatnings, their deaths were eſpecially vowed, and that the faction of Ananus to get him into authority, had ſent to call the Romanes (for this John had

A fained) deliberated with themſelves what to do, having ſo ſhort time to provide. For they ſuppoſed that preſently the people would aſſault them, and they bethought themſelves that now it was too late to ſeek forrain help: for they might endure all calamity, before they could give notice hereof unto any that would help them. Yet at laſt they determined to call the Idumæans to aid them, and ſo they wrote a brief Epiſtle unto them, letting them underſtand how Ananus, having ſeduced the people, meant to betray the mother City of their nation unto the Romanes; and that they fighting for their liberty, were by him beſieged in the Temple: that the time werein they expected ſafety was very ſhort: and that
B if they did not preſently ſend ſuccour, they were like to fall into Ananus and their enemies hands, and the City to be brought in ſubjection under the Romanes: and alſo committed many things to be ſpoken by word of mouth unto the Rulers of Idumæa. For which purpoſe were choſen two principall men eloquent, and apt to perſwade; and that, which was in this caſe required, ſwift of foot: it was certain that the Idumæans would preſently aid them, it being a clowniſh rude nation, and prone to ſedition and alteration, much rejoycing therein, and by flatterie eaſily entreated to warres, making as much haſte to them, as if they went to ſome feſtivall ſolemnity: ſo that there onely was required two ſpeedy meſſengers. Which two were ready and quick men for ſuch an exploit, and were both called by the name of Ananias. Theſe preſently came unto the Governours of Idumæa: and they
C reading the Epiſtle, and hearing that which the meſſengers were to ſay unto them, like mad men aſſembled all the people together in poſt haſte, and proclaiming warres; ſo the people in an inſtant gathered themſelves together, and were all armed to fight for the liberty of their mother City: and twenty thouſand being aſſembled together under the government of four Captains, came with all ſpeed to Jeruſalem: the names of them were theſe, John and James, ſonnes of Soſa, and Simon the ſonne of Cathla, and Phineas the ſonne of Cloſoth. Ananus and his watchmen knew not of the going of thoſe two meſſengers, nor of the watches in the Citie, but they underſtood of the Idumæans coming, and ſo ſhut the gates and placed watchmen upon the walls: yet they thought it not good to go out and fight with them, but D firſt with peaceable words to perſwade them to concord and peace. Wherefore Jeſus the eldeſt of the Prieſts next after Ananus, ſtood in a tower oppoſite againſt them, and ſpake in this manner:

Though many and divers tumults and troubles have moleſted this City, yet did I never ſo much admire any of them, as to come with ſuch fury and readineſſe to help theſe wicked people, againſt all expectation: for (ſaid he) you are come againſt us to help moſt vile perſons: and that ſo raſhly, as it behoved not you to have done. if your Metropolitane City had requeſted your help againſt barbarous people. If I ſhould perceive your manners like unto theirs that have requeſted your help, I would then think you had ſome reaſon to come, for nothing cauſeth firmer friendſhip then agreement or ſympathy in manners. But they if they were narrowly ſought into, have every one deſerved a thouſand deaths. For they are the baſeſt and very out-caſt of all the E countrey people; who having ſpent their patrimonies riotouſly, and played the theeves in all places and Cities about them, now at laſt have got into this holy City, moſt religious of all cities, and have profaned the holy place by their impiety: they tremble not to be drunk even in the holy Temple, and there they conſume in banquetting the ſpoiles they had gotten from them, whom they have maſſacred. And you come to help theſe men with as great an army and proviſion, as though that this your mother City had by publick conſent requeſted your help againſt forreign enemies. Is not this the injury of fortune, that your whole nation hath conſpired and bent all their forces againſt us to help theſe miſcreants? Till now I knew not what moved you ſo quickly and ſo ſuddenly to arm your ſelves to aſſiſt theeves againſt your native countreymen. What? Have you been informed of the Romanes coming, and of the betraying F of the city? For even now I heard ſome of you mutter, that you came to deliver your mother City. Is it not a wonder to ſee this device and invention of theſe malefactors? But they could deviſe no other way to incite other againſt us (who even naturally deſire liberty, and are ready for the ſame to ſpend our deareſt blood in conflict with the enemie) but to fain us to be deſtroyers of liberty: But it behooveth you to conſider who are theſe calumniators, and againſt whom theſe calumniations are deviſed; and then to gather the verity of the matter, not from forged tales, fained at mens pleaſures, but from the thing it ſelf. What ſhould move us now to yeeld unto the Romanes, having indured as yet nothing to conſtrain us thereunto? when if we had liked to live under their obedience, neither needed we at firſt to have rebelled; and beſide that, if we had repented our ſelves, we might have again ſubmitted our ſelves, and obtained their favour before this time that all the countrey round about us is deſtroyed. Nay, if now we would yeeld, it is not easie for us: for the spoil of Galilee which they having already conquered, G hath made them proud, and that we in humbling our selves unto them, being neer unto us, should incurre an infamy worse then death it self. True it is, I think peace better then warres; yet being once provoked to warres, and the fight being begun, I had rather die a glorious death then to live in Captivity. Do they enform you that we have secretly sent the chief of our City to the Romanes, or that by common consent of all the people we have done it? If they say that we did it secretly; let them then tell what friends of ours were sent, or what servants of ours were Ministers to effect this treason. Did they take any messenger of ours and find letters about him?

How can that be hid from all our citizens, with whom we do every hour converse? And is it possible that a few, shut up in the Temple, who could not come out into the City, should know our secrets, all the whole City knowing nothing? or do they now first know it when they are like to be punished for their impiety? never suspecting any of us to be traitors, so long as they were in no H fear. If they say that it was done by common consent of all the people, why then all men were there when the speech was made unto the people, to exhort them thereunto, and request their good wills, and so the news thereof would quickly have come unto your eare: Or what need had we to send Embassadours, if we had been now already certain to come to composition with the Romanes?
Let them tell you who was appointed for that Embassage. These are but devices and excuses of them, who fear to have a death according to their deserts, and a shift to escape punishment.

Iesus exhorteth the Idumæans, that since they are come, they should oppose themselves against the Zealous.

If fate had so decreed that our City should be betrayed unto the enemy, assure your selves that they, who do thus accuse us, would have betrayed it themselves; who have committed already all sort of impieties, treason onely accepted. It is your part, seeing you are come hither in armes, first (as reason and justice requireth) to assist your mother City against them who tyrannize over us, and violate our laws: who treading down our lawes, make all that justice, which they can effect I with their sword. And first of all they took Noble men and cast them in prison, drawing them from amidst the publike assembly; and never being accused nor condemned, nothing respecting their entreaties, put them to death. If it please you to come in peaceable and not hostile manner into our city, your selves shall plainly behold evident tokens of this that I speak unto you: to wit, houses ruinated and made desolate by their robberies, the wives and families of them that are slain, in mourning apparell, and howling and crying in every part of the city: for there is no one amongst us, that hath not tasted the persecution of these wretched men, who are gone so farre, that not content to make this city their refuge (which is the chief, and a spectacle to all others for sanctity) after they had robbed and spoiled all the countrey and villages, and cities hereabout, now lastly they have made the sacred Temple a refuge and place to carry all their spoils, which they have im-piously gotten in this city unto. This Temple they make their bulwark to issue out and to retire K unto; and from thence they make incursions upon the Citizens: and this is the place were they practise all their villanies against us. And this sacred place, which all the world, even the most barbarous and savage people thereof do reverence, is now defiled by the horrible robberies which one born amongst us committed. And now being in desperation, they rejoyce to see nation against nation, and city against city, and people against people, and our own countreymen to turn themselves against their own bowels: when contrariwise, (as I have already said) it had been your parts and duties to joyn with us, and help us to exterminate these malefactors; and be revenged of them for this lie, in that they presumed to call you to help them. whom they had just reason to fear as revengers of their impieties: yet if you make account of these mens prayers, vouchsafe (laying your weapons aside) to come into our city like friends, and be your selves judges between us and L them whom you came to help. And consider what favour we shew them, who permit them to plead their own causes before you, they being guilty of so hainous crimes, and having put to death persons of such account, never accused nor permitted to speak for themselves: yet this commoditie we will grant them for your sake. But if you continue in your anger against us, and refuse this offer to be our judges: then let us entreat you that, leaving both parts, you would neither imbrue your hands in our blood, nor lend your aid unto these miscreants against your mother Citie. And if you suspect any of us to be confederates with the Romanes, you may keep all passages, and then seek to defend your Metropolis, when you have proof of any such matter as is allead-ged against us; and punish the authours of that treason, when you have covicted them The M enemies cannot prevent you being already planted so neer the City. If you like of none of these, marvell not that we shut our gates against you, coming in armed and hostile manner.

Iesus requireth the Idumæans to judge the difference, between the Zealous and them.

The end of Iesus Oration to the Idumæans.

Iesus spake thus unto them. But the Idumæans being angrie, were not moved hereby, and so much the more, for that entrance into the City was denied them, and their Generalls were exceeding wroth, thinking it slaverie to lay down their armes, especially at the command of another,

A Then one of the Captains named Simon, the ſon of Cathla, having with much ado gotten his ſouldiers to be ſilent, he ſtood in a place where the Prieſts might hear him, and ſaid, "That he now did not wonder that thoſe who maintained liberty, where encloſed and beſieged in the Temple, ſeeing that they of the City now ſhut their gates againſt his fellows, "the City being common and free for all men; and that perhaps they were ready to open "the City gates for to receive the Romans. And he ſpake unto the Idumæans from a tower, "and commanded them to caſt down their arms, which they took onely for the liberty of "the City, when they durſt not truſt their own nation to keep the ſame; yet would have "them Judges of the diſcord: and that accuſing others for killing ſome not convicted, they "themſelves would condemn all the whole nation of ignominy; and that they had now B "ſhut the City gates againſt their own countreymen, which was common for all ſtrangers "to come unto for religion ſake. Did we make haſt towards you, to fight againſt our own "nation, which came onely to preſerve your liberty? But this is as true, as that they whom "you thus beſiege have wronged you, and as the accuſation you forge againſt them. And "you keeping in hold thoſe that are the defenders of the Common-wealth, do then ſhut the "city gates againſt men of your own blood; laſtly, you impoſe upon us contumelious "commands, and ſay that they do tyrannize over you, over whom indeed you do. Who can "any longer endure this your mockery, that perceiveth how unpoſſible your allegations "are? For who can juſtly accuſe thoſe that ye keep ſhut up in the Temple, becauſe that they "preſumed to puniſh traytors whom you grace with the title of noble & innocent, becauſe C "they were your confederates? Onely in this they are blame-worthy, that they did not be-"gin with you, but left alive ſuch members of that conſpiracy. Except alſo you will ſay, that "the Idumæans ſhut out of your City, you your ſelves not permitting us to come and offer "ſacrifice. But though they were too merciful, yet we Idumæans will conſerve the houſe "of God, and will fight for the common good of our countrey, and will be revenged both "of the enemies that are without the Citie, and the traytors within. And here will we "remain before the Citie, till either the Romans come and deliver you, or till you change "your minds, and bethink your ſelves what a jewel it is to have libertie.

Of the maſſacre of the Jews by the Idumæans.

ALl the whole multitude agreed with a loud crie unto theſe ſpeeches of Simon. And Jeſus departed ſorrowful, ſeeing that the Idumæans would agree to no reaſon, and that thereby their City ſhould ſuffer double wars. For the Idumæans wrath was not yet aſſwaged, who took the matter in great diſdain that they were not permitted to enter into the Citie, and alſo for that they thought the Zealous very ſtrong, and they themſelves were aſhamed that they could not come to help them, ſo that many repented that they E were come thither. Yet would they not for ſhame return, nothing being done by them: and ſo raſhly placing their Tabernacles near unto the Citie wals, they determined to ſtay there. But that night there fell a moſt huge tempeſt: for there was a great ſtormy wind, and an exceeding great rain mixt with fearful thunder and horrible lightening, and the Earthquake with ſtrange noiſes: whereupon all men thought that this motion of the earth, did ſignifie the death of mankind, and portend ſom great matter. The Idumæans and Townſmen were both of one mind: for they though that God was angry with them for bearing arms againſt their Metropolis, and perſwaded themſelves that they could not eſcape death if they continued in their purpoſe. Ananus and his followers perſwaded themſelves that they had now overcome them without war, and that God had fought for them againſt the Idumæans. But they were falſe prohets, and what they judged to befall their enemies, that fell upon themſelves. In the mean while the Idumæans lay as cloſe together as they could, and covered their heads with their ſhields, ſo that by this means the rain did them not ſo much harm, The Zealous were penſive for the Idumæans more then for themſelves, and deviſed which way they might ſuccour them. Then the boldeſt amongſt them adviſed the reſt, by force to oppreſſe the watchmen, and ſo to go into the City, and open the gates to the Idumæans that came to help them, for it was eaſie to ſurprize the watchmen, by reaſon that many of them were unarmed, and unfit for war, and the Citizens could not eaſily be aſſembled together, for every man becauſe of the tempeſt kept his houſe. And ſuppoſe that there there were danger, yet were it better to endure all mischiefs that might ensue, then to permit such an army shamefully to perish, who came at their request to help them. But the wiser sort disswaded the rest from this, seeing both a stronger watch placed to keep them in, & the City wals diligently guarded because of the Idumæans: and moreover, perswading themselves that Ananus ceased not, but went up and down, first from one watch, and then to another; yet that night he did not so, not for slothfulnesse, but because that the destinies had so decreed that thereby both he and the watch-men should perish. For about mid-night the storm increasing, the watch-men fell into a sound sleep. G

The watchmen are oppressed with sleep.

Then the Zealous determined to fire the bars and bolts of the gates in sunder; to effect this, they took the instruments which were consecrated to the Temple, and this attempt was much furthered by the huge wind and thunder, which made such a noise that they could not be heard: so issuing out of the Temple, they went privily to the wals, and opened that gate near unto which the Idumæans lay, and suspecting that Ananus would make some resistance, they first of all drew their swords, and then together with the Idumæans came in: & if at that time they had assaulted the City, they had without any let or hindrance destroyed all the people therein; so great was their rage at that time. But first of all they hastned to assist their fellowes, whom they left besieged, and requested the Idumæans not to leave them in danger, for whose succour they were come, nor permit them to incur greater damage: for having first surprized the watch-men, it would be more easie for them to assault the City which if they did not, but first set upon the Citizens, they would presently assemble together, and oppose themselves against them, and not permit them to ascend up into the Temple. The Idumæans consented unto this, and so they passed thorow the City into the Temple. And the Zealous remaining in the Temple, carefully expected their coming; at whose arrival they took courage, and joyning with the Idumæans, came out of the inner Temple, and set upon the watch: and some being slain who were fast asleep, the rest were awaked by the cries of others, and so betook themselves to their arms to defend themselves, being yet amazed. And at first, thinking that they were onely the Zealous that gave the assault, hoped onely by their multitude to suppresse them; but seeing others without the Temple also assailing them, they perceived the Idumæans were broken in: so the greater part of them being dismaied laid down their weapons, and cried: and onely a few of them, young men well armed, and of good courage, encountred with the Idumæans, and for a good space defended their idle fellowes; others went & advertised the inhabitants what was done, yet none durst come to help them, because they now knew that the Idumæans were got in, but every one lamented their hard fortune: and the women made great lamentation. when any of the watch men fell into danger. The Zealous also answered their cries with the like, and then the tempest and thunder made all more dreadful. The Idumæans spared none, because that they were naturally cruel and fierce to shed blood: and angry that they were so beaten with the tempest, they used them most cruelly, by whose means they were shut out of the City, sparing neither those who requested favour, nor them who made resistance, for they slew many even as they were entreating them to remember that they were of their own blood, and requesting them to spare them for reverence of their temple. There was no way to flie, nor any hope of escape: being driven up in a narrow room, they hurt themselves more then the enemies did, by crowding and treading upon one another, for there was no place to flie, nor their enemies ceased not to kill them. Being in this desperate estate, not knowing how to do, they cast themselves headlong down into the City, and so died a more miserable death (in my mind) that they that died by the enemies sword. The next day there was found slain eight thousand and five hundred, and all the outer Temple flowed with blood. Yet this massacre sufficed not the Idumæans rage, but turning themselves against the City, they robbed and spoiled all houses, and killed all they met, making no account of the death of the rest of the multitude. They made diligent search for the Priests, and many laid violent hands upon them, and killed them: and standing upon their dead corps sometime they upbraided Ananus with the peoples favour towards him, sometime Iesus with the words he spake upon the wall unto them, and were so impious, as that they cast away their dead bodies unburied, notwithstanding the Jews in this point are so religious, that after sun-set they take down the dead bodies of malefactors, who by sentence have been adjudged unto the crosse, and bury them. I think I do not greatly misse the mark, if I affirm Ananus his death to have been the destruction of the city, & from that time forth the wals of Ierusalem to have been overthrown, and the Common-wealth of the Jews to have perished in that day, when they beheld their Priest and Governor slain, even in the middest of the city. He was a man that led a laudable

and

A and moſt juſt life: and being in great dignity, honour, and reputation; yet wou'd he not exalt himſelf above any one, were he never ſo baſe. He was a man who thirſted after liberty, and bare the rule and government of the Common-wealth. He continually preferred the publike commodity before his own private gain, being alwaies deſirous of peace; for he foreſaw that the Romans could not be withſtood: and that, if the Jews did not quickly accord with them, their ruin was at hand: briefly I ſay, that had Ananus lived, they had yeelded with him unto the Romans. For he was an eloquent Orator, and could perſwade admirably: whereby he had now gained unto his ſide thoſe that hindred him, and cauſed the wars: whom if they had had for their Captain againſt the Romans, it had not been ſo eaſie for the Romans to have conquered them. With him was joyned Jeſus inferiour to Ananus, B yet excelling all the reſt. So that I think Almightie God having decreed the total ruin of the City, being now violated and filled with iniquity, and meaning by fire as it were, to purifie the holy Temple which was now defiled and prophaned, he firſt took up the defenders thereof, and thoſe that loved them moſt dearly. So they who a little before were cloathed in ſecret apparrel, and reverenced of all thoſe that from the furtheſt parts of the world came to Jeruſalem, now lay murthered and naked in the open ſtreets, left as it were a prey to be torn in pieces with dogs or wilde beaſts, who earſt were the authors of piety and religion. I think that Vertue it ſelf wept to ſee wickedneſſe ſo prevail.

CHAP. I.

Of another massacre, and of the return of the Idumæans, and the cruelty of the Zelous.

SUch was the end of Ananus and Jesus. After whose death the Idumæans and the Zelous massacred the people, as though they had been a flock of pernicious beasts, and every one was slain whersoever he was found: and taking the nobility and younger sort of men, they kept them bound in prison, hoping that by deferring their deaths, some of them would become partakers with them. Yet none was hereby moved, but every one desired to die, rather then impiously to conspire against their own country: yet were they most cruelly whipped before they were put to death, their whole body being all as it were one sore place by whipping and stripes: and so when they could not endure these torments any longer, then were they killed. And who so was taken on the day time, was in the night carried to prison, and those that died in prison, and tormen:s, they then cast their dead bodies out, that they might have place to imprison others in their room. And the people were so terrified, that none durst weep openly for his friend, nor bury the dead body of h.s kinsman; yea those that were in prison durst not openly weep, but secretly; looking about them, lest any of their enemies should espie them. For whosoever mourned for any that was afflicted, was presently himself used in the same manner as he had been for whom he lamented; and sometime some in the night scraped up a little earth with their hands, and therewithal covered the dead body of their friend; and some bolder then the rest, did the like in the day time. And in this general slaughter were twelve thousand young Noblemen slain by this means; and thus being hated for these massacres, they mocked and flouted the Magistrates, and made no account of their judgments. So that when they determined to put one Zacherie the son of Baruch to death, a noble man one of the chief of the City (for they perceived that he was an enemy to their wickedness, and loved the vertuous, and one that was rich, by whose death they hoped not onely to have the spoil of his goods, but also to be rid of such a one who might be able to resist their bad purposes) they called seventy of the best amongst the common people together as it were in judgment, yet they having no authority; and before them they accused Zacherie that he had betrayed the Commonweal unto the Romans, and that for that intent he had sent unto Vespasian: but neither shewed any evidence nor proof thereof, but onely they affirmed it to be so; and therefore would have credit given unto their words. When Zacherie perceived that under pretence of being called unto judgment, he was deceitfully brought into prison; and having no hope of life, yet he spared not to speak liberally his mind: but began to scorn the rage and pretence of his enemies, and purged himself of the crimes whereof he was accused; and converting his speech against his accusers, he laid open all their iniquities, and much lamented the miseries and troubles of the City.

Zacharie condemned to death by the Zealous.

In the mean-while the Zealous gnashed their teeth, and could scarcely contain themselves from drawing their swords, and were desirous that their pretended accusation and jugdement might be ended. He also requested them, who by these miscreants were appointed his Iudges, to remember justice, notwithstanding those dangerous times. The seventy Judges all pronounced that he was to be absolved and freed as unguilty; and rather chose to die, then to cause his death who was innocent. This sentence being pronounced the Zealous began to shout and cry with a loud voice, and they all were angry at the Iudges, who did not understand to what end that counterfeit authority was given them. Then two of the boldest amongst them set upon Zacharie, and killed him in the midst of the Temple, & mocked him, saying; Thou hast now our sentence and absolution, far more certain then the other was, and presently they cast him down from the Temple into the valley uunderneath: and then contumeliously with the hilts of their swords they did beat the Iudges out of the Temple; yet they did not kill them, to the end that being dispersed thorow the whole City, they might tell the people as messengers from them, of their miserable captivity. The Idumæans were now sorrowful for their coming: for they misliked these proceedings: who being assembled together, one of the Zealous secretly told them all that their faction had done from their beginning; and that the Idumæans had taken armes, because they were enformed, how that the Metropolitan City was by the Priests betrayed unto the Romanes: but as they might perceive, there was no proof nor sign of any such matter: and that indeed

A indeed the Zealous who pretended themſelves conſervers of the City, were meer enemies; and exerciſed tyrannie over the citizens even from the beginning. And though they had aſſociated themſelves with ſuch wicked perſons, and made themſelves partakers of ſuch and ſo many murthers, yet thought now to ceaſe from ſuch wickedneſſe, and not aſſiſt men ſo impious to deſtroy their countrey laws and religion. For although they took it in bad part, that the Citie gates were ſhut upon them: yet now they were ſufficiently revenged of thoſe that were the cauſe thereof. Now was Ananus himſelf ſlain, and almoſt all the people in one night, whereof many of them ere long would repent, and that they might now themſelves perceive the crueltie of them, who requeſted their aid, to be more then barbarous; ſo that B they bluſht not to commit their villanies openly in the ſight of them who had ſaved their lives: and their miſdemeanour and impietie would be imputed unto the Idumæans, becauſe they neither hindred their miſchievous practiſes, nor forſook their ſocietie. And that therefore it was their parts (ſeeing that it was now evident that the report of treaſon was onely calumniation, and that no aſſault by the Romans was to be feared; likewiſe that an invincible force was eſtabliſhed againſt the Citie) for to depart home, and by forſaking the ſocietie of the impious acquit themſelves of their impietie, as being by them deceived, and ſo againſt their wils made partakers thereof. The Idumæans were hereby perſwaded, & firſt of all they looſed them that were in priſon, in number 2000. of the vulgar, and preſently leaving the C Citie, they went unto Simon, of whom we will ſpeak hereafter, and ſo they departed home.

The year of the world, 4132 after chriſts Nativity, 70.

The Idumæans depart out of Ieruſalem.

Their departure was againſt the expectation of both parts: for the people, not knowing that the Idumæans were penitent for that they had done, rejoyced as now delivered from their enemies: and the zealous grew more inſolent and proud, as though they never had needed help, but now were delivered from them, in reverence of whom they abſtained from villanie. So now they uſed no delay to effect their impietie: for they ſpent not much time in taking advice; but whatſoever ſeemed beſt unto them, preſently without any delay they put it in practice. But chiefly they murthered thoſe men that were ſtrong and valiant: for they envied the nobilitie for their vertue: And they thought it a principal point firſt to be effected, nor to leave any one man of account alive. Wherefore they ſlew amongſt the reſt D Gorion a noble man of great birth and dignitie, one who loved the people, and was very bountiful and a lover of libertie: ſo that there was none amongſt the Jews like him, who for deſire of libertie, and his other vertues was put to death. But neither could Niger Peraita eſcape their hands, a man who in wars againſt the Romans had ſhewed himſelf valiant: who although he often cried out and ſhewed the ſcars of his wounds received in defence of his countrey; yet they ceaſed not for all this moſt ſhamefully to drag him thorow the citie: and being led out of the Citie, deſparing of life, he intreated that he might be buried. But the barbarous people denying his requeſt ſlew him. Who at his death beſought God that the Romans might come and revenge it upon them, & that plague and famine, and civil diſcord might light upon their Citie. Whoſe prayers God heard, ſending all upon them which he did juſtly require, and firſt of all, they were plagued with civil wars among themſelves. Ni- E ger being thus ſlain, they were freed from the fear that they had of him, how that he would reſiſt their wickedneſſe. There was no part of the common people, who were not by ſome forged tale or other put to death. For ſome were ſlain, for that long ſince they had born arms againſt their own Citizens; and they who were innocent in all points were put to death, for ſome occaſion deviſed in the time of peace: and they who did not converſe with them were murthered, as ſuch as contemned them: and they that freely and friendly converſed with them were ſlain, as men that ſought to betray them; and the greateſt offenders, and the leaſt offenders were all puniſhed alike; to wit, with death: for no man eſcaped, except he was either poor, or of very baſe condition.

The civil diſcord amongſt the Jews.

The ſouldiers incite Veſpaſian to reſort to Jeruſalem.

IN the mean-while the Romans addreſſed their courage againſt the Citie of Jeruſalem; and ſeeing them at great variance among themſelves, thought this to be for their great advantage. Upon this they incited Veſpaſian their General, affirming that it was Gods providence (who fought for them) that the Jews ſhould be at civil wars among themſelves, and that therefore he ſhould not overſlip ſo good an opportunitie: for the Iews would quickly be friends again one with another, either by the wearineſſe of civil war, or elſe repenting themſelves of that which they had done. To whom Vespasian answered, that they were ignorant what was to be done, being rather desirous as it were in a Theater to shew their forces and strength, then with him to consider what was profitable and expedient. "For (said he) if we presently assault them, our coming will make "concord amongst our enemies, and so we shall bring upon our selves their forces yet firme "& strong; but by expecting a little while, they should have lesse ado to conquer them, their "chiefest forces being destroyed by their own civil wars: And that God was more their "friend then they were aware of, who without their labour & pain delivered the Jews into "their hands, and will give us the victory without endangering of our army: And that ther-"fore it was rather their parts to be as it were beholders of that tragedie, then to fight against "men desirous of death, and troubled with the greatest evil that possible could be, to wit, "domestical sedition, and civil wars. And if any think that the victory is not famous being "gotten without fight, let him know and consider the uncertain events of wars: and that it is "better, if it be possible, to get a victory without bloodshed, then therewith to hazard the "victory. For they who by councel and advice do any worthy act, deserve no lesse praise then "they, who by force of arms atchieve a victorie. Moreover, in the mean time that the ene-"mies one destroyed another, his souldiers might take rest, and so be stronger and better able "to fight when need should require. Beside that, it seemed not that there was much haste "required to get the victory: for the Jews neither prepared arms or engines of war, nor le-"vied any forces, nor sought for aid, and so by delay no damage could ensue: but that they "would plague one another more by civil wars, then his army could by taking them and "their city. And therefore whether they considered it best to abstain from assaulting them "who fought with one another) for security sake, or else for vain glory, though the honour "of the victory diminished thereby: yet he held it not meet to fight against them, who were "at civil wars amongst themselves; for so it would be justly said, the victory was not to be "imputed to us, but to their discord.

Veſpatian

The yeer of the world, 4032. after Christs nativitie. 70.

Vespasian expecteth victory by the civil dissension of his enemies.

Many citizens to fly the zealous, resorted to Vespasian.

The Captains all consented, and thought this advice of Vespasians best: and presently it appeared how profitable his counsel was. For every day many fled unto him to escape the hands of the zealous: yet it was hard and dangerous to flie, because all the wayes were guarded with watch-men. And if any man upon any occasion whatsoever were taken upon the way, he was presently killed, as one who intended to have fled unto the Romanes: yet he that fee'd the watch men with money, escaped away safely; and he that did not, was counted as a traitor: so that onely rich men could escape, and the poor were left to the slaughter. The multitude of the dead bodies that lay on heaps together was innumerable, & many of them who had fled unto the Romans, returned again into the City, chusing rather to die there: for the hope they had to be buried in their native soil made the death there seem more tolerable. But they became so cruel, that they neither permitted them who were slain within, nor them without the Citie, to be buried. But like men that had now determined together, with their countrey laws to abolish the law of nature, yea and by their impiety to polute the sacred divinitie with injustice, let the dead bodies rot above the ground, and whosoever attempted to bury any one of them that were slain, whether he were friend or kinsman, were presently put to death, and left unburied, as men forsaking their City, and flying to the enemy. To be brief, nothing so much increased their calamity as mercy: for the wicked people were herewith, as it were provoked to wrath, whose displeasure and crueltie was extended from the living unto the dead, and from the dead unto the living. And such fear fell upon the whole City, that those that were left alive, deemed them happy, that being dead, were at rest, and free from those miseries: and they that were in prison, in respect of the torments they endured, thought themselves unhappier then they who lay unburied. All humane justice was by them perverted, and they scorned and mocked at all divine and holy things, and proudly derided the Oracles of the Prophets, esteeming them as fables and jests. But having now contemned all laws established by their forefathers for the punishment of vice, and increasing of vertue, at last they found that true which by them was foretold, concerning the destruction of themselves and their countrey. For there was an old prophecy, that when sedition reigned amongst them, and their own hands, had first violated the Temple of God and holy things; that then their Citie should be destroyed by war, and their holy places should be burned with fire, according to the use and custome of war. And the zealous giving credit to this prophecie, made themselves the ministers of this action.

The zealous tyrannize both over the living and the dead.

CHAP. III.

How Gadara was yielded: and of the Maſſacre there.

The yeer of the world, 4031. after Chriſts Nativity, 70.

BUt John, who long agoe deſired to be in chief authoritie, as Tyrant over all the reſt, thought it not ſufficient to be in as great reputation as his fellows; wherefore by little and little joyning unto himſelf the moſt impious of all the Zealous, he divided himſelf from their union and fellowſhip: So that now every one perceived (in that he alwayes neglected what others commanded, and imperiouſly commanded what himſelf thought good) that he affected principalitie; and many joyned to him for fear, ſome for favour (for he had a ſmooth tongue, able to perſwade them unto what he would:) many alſo followed him, thinking it better that all the impietie before committed were laid to one mans charge in particular, then unto all men in generall. Moreover, being a valiant man of his hands, and one able to give politike counſell, he wanted not followers, notwithſtanding, that many of the contrarie faction left him, envying that he, who before was their equall, ſhould now be their Lord and commander. Fear alſo terrified them from living under the government of one man; for they thought that if he once prevailed, he could not eaſily be overcome: and again, if he were depoſed, that he would pick quarrels againſt them in the end, becauſe that they reſiſted him in the beginning. So every man determined rather to ſuffer all miſerie in warre then to ſubmit himſelf, and periſh like a ſlave. Thus the ſedition was divided, and John was chief of the faction againſt the Zealous: ſo between them they appointed garriſons in every place; and if by chance they combated together, they did little or nothing hurt one another, but the chief contention was, who ſhould bear moſt ſway amongſt the people: and they did ſtrive on both parts who ſhould have the greateſt part of the ſpoyl. Thus the Citie at one time was vexed with three intollerable miſchiefs and evils, to wit, War, Tyranny and ſedition: and yet warre ſeemed a leſs evil then the reſt unto the commonaltie. In brief, many leaving their native ſoil, fled unto ſtrangers for ſuccour, and found among the Romans ſafetie, who with their own nation lived in continuall danger. There was alſo then begun the fourth evill, which wrought the ruine of the whole Nation. Not farre from the Citie there was a Caſtle called Maſſada, builded by the ancient Kings of Jeruſalem, very ſtrong to lay their treaſure in, and their munition for warre, and to retire themſelves thereunto in time of need, for the ſafetie of their perſons. This Caſtle was taken and kept by that ſort of thieves that were called Sicarii, who for fear durſt rob no more. Theſe thieves ſeeing the Romane Army now idle, and the thieves in Jeruſalem at civill wars and ſedition among themſelves, they took courage, and again fell to their villanies. And ſo on that day, which is the feaſt of unleavened bread (which the Jews do keep holy, in memory of their deliverance out of the Egyptian Captivitie) deceiving the watchmen, they ſeized upon a Fort, called Engaddi: and before the townſmen, could arme and unite themſelves together, they were by theſe perſons driven out of the Town, who alſo killed them that could not flie, to wit, women and children, to the number of more then ſeven hundreth; and ſo ſacking the houſes, and taking the fruits that were now ripe, they carried all unto Maſſada: and ſo they waſted all the villages and whole countrey round about them, many wicked perſons dayly flocking unto them, and joyning with them: and by their example, other thieves that a while had been quiet, now robbed again, and ſpoyled in every part of Judæa. And as in a body, if the principal member thereof be ſick, all other parts of it are afflicted: ſo Jeruſalem being filled with tumults and diſcord, thoſe that were without the city found licence to rob and ſpoil: and all they that had their towns deſtroyed where they were wont to inhabit, went into the wilderneſſe. Then they aſſembling and uniting themſelves together, not ſo many as an Army, yet more then a company of thieves, they brake into the Towns and Temples; and as in war it cometh to paſſe, they purpoſed to aſſault them, by whom they had ſuffered ſuch injurie: but they were prevented; for the thieves underſtanding of their coming, fled with the ſpoyl they had gotten. And there was no part of Judæa, that did not periſh together with Jeruſalem their mother Citie. Thoſe that fled unto the Romanes, certified Veſpaſian hereof: for although the ſeditious perſons did keep and obſerve all paſſages, and kill them that offered to fly, yet many ſecretly ſtole away from them, and beſought Veſpaſian, both to help the oppreſſed Citie, and to take compaſſion upon the reliques of their nation: affirming, that many had been butchered for wiſhing well to the Romanes, and many being yet alive, were yet in great danger. And Veſpaſian moved to compaſſionate sionate their calamities, came with his Army neerer Jerusalem, as though he would have besieged it (but indeed his intent was to deliver it from the siege,) hoping in the mean time to conquer that part of the Countrey that was yet untoucht, and so to leave nothing to hinder him when he should begin the siege. Wherefore coming unto Gadara, the strongest place and mother Citie of all the countrey beyond the river, he entred into it the fourth day of March: for the chiefest of the Citie, unknown unto the seditious people, had sent Embassadors unto him, partly desiring peace, partly to save their goods and lives, and promised him to yeeld the Town into his hands: for there were many rich men dwelling in Gadara: and their enemies knew not of their Embassage, till they saw Vespasian at the Citie gates. And so despairing that they were able to keep the Citie, by reason they had in the Town many enemies, more in number and stronger then themselves; and moreover, seeing Vespasian even now almost at the Citie: and thinking it a shame to flie, and not to be revenged of their enemies; they took Dolesus (who was both a Noble man and chief of the Citie, and also the Author of that Embassage) and killed him, and for anger beating him after he was dead, they fled out of the Citie. Now the Romanes Army approaching neer unto the citie, the people of Gadara went forth and received Vespasian joyfully, who also confirmed a league betwixt them and him, and left them a company of horse and footmen to defend them against the incursions of the fugitives their enemies: for they themselves before the Romans requested it, destroyed the Citie walls, that so they might shew themselves to desire peace, in that destroying their walls, if after they desired to rebel, they could not.

Vespasian then sent Placidus with five hundreth horsemen, and three thousand footmen to pursue those, that were fled out of Gadara, and he with the rest of his Army returned to Cæsarea. But the fugitives perceiving themselves to be pursued by Placidus, before he could overtake them, got into a Town called Bethenabris: and finding there many young men, partly for that they were willing, partly by force they compelled them to arm themselves, and so rashly they came against Placidus. Placidus and his Army seemed a little to give back, to the intent to draw them further from the wall, and then having compassed them about in a fit place, they wounded them afar off with darts and arrows. Then the Jewes seeking to flie, were prevented by the horsemen: and they who offered to fight, were by the Romane footmen all put to the sword, never shewing any sign of valour. For the Jews assaulting the Romans, being all invironed and quite covered with their shields as with a wall, and not being able to break into their battel, they were slain by the Romans darts: but their darts could do the Romans no harm, and so like fierce and savage beasts they wilfully ran upon their enemies swords, and so were slain, some having all their face cut with swords, some killed by the horsemen. For Placidus was carefull to intercept their passage unto the Town, and to hinder their recourse unto it, and brought those back again that fled towards it, using his darts, and killing those that were next him; and those who fled afar off for fear, he caused to return; till at last, the strongest amongst them brake away, and got unto the town walls: And those that were within the Citie knew not what to doe, for they would not shut the fugitives of Gadara out of the Citie, because they desired to let their own Citizens in; and again they perceived that if they let them in, they thereby should work the overthrow of the Citie, as it fell out indeed they did. For the gates being set open for them to come in, the Romane horsemen almost brake into the town with them, yet the gates were shut before they could get in. Then Placidus with all his souldiers assaulted the Town, and fighting a sore fight which continued even untill the Evening, at last he got the wals, and the town, and slew the weaker sort: for the stronger fled: so the souldiers sacked the houses, and then fired the town. They who escaped thence, incited the whole countrey to flie with them, reporting their calamities with the most, and affirming that all the Romane Army was at hand: and so they put all the inhabitants there in great fear; and having assembled a great multitude, they fled unto Jericho, which place they put their confidence in, for that it was strong and populous. Placidus having horsemen, and being incouraged with his former victorie, pursued them unto Jordan, and whomsoever he overtook he slew, and at the river he fought with all the multitude there gathered together; and staying, because that the river being waxed deeper by abundance of rain, that had lately falne, they could not pass over it.

Placidus taketh and burneth Bethenabris.

Wherefore necessitie forced them to fight, because they could not flie: and placing themselves along the banks of the river, they there received the horsemen, and warded their darts; yet many for fear fell into the river; so the Romanes slew there 13000. and the rest not able to resist, cast themselves into the river; which were an infinite number; also the Romanes took 2000. and 200. men alive, and a huge bootie of Sheep, Asses, Camels, and

Placidus victorie over the fugitives.

A and Oxen. This maſſacre though it was no greater then the former, yet it ſeemed to the Jews far greater, becauſe that many all over the countrey flying were killed, and Jordan was ſo filled with dead carkaſſes, that none could paſs over it: and alſo the lake Aſphaltites was full of dead bodies, brought thither out of divers Rivers. Placidus having ſo good ſucceſs, went into the towns and villages adjoyning, and took Abila, Julias, Beſemoth, and all the towns even unto the lake Aſphaltites, and placed in them garriſons of them that fled unto him: and afterward preparing ſhips and furniſhing them with ſouldiers, he purſued them that were fled by water, and overcame them: and ſo all the countrie beyond Jordan yielded unto the Romans, and even unto Machæron, all places were by them conquered.

CHAP. IIII.

How certain towns were taken, and the deſcription of Jericho.

AT this time came news of the troubles in Gallia, and how that Vindex, together with the Nobilitie of that countrey had revolted from Nero, whereof we have made mention in another place. This news cauſed Veſpaſian to be more earneſt to end the wars of the Jewes: for even then he foreſaw the civil warres that enſued, and the danger of the C whole Empire: and he thought that if he could before the beginning of thoſe troubles end the warres in the Eaſt part of the World, that then Italy was not in ſo much danger. but Winter hindring him, he in the mean time placed garriſons in all Townes and Villages, about the whole Countrey, and placed Decurions in every Citie, and repaired many places which he had before deſtroyed. And firſt of all, he with his whole Armie that was at Cæſarea, went to Antipatris; and there having ſettled the eſtate of that Citie, after his abode there two dayes, the third day he departed, ſpoyling and burning all the Countrey: as alſo all the Countrey about Thamnia the Toparchie, and ſo went into Lydda and Jamnia. But ſeeing that thoſe two places ſubmitted themſelves unto him, leaving there ſuch inhabitants as he thought good, he went thence unto Ammaus, and placing himſelf in the way to their Metropolitane Citie, he there entrenched his Armie, and then leaving the D fifth legion there, he with the reſt went into the Toparchy of Bethlepton, firing it and all places thereabout; as alſo the borders of Idumæa: but he reſerved there certain Caſtles in fit places, and fortified them. And having taken two Townes in the middeſt of Idumæa, to wit, Begabri and Caphartopha, he ſlew there above ten thouſand men, and took almoſt a thouſand, and driving out the reſt of the inhabitants, he left a great part of his Armie there, who made incurſions, and waſted all the high places there bout: and he with the reſt returned to Jamnia; and from thence by Samaria and Neapolis, called by the inhabitants Nabortha, the ſecond day of June, he came into Corea: and pitching his Tents there, the next day he came to Jericho, where one of his Captains, named Trajan, met him with the ſouldiers he brought from beyond Jordan, which place he had conquered. But the multitude before the E Romanes came, fled from Jericho into the high Countrey over againſt Jeruſalem, and many that ſtayed behinde, were there ſlain. So he found the Citie deſolate, being ſcituate in a Plane, under a great mountain that is barren, which is of a huge length: for it reacheth on the Northſide, unto the borders of Scythopolis, and on the South, unto the borders of Sodome, and the lake of Aſphaltites. It is all rockie and not inhabited, becauſe it beareth no fruit. Over againſt this neer Jordan, is ſcituate a huge mountain, beginning on the Northſide, at Julias, and reaching unto Bacra on the South, which is the limits of Petra, a Citie of Arabia. In this place is that, that is called the mountain of Iron, reaching unto the Countrey of the Moabites.

The countrey between theſe two mountains is called the great field, reaching from the F village Gennabara unto the lake of Aſphaltites, being in length two hundreth and thirty furlongs, and in breadth a hundred and twentie, and in the midſt it is divided by the river Jordan. Theſe are alſo two lakes of contrary natures, Aſphaltites, and Tiberias; for one of them is ſalt and barren, but that of Tiberias ſweet and fertill. This Plain in ſummer time is burned with the heat of the ſun, and the aire is infected in all places thereabouts, ſave onely about thoſe which adjoyn to Jordan: and this is the cauſe that the Palm-trees that grow about the River ſide do flouriſh moſt, and are more fertill then the reſt. Neer unto Jericho, there is a large great fountain, which plentifully watereth the fields thereabout, and runneth with a great ſtreame out of the ground neer unto the old citie: which Joſue the ſonne of Nun, General of the Hebrewes took by warre, the firſt of all that he took in the land of Canaan. It is reported that in the beginning, the waters of this fountain did deſtroy all fruits of the earth, and also made women be delivered before their time, and to infect all places with diseases, and the plague; and afterward by Helizæus the succeſſour of Helias was made ſweet and fertill: Who being once courteouſly entertained by the inhabitants of Jericho, did ſo reward them and all the countrey for that their kindneſſe: and going unto the fountain, he caſt a pitcher full of ſalt into the water; and hard by lifting up his hands to Heaven, and tempering with this fountain water certain ſweet waters, he prayed God to qualifie the rage thereof, to make it flow with more ſweet ſtreams: and beſought God to give a better aire unto the fountain, which both might cauſe plentie of fruites, and alſo of children unto the inhabitants: and that the water might have the vertue to make women fertill, ſo long as they perſiſt in pietie. After theſe prayers, with his hands he altered the fountain according to the knowledge he had: and from that time, this fountain which before was the cauſe of famine and ſterilitie, was now the cauſe of plentie and fertilitie. And ſo it watereth the ground, that where a little of it cometh, it doth more good then all the other waters which lie long upon it: and ſo they that water their grounds but a little with it, receive much fruits; and they that water their grounds with it much, do not receive them in that meaſure; yet it watereth a greater compaſs of ground then other fountains: and in length it runneth thorow a Plain ſeventie furlongs long, and twenty broad. There are moſt pleaſant and goodly Orchards, and many ſorts of Palm trees growing by brooks ſides, which are divers in the taſte of their fruits; the fatteſt whereof being preſſed, do yield a juice like hony, nothing inferiour to other hony: yet there is great ſtore of hony in that countrey, and the juice of balm, which is more precious then all fruits growing. There grow alſo Cypres trees and Myrobolans: ſo that one may juſtly call that part of the earth divine, where what fruit ſoever is moſt dear and precious, is in moſt abundance. Alſo in all other fruits it ſurpaſſeth all countries in the world: for it multiplieth and increaſeth all things ſooner there. The cauſe hereof I judge to be the pleaſant Waters, and warm nouriſhing Aire, which as it were inviteth all things to ſpring up, and then encreaſeth them: and the moyſture cauſeth all things to take firme roote; and alſo defendeth them from drought in ſummer time, when the Countrey is vexed with ſuch intollerable heats, that all things are as it were ſcorched, ſo that nothing then will grow; yet if they be watered with water drawn before Sunne-riſe, by the blowing of a milde and temperate winde, they are refreſhed, and it receives a contrary nature: In Wintertime it is as it were luke warme and temperate to them that goe into it. The ayre of that place is ſo temperate, that when it ſnoweth in other parts of Judæa, and is extreme cold, the inhabitants in this place do onely wear a linen garment. This countrey is diſtant from Jeruſalem a hundred and fiftie furlongs, and threeſcore from Iordan, and all the ground betwixt it and Ieruſalem is deſart and ſtonie, and ſo likewiſe between it and Iordan and Aſphaltites, though it be lower ground then the other. Thus we have ſufficiently declared the fertilitie of Iericho.

The deſcription of the lake Aſphaltites.

IT is worth the labour to deſcribe the lake Aſphaltites, which is ſalt and ſterill; yet whatever is caſt into it how weightie ſoever it be, it ſwimmeth above the water: ſo that one, though he would upon purpoſe, cannot ſcarcely ſink unto the bottome. Veſpaſian coming thither to ſee it, cauſed ſome to be taken, who could not ſwimme, and their hands to be bound behind them, and caſt into the middeſt thereof, and all of them did ſwimme aloft, being as it were born up by the power of ſome ſpirit. Moreover, it is admirable, how this lake thrice in every day changeth colour; and ſhineth diverſly, according as the beames of the Sunne doe ſundry wayes fall upon it. And in many places it caſteth up pieces of black bitumen, in greatneſs and ſhape like a Bull without a head, and theſe float above the water. They that get their living upon this water, finding this bitumen, that is thus gathered together, draw it to their boats, and it is ſo tough and clammy, that having filled their boats herewith, it is not eaſie for them to get them away, but their boat is as it were faſtened: ſo it hangeth upon the reſt of that maſſe of bituminous matter till it be ſeparated from it by the terms or urine of a woman. This bituminous matter is good for to cloſe the rifts of ſhips, and alſo to cure many diſeaſes. This lake is five hundreth and eightie furlongs long, being extended unto Zoar which is in Arabia, and it is a hundreth and fiftie furlongs broad. Neer unto this lake is the land of Sodome and Gomorrah, ſometime both fertill and rich: now all burnt, being (as it is reported) for the impiete of the inhabi-

How Geraſa was deſtroyed: of Neroes death, and of Galba and Otho.

Veſpaſian deſirous to beſiege Jeruſalem on every ſide, builded Caſtles at Jericho and Adida, and left there both the ſouldiers that came to aſſiſt him, and alſo Romanes with them. And he ſent L. Annius to Geraſa, giving him many footmen, and part of his horſemen; who at the firſt aſſault took the Citie, and ſlew 1000. youngmen, who thought to have fled, and led whole families captive, giving the ſouldiers the ſpoil of their goods: and ſo firing their houſes, he went to other places adjoyning. They who were able fled, and the weaker ſort who could not flie were ſlain; and whatſoever came in their way, they conſumed it with fire. Thus all places both mountains and plains being waſted and C oppreſſed with wars, the inhabitants living at Jeruſalem had not whither to go, when they deſired to flie from the Zealous by whom they were kept in. And they who were againſt the Romans, were kept in themſelves, the Citie being on every ſide incloſed and incompaſſed with the Army. L. Annius taketh Geraſa.

After that Veſpaſian was returned unto Cæſarea, and with all his Army purpoſing to go to Jeruſalem, news was brought him that Nero was ſlain, having reigned thirteen yeers, and eight dayes. Touching whom I will not recount how he did diſhonour the Empire, committing the whole ſway of all the Common-wealth unto two moſt wicked men, to wit, Nymphidius and Tigillinus, and of leaſt worth amongſt all the Libertines: and how he being taken by the treachery of theſe two men, was forſaken of all his Senators; and ſo fled onely D with four truſtie Libertines into the ſuburbs, and there killed himſelf: and how that long time after, they that depoſed him were puniſhed for that offence: and how the wars ended in Gallia; and that Galba being created Emperour, returned to Rome out of Spain: and how he was accuſed by the ſouldiers, and by them killed in the market place, as one of baſe condition: and how Otho was declared Emperour, and led his ſouldiers againſt Vitellius his Army: alſo Vitellius his broyles and his fight before the Capitol: and how Antonius Primus, and Mutianus ſlew Vitellius, and ſo appeaſed the Germane troups and civil wars: Of all theſe I have refuſed to ſpeak, becauſe I hope that both the Greeks and Romans have written theſe things at large, yet I have briefly recapitulated all to continue my Hiſtory. Veſpaſian hath tidings of Neroes death. Galba. Otho. Vitellius.

After Veſpaſian heard theſe news of Nero, he deferred the ſiege of Jeruſalem, expecting E who ſhould be created Emperour after him. And when he was certified that Galba reigned, he determined to do nothing; but lie quiet till ſuch time as he ſhould write unto him his minde, whether he would have him proceed in thoſe wars againſt the Iews. And he ſent unto him his ſonne Titus both to ſalute him, and alſo to know his pleaſure concerning the Iews. Likewiſe, King Agrippa went with Titus for the ſame cauſe unto Galba. But as they were paſſing by Achaia with long ſhips in winter time, as the cuſtome is, news was brought that Galba was ſlain, having reigned ſeven moneths and ſeven dayes. After whom ſucceeded Otho, who governed the Empire three moneths. Agrippa not terrified with this alteration, ſtill kept on his journey to Rome. But Titus (as God would have it) returned from Achaia unto Syria, and ſo to Cæſarea unto his father. They both were as it were in ſuſpence what would F enſue, and who ſhould be Emperour, the Empire being ſo full of trouble: and ſo they neglected the wars againſt the Iews, fearing their own Countrey, and therefore thinking it an unfit time to aſſault ſtrangers. Veſpaſian deferreth his ſiege at Jeruſalem. Galba is ſlain, and Otho governeth.

CHAP. VII.

Of Simon of Geraſa, authour of a new conſpiracie.

FOr all this the war at Jeruſalem was increaſed. For there was one Simon the ſonne of Giora born in Geraſa, young in yeers, and inferiour to John, who now already had gotten the dominion over the Citie: yet was he in ſtrength and boldneſs more excellent then John. This Simon being for this cauſe alſo driven out of the Countrey of Acrabatena, where he was Governour by the means of Ananus the high Prieſt, he came to the thieves that ſeized upon Maſſada. This Simon, at his firſt coming, was ſo ſuſpected by the thieves, that they onely permitted him and the women that came with him to dwell in the lower part of the Caſtle, and they themſelves kept the higher part: yet afterwards, his maners and behaviour was ſuch, that they put confidence in him: for he was their Captain alwaies when they went to ſpoil and rob any part of the Countrey about Maſſada. So he feared not to perſwade them to attempt greater matters: for being deſirous of rule, after he heard that Ananus was dead, he departed into the high places of the Countrey, and with the voice of a Crier, promiſed and proclaimed, that all bond-ſlaves that would follow him, ſhould have their libertie, and all other ſhould be richly rewarded; and ſo he gathered together all the wicked and deſperate people in the Countrey. And having now a large Army, he robbed and ſpoyled all the towns and villages thereabout; and his number dayly encreaſing, he alſo now preſumed to come into the plain countries: ſo that now Cities ſtood in awe of him, and many Potentates now feared him for his ſtreugth and proſperous ſucceſs. And his Armie did not onely conſiſt in thieves and ſlaves, but now many people of the countrie came unto him, reverencing him as their Prince and King. So they made excurſions into the Toparchie of Acrabatena, and into the greater Idumæa. For he had fortified a town called Nain walld about, which he uſed for his defence like a Caſtle. And in the valley called Pharan, he made many caves, and found many already made, and in theſe caves he kept his treaſure, and the booties he got: alſo all fruits of the earth that he robbed and ſtole, there he laid up in ſtore; as alſo munition for divers companies. And now no man doubted, but that being thus furniſhed with men and munition, he would go to Jeruſalem. The Zealous fearing this, and deſirous to prevent him whom they every day did ſee increaſe his number, and to grow more potent againſt them; they armed many of their company, and went out to meet him. Simon was not daunted at this, but boldly incountred them, and gave them ſo ſharp a battle, that he ſlew many of them in fight; and forced the reſt to retire themſelves into the town: yet having men ſufficient, he would not beſiege the town; but firſt of all he purpoſed to ſubdue Idumæa, and ſo accompanied with 20000. armed men, he haſted towards the borders thereof.

The fight between Simon and the Zealous.

The Princes of Idumæa underſtanding this, preſently aſſembled five and twentie thouſand armed men: and leaving at home ſufficient Garriſons to defend their countrie againſt the incurſion of the Sicarii, which held the fortreſſe of Maſſada, they accompanied with this train, went out and expected Simons coming into the borders of their countrie, where having met him they joyned battell, and fought a whole day, yet neither partie got the victorie. Then Simon returned to Nain, and the Idumæans home. Not long after Simon with a greater Armie then before, aſſaulted the borders of their countrey, and pitching his tents in a village called Thecue, he ſent one of his companions named Eleazar, to them that kept the Caſtle Herodium not far from that place, to ſolicite them to yield it unto him. The garriſon there preſently received him into the Caſtle, not knowing the cauſe of his coming. But ſo ſoon as he hegan to perſwade them to Treaſon, they all purſued him with their drawn ſwords: and he not having any place to flie unto, caſt himſelf from off the Caſtle wall into the valley underneath, and ſo preſently he died. The Idumæans ſomething fearing Simons forces, before they would offer him battel, thought it beſt to eſpie what number of men he had: to effect which buſineſs, one Jacob a ruler amongſt them offered himſelf, meaning indeed to betray his countrie to Simon. So departing from Olurus where the Idumæans forces were aſſembled, he went unto Simon, and firſt of all promiſed him to betray his countrie unto him, receiving of him an oath, that for reward of this deed he ſhould alwayes be next in dignitie unto Simon himſelf, and ſo he preſently promiſed to help to ſubdue all Idumæa. For this cauſe he was welcome to Simon and feaſted liberally, and had great promiſes if he performed that which he offered: and then returned unto the Idumæans; and fained that Simons Army was farre greater then indeed it was. And ſo at laſt terrifying the Governours of his countrie, and the people, he by little and little perſwaded them to receive Simon, and without any more fight yeeld unto

A unto him the whole ſoveraigntie over them. Jacob, ſtudying to bring this his purpoſe to paſs, privily ſent meſſengers to Simon, willing him to come with his forces, and promiſing him to ſubdue the Idumæans for him, which he alſo did. For when Simons Army drew neer, he firſt of all got upon his horſe, and together with his aſſociates that were partakers of his Treaſon, he fled to the enemie. Then fear fell on the Idumæans, and every one without any more ado departed home. Thus Simon againſt his own expectation entred Idumæa without bloodſhed: and firſt of all aſſaulting a little village called Chebron, upon a ſudden he took it, and in it an exceeding great bootie, a great quantitie of corn, and many fruits, all which he carried away. The inhabitants report, that this Chebron is not onely more ancient then all Cities of that Land, but alſo then Memphis in Egypt: for they affirm it to have been built 2000. and 3000.
B yeers ſince. They alſo ſay, that this was the place where Abraham the father of the Jewes dwelt, after he forſook Meſopotamia, and that his poſterity departed from hence to Egypt. And of this there are yet monuments in the citie, richly wrought in fine marble. Six furlongs from the town there is an exceeding great Turpentine tree, which they affirm to have endured ever ſince the creation of the world, until this day.

Simon having obtained this place, from hence he invaded all Idumæa, and not only robbed and ſpoyled all towns and cities thereof, but alſo he waſted and deſtroyed many Territories: for beſides his Army, there followed him 40000. ſo that he could not find victuals ſufficient for ſuch a multitude. Moreover, befides this calamitie that he brought upon Idumæa, he exerciſed great crueltie and outrage upon the countrie, and ſo cauſed a great ſpoil therein. And
C like as after Locuſts, the trees and woods where they have been are leaves: ſo whereſoever Simon had been, all the countrey from whence he came, he left deſolate. And either by fire or overthrowing it by ruinating places where he came, or elſe by treading upon it with the feet of his Armie, or by devouring ſuch as they found, they left nothing ſtanding nor growing either in field or town: and onely by paſſing thorow fertile places, he made the fields harder then barren ground; and left no ſign in places which he had deſtroyed, that ever they had been tilled.

Simon ſpoiled all Idumæa.

Hereat the Zealous were again moved, yet durſt they not fight with him in open field: but placing ambuſhes in the way he was to paſs, they took Simons wife, and many of her ſervants, and ſo came again into the Citie, rejoycing as though they had taken Simon himſelf. For D they perſwaded themſelves, that Simon would preſently, laying arms apart, come in humble wiſe, and intreat them to reſtore unto him his wife. But Simon was not moved with compaſſion for the loſs of his wife, but with furie: and coming to the walls of Jeruſalem, like a cruel beaſt that had been wounded, and could not come to them that hurt him, he killed and ſlew all he met. And taking them that went out of the Citie to gather herbs and wood, he cauſed them to be whipt to death, whether they were young or old: and this crueltie ſeemed onely wanting in him, that he did not eat the fleſh of the dead bodies. Alſo he took many and cut off their hands, and ſo ſent them into the citie, thereby to terrifie his enemies, and to recall the people from the Zealous: and bad them tell the Citizens, that except they preſently reſtored his wife unto him, he ſwore by God who governed all, that he would break down their walls, and uſe all that he found in the Citie after that faſhion, and that he would
E ſpare no age, nor reſpect the innocent more then the guiltie. Theſe his threats did not onely terrifie the people, but alſo the Zealous, inſomuch, that they ſent him his wife again; and ſo his anger being ſomething aſſwaged, he ceaſed a while from daily ſlaughter.

of Galba, Otho, Vitellius and Veſpaſian.

F NOt onely in Judæa, bus alſo in Italy at this time were civill Warres: for Galba was ſlain in the middeſt of the market, after whom Otho was created Emperour, and fought againſt Vitellius, who affected the Empire, whom the Germane legions had elected: So the battell being fought neer unto Bebrias, a Towne in Gallia Ciſalpina, the firſt day, Otho got the victorie againſt Valens and Cæcinna, the Generals of Vitellius his Armie. But the day following, they overcame Otho: and ſo many being ſlain on both parts, and news being brought that Vitellius his Armie had gotten the victorie, Otho being at Brixels ſlew himſelf, when he had ruled the Empire three moneths and two dayes. Then Othoes ſouldiers came utto Vitellius his Captains, and joyned with them, and ſo Vitellius came to Rome with his Armie. In the mean time Veſpaſian the fifth day of June departed from Cæſarea, and went unto thoſe parts of Judæa which were yet unconquered: and firſt first of all he went into the high Countreys, and subdued the two Toparchies of Acrabatena and Gophnitis, and after them two towns called Bethel and Ephrem, and placed garrisons in them, and so went to Jerusalem, killing many that he found in the way, and he took many captives. And one of his Captains called Cerealis, with a part of horse and footmen, wasted all the higher Idumæa, and in the way as he went, he took Caphetra a Castle, and burnt it, and besieged another called Capharis, enclosed with a strong wall: for the which cause he deemed that he should have made long abode there: but contrary to his expectation, the inhabitants opened the gates unto him, & came and yielded themselves, beseeching him to be good unto them. When he had overcome them, Cerealis went unto Hebron an ancient City, and set it on fire; this Hebron as I have already said, was scituated upon the mountains, so far from Jerusalem: and breaking into it by force, he slew all them that he found there, and fired the City. And having subdued all places, save only three Castles, to wit, Herodium, Massada, and Macheron, which were kept by the thieves, now only Jerusalem remained to be conquered.

CHAP. IX.

WHen Simon had received again his wife from the Zealous, he went into Idumæa, to rob and spoil that which he had left: and chasing the inhabitants up and down, at last he forced them to flie unto Ierusalem, and he himself followed them thither; and besieging the walls, he killed all the workmen he took, that returned out of the fields from their labour. Thus Simon without the citie, was more terrible to the people then the Romans, and the Zealous within the Citie crueller then them both, being incouraged and incited thereto by the counsel of the Galileans. For they had put John in authoritie: and John in reward thereof permitted all things to be done which they requested. There was no end of robbing and spoyling rich mens houses, and of slaughtering both of men and women; and now to injure any person was a pastime. And having with blood-shed obtained their prey in securitie, and without all fear after they had gotten what they liked, they now began to lust after women: yea, they became themselves effeminate through luxuriousnes, dressing their hair, and clothing themselves in womens apparel; and they anointed themselves with sweet ointments, that their beautie might be pleasing, and alluring, their eyes wanton like; they now did not onely imitate the attire of women, but also their impudencie, and became so shameless, that they now thirsted after unnatural pleasures, as though they had kept a stews, and so profaned the whole citie with their execrable impurities. Yet though they did effeminate their faces, their hands were prone to blood-shed; and although they lived in ignominious maner, as people given over to pleasure, yet could they quickly become warriers, and under the habits of women drawing their swords, they did kill whomsoever they met. Whosoever escaped Johns hands, Simon crueller, murthered; and whosoever escaped the tyranny within the Citie, was slain by the Tyrant without. So now there was no way to flie unto the Romans. Furthermore, the Army of John began to be divided, for all the Idumæans separated themselves from the other people, and there began a mutiny against the Tyrant partly envying his puissance, partly hating his cruelty. And so assaulting him, they slew many of the Zealous, and compelled the rest to flie into the Kings house, builded by Grapta father of Izata, King of Adiabena. The Idumæans also brake in thither with them, and drave them from thence into the Temple, and so seized upon Johns treasure: for John lived in that Palace, and thither carried all his spoils. Then those Zealous that were dispersed in the Citie, came unto them that were in the Temple, and John purposed to send them against the townsmen, and the Idumæans. But they feared not so much their forces, although they knew them to be the better warriors, as they did fear that now being desperate, they would steal out of the Temple in the night, and so slay them, and fire the Citie. Wherefore assembling themselves, they deliberated with the Priests how to avoid their assaults: but it pleased God to turn their own counsel to be their destruction, and that they should provide a remedie of safetie, far worse then death it self. For to depose John, they devised to introduce Simon, and as it were to intreat yet another to tyrannize over them. So this counsel was thought best: and Matthias the Priest was sent unto Simon (whom before they stood in great fear of) now to request him to come into the Citie. With them also came such as had fled from Jerusalem, for fear of the Zealous, intreating him in like manner, because they desired to return to their wives and families. So he entred into the Citie proudly, promising them to be their Lord, and all the people cried with loud voices as he came into the Citie, that he was their preserver,

Being now within the Citie, preſently he deliberated with them about him, to eſtabliſh his dominion, thinking as well them that called him into the Citie, as thoſe againſt whom he was called, his enemies. Then John and the Zealous with him, finding no way to come out of the Temple, and having loſt all that he had in the Citie, (for Simon and his followers at his entrance took all that belonged unto him) began now to deſpair of his ſafety. And Simon, being aſſiſted by the Citizens, aſſaulted the Temple, and the Zealous placing themſelves upon the porches, and in towers of defence, made reſiſtance, and hurt many of Simons followers. For the Zealous were upon the higher ground on the right hand, and ſo had the vantage againſt Simon. And although by reaſon of the place wherein they were, they prevailed againſt Simon; yet they builded four high towers, that from thence they

One of theſe towers they built upon the Eaſt ſide of the Temple; another on the North; the third upon a place oppoſite to the lower part of the town; and the fourth tower they built upon the top of the place called Paſtophorium, where one of the Prieſts do uſe to ſtand before the Sun-ſet, and at break of day, to ſignifie unto the people with the ſound of the Trumpet the beginning of the Sabbath, declaring thereby unto them, ſometime holy daies, and afterward that they might go about their buſineſs. In theſe towers they placed all kind of Engines to caſt ſtones, and men with ſlings. CHAP. VIII.

AT this time the Romans were in great danger: for Vitellius was now arrived out of Germany with his Army, bringing beſide them an infinite multitude with him; ſo that his Army was ſo great, that the place appointed for ſouldiers could not contain it: inſomuch that his Army occupied all the whole Citie, and every houſe was filled with armed men. And they beholding the Romanes wealth greater then ever they ſaw any, and admiring their abundance of gold and ſilver, not able to contain themſelves, they began to rob and kill whomſoever that fought to withſtand them. And this was the eſtate of the affairs
D in Italy, Veſpaſian having waſted all about Jeruſalem, returned unto Cæſarea, and there he underſtood of the troubles at Rome, and how Vitellius was Emperour. Hereat, though he knew as well to obey, as to be obeyed, yet was he moved to indignation, and diſdained to call him Lord, who had as it were invaded and uſurped the Empire, being deſtitute of a Ruler. And much grieved hereat, he could not conceal his grief, nor follow warres againſt ſtrangers, his own Countrey being ſo endangered. But the diſtance between him and Rome did as much repreſs him, as anger incited him to ſeek revenge: for he conſidered that fortune might cauſe many alterations before he could get to Rome, eſpecially, it being winter: and ſo he ſought to bridle his wrath which dayly increaſed. But his Captains with the ſouldiers did now openly conſult of a change, and with indignation did exclaim againſt the ſouldiers at E Rome, who lived in pleaſure, and never heard ſo much as the report of war; and that notwithſtanding this, it was lawfull for them to create whom they pleaſed Emperour; and under hope of gain, they diſpoſed of the Common-wealth at their own pleaſure: where they on the contrary ſide, having overpaſt ſo many labours and dangers, ſtill continuing in Arms till now, waxed old and gray-headed, and did ſuffer authoritie due unto themſelves, to be executed by others; when notwithſtanding, they had amongſt them one who deſerved the Empire, more then any one; and what recompence could they ever after make him? or what occaſion could they find hereafter to ſhew themſelves gratefull to him for the benefits by him received, if they did now omit this occaſion?

Vitellius encamps his army in Rome.

Veſpaſian knew both how to govern and how to obey.

The Captains conſult with the ſouldiers openly of a change.

And they thought that Veſpaſian was ſo much more worthy of the Empire, then Vitellius, by how much they, who created Vitellius Emperor, were in many very reſpects much inferior
F unto them. For (ſaid they) we have endured no leſs toyle then thoſe that came out of Germany: neither are we leſs valiant then they, who bring a Tyrant with them out of Germany. And that no body would reſiſt Veſpaſian: for the Senate and the people of Rome would not rather endure Vitellius his unſatiable luſt, then Veſpaſians chaſtitie and temperance; nor a cruel Tyrant, rather then a good and courteous Emperour; nor the ſon ſhould by them be elected Emperour, before the father. For true valour in an Emperour is a great defence of peace. Therefore if the Empire were due to aged experience, they had Veſpaſian; if to valiant youth, they had amongſt them Titus: and that they might reap commoditie by both their ages: And that they would not onely aſſiſt him with the forces of the Empire, having there three three legions, beside the help of the Kings; but also all the East part of Europe was out of Vitellius his danger. Moreover, they had in Italy some that would assist Vespasian, to wit, his brother and his son, whereof the one (they hoped) would get many young men to follow him, and the other was now made Prefect of the Citie, which was no small step to attain unto the Empire. Lastly, it might so fall out that the Senate would declare him Emperour, whom now the souldiers, being as it were their conservers, had elected. G

The causes that moved the people to elect Vespasian Emperour.

This was first talked amongst the companies of the souldiers. at last, exhorting one another thereto, they came and saluted Vespasian by the name of Emperour, and requesting him now to preserve the Empire, being in great danger to be lost. Albeit, Vespasian had alwayes been careful for the good of the Common-wealth, yet he refused to be Emperour: deeming himself indeed to have deserved it; yet he rather did choose to live a private life, wherein was securitie, then in the height of fortune and honour with perpetual danger. The Captains were more earnest because he refused it; and the souldiers flocked about him with drawn swords, threatning his death, except he would consent to live as he deserved: yet long time striving to avert this their determination, being loth to be Emperour; at last, seeing he could not avoid it, he accepted their offer. CHAP. XI.

The description of Egypt.

Mutianus and the rest of the Captains that had incited him to the Empire, together with the whole Armie, cried aloud, willing Vespasian to lead them against their common enemie. But Vespasian thought it best, first to settle the estate of Alexandria, knowing that Egypt for the supply of corn was the greatest and best part of the Empire: which if he once were sure of, he hoped that although Vitellius were stronger then he, yet he could bring him under perforce, because the people would not endure that for his sake the Citie should be famisht: which would have come to pass except they had supply of corn out of Egypt. I

Moreover, he desired to joyn to himself those two legions that were at Alexandria. He also thought, that that countrie might be a defence and refuge for him, if any adverse fortune should betide him: for the countrie is not easily to be entred by an Armie, and the Sea-coasts have no havens, nor harbours to receive ships. On the West, it bordereth upon the drie and barren part of Lybia; on the South, upon the frontiers which separate Syene from Ethiopia; and the streames of Nilus not navigable; on the East it bordereth upon the red Sea, which extends it self even unto the Citie Copton; on the North, it is defended with Syria, and the Egyptian Sea, wherein there is no haven. Thus Egypt is strong on every side, and reacheth in length 2000. furlongs from Pelusium to Syene: and from Plinthine to Pelusium, they sayle 3000. and 600. furlongs. And Nilus is navigable even unto the town Elephantine. K

The bounds of Egypt.

The length and breadth of Egypt.

Further, by reason of the downfals of Nilus, also the haven at Alexandria is dangerous to come unto in time of peace: for the entrance into it is very straight; and beside that, the way goes not directly on, but is made crooked by great stony rocks, and the left side is compassed artificially, but on the right side is the Ile Pharus, having a Tower upon it exceeding great: so that the light in it is seen of the Mariners 300. furlongs off, that long before they come neer it, they may provide to bring their ships in with safetie. L

A most high Tower in the Iland Pharus, giving light to those that sayle 300 flounds off.

This Ile is inclosed with most huge walls made by Art; against which the Sea beating, and so returning back again, maketh the entrance into the haven more dangerous. Yet this haven within is very safe, and 30 furlongs long: so that whatsoever that countrey wants, it is brought them into that haven, and whatsoever aboundeth amongst them which other Nations need, is carried from thence all over the whole world. So that Vespasian did not unadvisedly seek to establish the estate of Alexandria, and dispose thereof for his own profit, being to begin his Empire. Wherefore presently he sent letters to Tiberius Alexander, who was Governour of Alexandria and Egypt, and told him of the souldiers resolution: and how that he, seeing he could not avoid it, but that he was forced to take upon him the Empire now requested him to help him in what he could. Alexander, receiving Vespasians letters, agreed willingly thereto, and presently caused his Armie, and the people also to swear unto Vespasian; which both of them did willingly, understanding Vespasians vertue, by reason that he governed so neer them. And so he having now leave, prepared all things to furnish himself like an Emperour, and to be received like a Prince. M

How Veſpaſian delivered Joſeph out of captivitie.

The yeer of the world, 4033. after Chriſts nativity. 71.

IT is incredible how quickly this news was carried into all parts of the world, to wit, that Veſpaſian was declared Emperour in the East; and now all Cities rejoyced and made triumphs, and offered ſacrifices for his fortunate ſucceſs. Moreover, the legions in Mœſia and Pannonia, who not long before were revolted from Vitellius, by reaſon of his crueltie, did now willingly ſwear obedience to Veſpaſian. Veſpaſian returned by Berytum to Cæſarea: where many Embaſſadours came unto him, bringing him Crowns, and applauding and rejoycing at his good fortune, who came out of Syria, and all other places thereabout. There was alſo preſent Mutianus, Governour of thoſe parts, who brought tidings how joyfully all the people received him for their Emperour, and how that they had all ſworn obedience unto him. So all things falling out proſperouſly on Veſpaſians ſide, and fortune for the moſt part inclining as he deſired, he began to think with himſelf, that it was Gods providence that he was made Emperour, and that a juſt deſtinie had brought him to that eſtate. And ſo he called to mind all tokens and ſignes (as there had hapned many, which did foretel that he ſhould be Emperour) and among the reſt, he remembred that which Joſeph had told him; whom, Nero being yet alive, preſumed to call him Emperour, and ſo he admired the man, whom as yet he kept in hold. And calling Mutianus and the reſt of his friends together, firſt of all he told them how valiant Joſeph had been, and what ado he had to win Jotapata, onely becauſe of him; and then his Prophecies, which at that time he eſteemed onely fables, fained upon fear; yet now time and event had proved them true. Affirming it an undecent thing, that he, who had been the foreteller of his exaltation, and had been a meſſenger to him from God, ſhould ſtill continue in bonds like a captive, and be left in adverſitie. So calling for Joſeph, he commanded him to be let looſe. This fact of his made the Captains under him, hope for great reward at his hands, ſeeing he had been ſo kind to a ſtranger. Titus being there preſent, ſaid; It is meet, O father, that as you acquit Joſeph from captivitie, ſo you alſo take away the ſhame of that which he hath already endured. For if we do not onely untie his chains, but alſo break them in ſunder, he ſhall be as though he had never been in bondage: for this is the manner uſed for redreſs, when any one being guiltleſs is committed to bonds. Veſpaſian hereto agreed: and ſo one came with an axe, and hewed his chain in pieces. Thus was Joſeph rewarded for his Prophecie, and ſo hereafter he was eſteemed worthie to be beleeved.

Veſpaſian by Common voice is created Emperour and crowned.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Vitellius his death and manners.

WHen Veſpaſian had anſwered the Embaſſadors, and juſtly diſpoſed of all the Rulers of his Armie according to every ones merit, he now came to Antiochia, and their did deliberate whither to go firſt, and it ſeemed beſt to him to go to Rome, rather then to Alexandria: for he knew that Alexandria was quiet and firm, but Rome was troubled by Vitellius. Wherefore he ſent Mutianus into Italy, with many footmen and horſmen: who fearing to go by Sea, went thorow Cappadocia and Phrygia, for it was winter time. Now Antonius Primus, who was governour of Mœſia, brought from thence the third legion remaining there, and came to war againſt Vitellius. Vitellius ſent Cæcinna to meet him with a great Armie: who departing from Rome, preſently met with Antonius at Cremona, a town of Gallia, ſcituate upon the confines of Italy; and there beholding the diſcipline and multitude of the enemies, durſt not fight with them: and thinking it very dangerous to flie, he plotted treaſon, and ſo calling unto him the Centurions and Tribunes under his government, he perſwaded them to go and joyn with Antonius, debaſing Vitellius his power, and extolling Veſpaſians: affirming the firſt to have onely the bare name of the Emperour; and the laſt to have alſo all vertues meet for an Emperour. Moreover, that ſo it would be better for them to do that of their own accord, which otherwiſe they ſhould be compelled to; and ſeeing themſelves already overcome in number, ſo alſo now willing to prevent all danger. For Veſpaſian was able without their aſſiſtance to ſubdue all the reſt: but Vitellius was not able with their help to keep that he had: ſpeaking much to this effect, he perſwaded them to all that which he would have done. And ſo with his whole Armie joyned with Antonius.

Veſpaſian bethinks himſelf to return to Rome.

Cæcinna perſwades the ſouldiers to forſake Vitellius, and honour Veſpaſian.

that Vitellius ſhould get the upper hand who ſent them againſt Antonius drew their ſwords, and would have ſlain Cæcinna; And had done it, had not the Tribunes come and entreated them to the contrarie: wherefore they did not kill him, but kept him bound, meaning to ſend him to Vitellius as a Traitor. Primus Antonius hearing this, came with his Army and aſſaulted them who were revolted from him, and they a while reſiſted; yet at laſt forced to retire, they fled to Cremona, And Primus, accompanied with horſemen, prevented their courſes, and ſo ſlew moſt of them before the citie; and afterward ſetting upon the reſt, gave his ſouldiers the ſpoil of it, wherein many Merchants of other Countries, and many townſmen were ſlain, and all Vitellius Army, 30000. and 200. men; and Antonius loſt in that battel 4000. and 500. of thoſe whom he brought with him out of Mœſia. And delivering Cæcinna from priſon, he ſent him to bear news hereof to Veſpaſian: who coming unto him, was praiſed for his fact, and greatly honoured above his expectation, in reward of his Treaſon.

Cæcinna is apprehended for Treaſon.

Veſpaſian honors Cæcinna with unexpected honours, and is acquitted of Treaſon.

Sabinus, who was at Rome, hearing that Antonius was at hand, greatly rejoyced, and took courage: and gathering together the companies of the watchmen in the night time, he took the capitoll, and in the morning, many of the Nobles came and joyned with him: and Domitianus his brothers ſon, who was a great cauſe and help to obtain the victorie. Vitellius little eſteemed Primus; but he was angry againſt Sabinus, and thoſe that had revolted with him: as it were naturally thirſting after the blood of the Nobilitie, he ſet all the Army he brought out of Germany with him, to aſſault the Capitoll, where many valiant deeds were ſhewed on both parts: and at laſt the Germanes, being moſt in number, got the Capitoll hill. And Domitian with many brave Noblemen, as it were by Gods providence, eſcaped ſafe, the reſt of the multitude were their ſlain. And Sabinus was carried to Vitellius, and there by his commandment put to death: the ſouldiers taking away all the gifts and treaſure in the Temple, ſet it on fire. The day after came Antonius, and Vitellius his ſouldiers met him: and fighting in three ſeverall places of the Citie, they were all ſlain. Then Vitellius came drunk out of his Palace, and being full gorged with delicate meat, he was drawn thorow the midſt of the people, and after many contumelies ſlain, having reigned eight moneths, and five dayes: who if he had lived longer, I think verily the Empire had not been ſufficient to have maintained his gluttony. There were ſlain above 50000. of other people. And this was done the third day of October. The day after, Mutianus with his Army came and entred Rome, and repreſſed the ſouldiers of Antonius, who ſtill fought about in every place for Vitellius ſouldiers, and many other of his favourites, and ſlew whom they thought good, not examining any matter by reaſon of their furie: and bringing out Domitian, he declared to the people that he was to govern the Citie till his father came. The people being delivered from fear, proclaimed Veſpaſian Emperour, and made feaſts and triumphs both under one, for his eſtabliſhing in the Empire, and for joy that Vitellius was depoſed.

Sabinus takes the Capitoll, and leaves Vitellius.

Vitellius ſlain.

How Titus was ſent by his father againſt the Jews.

Titus repairs to Jeruſalem.

WHen Veſpaſian came unto Alexandria, news were brought unto him what was done at Rome. And Embaſſadours came unto him from all parts of the world to congratulate him. And although next after Rome this Citie was the greateſt in the world, yet was it ſcarcely able to receive the people that came thither unto him. Veſpaſian now being eſtabliſhed Emperour of all the world, and the Common-wealth of the Romans, being contrary to his expectation freed from troubles, he now began to think upon the reliques of Judæa. And ſo he himſelf, winter being ended, prepared to go to Rome, and in the mean time he haſted to diſpoſe of all things at Alexandria. Moreover, he ſent his ſon Titus with certain choſen men to deſtroy Jeruſalem. Who departed from Alexandria to Nicopolis by land, which is diſtant from it 20. furlongs, and there he did ſhip his men, and ſo ſailed along the river Nilus by Medenſia to Thumin, and there landing his men, he came to the Citie called Tanis. And the ſecond place he reſted in was the Citie Heraclea, and the third Peluſium: and there reſting, and refreſhing his ſouldiers two dayes ſpace, the third day he paſt the borders of Peluſium, and having gone one dayes journey thorow the wilderneſs, he pitcht his tents at the Temple of Jupiter Caſſian, and the next day at Oſtracine, where there is no water, but all that the inhabitants do uſe, they bring from other places. After that, he reſted at Rhinocolura, and from thence in foure dayes he came to Raphia, where begin the borders of Syria, and the fifth day he lodged at Gaza, and from thence to Aſcalon, and ſo to Jamnia and Joppe, from whence he went to Cæſarea, purpoſing to gather the reſt of the ſouldiers there.

CHAP. I.

Of the three sorts of sedition in Ierusalem.

The yeer of the world 4034. after Christs nativitie 72.

A threefold sedition in Ierusalem.

TItus being thus come out of Ægypt by the desart into Syria, he departed from thence unto Cæsarea: for there he purposed to set his army in order. And whilest yet he was with his father Vespasian at Alexandria, disposing of the Empires that God had given him, it happened that the F sedition at Jerusalem was divided into three parts, whereof one fought against another: and one may say it was a good turn that they were so equally divided. We have already sufficiently declared who were the Authors and beginners of the faction of the Zealous, whose tyranny over the city was the ruin thereof: and one may well call this a sedition raised out of a sedition; which, like a cruel and savage beast in penury and want of others, turned his cruelty against his own bowels. So Eleazar the sonne of Simon, who was the first that in the Temple divided the Zealous from the people, faining himself to be displeased with that which John every day did; yet in truth, for that he envied that a more tyrant of later time then himself should be his ruler, desirous to obtain the principalitie, and make himself mightie, he revolted from the rest: and with him Judas the sonne of Chelcias, and Simon the sonne of Ezron, two of the most potent amongst them. Besides them, was also Ezechias the sonne of Chobarus a Nobleman, and all these had many of the Zealous following them: and getting in possession the inner part of the Temple, they ſet a guard in the entrance and in the ſacred gates, truſting G in their abundance of all neceſſaries: for there was great ſtore of ſacred proviſion, and they thought it no impiety to uſe it; yet fearing their ſmall number, they permitted many of the companie that were killed, to remain in the places where they were ſlain. John was ſuperiour in multitude and number, but inferiour by the inequalitie of the place: and having his enemies above his head, he could not without danger make incurſions; and yet for anger he would not ceaſe to proſecute his enemie: notwithſtanding that thereby his part had more harm then thoſe of Eleazars ſide, yet he ſtill aſſaulted them though to his own coſt: thus many aſſaults were continually made, and many darts caſt, and all the Temple was prophaned H with murders. And Simon the ſonne of Giora (whom the people being in deſpair, incited to be their leader, in hope that he would have aſſiſted them, having in his hands both the higher part of the Citie, and the greater part of the lower) did now more boldly then before aſſault John and his followers, becauſe they were aſſailed by thoſe above them: yet he being as it were beneath John and his adherents, he ſuſtained as much loſſe at their hands, as John himſelf did at theirs above him. So John had double warres: and Eleazar harmed him becauſe of the higher place wherein he was, ſo likewiſe did he damage Simon for the like cauſe; and eaſily without any labour repulſed all his aſſaults, which he made being on the lower ground, and terrified by Engines thoſe that caſt darts at him from the top of the Temple: for he uſed all Engines to caſt darts and ſtones, and killed many not oneiy of his enemies, but alſo of them that were offering ſacrifices. For although that they were carried headlong unto I all vice, yet they permitted thoſe that would, to offer ſacrifice, watching and diligently guarding them of their Nation. For the ſtrangers that came thither for devotion, were not miſtruſted: yet afterward that they had entreated theſe wicked people to permit them to ſacrifice, they when they had done were a prey for them, and conſumed by this ſedition.

The yeer of the world, 4034. after Christs nativity, 72.

For darts and other ſhot with force of the Engines came into the Temple and Altar, and ſlew the Prieſt at the Altar. And many who came from the uttermoſt parts of the world unto that holy place, were ſlain even as they offered ſacrifice, and ſo imbrued the Altar with their blood, which all the Greeks and barbarous people did reverence: and ſtrangers and the Prieſts being now prophaned, were forced to be amongſt the dead bodies, and the place about the Altar ſtood full of blood of men that were ſlain. "O miſerable city! What didſt thou
"ſuffer at the Romanes hands, to be compared unto this, although they entered with fire to K
"purge thee from iniquity? For now thou waſt no longer the Houſe of God, neither couldſt
"thou endure being made a Sepulchre of thine inhabitants, and having by thy civill warres
"made thy holy Temple a grave of dead bodies. Yet maiſt thou once again come into better
"eſtate, if firſt thou appeaſe Gods wrath that hath made thee deſolate. But I muſt not give "place unto ſorrow, and write a lamentation of my miſerable countrey, ſeeing I have under"taken to write a Hiſtory of all things that paſt there. Wherefore I will recount the reſidue "of the impiety of theſe ſeditious.

The ſeditious people being divided into three companies; Eleazar and his followers who had the keeping of the holy firſt-fruits, and all the ſacred oblations, came againſt John L when they were drunk. And they who followed John ſpoyling the people, aſſaulted Simon, and the City did ſuccour Simon. Wherefore when John was aſſaulted on both ſides, he turned ſome of his ſouldiers againſt Simon, and the reſt againſt Eleazar, and againſt Simon he uſed darts to caſt from the porches of the Temple: and againſt Eleazar he uſed engines for ſhot. And alwaies ſo often as they above his head ceaſed (as they often did being either weary or drunken) he freely aſſaulted Simon and his men. Alſo as farre as he drave them into the city, ſo farre did he fire all, and burn houſes full of corn and other neceſſaries; and that which he left unburned, Simon at his return (when John was gone into the Temple) ſet on fire: as if upon purpoſe, to the great advantage of the Romanes, they had conſumed all that M was provided againſt the ſiege; ſo did they deſtroy their own forces and ſtrength. To be ſhort, all was conſumed with fire about the Temple, and the city was made a plain ground to fight in, and all the corn was burnt that might have ſufficed the city many yeers; and ſo they were taken by famine, which they could not have felt, had they themſelves not cauſed it. The Citizens were in every place a prey unto thoſe that were ſeditious on one ſide, and to them that beſieged the City on the other ſide, and like a great body torn in pieces between theſe two. The old men and women aſtoniſhed with theſe calamities, prayed for the good ſucceſſe of the Romanes, and deſired ſome forrain warre to deliver them from their civill diſagreement.

And forthwith great fear and terror fell upon them all: beſides, it was no time as now to

They of Jeruſalem had welnigh burnt all their corn.

A wretched calamity in Jeruſalem.

A take counsell to change their minds, nor hope of agreement or of flight to them that desired it. For all places were kept and the rebels within, whomsoever they perceived to wish peaceably to the Romanes, or offer to fly unto them, they presently killed them as their common enemies. And all these wicked persons agreed in this, to wit, to put the just men to death, who best deserved to live. Day and night nothing could be heard save onely the noise of them that fought one against another; yet the lamentable cries of them that lived in perpetuall fear was far more miserable, who every day had new causes and occasions of sorrow given them; yet durst they not publikely lament, for fear; and so not daring to shew their grief, they secretly sorrowed, and now no man observed any reverence to them that were alive amongst them, nor took any care to bury the dead. The cause of both which was, that every B man despaired of himself. For whosoever were not joyned with the seditious, grew to be careless of all things, as making account presently to die a thousand deaths. But the seditious gathering the dead bodies upon heaps, continued their fighting, and troad upon them; and as it were encouraging themselves by the dead under their feet, they became more cruell, still devising one pernicious practise or other, and presently executing whatsoever they devised without any commiseration, omitting no way to murther, and leaving no tyranny unattempted: so that John abused the holy things of the Temple to make Engines of warre. For before-time when the Priests and people had determined to underprop the Temple and build it twenty cubits higher, King Agrippa with great cost and charges, brought them very goodly timber sufficient for their purpose from mount Libanus. And this work being prevented by warres, John took them, and seeing them fit for his purpose, C he erected a tower to fight against those that assaulted him from off the Temple; which he built along the wall over against the Chapter house, that standeth on the West side of the Temple: for he could build it in no other place, by reason that all other places were filled with staires. And having thus impiously provided engines, he hoped hereby to destroy his enemies. But God shewed his labour to be in vain, and before he could prevail against them, he brought the Romanes against the City.

Lamentation & mourning in Jerusalem.

The cruelty of the seditious in Ierusalem.

John made use of the wood, that was kept for holy uses, to make engines of.

For after that Titus had now gathered together part of his army, and by writing appointed the rest to meet him at Ierusalem, he departed from Cæsarea, having three legions that lately under the conduct of his father Vespasian had wasted all Iudæa, and the twelfth legion that sometime under Cestius were overcome, and put to flight by the Iews: who though they D were otherwise valiant enough; yet they desired to fight against the Iews to revenge themselves for that disgrace. Titus commanded the fifth legion to meet him at Ierusalem, and go by Emmaus, and that the tenth legion should march by Iericho: the rest he took with himself accompanied with the Kings forces that came to help him, having now more help then before, and many also out of Syria. Titus also brought men with him to supply the number that was wanting, being sent by Vespasian with Mutianus into Italy: for he brought two thousand chosen men from the legions at Alexandria, and three thousand followed him from Euphrates, together with Tiberius Alexander his chiefest friend, and one next him in most authority, who before was Governour of Egypt, and as then thought a fit man worthy to be Governour of the army; for that he was the first that did entertain the Emperour be- E ing new elected, who faithfully joyned with Vespasian, though yet he knew not what successe he should have: and he was present with him in all his affairs as his chiefest Counseller, renowned both for his wisedome and experience.

The order of Titus army.

CHAP. II.

How Titus went to Ierusalem to see their strength, and how he was in great danger.

F TItus being now to go into the countrey of the enemy, caused all those that came to help him, to march in the foremost place: after whom followed they that were to mend the wayes, and to pitch the tents: and after them they which carried the baggage of the Rulers and Governours of his army, and with them, the armed souldiers. Next after these came Titus himself accompanied with chosen men, and with him many that bare his colours: next, the horsemen going immediately before the Engines. And the Prefects and Tribunes with certain chosen men, and their companies followed. After them the Eagle with many other Ensignes: and the trumpets went before them. And after them followed the army marching six in a rank: then the multitude of servants that followed every legion did drive their baggage before them: lastly, came the hirelings and those that were appointed to guard them. Marching in such comely and warlike manner, as the Romanes are wont, he came by Samaria into Gophna, which place was already conquered by his father, and then also was under the custody of the Romane garrisons. And staying there one night, he departed from thence the next day: and after a dayes journey he pitched his tents in a place, which in the Jews language is called Acanthonaulona, that is, the valley of thornes, neer unto a village named Gabath Saul, which signifieth the valley of Saul, which is almost thirty furlongs from Jerusalem. From thence accompanied with 600. chosen horsemen, he went to Ierusalem, to view how strong it was, and of what courage the Iews were, to see if peradventure at sight of him they would yeeld without any further warre, for fear. For Titus understood (and it was true) that the people desired peace, but they were oppressed by the seditious, and so durst not attempt any thing, being not able to encounter or resist the Rebels. Titus riding along the high way that went straight to the walls saw no man all the way: but turning aside towards the tower Psephinos with his horsemen, an infinite number presently issued out by the towers of women, at a gate opposite to Helens tombe; and brake his rank of horsemen into two parts, and opposed themselves, hindring those horsemen that were yet in the high way, to come and joyn with the rest that had crost the way, and so did single out Titus accompanied onely with a few men. So he could go no further for the ditch of the town wall on one side, and for the garden pales on the other side: and there was no hope for him to return unto his souldiers, the enemies being between him and home. And many of his souldiers not knowing their Generall to be in any danger, but supposing him to have been amongst them still, fled away. Titus seeing that he had onely his own valour to trust unto, turned his horse against his enemies, and with a loud voice exhorted his followers to do the like, and so he brake violently into the midst of them, hasting to get unto his company. It was evident at that time that God giveth the victory, and hath a particular care of Kings and Princes and Emperours. For notwithstanding that an infinite number of darts and arrowes were shot at Titus, and he had no armour at all (for as we have already said, he came to espy, and not to fight) yet had he not one wound but all past him; as though purposely every one had striven to have mist him. But Titus with his sword made way, and cut many upon the face that opposed themselves against him, and so they falling down, he with his horse past over them. The Iews seeing Titus his valour, cried and exhorted one another to set upon him; but whithersoever he turned, the Iews fled, and would not abide by it: likewise those souldiers that were in the like danger with him, came of either side him and behind him. For no man had any hope to save his life, but onely by making themselves way with Titus, before they were so enclosed and oppressed. So, of two of the most valiant amongst them one was slain, and his horse likewise: the other was slain, and his horse taken by the Iews. And Titus with the rest of his followers came safe into the camp. And the Iews getting the first victory, rashly took courage, and that encouragement being of moment, made them very confident a long time after.

CHAP. III.

How the Iews did issue out upon the Romanes pitching their Tents.

SO soon as the legion that was to passe by Ammaus, was joyned to the rest of the army that night, Cæsar presently the next morning removed, and came to Scopos, where he might perfectly view the City and the Temple on the North part, where the ground adjoyning unto the City is very low, and is properly called Scopos, being distant seven furlongs from the Citie: and there Titus commanded two legions to encamp themselves, and the fifth legion to retire three furlongs off, to the intent that the souldiers who were wearied with travelling all night, might entrench themselves without fear or danger; no sooner had they begun their work, but presently the tenth legion came, who were to passe by Iericho, which Vespasian had already subdued, and had placed their garrison. This legion was commanded to encamp six furlongs from Ierusalem, neer mount Olivet, which is opposite to the East part of the City, and is enclosed with a deep valley called Cedron. This great and huge army so suddenly arriving, presently staied the warres within the city: and these three sects of seditious people beholding with admiration the Romanes camp, became friends, and made agreement amongst themselves. They began also to question one with another, what fury caused them to suffer themselves to be enclosed with three walls, to their prejudice and losse of their lives: and seeing such preparation of warres towards, that they should be as it were beholders of that which was done,

Thus they being aſſembled together, exhorted one another: and preſently arming themſelves, they iſſued out of the city, and aſſaulted the tenth legion, and with a huge cry ſet upon the Romanes that were entrenching themſelves in the valley. The Romanes being every one appointed to do ſome buſineſſe for the furtherance of that work, and for that cauſe the moſt of them having laid down their weapons (for they thought the Jews durſt not have made any excurſions, and although they would, that yet they were hindred being at variance among themſelves) they were troubled above meaſure, and preſently leaving the work

B ſome fled; many arming themſelves to fight, were ſlain before they were prepared to reſiſt. The multitude of the Jews was daily increaſed, becauſe that at the firſt they got the upper hand, and notwithſtanding their number was ſmall, yet did they think themſelves many: and ſo did the Romanes think them to be, becauſe of their good fortune. The Romanes who were alwaies wont to obſerve military diſcipline and order, at that time by their ſudden aſſaulting, were ſo troubled, that they obſerved no order, and ſo fled: yet whenſoever they turned again upon them that followed them, they eaſily wounded the Jews, partly, becauſe that they were ſo earneſt, that they did not greatly ſeek to defend themſelves, and alſo they did eaſily ſtay the Jews from purſuing them. Yet the number of them that purſued them ſtill increaſing, they were alſo more troubled, and ſo at laſt forced to forſake the field, and leave their tents: and the whole legion had been in greater danger, had not Titus having preſent

C news hereof ſpeedily came and ſuccoured them, and upbraiding their cowardlineſſe recalled them from flight; who with them, and the choſen men he brought, encountring the Iews on one ſide, he ſlew many of them, and wounded divers, and put the reſt to flight, and forced them into the valley. The Iews being now in the lower gronnd, and having endured much at the Romanes hands, ſince fortune frowned upon them, turned again, and having the valley between them, they fought with the Romanes. And thus the fight continued till the midſt of the day.

A little after midday Titus guarding the reſt with thoſe that he brought to ſuccour them, and placing others, to prevent the excurſions of the Jews, he commanded the reſt to entrench themſelves in the top of the mountain. The Jews thought the Romanes had fled, and

But Titus in the midſt of the ſide of the mountain remained alone having but a few with him; notwithſtanding his friends, who for the love they bare to their Emperour, ſtaied with him, and abode the danger, did earneſtly perſwade him to flye from the Iews, who deſperately ranne upon their own deaths, and not to endanger himſelf for them, who ought rather to abide it then he: And that he ſhould think upon his own eſtate,

But he made as though he heard them not, and oppoſed himſelf againſt them that offered to aſſault him, ſtriking them upon the faces, and killed them that made reſiſtance, and he purſued them down the hill, and ſo forced them to retire. The Iews amazed at his valour, did not yet flie into the city, but avoided him on both ſides, and fled into the valley: then again purſuing them that fled from them; yet Titus croſſing them as they went, hindred their purſuit. Then the Romanes turning again for ſhame, and accuſing themſelves guilty of a great offence in forſaking their Emperour amidſt ſuch danger, came with all the violence they could uſe againſt the Iews, and driving them down the mountain, forced them to retire; yet the Iews fought flying, and ſeeing the Romanes to have the upper hand of them, becauſe they were upon the higher ground, they departed into the valley. Titus aſſaulted them that were oppoſite againſt him, and ſo commanded the reſt to go and finiſh their trenches. And he with thoſe that before were with him to defend the workmen,

CHAP. IIII.

Of the fight within the City upon the feast of unleavened bread.

John entreth and seizeth the inward Temple and all the furniture thereof, putteth the Zealous to flight, and raiseth a mighty sedition.

During the intermission of the forrain wars, they fell to their former sedition againe, which caused civil wars among them. And against the feast of unleavened bread, which is the fourteenth day of April (for upon this day the Jews say that they H were delivered out of the bondage of Egypt) Eleazar and his companions opened the gates, to the intent that all that would, might come in to adore and do their devotion. But John used this festival day as a means to effect his deceit; and caused many of his company that were unknown, to enter in among the people with weapons under their garments, giving them charge when they were within, to get possession of the Temple: and so soon as they were within, they cast of their garments, and shewed themselves to be in armour. Presently a great tumult arose within the Temple; for all the people that were not of the sedition, thought themselves betrayed: and the zealous thought this treason, onely practised to prejudice them: and so leaving the gate which before they kept, and leaping down from the towers, they never offering to fight, fled unto the vaults about the Temple. And the people flocking about the Altar, and others who were driven into the Temple, were killed with I clubs and swords, and so troden upon. And many were slain upon private hatred, under pretence to be partakers with the enemies. And whosoever beforetime had offended any of those traitors, he was put to death, as though he had been one of the zealous. But they who had cruelly raged against the innocent, let the wicked have leisure to escape out of those caves, whereby they had no harm: and having gotten the inner part of the Temple, and all belonging thereunto, they did now more confidently then before fight against Simon: and thus the sedition that was before divided into three parts, was now brought onely into two. Titus being desirous to bring his amy nearer the City, sent a certain number of horsmen and foot men, which he thought sufficient to hinder all excursions of the Jews from Scopos, and another company he sent to plain all the grounds betwixt him and K
Jerusalem: who cutting down all hedges, and pales, and fences, and wood (though they were fruit trees) filled the valleys, and made it all plain ground: and hewing down all stones that standing up made the ground unequal, they plained all that ground from Scopos, even unto Herods monument, which adjoyned to the lake of Serpents called sometime Bethora.

CHAP. V.

Of the deceit the Jews used against the Romane souldiers,

About this time the Iews divised this stratagem against the Romans. The most courragious among the seditious people went out unto the places called the womens towers, and counterfeited themselves to be driven thither by them within the City that desired peace; and for that they feared the Romans, they were come thither to hide themselves one behind another: others standing on the wals, and counterfeiting themselves to be the Citizens, with loud cryes desired peace, and a league of friendship, promising to set the Citie gates open, and inviting the Romans to enter: and crying thus they also cast stones against their countrey men before spoken of, as though they did drive them from the gates; and they made as though they would by force break thorow the people, and come to the gates, partly by force, partly by entreating the people to permit them. And making many offers to go unto the Romans, they returned again like men troubled in mind, M and studying what to do. The Romane souldiers did not perceive their subtil meaning; who seeing the seditious ready to fall into their hands, that so they might punish them, and seeing the people (as they thought) ready to open the gates unto them, would in post haste have gone unto the City. But Titus suspected some deceit coloured with this kind, inviting him to enter. because he did not see any reason for it. For the day before, having by Joseph offered them peace, he understood that their minds were far from any peaceable cogitations: wherefore now he commanded the souldiers to keep their quarters and not to remove; yet some of them, appointed to work in the trenches, taking their weapons, ran unto the gates, and the Jews who seemed to be driven out of the City at first fled; at last when they came

A unto the gates of the towers, they enclosed the Romanes round about, and assaulted them upon their backs: and they that were upon the wals did cast all kind of darts and stones upon them: so that they slew many, and wounded very many; for it was not easie to escape from the wals, others being behind them, and offering them violence. Moreover, they were ashamed that their Captains had so offended, and in fear of their offence committed, both which caused them still to persevere in it. And after a long conflict receiving many wounds, and giving as many, at last that put them to flight that inclosed them, and so the Jews departed, and followed them to Herods monument, pursuing them with darts. And then the Jews returned rejoycing in their good fortune; and deriding the Romanes for being so deceived, lifting up their shields and bucklers, shouting and rejoycing.

The victory of the Iew.

B The Romane souldiers were received of their Captains with threatnings, and of Cæsar, with this speech: The Iews led onely with desperation, do all things with advice and counsel, devising deceits: and fortune favoureth their practises because they are ordered, and trusty to one another. And now the Romanes, whom for their obedience and discipline fortune was wont to favour, do contrariwise offend herein, and for their rash and unadvised fighting are overcome: and which is worst of all, in Cæsars presence offering to fight without their Captains. Truly the military law and discipline will be grieved hereat, and my father very sorrowful to hear of this. For he who from his infancy unto old age, hath been trained up in arms, yet did he never offend in this sort; and what shall we say to our law that punisheth the least offences against them committed with death, when our whole army doth disobey their Emperours command? But (quoth he) they who so arrogantly have disobeyed C our command, shall presently understand, that among the Romanes, victory against the Generals command, is an infamy. Titus having thus spoken in anger to the Captains, evidently declared to them what and how he purposed to puinish them. And they presently despaired as though by and by they were justly condemned to die. But all the other legions flocking about Titus, besought him to pardon their fellow souldiers, and to remit the offence of the rashnesse of some few, for the obedience sake of the rest; affirming that their future valour should be a sufficient recompense for this their offence. Cæsar was now pacified, partly thinking what was most profitable, partly for the intreaty of the rest; for he purposed to punish one man onely, and to rebuke the rest, and signifie to them his displeasure, and so he was reconciled to his souldiers; straightly charging them to be wiser hereafter: and after, he D devised how to be revenged on the Jews for this deceit. When all the ground between the wals of Jerusalem, and his army was in four dayes made plain, Titus being desirous safely to conduct the baggage, and the rest of the multitude in safety, he placed the strongest of all his souldiers every one in his rank seven by seven, and caused them to march from the North part of the City unto the West, all along without the City wals, placing the footmen in the forefront, and in the last place, the horsemen three in a rank, and between them both the Archers. So the Jews not able now to make any excursions, Titus souldiers being thus disposed of the baggage of the three legions and the multitude passed along without any danger. And Titus himself being now within two furlongs of the City wals, pitched his tent against that E corner of the wall that is called Psephinos, where the compass of the wall from the North bends into the West: the other part of the army entrenched themselves against that pat of the wall that is called Hippicos, distant in like manner two furlongs from the City. But the tenth legion remained still in mount Olivet where it was before.

CHAP. VI.

The description of Jerusalem.

F THe City was compassed with a threefold wall on every side, save onely on that part where it was inclosed with valleys inaccessible: for on that side it had onely one wall. It was built upon two litle hils, one of them being opposite unto another, and separated one from another with a valley, which was wonderfully repleniished with houses. One of these hils whereon standeth the upper part of the City, is far higher and steeper then the other, insomuch that because of the strength of it, King David in times past called it a Castle (this David was the father of King Solomon, who first builded the Temple in that place;) but we at this day call it the high market place. The other hill called Acra, is the place were the lower part of the City stands. Opposite against this hill, there was also another lower then this Acra was, which was first divided from it with a large valley, but afterward at such time as the Asmoneans reigned, they did fill up this valley, to the intent intent they might joyn the City unto the Temple, and cut down the top of Acra, and so made it lower, that it might not hide the Temple. The valley, by which we have ſaid the two higher hils are ſeparated one from another, is called Tyropœon, and reacheth unto Siloa (which is a fountain abounding with ſweet water.) Without the City were two hils compaſſed with deep vallies: and being incloſed with high rocks, they were on every ſide inacceſſible. The moſt ancieſt of the three wals, by reaſon of the valley about it, and the hill whereupon it ſtood, could not eaſily be taken; and beſide the opportunity of the place, it was very ſtrongly built, at the coſt and charges of David, Solomon, and other Kings. This wall, beginning at the tower called Hippicos, reacheth to that called Xyſtus, and afterward being joyned unto the Palace, it endureth in the Weſt porch of the Temple: on the other ſide towards the Weſt it begins at the ſame tower; and paſſing by the place that is called Betiſo, it deſcends unto the gate of the Eſſeans, and ſo into the South, and from thence again it bendeth into the Eaſt, where is alſo Solomons pond, and reacheth unto the place called Ophlan, where it is joyned unto the Eaſt porch of the Temple. The ſecond wall beginneth at the gate that is called Genath, which is a gate of the former wall, and it onely compaſſeth the North part of the City, and reacheth to Antonia, a caſtle ſo called. The third wall beginneth at the tower Hippicos, from whence it goeth into the North part, and from thence it cometh unto the tower Pſephina, over againſt the Sepulchre of Helena that was Queen of Adiabena, and mother of King Izates: and paſſing along by the Kings caves, it turneth towards the tower near the monument of Fullo, and the valley called Cedron it joyneth with the old wall. Agrippa compaſſeth that part of the City that he built, with this wall, it being before all open without defence. For the City grew ſo populous, that by little and little they were forced to inhabit ſome part without the wals: and this wall reacheth a great way, being joyned unto the hill next the City on the North ſide of the Temple. There was alſo a fourth hill inhabited, named Bezetha, ſituate againſt Antonia, but ſeparated from it with very deep ditches, which were made of purpoſe, leſt that the foundation of Antonia being joyned unto it, it might be eaſier to come unto, and ſeem lower: for the deepneſſe of the ditch maketh the tower ſeem much higher then otherwiſe it would. This place being added unto the City, is called in that countrey language Bezetha, which ſignifieth the new City. And the inhabitants deſiring that part to be fortified, Agrippa, father to this Agrippa that finiſht the wall, did begin that wall aforementioned: and fearing leſt Claudius Cæſar, hearing how ſumptuous a wall he built, ſhould miſtruſt that he purpoſed to revolt, he onely laid the foundation of it, and ſo left it unfiniſhed.

Agrippas coſt in building the wall.

For the City could never have been taken by force, if he had finiſhed that wall as he began it, it being built with ſtones twenty cubits long, and ten cubits broad, which could neither eaſily be undermined, nor battered with engines: and this wall was built ten cubits high, and no doubt had been raiſed higher, had not his liberality who began this building been hindred. Yet again by the Jews induſtry the ſame wall was raiſed twenty cubits high, the battlements hereof were two cubits high, and the tower three cubits, and in all it was twenty four cubits high, as before. Upon the wall were three towers twenty cubits broad, and twenty cubits high, built four-ſquare very ſtrongly, and was builded of as firm a foundation as the wall it ſelf, which for the building and fair ſtone was not inferiour to the Temple above. Within this ſtrong tower, which reacheth twenty cubits high, were rooms for men to dwell in, and ciſterns to receive rain-water, and large turning ſtairs to go into every place there: and this third wall had four-ſcore and ten of theſe towers, and between every tower were two hundred cubits ſpace. The middle wall had fourteen towers, and the old wall had threeſcore, and the compaſſe of the whole City was three and thirty furlongs. And although the third wall was admirable, yet the tower of Pſephina, which was built upon a corner of the wall between the North and the Weſt part of the City, had a certain excellency of more wonder, againſt which part Titus had encamped himſelf: for it was ſeventy cubits high, ſo that from thence upon a clear Sun-ſhine day, one might diſcover Arabia, and ſee the uttermoſt parts of all the dominions of the Hebrews unto the Sea, and it had eight corners. Juſt oppoſite to this was the tower Hippicos, and near unto it were other two, that King Herod builded upon the old wall, which in bigneſſe, beauty and ſtrength, did ſurpaſſe all others in the whole world.

The third wall had 90 towers.

Pſephina was 70. cubits high.

For King Herod, beſides his natural liberality and deſire to adorn this City, did alſo for his own pleaſure ſo beautifie this building, that it might excel all other, and dedicated them to three moſt renowned perſonages, whoſe names they alſo did bear, to wit, to his brother, his friend, and to his wife, ſhe being (as is aforeſaid) put to death for jealouſie; the other two being ſlain in warres, after they had fought valiantly. The tower Hippicos called by the name

Herod called three towers by the names of three his moſt dearеſt friends.

A name of his friend, had four corners, and every one of them were five and twenty cubits broad, and as many in length, and thirty cubits in height, being in no place hollow; and above the high places and ſtone-work, there was a well to receive rain-water, twenty cubits deep: and aloft of it were houſes with double roofs twenty five cubits high, and divided into many rooms: and above them were battlements two cubits high, and turrets three cubits high: ſo that the whole height was accounted to be fourſcore and five cubits. The ſecond tower that by his brothers name he called Phaſælus, was in breadth and length fourty cubits, and ſo many cubits high, in figure of a ſquare pillar, all which height was ſolid, and not hollow within: and above this a porch ten cubits high, decked with turrets and pinnacles. Over the midſt of this Porch he built another tower diſtinguiſhed into goodly rooms
B and ſumptuous baths, that it ſhould not want any thing neceſſary for a Prince: on the top it was beautified with turrets and pinnacles, ſo that all his height was almoſt fourſcore and ten cubits: And it reſembled the tower Pharus at Alexandria, wherein continual light is kept to guide the ſeamen that ſail thither, ſaving that it had a greater compaſſe then it. And in this houſe now at this time did Simon lodge, who tyrannized over the people. The third tower was, according to the Queens name, called Mariamme, the wife of Herod, twenty cubits high, all ſolid, and other twenty cubits broad, having more magnificent and beautiful houſes and lodgings then the reſt. For the King ſo thought it meet, that the tower called by his wives name, ſhould be more beautiful then they who onely bare the names of other men, like as they were ſtronger then this that bare the name of a woman. This tower was
C in all fifty five cubits high.

Notwithſtanding theſe three towers were of ſuch height, yet by reaſon of their ſituation they ſeemed far higher: for the old wall whereupon they were built was placed upon high ground, and the top of the hill whereupon they ſtood was above thirty cubits high, whereby their height was much increaſed. The greatneſſe alſo was admirable; for it was not ordinary ſtone which men might bear, but all white marble, whereof every ſtone was twenty cubits long, and ten cubits broad, and five cubits thick, and they were ſo coupled one to another, that every ſtone by it ſelf ſeemed a tower; & ſo cunningly conjoyned by workmens hands, that every tower ſeemed one ſtone. And theſe were placed on the North ſide of the City; and adjoyning to them within the City, was ſituate the Kings Palace, ſurpaſſing all
D that can be ſpoken of it: which for greatneſſe and excellent work may be compared to all that were in the world. It was compaſſed about with a wall thirty cubits high, and adorned with goodly towers round about, every one of like diſtance from other, beautified with dwelling houſes and lodgings for a hundred of the Nobility. The variety of the marble it was built withal, was admirable, for all ſorts being there uſed that were never ſo rare to be found: and the tops of theſe houſes for the length of the beams and the beauty thereof paſſed all credit; and the multitude of rooms, and diverſity of buildings, all filled and adorned with houſhold ſtuffe and furniture. And in every room there were many veſſels of gold and ſilver, and many porches round about, one anſwerable unto another, and pillars in every one. And there were many pleaſant walks repleniſhed with divers trees, and many
E walking places, or allies, all beſet with conduits that ſpouted up water on high, and ciſterns full of brazen images, from which ran out water, and about the water many dove-houſes full of tame pigeons. But it is impoſſible ſufficiently to declare the riches and bewty of the Kings Palace; and a grief to think what goodly things, and how rich, the theeves did there ſet on fire: for theſe things were not burnt by the Romanes, but by the ſeditious theeves (as is before ſaid) at the beginning of this rebellion, who conſumed all with fire, even from the Caſtle Antonia from whence the fire came, and deſtroyed the Kings Palace, and the covers and tops of the three towers. The Temple was, as is before ſaid, built upon a hard mountain, and at the firſt, the Plain upon the top thereof was ſcarcely big enough to contain it and the Temple yard, the hill being very ſteep. But when King Solomon, who alſo built the Temple, had compaſſed the Eaſt part thereof with a wall, he alſo placed a porch
F upon the rampire, and ſo for many ages after, it lay unfenced on other parts: wherefore the people every day bringing earth thither, at laſt made it plain & large enough: & breaking down the North wall they took in all that ſpace which the Temple had continually occupied even until now: and the hill being now incloſed with a threefold wall, it was a work paſſing all expectation in building. To the effecting whereof many ages were ſpent, and all the holy treaſure offered to God, even from all parts of the world, was employed therein, as well in the buildings of the higher, as of the lower part of the Temple; the foundations whereof wer laid three hundreth cubits deep, and in many places more: yet could not all the height of the foundations be ſeen, being now buried in valleys, that were filled up

The ſtones of this building were of fourty cubits: for the abundance of treaſure and liberality of the people did effect that which was ſcarcely poſſible; and that which all men thought could never have come to paſſe, in time and by induſtry came to perfection. G

The porches were built of white marble ſtone ſuſtained by pillars.

The building was anſwerable unto theſe foundations. For all the porches were double, and every one was ſupported by pillars, each of them being five and twenty cubits high, and all of one piece and of white marble: the top whereof was all of Cedar, whoſe natural beauty for the good conjoyning of this wood and poliſhing thereof, did aſtoniſh all that beheld it, being adorned neither with painting nor carved works. Theſe porches were thirty cubits broad: and the compaſſe of them altogether, with the fort of Antonia, was ſix furlongs. All the ground whereon ſtood no building, was curiouſly wrought and paved with all ſorts of ſtones. The way to the ſecond Temple was all incloſed with ſtones of lattice work, which were three cubits high, and moſt beautifully wrought along: in which place alſo were placed certain pillars equally diſtant one from another, to ſhew the law of purification; ſome being written upon in Latine letters, other ſome in Greek, forbidding all ſtrangers to enter into the holy place: for the ſecond Temple is called the holy place. To go unto the ſecond from the firſt, one muſt paſſe up fourteen ſtairs, and it was fourſquare aloft, and encloſed with a wall by it ſelf; whoſe outſide being fourty cubits high, was all covered with ſtairs to aſcend up unto it; and within, it was five and twenty cubits high: for all the part of the inner ſide was unſeen, becauſe it was built on the deſcent of a hill. After the fourteen ſtairs there was a Plain made levell with the wall of three hundreth cubits: from thence paſſed on five other ſtairs which lead unto the gates, whereof on the North ſide and the South there were eight, four on each ſide, and two on the Eaſt. For it was neceſſary that there ſhould be a peculiar place for women to exerciſe their devotion in, which alſo was encloſed with a wall. And ſo it, was neceſſary there ſhould be two doors: and againſt the firſt gate there was oppoſite unto it one gate on the North ſide, and another on the South, both ſeparated from the reſt, whereby one entred the place allotted for women; for it was not lawfull for any to paſſe by any other gate unto the women, neither could they go beyond their own door, becauſe of the wall: for that place was common both to the women of that nation, & alſo to all ſtrange women that came for religion ſake. There was no gate on the Weſt part, but a wall that reacheth all along in that place. Between the gates were porches oppoſite one againſt another, reaching from the wall unto the treaſure houſe, ſupported with great and goodly pillars, being as plain, and fully as big as they below. The gate were covered with gold and ſilver, as alſo the poſts and foreparts thereof were, one onely excepted that was covered with Corinthian braſſe, far ſurpaſſing in beauty the other that were covered with ſilver and gold. In every gate there were two doors, each one thirty cubits high, and fifteen cubits broad: and after the entrance where they were made larger, every one had on each ſide ſeats thirty cubits long, and large like a tower, and fourty cubits high, each one ſupported with two piliars twelve cubits thick. And all other gates were of like greatneſſe; but that which was covered with Corinthian braſſe, which was the entrance into the place allotted for the women, and opened into the Eaſt gate of the Temple, doubtleſſe vvas bigger then the reſt: for it vvas fifty cubits high (the gates vvhereof vvere fourty cubits) and vvas more richly adorned then the reſt: for the cover of gold and ſilver vvas thicker then it vvas in the reſt, vvhich Alexander Tiberius his father had melted, to cover all the nine gates. And there vvere 15. ſtairs, that vvent from the vvall that ſeparated the vvomen, unto the great gate of the Temple: for theſe ſtairs vvere ſhorter by five degrees, then thoſe that vvent to other gates. The Temple it ſelf vvas ſituated in the midſt of all, to vvit, the holy Sanctuary, and had tvvelve ſtairs to go unto it. The forepart vvhereof vvas in height and breadth a hundreth cubits: and behind, it was fourty cubits outright: and before it, vvas as it vvere tvvo ſhoulders on each ſide riſing up in height tvventy cubits. The firſt gates hereof vvas ſeventy cubits high, and twenty five wide, and had no door: for it ſignified that heaven was ſpread all over, and might be ſeen in every place: and all the foreparts were gilded with gold, and all the firſt building did appear and might be ſeen without, and all that vvas vvithin and about the gate gliſtered vvith gold. The inner part thereof vvas divided into tvvo rooms, vvhereof onely the firſt room might be ſeen, vvhich vvas in height fourſcore and ten cubits, and in length fourty, and in breadth tvventy. The inner gate vvas (as is already ſaid) all gilded vvith Gold, and all the vvall about it, and above it: it had a golden vine, whereon were hanging cluſters of Grapes all of gold, every cluſter being as long as a man is high. And becauſe the height was ſeeled above, the inner Temple did ſeem to be lower then it was without, and it had Golden gates fifty five cubits high, and ſixteen cubits broad.

It

A It had hangings alſo of the ſame length, which was a Babylonian vail, all wrought with violet, and purple ſilk and ſcarlet, admirable to behold: the permixtion of which colours had a myſtical meaning, bearing as it were the ſignification of the whole world. For the ſcarlet doth ſeem to expreſſe the fire, the ſilk ſignifieth the earth, the violet ſheweth the air, and the purple declares the ſea, partly in their colours reſembling them, partly alſo as having their beginning from them: for the purple is ingendred in the ſea, and the ſilk is produced by the earth. In this tapeſtry work was curiouſly wrought, and deſciphered all the ſpeculations of the heavens, onely the Celeſtial ſigns excepted. Being entred within, you come into a lower place of the Temple, which was 60. cubits high, and as many in length, and 20. in
B breadth. Again, this place was divided into two, whereof the firſt part contained 40. cubits, having in it three moſt admirable things, and famous thorowout the world, to wit, a candleſtick, a table, and the alter of incenſe. upon the candleſtick ſeven lamps were p'aced which ſignifieth the ſeven Planets (for ſo many did there come all out of one ſtem of the candleſtick) upon the table were ſtanding twelve loaves of bread, ſignifying the twelve celeſtial ſigns, and revolution of the year. By the altar of incenſe, out of which proceedeth thirteen odours, coming partly from the ſea which is unhabitable, and partly from the earth which is inhabited, is ſignified that all things are in the hands God, and ſubject to yeeld him obedience. The inner part of the Temple contained 20. cubits which alſo was ſepa-
C rated from the other part by a vail, and nothing was within it: and this place was the holy of holies, & no man might enter, look into it, nor violate the ſame. On each ſide of the lower Temple, there were many lodgings and doors to paſſe into, every one of them having three roofs one above another; and there was a gate which led unto both ſides of the Temple, and unto theſe rooms: but the higher part of the Temple had not the like rooms on each ſide, and therefore it was made ſo much narrower then the other, yet was it higher then it by 40. cubits, neither was it ſo gorgious as the lower. For the whole height was 100. cubits, and the ground thereof 60. The uttermoſt part was ſo curious and richly wrought, that it was unpoſſible for any one to imagine any workmanſhip that it wanted: for it was all cove-
D red with a maſſive plate of pure gold, which ſhined far brighter then the morning ſun, ſo that it dazled the eyes of the beholders, as doth the ſun when it is gazed upon. And a far off it ſeemed unto ſtrangers that came thither, like a white mountain: for where the Temple was not gilded with gold, there was it milk white. The top hereof was all ſet full of rods of gold, very ſharpe at the upper end like pikes, leſt the birds ſhould come and ſit thereon, and ſo defile it: many ſtones wherewithall it was built; were 45. cubits large, 5. cubits in length, and 6. cubits broad. Before the Temple there ſtood an Altar 15. cubits high, being 40 cubits broad, and as many long, and four ſquare, having corners made like horns. The way to this Altar was on the South ſide, where it by little and little mounted from below even unto the Altar. This Altar was builded without Iron, and never Iron did touch it. The Temple and the Altar were encloſed with ſtone work, beautiful to behold, which was a cubit high, ſe-
E parating the people from the Prieſts. Thoſe that were tronbled with a flux of their ſeed, and Lepers were expulſed out of the City; and women alſo having their monethly courſes, and thoſe thar were not unclean, might paſſe this foreſaid limit. Likewiſe men that were not purified, were not permitted to come within the inner Temple; and thoſe that were, might not come among the Prieſts: thoſe alſo that deſcended from the line of the Prieſts, and for blindneſſe did not adminiſter their function, were not withſtanding admitted into the place appointed for the reſt of the Prieſts that were ſound, and had a ſhare as they had; yet did they go attired as lay-men, for onely he that did ſacrifice, might weare Prieſtly attire.

F The Prieſts that come unto the Altar and Temple had no infirmity, and they were clothed in a fine linen garment, and abſtained from wine, and lived in abſtinence for reverence of religion, leſt they ſhould ſin whil'ſt they offered ſacrifices. The high Preiſt alſo aſcended with the Prieſts into the Temple; yet not alwaies, but every ſeventh day, and in the Calends of every moneth, or on a feſtival celebrated according to the cuſtome of their countrey, or wherein all the people were preſent. And then he ſacrificed being girded with a vail, which covered his thighs even unto his privities, under which he wore a linen garment hanging down unto his feet, and above it a round violet garment all fringed at the skirts, and hanged full of golden bels, and pomgranats of gold, firſt one, and then another; the bels ſignified thunder, and the pomgranats lightning. Upon his breſt he wore a veſture of five colours; to wit, gold, purple, ſcarlet, ſilk and violet, which alſo (as we have ſaid) the vails of the Temple were wrought withal. He had likewiſe a rotchet of the ſame, wherein was more gold, and in ſhape it was like the garment he wore on his body to the thighes: it was alſo also buttoned with two golden buttons, made in the form of Asps, wherein was inclosed the greatest and most precious Sardonyx stone that could be found, bearing the names of the 12. tribes of Israel engraven in them. On the other side did hang 12. precious stones, three and three in a rank, divided into four rows. In the first was the Ruby, the Topaze, and the Emeraud: in the second the Carbuncle, the Jasper and the Saphire: in the third the Agate, the Amethyst, and the Diamond: in the last the Onyx, the Beryl and Chrysolite, in every one of which one name of the twelve tribes was written. Upon his head he wore a miter of silk, which was crowned with Hyacinth: and aloft of it was another Crown of gold, wherin was engraven sacred letters, to wit, the four vowels. He did not alwayes use this garment, but another most commonly not so gorgeous: this he used when he entred into the Sanctuarie, which he did onely once every year alone, none else going with him, upon which day all the nation was wont to fast. But we will hereafter speak more at large of the City and Temple, the laws and customes, the ordinances and observations, for these things cannot be briefly declared. The Castle Antonia was situate in a corner of the two porches of the first temple, which looked unto the West, and the North: and it was built upon a rock of stone of fifty cubits high, which on every side was inaccessible: this first was built by king Herod, to shew the greatnesse and magnificence of his mind. For first of all the rock at the foot thereof was all covered with thin and slender stones like slates. Which did both adorn it, and would also easily slide down if any one walked upon them. Before the battlements of the fort there was a wall three cubits high, within which the Castle Antonia was built 40. cubits high, being within all furnished and contrived like the Palace of a king, having all kind of houses of office, and other necessary rooms. For there were porches, bathes, and large hals, to place tents in: so that for all convenient roomes and places it seemed to be a City, and for the magnificence thereof a kings Palace. In outward fashion it was built like a tower, and invironed about with four other towers, at every corner one, whereof they that were on the South and East side were 70 cubits high, the other two were onely 50. So out of these two highest, one might have perfect view of the whole Temple. Where it joyned to the porches of the Temple, there was on either side of it a pair of stairs for the souldiers to come down out of it into the Temple. For alwayes the Romane souldiers lodged there, and guarded the Temple in armour upon festival dayes, lest the people should attempt any rebellion or sedition. For the Temple was a Castle to keep the town in awe, and the Castle Antonia to overthrow the Temple: there also were placed the souldiers: likewise in Herods Palace, which served for a castle over the higher part of the City. The hill Bezetha was divided from the City, as is before mentioned: which being the highest of all, was joyned to part of the new city, which did obscure the view of the Temple on the North side. And thus I have here spoken sufficiently of the City, and the wall in this place, because we mean hereafter to describe them more at large.

CHAP. VII.

How the Jews refused to yeeld, how they assaulted the Romans.

1500. follow Simon.

THe most warlike of all the people joyned with Simon, being in number ten thousand, beside the Idumæans: and those ten thousand had 50 Captains of their own fellows, yet all subject unto Simon. The Idumæans that took his part were five thousand, and had ten Captains, the chief of whom were Jacob the son of Sosas, and Simon, the son of Cathla. And John, who kept the Temple, had six thousand armed men, over whom were twenty Captains: and then there came unto him two thousand of the zealous, and four hundred, who before had followed Eleazar and Simon, the son of Jairus. So these warring one against another, the people was their booty, and the multitude that were not seditious as they were, was their prey. Simon kept the higher part of the City, and the greater wall even unto Cedron; and all that part of the old wall which is between Siloa, and the Palace of Monobazus, who was King of Adiabena, that lieth beyond the river Euphrates: he also kept all the hill Acra (which is the lower part of the City) unto Helenas Palace, who was Monobazus his mother. But John kept all the Temple and the space about it, Ophla, and the valley Cedron: and that which was between these two places which Simon and John kept, was all consumed with fire, and made a place to fight in. For although the Romanes tents were pitched near unto the walls of the City, yet did not this sedition cease; but having recovered some security a while at the Romanes first coming, presently they returned unto their former wont. And dividing themselves again, every man fought for his own part,

A part, doing all that the Romanes could wish to be done. For the Romanes did them no more harm then they did themselves: for after them the city suffered no new calamity, but indured farre more misery before it was taken and destroied by the Romanes, then it did at that time. For the Romanes in destroying it, did rather end their misery then bring them into it. For the seditious did take the citie, and the Romanes did overcome and take the seditious, which was farre stronger then the walls: so that one may ascribe all their miseries to their own nation, and equitie and justice unto the Romanes, as every one shall cleerly see by that which ensued.

The yeer of the world, 4034. after the nativity of Christ, 72.

The seditious took the city, and the Romanes overcame and took the seditious.

The City being in the estate beforesaid, Titus with chosen horsemen went up and down without it, to espie where he might most easily assault the walls. And being in doubt a long
B time what to do, for that where the valley was, footmen could not possibly get up to it; and where it was walled, they seemed to be impossible to be battered down with engines: at last he determined to assault it on that part, where was the monument of John the high Priest: for onelie in this place the first wall was lower then in other places, and it was not compast here with the second wall, for this place was not fortified, becaus that those parts of the new city were not much inhabited. So that from this place the wall might easily be assaulted: whereby Titus was perswaded that the higher city, and the Temple, and Antonia, might easily be taken. As he was thus viewing the place, one of his friends called Nicanor, came unto him: who was shot in the left shoulder with an arrow, becaus he desired to come neer Joseph, who went thither of purpose to perswade the Jews which were upon the wall to yeeld: for Nicanor was very eloquent. Cæsar perceiving their mindes, and that they would not abstain
C from him, who perswaded them to that which was most expedient for them, was now moved, & began earnestlie to besiege them: and so he permitted his souldiers to waste all the suburbs, and to gather all the rubbish, stones, wood, and other matter together, and made therewith a mount. And dividing his army into three parts, he disposed of every one what he should do, and in the midst of all upon the mounts he placed archers, and before them engines for shot, wherewithall he hindred the incursions of his enemies, left they should annoy the work, and also did beat those off from the wall, who made any resistance from thence. And presently all trees being cut down, the suburbs appeared naked. Whilest the Romanes having gathered the wood together, were busied in the work, the Jews were not
D idle: and then the people, who were troubled with murthers and robberies, did hope to have an end of their misery, the seditious people being busied against their enemies: and they now hoped that if the Romanes did overcome, they might be revenged upon them. John still kept where he was, fearing Simon; yet were his followers very earnest to assault the Romans. But Simon being next unto the siege, did not rest, but placed all along that part of the wall, men with darts, which before were taken from Sestius Governor of the Romanes, and found in the Castle of Antonia. But the darts did the Iews small pleasure, by reason that few of them knew how to use them: onely some who were taught by certain that fled from the Romanes, could use them a little. Yet did they assault the Romane souldiers that were building the mounts, with arrows and stones; and also made incursions upon them by companies, and E fought with them. But the Romane workmen were defended by hurdles that were of purpose set before them: and every legion had strange and admirable engines against the excursions of their enemy, and especially the engines that the tenth legion had to cast darts, and others that cast stones; which did not onely repulse them, by whom they were assaulted, but also those that stood upon the wall: for every stone was a talent weight, and were shot more then a furlong, and slew not onely those that they did first strike, but also many that were stricken with the rebound. But the Iews alwaies espied the stones before they came (for they were white) and so avoided them: and they were not onelie descried by the noise they made in flying, but they might easily be perceived: and by this means the watchmen in the towers gave warning alwayes when these engines were shot off, and when the stones came, crying in their countrey language, The stone cometh: so the Iewes upon the wals knowing what F they meant, avoided the stones, and so received no harm. Then the Romanes devised to black the stones with ink, and so they could not be seen as they flew, but at one stroke slew manie. But the Iews were not herewith so terrified, that they permitted the Romanes peaceably to build the mount, but night and day they hindred them with stratagems and valour. Now when the Romanes had finished their work, the Carpenters measured the space between the mounts and the wals with a plummet fastned unto a line, which they cast from one place unto another: for they could not measure it otherwise, becaus of the darts cast from the wals; and finding that they had rammes long enough, they set them up, and Titus commanded the wall to be battered in three places, to the end that the battery might not be hindred. The noise that these rams did make, was heard round about the city; and the citizens cried mainly out, and the seditious persons were also sore affraid. And seeing themselves all in like danger, they now determined to joyn all together in resisting the Romanes: and the seditious cried one unto another, saying, that they rather assisted the enemies, then resisted them: and therefore exhorted one another at least for that time to become friends if not for ever, onely to resist the Romanes. And Simon sent a cryer unto the Temple, licensing all such as would, to come unto the wals: which also John did permit, notwithstanding he mistrusted Simon: so they forgetting their old quarrel, joyned all together, and resisted the Romanes, and guarding the walls round, they cast much fire upon the Engines of the Romanes, and against those that did rule them; and threw darts against them without intermission: and the boldest amongst them in great companies leapt down, & destroied that wherewith the engines were covered, and assaulted those that stood to defend them; and so did the Romanes much harm, by reason of their desperate boldnesse, more then by their skill. G H

Titus commandeth the wall to be battered in three places.

The seditious forgetting their hatred and discords joyn in one.

Titus was still at hand to succour them that stood in need: and placing horsemen and Archers about the engines, he repulsed the Jews who came to cast fire, and represſed them that cast darts, and shot arrows from the towers, and so gave the rams time and opportunity to beat the wals. Yet for all this the wall was not shaken with rams, save onely that the ram of the fifth legion did shake the corner of a tower; but yet the wall stood firm, and was not harmed by the shaking of the tower: for it was far higher then the wall, and so could not draw down any part of the wall as it fell. So soon as they had a while ceased from excursions, they perceived that all the Romanes were busied in one labour or other, and so dispersed all over the camp, thinking that the Iews for fear durst come no more. The Iews all secretly issued out of the gate by the tower Hippicos, and cast fire upon the works, and couragiously made incursion upon the Romanes even unto the rampire of their camp. The Romanes seeing what danger might ensue, presently assembling themselves, both they that were neer, and those that were far off. The discipline of the Romanes overcame the fury of the Jews: and putting those to flight that first met them, they assaulted those that opposed themselves against them afterward. So there began a grievous battell about the engines; the Iews striving to fire them, and the Romanes fighting to hinder them; and a doubtfull cry was raised on both parts, and many in the forefront were slain on both sides. But the Jews audacity got them the upper hand; and their fire did something touch the engines: and all had been consumed quite with fire, had not the chosen souldiers that came from Alexandria hindred it, who for the opinion that they had of themselves did fight stoutly (for they were accounted to have been the most valiant of all in this battell) till such time as the Emperour with certain selected horsemen, came and set violently upon the enemies: and he himself slew 12. men that did resist him, for whose deaths the rest fearing fled, and were forced to retire themselves into the city, and so saved the engines from being fired. It chanced that one of the Iews was in this fight taken alive, and Titus commanded that he should be crucified before the wall, that perhaps the rest being herewithall terrified might yeeld. After Cæsar was retired, John the Captain of the Idumæans talking upon the wall with one of his friends, being stricken in the breast with an arrow by an Arabian souldier, presently died: which caused great lamentation among the Iews, and sorrow amongst the seditious, for he was valiant of his hands, and very wise and of good advice. CHAP. VIII.

Of the fall of the tower: and how the two wals were taken.

THe night following, there was a great tumult amongst the Romanes. For Titus the Emperour had commanded to be builded three towers, 50 cubits high apiece, each one upon a severall mount, that from thence he might the more easily beat the enemies from off the walls: but one of these towers in the middest of the night fell down without any assault. And making a great noise with the fall, fear fell upon the whole army; who suspecting that it came to passe by some stratagem wrought by the Iews, every one ran and armed himself, and so there was a great tumult in the army: and for that no man could tell what the matter was, a long time, they stood as it were all amazed, every one asking his fellow what had hapned. And seeing no enemies come, they began to fear some treason amongst themselves; and so were in a great fear they knew not wherefore, till such time as Titus understanding the matter, caused the truth thereof to be presently proclaimed thorowout the camp; and so the tumult (although with much ado) was appeased. M

The

A The Iews valiantly bearing and induring all other dangers, were ſore troubled by reaſon of theſe towers which Titus had erected; for they were ſlain and wounded from thence with ſmall engine ſhot, darts and arrows; neither could they build themſelves any ſo high, nor was there any hope to deſtroy them: for neither could they be thrown down for their vveight, nor fired, becauſe they vvere covered vvith Iron: and ſo they flying out of the reach of the ſhot, did not ſeek to hinder the ram from battering their vvalls; vvhich never ceaſing at laſt prevailed ſomewhat. So the great ram, which the Iews called Nicon, becauſe it overcame all, at laſt battered the wall; and the Iews being weary with fighting, for that they had watched all the night before, for ſloth, or elſe becauſe they perſwaded themſelves that the B wall was ſuperfluous, they having two more beſide it, they all forſook their quarters, and retired themſelves unto the ſecond wall; and the Romanes entred the firſt, that the ram called Nicon had battered. Then the Romanes that had paſſed and entred the firſt wall, went and opened the gates and let in the whole army. Having thus gotten the wall the ſeventh day of May, they deſtroyed the greateſt part thereof; and alſo the North ſide of the City which before Ceſtius had waſted.

Titus removed his camp from thence, and went unto the place called the Aſſyrians camp, and ſeized upon all between that and Cedron; and being without the ſhot of an arrow from the ſecond wall, he began again to aſſault it. Then the Iews dividing the wall betwixt C them to defend each others part, they reſiſted moſt valiantly. And John and his partakers defended all Antonia, and the North part of the Temple from Alexanders tomb: and Simon defended all from Johns tomb unto the gate by the tower Hippicos. And many times iſſuing out at the gates, they fought hand to hand with the enemy, being alwaies repulſed by the diſcipline of the Romanes, onely for want of knowledg in warlike affairs; and ſtill in all fights upon the wall they got the beſt: for the Romanes were aſſiſted by fortune and knowledge, and the Iews with deſperate boldneſſe which came of fear; for they are of ſtout courage in adverſity. Moreover, the Iews were moved to fight, in hope that way to ſave their own lives: and the Romanes to get a ſpeedy conqueſt. Neither party was weary, neither did they ever ceaſe from aſſaulting one another: all the day long the Iews in whole compa- D nies made excurſions againſt the Romanes, and they omitted no kind of fight, beginning at Sun-riſe, and continuing all night long, farre more terrible to them both then in all the day before: the Iews feared leſt that the Romanes ſhould get the wall; and the Romanes likewiſe miſdreaded that the Iews ſhould invade their camp. Thus ſtill all night long being armed, early in the morning they were prepared again to fight. The Iews did one ſtrive with another who ſhould undergo the moſt danger, and ſo deſerve his Captains favour. Simons followers did greatly reverence and fear him, inſomuch as if he ſhould have commanded any of them to have killed himſelf, he would preſently have done it. The Romanes were encouraged to fight, by their wont and cuſtome in getting the victory, and that they were not wont to be overcom: again, their frequent and daily warres and continuall exerciſes, E and large dominions gave the like courage, and eſpecially Titus their Generall ſtill preſent, in all their affairs greatly ſtirred them forward: for every one thought it a hainous crime to be a coward in the preſence of ſuch a Captain as Caſar was. Ceſar himſelf beholding and looking on, who alſo was a witneſſe of their deeds that behaved themſelves valiantly, would reward every man for his valour: beſide that, it was advantage to be eaſily known unto the Prince for a valiant man: ſo that many of them ſhewed that their alacrity was farre greater then their ſtrength. At this time Longinus one of the horſemen coming out of the Roman army, preſſed into the midſt of the Iews forces, and caſting them down that ſtood in his way, by this violence he ſlew two of the ſtrongeſt of the enemies amongſt them, ſtriking one of them over the face, and ſlaying the other with his own dart he took from him: who F for this deed was greatly honoured, having broken thorow a ſtrong army of the Iews, that were placed before the walls, and caſt darts at him on either ſide. Many of the Romanes by this his example were inticed to do the like. The Iews now regarded not what they ſuffered, but onely deviſed which way to harm their enemy; nothing eſteeming death, ſo that they might kill ſome one of the Romanes. But Titus had as much care to preſerve his ſouldiers, as he had to get the victory; affirming theſe raſh aſſaults to proceed of deſperation: and that onely was to be accounted for vertue, when one did warily not indanger himſelf to atchieve any worthy action, and willed them rather to ſhew themſelves men where there was no danger.

How Castor the Jew derided Romanes.

THen Titus commanded the ram to be set up against the tower on the North part on the City, wherein a crafty and politike Iew accompanied with ten men had hid himself, all the rest being fled: this Jew was named Castor. These men having lien still a while there in their armour, at last being afraid, and the tower beginning to shake, they start up: and Castor stretching forth his hand, did as it were humbly crave favour at Cesars hands, and with a lamentable voice besought him to spare him. Titus seeing the mans simplicity, as he thought, and perswading himself that the Jews did now repent them of their enterprize, he caused the ram to cease from battery, and the archers to hold their hands; and withall permitted Castor to speak his pleasure. Castor said, that he desired to come and make a league of peace. And Titus answered, that he would grant it, if so be all the rest would do so likewise; and that he would presently confirm a league of peace between him and the city. Five of Castors fellows seemed to be willing, and to requeast the like; but the other five counterfeited to withstand them, crying out aloud, that they would never be slaves to the Romanes, seeing they might die in liberty. Whilest Castor and his fellows were debating the matter, the battery ceased. In the mean time Castor privily sent word unto Simon, willing him whilest the battery ceased, to deliberate what was expedient to be done in this necessity: for he a while would deceive the Romane Emperour, and hold him in suspence. And in the mean time he seemed to exhort his companions, that denied to embrace the kind offer of Titus: and they as it were angry hereat, drew their swords and stroke upon their corslets; and they so stricken seemed to fall down, as though they had been slain. Titus and his souldiers were amazed at this their obstinacy, for being on the lower ground, they could not well perceive what was done: and so they wondred at their desperation, and also pitied their calamity. At this time one struck Castor in the buttock with a dart, and Castor pulling it out of his flesh; shewed it unto the Emperour; and complained of it, as being injured. Titus presently with sharp words corrected him that shot it, and forthwith would have sent Joseph to promise Castor pardon and peace. But Joseph denied to go, affirming that Castor onely dissembled, and so hindered his friends that would have gone. At last one Aeneas, who had fled unto the Romans, offered himself to go. Castor invited him, as though he would give him something in token of his true meaning. Then Aeneas opened the skirt of his garment, thinking Castor would have cast him down something of worth: and when he came underneath the tower, Castor took a great stone and threw it down upon him; yet hurt him not, because he was aware of it, and avoided the stone; but it wounded another souldier standing by. Then Cæsar considering this deceit, began to think that piety and mercy in wars was hurtful, and that cruelty was not so easily deceived; and so being very angry at this deceit, he caused the wall to be beaten with the ram more then before. Castor and his fellows perceiving the tower to shake, they set it on fire, and so passed thorow the flame, and conveighed themselves into a mine of the tower; so that again the Romanes admired their courage, thinking that they had burned themselves.

Castor a subtile and politike Iew.

Mercy in wars hurtfull.

Titus assaulting the wall on his part, took it five daies after that he had taken the first; and causing the Jews to fly from thence, he accompanied with a thousand chosen men about him, entred in where the woolmen, and copper-smiths, and merchant-tailours dwelt, which place was the new city, having onely narrow and streight waies to go unto the wall. And had he presently beaten down a great part of the wall, or according to the laws of arms destroyed what he had gotten, he had obtained the victory without any losse on his side. Yet now hoping the Iews would yeeld, seeing that if he pleased he might take them by force, he gave the more ample and easie passage to retire: for he did not think that they whose good he sought, would have been traitors unto him.

Titus taketh the second wall.

CHAP. X.

How the Romanes did twice take the second wall.

WHen Titus was entred the city, he suffred none of them that were taken, to be slain, nor the houses to be burned, but permitted the seditious (if they were so minded) to fight, and that without the prejudice of the people: and also promised the people to restore unto them all their goods. For many besought him to spare the City for them; and the Temple

A Temple for the city. The people were glad hereof: and many of the warlike Iews thought the humanity of Titus to proceed from cowardize; and judged that Titus, for that he despaired to winne the reſt of the city, did now coward-like propound theſe conditions. They likewiſe threatned all the people, that whoſoever ſhould ſpeak one word concerning peace and yeilding unto the Romanes, ſhould preſently die: and ſome of them did reſiſt the Romanes from out of their houſes, and others in the narrow waies: and others going out at the higher gates, began a battell; wherewith the watch men being ſore troubled, fled from the wall, and forſaking the towers, they retired themſelves into the camp. The Romane ſouldiers within the city cryed out, becauſe they were incloſed with enemies, the gates being ſhut, and aſſaulted without, by thoſe who apprehended their companions to be in great danB ger. The number of the Iews encreaſing, and prevailing, for that they knew the waies and turnings of the ſtreets, many of the Romanes were ſlain, and violently born down, when they offered to reſiſt in that neceſſity: for a multitude together could not flye, by reaſon of the narrowneſſe of the ſtreets, that went unto the wall: and all that entred into the city had been ſlain, had not Titus ſuccoured them. For placing at the beginning of every ſtreet archers, and himſelf being where moſt need was, he ſo did drive away the Iews with darts and arrows: and with him Domitius Sabinus, who in that fight was proved a ſtout warriour; who ſo long continued beating the Iews with arrows, till all the ſouldiers were eſcaped away.

The Romanes are driven out by the Iews.

Thus the Romanes having got the ſecond wall, were beaten from it again: And the citizens fit for war, were hereat encouraged, and were drunken with this good fortune, thinking that now the Romanes durſt no more offer to come into the city, and that they could C not be overcome, if they did arm themſelves to fight. For God, becauſe of their iniquity had darkned their underſtanding, ſo that they never conſidered that the Romane forces were farre greater then they that were overcome, nor the famine that preſently inſued: for as yet they lived upon the deſtruction of the people, and drank the blood of a citie: but the good did even now ſuffer famine, and many of them had already periſhed for want of food: yet the ſeditious did rejoyce at the death of the Citizens, as though thereby they were eaſed of a great burthen, onely deſiring their lives that bare rebellious mindes, and would joyn with them againſt the Romanes, rejoycing at the death of the reſt, as free from a heavy clogge: and this was the affection they bare unto their Citizens. And ſo they armed themſelves and reſiſted the Romanes, who now again did attempt to enter the breach: and they threw down ſtones and part of the wall upon them as they came up, and ſo drave them back D again, and valiantly reſiſted them for three daies. But the fourth day they were not able to withſtand Titus his aſſault, but were forced to retire, as before: and he having gotten the wall, deſtroyed all the North part thereof, and placed a garriſon in the towers and fortreſſes of the South part.

CHAP. XI.

Of the mounts raiſed to batter the third wall: and a long Oration of Joſephus to perſwade the people to yeild: and of the famine in the City.

E TItus now determined to batter the third wall, and he thought to continue the ſiege but a ſhort time: and that it was convenient to give the ſeditious ſome time to bethink themſelves, to ſee if that either by the taking of the ſecond wall, or terrified with famine, they would repent. For now there were no more preys for them left in the City, and he lay before the walls thereof, even as he deſired. And the time being come, that every ſouldier ſhould receive victualls and proviſion for himſelf, Titus cauſed them to be led every one in order into a place, where the Jews in the city might preſently behold them, and cauſed his captains to diſtribute money to every one: and the ſouldiers (as their cuſtome is) all armed, and drawing their ſwords out of their F ſheathes, marched along, the horſemen leading their horſes gallantly adorned, and a great part of the ſuburbs gliſtered with gold and ſilver, This ſpectacle was gratefull to their own ſouldiers, and terrible to the Iews: for all the old walls, and the North part of the city, and many houſes were filled with the multitude of them, who came to view this ſight: and there was no part of the city that was not filled with people to ſee and behold it. And fear came upon the very boldeſt amongſt all the Jews, ſeeing both the Romanes armour and their order: and perhaps that ſhew would have cauſed the ſeditious people to have relented, had they not deſpaired to have found mercy and pardon at the Romanes hands for their offences committed; and so they thought it better presently to be slain in warres, then to be put to death shamefully, if they desisted from fight. Destiny also hindred this, whereby it was decreed that the innocent should perish with the wicked, and the city with the seditious, and for four daies space they distributing necessaries unto the souldiers; and on the fifth day Titus perceiving that for ought he could do, the Jews were still obstinate, he divided his army into two parts, and about Johns tomb he began to raise mounts, and against Antonia, hoping that waies to take the higher part of the City: and by Antonia to seize the Temple; which except he could effect, he could not safely take the City: and against either of these places he raised two mounts, every legion making one. The Jews and Simons folowers did hinder the work that was begun before Johns tomb, and John likewise with a great number of the Zealous hindred them that made the mounts over against Antonia: who not onely did fight with the advantage of the higher ground, but also had now learned the use of engines: for continuall use by little and little made them skilfull, and they had 300 engines called Balistaes: and 40 engines to cast stones, wherewith they greatly annoyed the Romanes, and hindred them from their work.

The yeer of the world, 4034. after Christs nativity, 72.

Destiny had decreed that the innocent should perish with the nocent, and the city with the seditious.

The Romanes in their l bour are h ndred by the Iews.

Titus, foreknowing that fortune would favour him, and that the city was like to perish, hasted to take it, never ceasing to perswade the Iews to yeild: and with his deeds he joyned counsell. For he knew that many times words prevail more then violence of arms, and exhorted them to save themselves, and yeild the city unto him: and told them of Joseph, how that he should make a speech unto them in their own language, for he hoped that they would, hear their own countreymen.

Titus bounty towards the Iews.

Then Joseph, going about the City without the danger of shot, cried unto them to spare themselves, the city, the Temple, the people, and not become more heard-hearted unto them then strangers were. For the Romanes did reverence the holy places, notwithstanding they had no society, or portion in them; and how even till this day they had abstained from violating them: and they who were nourisht with them, and might onely save them, did wilfully cause their destruction: and bad them consider that their strongest walls were battered down; and onely now the weaker remaining unbattered, he willed them to consider, how they were not able to withstand the Romanes forces. And that it was no news to the Jews, nor strange, to be subject unto the Romanes. For although it be a good and commendable thing, to fight for liberty, yet that was to be done in the beginning: for he that was once subject, and would rebell, having a long time lived under the obedience of the Romanes, seemed rather to be desirous of a shamefull death then a lover of liberty. Moreover, that they should disdain to be subject unto base people, and not unto them whom the whole world obeyed. For (said he) what place have not the Romanes that may be inhabited? Nay themselves might perceive how fortune did still favour them: and that God who guided the Empire to be placed in all parts, was now in Italy. Also that even by the law of nature, as well by the example of beasts as men, we are taught to give place unto them that are stronger then our selves, and be contented that they should get the victory that are valianteſt in arms. And this (quoth he) was the cause that your ancestors, who were farre more strong and politike then you, and had better means to resist; yet did they submit themselves unto the Romanes: which if God had not been pleased withall, he would never have permitted them to have done. And how could they hope to resist, seeing the city was as it were already taken? And that the Citizens supposing their walls were whole, yet were they all destroied. For the Romanes well knew what famine was amongst them, and how it did every day waste the people, and would also in short time destroy the warriours amongst them. For suppose that the Romanes would cease, and not besiege the city, nor offer with drawn swords to assault it: yet is there a civill warre within the City, which the Jews cannot overcome or avert, it every day increasing: except they would also fight against hunger, and they alone overcome adverse fortune. Further, he added, that it was best, before intolerable calamities, befell them, to change their opinion, and whilest they have time, to be counselled by good advice; and that the Romanes would not punish them for that which was already past, except they persisted obstinate even unto the end. For they are (quoth he) kind, courteous, and gentle to their subjects, and do preferre their commodity before revenge. And they thought it advantage to have the City, and the countrey inhabited; therefore the Emperour would make a league of peace with them: but if he took the City by force, he would not spare one, especially seeing that they were willed by him to save themselves, and yet in their greatest necessity refused to obey him. Likewise he told them that the third wall would also be taken very shortly, as well they might perceive by the two walls: and suppose that the City was inexpugnable, yet the famine would cause it to be yeilded into the Romanes hands in despite of them.

Iosephs Oration to the Iews.

Fortune and God for the Romanes.

Famine in the City.

As

A As Joseph did thus advise them, many standing upon the walls did rail against him, many upbraided him, and others shot at him. Joseph seeing he could not avert them from their imminent calamities, recounted unto them all their own Histories making for his purpose. "O "wretches (quoth he) and ungratefull to them that help you! you fight against the Romans, "and bear arms against them, as though this way you had conquered some others that came, "as they now do, against you. When doth God the maker of all things deny help unto us if "we be oppressed? Will you not remember your selves? For what cause did you enterprise "these warres, and how great a friend and assister of yours do you daily offend? Do ye not re- "member the miraculous works of your ancestors, and this holy place, and how in times past "it was by the enemies destroyed? but I quake and tremble to recount the works of God to B "such unworthy hearers: yet hearken, that you may know that you do not only resist the Ro- "mans, but also God himself. Nechias at that time King of Egypt, who also was called Pharao, "came, & with an infinite army took away Queen Sara, the mother of our nation. And what "did our first father Abraham in this case? Did he with weapons & arms revenge this injury? "having under his command three hundreth and eighteen Captains, and under them an infi- "nit multitude? Or did he rather desist from warre, perceiving God not to accompany him? "wherefore lifting up pure and undefiled hands towards this holy place, which now you have "defiled and prophaned, he chose God an invincible helper to aid him. And was not the "Queen the second night after sent home again unto him untouched? And the Egyptian "adoring this holy place, which ye have polluted with murders of your own nation, & trem- "bling at the visions he saw in the night time, fled, rewarding the Hebrews with gold & sil- C "ver, whom he perceived to be so beloved of God. Shall I recount unto you the going of our "ancestors into Egypt? who having for four hundreth yeers been slaves unto the Egyptian "Tyrants and Kings, and able to have revenged themselves by force of arms, yet did they ra- "ther expect and stay Gods leisure. Who knoweth not, that then Egypt in revenge of the "Hebrews, was filled with all kinds of serpents, and infected with all diseases, and the earth "became so barren, that Nilus waxed dry, and the ten plagues followed one another without "ceasing; whereby our ancestors were safely delivered without any bloodshed: for God con- "ducted them, as willing to reserve them for his Priests?

"When the Assyrians had taken away from us the holy Ark, did not Palestina and Dagon re- "pent that fact? did not all the nation of them that took it, weep and lament therefore? For D "their privie parts being putrified, their bowels and the meat they did eat ranne out there; "and so with unclean hands they were forced to bring it back again, with cymbals and trum- "pets: thereby to make satisfaction for their offence. It was God that did this for our ance- "stors, because that they laying their arms aside, wholly resigned themselves to his pleasure. "Was Senacherib King of Assyria, coming with all his power out of Asia, & incamping him- "self before this Citie, overcome by humane force? Did not our ancestors leaving arms, flie "to prayers, and by an Angel God in one night destroyed an infinite army? And the next day "the Assyrian rising, found a hundred fourscore and five thousand of his men dead, and so fled "with the rest from the Hebrews being unarmed, and not pursuing him? You know also, that E "in the captivity of Babylon, where the people lived the space of seventy yeers, they got not "their libertie, till such time as God put in Cyrus heart to suffer them to go into their own "country. Who still assisting them, they again as the Priests in old time were wont, did serve "and reverence their helper. In brief, our ancestors did never atchieve any great matter by "force of arms, neither did they leave any thing undone, wherein they expected Gods help, "but still remaining quiet at home, they overcame their enemies through his providence: & "when they did fight after their own wills, they alwaies failed of their expectation For when "Zedechias our King, contrary to the admonition of the Prophet Jeremy, did go forth, and "fight with the King of Babylon then besieging the city, both he and all his were taken, and "this city destroied. Yet consider how far your captains are inferiour unto that King, & your "selves unto the people of those times. For Jeremy crying up and down the city, and saying F "that God was offended at their iniquity, and that except they did yeild the same, it should "be taken by force; yet did not the King nor any of the people lay hands upon him. And you "(that I may omit your iniquity, done within the Citie, which though I would, I could not suf- "ficiently discipher) do attempt to kill me, and using railing speeches against me, who once "gave you wholesome counsell for your good; onely for that I put you in mind of your sins, "you not enduring to hear of that which you daily commit. This same betided also when "Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes besieged the citie, God being highly displeased at our ance- "stors, who going out in armes against him were all slain, the town spoiled, and this holy "place for three yeers & six moneths made desolate. What should I shew unto you any more

"it not proceed from the sedition of our ancestors, when the fury of Aristobulus and Hircanus

Joſeph crying thus unto them with tears trickling down his cheeks, the ſeditious were nothing moved, but told him that it was not faſetie for them to yield. But the people were perſwaded to flie: and ſome ſelling their poſſeſſions and that they had for ſmall prices, they did ſwallow down the gold, for fear the thieves ſhould take it from them. And ſo when they B had eſcaped unto the Romans, they emptying their bellies found it again, and ſo had money to buy them neceſſaries. Titus alſo permitted many to go away whitherſoever they pleaſed: which thing cauſed divers to flie, ſeeing that thereby they were delivered out of their calamitie, which in the Citie they abode, and were not forced to ſerve the Romanes. But John and Simon were as diligent to ſtop the waies, leſt the Citizens ſhould eſcape, as they did hinder the Romans from entring into the Citie: ſo that whoſoever did but give any ſuſpition of flight, he was preſently by them put to death. The richer ſort, whether they ſtaied or fled, were ſlain for their wealth and poſſeſſions. The famine of the Citie, and the deſperation of the thieves both increaſed alike, everie day more and more; ſo that now there was no more C corn found. Wherefore the ſeditious perſons brake into the houſes, and ſearched everie corner for to find corn; and if after their ſearch they found any, then they did beat the owners for denying it at the firſt: and if they found none, they tortured the houſholders, as having more cunninglie hidden it. And whoſoever was yet ſtrong of body, and well liking, him they preſently killed; for hereby they deemed him to have ſtore of food, or elſe he ſhould not have bin in ſo good plight of bodie as he was. And they that were pined with famine, were by theſe barbarous ſeditious people ſlain, who eſteemed it no offence to kill them, who would ſhortlie after die though they were left alive. Manie both rich & poor ſecretlie exchanged all that they had for one buſhel of corn, and preſentlie ſhutting themſelves in the ſecreteſt room of their houſe, ſome of them did eat the corn as it was, unground: others, made D bread thereof as neceſſitie and fear required. A wonderfull famine in the City.

The argument of ſtore of meat.

Moſt miſerable was this maner of living, and a ſpectacle which none without teares was able to behold; for the ſtrongeſt ſtill got the moſt, and the weakeſt bewailed their miſerie: for now famine was the greateſt calamitie they indured. And nothing doth arm men more then ſhame; for during this famine, no reverence was had towards any man: for wives took the meat even out of their husbands mouths, and children from their Parents, and mothers even from their infants, which was the moſt lamentable thing of all. No body had now any compaſſion, neither did they ſpare their deareſt infants, but ſuffered them to periſh even in E their armes, taking from them the very drops of life. Yet could they not eat thus in ſuch ſecrecie, but preſently ſome came to take away from them that whereon they fed. For if in any place they ſaw any door ſhut, preſently hereupon they conjectured that they in the houſe were eating meat, and forthwith breaking down the doors they came in; and taking them by the throat, they took the meat already chewed, and readie to be ſwallowed down. The old men were driven away, and not permitted to keep and defend their food from being taken from them: the women were drawn up and down by the hair of the head, for that they hid between their hands ſome part of their meat, and would not forgo it. No pity was now remaining, neither to old age nor infancy, but they took young babes eating, their mouth full of meat, and not permitting it to be taken out of their mouthes, and threw them againſt the F ground. Now if any one had prevented theſe theeves, and eaten their meat before they could come at them, then they were more cruel; and the other ſo much more tyrannouſly handled, as having committed ſome greater offence againſt them, They alſo deviſed moſt barbarous and cruel torments to extort food from others: for they thruſt ſticks or ſuch like into the cavity of mens yards, and ſharp thornie rods into their fundaments: and it is abominable to hear what the people endured to make them confeſſe one loaf of bread, or one handful of corn which they had hidden.

A miſerable kind of living and a ſpectacle of great compaſſion.

The ſouldiers enter the houſes, and take the meat unchewed out of the Citizens mouthes.

Theſe miſcreants did not yet for all this feel either hunger or thirſt: for then theſe their impieties had been more tolerable; but they did it onely to exerciſe their cruelty, preparing ſix dayes food for themſelves aforehand. Wherefore meeting ſuch as had eſcaped the Romane watch in the night, and gone into the fields to gather weeds or herbs, when they again came into the City, and thought they had now eſcaped the danger of their enemies; they there took took from them the herbs they had gotten with the hazard of their lives, denying to give them any ſmall part of that, for which they had undergone ſuch danger: and they required them for Gods ſake to do it, yea they thought it a benefit, if being thus robbed and ſpoiled, they did not alſo periſh by the ſwords of theſe miſcreants. Theſe calamities the baſer ſort of people endured at the hands of the common ſouldiers: but the Nobles and chief men of the city were led unto the tyrants, and accuſed before them of betraying the City unto the Romanes; and ſo by ſome forged treaſon or other put to death. And many times their ſuborned accuſers would teſtifie againſt them, that they purpoſed to flye unto the Romanes. And thoſe that Simon robbed, he ſent unto John; and thoſe that John ſpoyled, he ſent unto Simon: and ſo they did as it were one drink unto another the blood of the people, and divide their dead carcaſſes between them; inſomuch that they diſagreed onely for their deſire of rule and domination: but both conſpired to do miſchief and commit iniquity. For he that did not give to the other part of that which by cruelty he had extorted from the miſerable Citizens, was accounted impious: and he that received not part, did now grieve as ſuſtaining loſſe, in not having a ſhare in cruelty and impiety.

The yeer of the world, 4034. after the nativity of Chriſt, 72.

The honourable and rich are drawn before the tyrants.

The diſſenſion between John and Simon was for rule, their concord was in wickedneſſe.

I am not able to recount all their iniquities: but briefly, I think that never any City endured the like, nor never any people ſince the memory of men were ſo cruel and barbarous: and finally, to the intent that their impiety unto ſtrangers might ſeem the leſſe, they ſpake evill of the nation of the Hebrews, and curſed them, and openly confeſſed themſelves to be ſlaves, people of divers countries, united together in wickedneſſe, baſtards and abortives of their nation. They overthrew the City, and forced the Romanes (though againſt their wills) to accept of this ſorrowful and heavy victory, and almoſt drew the fire into the Temple, as though it ſtayed from it too long. Neither did they weep or lament, when they ſaw the higher part of the City on fire; but many among the Romanes did with ſorrow behold that ſight which we will ſpeak of hereafter, where we will deſcribe the event of that buſineſſe.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Jews that were crucified, and the Rampiers burnt.

THe mounts and Rampires that Titus built, did greatly advantage him: and although his ſouldiers endured ſome loſſe by the Jews who were upon the wall, yet he ſent part of his horſemen, and commanded them to lay wait for the Jews that came out of the city into the vallies to fetch food: and amongſt them were alſo ſome fighting men. For now that which they could rob and take from the Citizens, was not ſufficient for all of them: yet the greater part of them were poor people, who durſt not flie unto the Romanes, for fear that ſome harm ſhould thereupon betide their deareſt friend, not enduring to leave them behind to be murthered by the theeves. Famine did now embolden them to go forth of the city; and now it onely remained for them to go forth privily, and be taken by the enemies. And being taken, neceſſity forced them to fight for feare of torments; for they now thought it too late to requeſt mercy: after the fight, they were beaten and tortured all waies poſſible, and then crucified before the city walls. Titus deemed this calamity moſt miſerable: for every day 500. Iews and ſometime more were taken; and yet did he not think it expedient to diſmiſſe ſo great a multitude, nor to keep them who would be as a guard of guards. But the principall point for which he did not hinder this, was, that by this ſpectacle he might terrifie the Iews, and make them fear to ſuffer the like, except they did quickly render themſelves and the city unto him. Wherefore the ſouldiers for a hatred which they conceived againſt our nation, crucified all they took, one after one faſhion, and another after another, in deriſion. And the multitude of the captives was now ſo great, that there remained no more ſpace to ſet croſſes in, nor any more croſſes to crucifie bodies upon. But the ſeditious Iews within the citie were ſo farre from relenting by this maſſacre, that rather their hearts were hereby more hardned; ſo that herewith they terrified the reſt of the multitude: for they carried the kindred of them that had fled unto the Romanes to the walls, and bade them behold how thoſe were uſed that fled unto the Romanes: the ſame ſight they alſo ſhewed unto them that deſired peace; affirming that they whom the Romans had ſo uſed, were thoſe that fled unto them for ſuccour, and not captives by them taken. This terrified manie who deſired to flie unto the Romanes, from effecting their deſire; till ſuch time as the truth hereof was known. Yet ſome preſentlie went boldlie unto the Romans as it were intending to ſuffer death and torment at their hands, accounting that death coming unto them by their enemies hands, was farre more tolerable then the famine they endured.

The poor peoples miſery.

Titus crucifieth many Iews before the walls.

The Iews carried the kindred of thoſe that were fled out of the city to the Romans, and ſhewed them the tortures they ſuffered.

A Hereupon Titus cut off many of the captives hands, and ſo ſent them into the City unto Simon and John, that their calamity might teſtifie them to be captives, and not ſuch as had fled and yeelded unto the Romanes, willing to admoniſh them at leaſt now to yeeld, and not compel him to deſtroy the City: telling that in ſo doing, even now at laſt they ſhould ſave their own lives, countrey, and Temple, which had not the like in all the world: and he continually went about the rampires haſtening the workmen in their buſineſſe, as though he preſently meant to effect that in deeds, which in words he had ſpoken. The Jews that ſtood upon the wals, curſed both him and his father, reviling them, and affirming that they contemned death; and that they did chuſe rather to die, then to become bond-ſlaves: and that whileſt life laſted, they would as much as lay in them harm the Romanes, neither having
B care of themſelves nor of their countrey; which Cæſar ſent them word were both preſently to periſh. Moreover, they ſaid that the whole world was a Temple dedicated to God, far more excellent then that of theirs, which notwithſtanding ſhould be conſerved by him that dwelt in it; whoſe help they alſo enjoying, would deride all his threatnings, which could not come to paſſe, God being the end of all. And thus opprobriouſly they exclaimed againſt the Romanes.

The yeer of the world, 4034. after Chriſts nativitie. 72.

The Iews both curſe Cæſar and his father.

At this time arrived alſo Antiochus Epiphanes, and with him many armed men; and beſide them, guarded with a company called the Macedonians, who were of like age; and little older then young men, in their youth all trained up in arms, and armed after the Macedonian manner, whereof alſo they took their name: yet for the moſt part not able to anſwer the C expectation that men had of the Macedonians. For the King of Comagene was the moſt fortunate and happie of all Kings that were ſubject unto the Romane Empire, till ſuch time as he felt the frown of Fortune: who in his aged years ſhewed that none ought to be accounted happy before his death: he yet flouriſhing, his ſon (ſaid he) marvelled that the Romanes did delay ſo long to aſſault the City, & entered the battered wals (for this young man was a fine warriour, and of exceeding ſtrength, to the which he truſted too much, ſo that he did many things raſhly.) Titus hereat ſmiled, and anſwered, that that was a labour not onely for the Romanes, but for all in common. After he had ſaid thus, preſently this young man Antiochus, as he was accompanied with his Macedonians aſſaulted the wall, and himſelf with his ſtrength and dexterity avoided the darts of the Iews, and caſt his darts at them: but all
D his young men (onely a few excepted) were there ſlain: for aſhamed of their boaſting ſpeeches, they continued longer in fight then it was expedient for them: at laſt, many being wounded retired themſelves, now perceiving the Macedonians to win a victory had need of Alexanders fortune. The Romanes the twelfth day of May, began to build their rampires: and labouring full ſeventeen whole dayes, with much ado they ended them the nine and twentieth day of the ſaid moneth. For they builded four moſt huge rampires, one of them over againſt Antonia, which was built by the fifth legion oppoſite to the midſt of the Struthian waters: another was builded by the twelfth legion, twenty cubits diſtant from the other. But the tenth legion, which was of more account then the two former, erected a mount oppoſite to the pond called Amygdalon on the North ſide: and the fifteenth legion made the

The mounts being thus finiſhed, John undermined that which was over againſt Antonia, and underpropped it with poſts of wood, and filling the mine with wood, bitumen and pitch, he fired it: ſo the poſts that held it up being burnt, the myne fell, and the mount alſo with a hideous noiſe fell into it: and firſt of all there aroſe a great ſmoak and duſt, for the mynes did cover the flame; at laſt the fire having conſumed the matter that covered it, the flame clearly appeared. The Romanes at this ſudden and unexpected exploit were amazed, being grieved at it: ſo that thereby thoſe who before made account of the victory, as though it had been theirs already, began to deſpair. Two dayes after Simon and his aſſociates did ſet
F upon the other rampires: for thereon were planted Rams, wherewith the Romanes began to beat the wals. Amongſt the reſt, a certain man named Tephæus of Garſus a City of Galilee, and Megaſſarus, one of Queen Mariammes ſervants, and with them one of Adiabena the ſon of Mabatæus, who for his fortune was named Agiras, which ſignified lame: theſe three taking fire-brands, ran unto the Engines, and there was none found in all the Romane army more valiant then theſe men, nor more terrible: for they ran amidſt the throng of their enemies ſo boldly, as though they had gone amongſt their friends, and never made any ſtay, but breaking thorow the midſt of their enemies, they fired their Engines: and notwithſtanding that on every ſide they were aſſaulted with darts and arrows; yet did they not give back, nor ſeek to avoid the danger, till ſuch time as the fire had taken hold of the Engines.

The Romanes began to draw away the Rammes, their shelters being fired. And the Jews amidst the flames sought to keep them there: yet for all this the Romanes saved their Rammes. From thence the fire caught hold of the rampiers, and those that would have prevented it were burned: and the fire so increased, that it could not be extinguished; so the Romans now environed with a flame, and despairing to rescue their works, retired themselves into their camp, and left them on fire. But the Iews were so much the more earnest, their number still encreasing, by new supplies coming out of the Citie: and so encouraged by this their victorie, they rashly adventured unto the Romanes camp, and assaulted the guard there. Which guard H

For the Iews fought with whomsoever they met, and rashly running amongst their enemies pikes, they struck them with their fists. For the Iews prevailed more by their hardinesse, then by their deeds: and the Romanes fled more for the Jews boldnesse, then for anie harm they sustained by them. I

Then Titus came from Antonia, where he had been to veiw a place to build another ram-

The Jews persisted still in the battell, not for that they trusted to their force, or thereby prevailed, but because they were desperate. The Romanes on the other part took courage, and fought stoutlie for shame, and K

So that I think, that had not the Jews retired themselves into the citie, the furie of the Romanes had then consumed the whole multitude. The Romanes were now sorrowfull for the losse of their rampires, who in one hour had lost that, which with such labour and so long time they had been making: and manie of their Engines being now displaced, they despaired to take the City.

Titus now deliberated with his Captains what was to be done; and they that were Titus consulteth with his Captains. most forward amongst them. thought it best with all the whole army to assault the walls: for that as yet the Jews had onelie fought with one part of the armie, but they were not able to withstand the force of the whole army, but would be all consumed with darts and arrows. The wiser sort again perswaded Titus to build rampires: but others counselled the contrary, to hold themselves quiet there, and onely to keep all places about, that no food should be conveighed into the city, and so famish the city, and never fight with the enemy. For that the Jews being now desperate. and desiring to be slain, would not be overcome by force; or if not, to slay others which was worst of all. But Titus thought it a shame to lie there idle with so huge an army, and do nothing; yet he deemed it superfluous to fight with them who would willingly fight to be slain: and he could not make any mounts, because he wanted matter, and it was most difficult of all to guard every place about the citie, that none could go forth, for that it could not be beleaguered round on every side, by reason of the difficult places and huge compasse thereof, fearing also the dangers that so might ensue, the Iews issuing out of the city. For the Iews seeing their open ways all guarded by the Romanes, they would devise some secret waies, both urged thereunto by necessity, and also because they knew all places thereabout very well. And if so be that the Iews should secretly effect any thing to prejudice them, that then their siege was like to continue

A so much the longer: so that he feared that the continuance of time would diminish the glory of his victorie. For though all those wayes might be taken, yet he preferred haste before glory: and if so be he would use celeritie and safetie, that then it was needfull for him to compasse the whole Citie round about with a wall: for so all wayes and passages might be hindred: and so the Jews seeing now no hope of safetie, should either be compelled to yield the Citie, or else be consumed with famine, other wise he could not be in safetie and at quiet; and that so he might erect mounts, having that wall to defend them. And if any one think that work difficult, and not to be atchieved, let him consider that it did not become the Romans to make a base or slender piece of work: and that no man in the world could without labour effect any great matter, but God onely. Having with these speeches encouraged
B his Captains, he caused them to lead the souldiers, and dispose them all in these businesses. The souldiers had as it were some divine force and courage faln upon them: for the Captains, parting the circuit amongst them, not onely they, but the souldiers also did strive who should first effect their part. And every souldier, laboured to please his Decurio, the Decurio to content the Centurion, and the Centurion the Colonel, and the Colonel to please the Captain, and the Captain to please Cæsar, who every day went round about and beheld the work: and so beginning at the place called the Assyrians camp, where he was encamped, he drew a wall all about, even unto the new Citie, and from thence by Cedron and mount Oliver, and so turned toward the South, and enclosed the mountain to the rock called Peristereonos, and the hill next adjoyning thereunto which hangeth over Siloa: and from thence bend-
C ing his work into the West, he brought it down all along the valley of the fountain: from thence ascending to the monument of Ananus the high Priest, where Pompey pitched his Tents, and so brought it about by the North side of the Citie: and comming along unto the village called Erebinthonicus, he compassed the monument of Herod towards the East, and so joyned the wall unto his camp, where he began. This wall was nine and thirtie furlongs about. Without this wall he builded also thirteen Forts, every one ten furlongs in compasse. And all this whole work was finished in three dayes space, which desired moneths to have been builded in: so that the celeritie in the building thereof doth make it scarcely credible. The Citie being thus encompassed with a wall, and guards placed in every fort, Titus himself did still goe round about the first watch, to see all things in good order: the second watch he allotted unto Alexander; and the third unto the Captains of the legions,
D and the watchmen appointed every one in his turn to sleep in: and so all night long some of them went about the Castle.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the famine in Jerusalem: and of the building of the second Rampire by the Romans.

THe restraint of liberty to passe in and out of the Citie, took from the Jewes all hope of safetie; and the famine now increasing, consumed whole households & families and the houses were full of dead women and infants; and the streets filled with the dead
E bodies of old men: and the young men swollen like dead mens shadows, walked in the market place, and fell down dead where it happened. And now the multitude of dead bodies was so great, that they that were alive could not bury them, nor cared they for burying them, being now uncertain what should betide themselves. And many endeavouring to bury others, fell down themselves dead upon them, as they were burying them. And many being yet alive, went unto their graves and there died. Yet for all this calamitie, was there no weeping nor lamentation, for famine overcame all affections. And they who were yet living, without teares beheld those, who being dead were now at rest before them. There was no noise heard within the Citie, and the still night found all full of dead bodies: and which was most miserable of all, the thieves at night came and took a-F way that which covered the dead bodies nakednesse, and went laughing away, and in their bodies they proved their swords, and upon pleasure onely thrust many thorow, yet breathing. Yet if any had desired them to kill him, or to lend him a sword to kill himself, that so he might escape the famine, they denied him. And every one that died, as he was dying, fixed his eyes upon the Temple, and beheld it now with grief, leaving the seditious behinde them. The seditious now not able to endure the stink of the dead bodies that lay corrupted above the ground, first commanded that all such should be buried at the charges of the Citie: at last, finding out place wherein to bury them all, they threw them over the walls into the ditch. When Titus, going about the walls, beheld all the ditch filled with dead mens was not his doing. Such was the estate of the Citie. Now the Romans, when none of the seditious durst make any more excursions, passed their time in joy and mirth: for they neither suffered famine nor sorrow, having abundance of corn, and all other necessaries out of Syria, and the Provinces adjoyning: and many standing before the walls, and shewing their abundance of victuals unto the Jews, did so much more encrease their famine. Yet were not the seditious people moved at these calamities: wherefore Titus pitying the reliques of the Nation, and minding at least to save them that were left alive, hasted to take the Citie, and so he began anew to build mounts, though he scarcely found matter to do it withall. For all the wood near unto the Citie, was consumed in the first works, so that now the souldiers were forced to fetch more wood ninetie furlongs off; and onely against Antonia, were erected in four places, four mounts greater then the former. Cæsar went about and hastened the H workmen, and now shewed the thieves that were fallen into his hands. Yet for all this, they would not repent: and now as it were deprived of their wits and bodies, they used both as though borrowed, and not their own. For neither did any affection move their minds, nor any grief their bodies: for they rent and tore the dead bodies like dogs, and filled the prisons with weak and languishing people,

Of the massacre of the Jews, both within and without the Citie.

Simons cruelty against Matthias and his sons.

AT last, Simon having tormented Matthias, put him to death, notwithstanding, that by I his means he had obtained the Citie. This Matthias was son unto Boethus a Priest, whom the people for his fidelitie towards them greatly esteemed of: who seeing the outrage of the Zealous towards the people, John being now joyned with them, perswaded the people to call in Simon to help them, conditioning nothing with him before, for that they misdoubted no evil. And when he was come into the Citie, he held him for his enemy as well as the rest: notwithstanding, that by his onely advice he was received into the the Citie, as though Matthias had onely done that of simplicitie. Wherefore calling him before the people, he accused him that he did favour the Romans, and so condemned him to die, not suffering him to clear himself; and put to death likewise his three sons with him, for the fourth was before this time fled unto Titus. Matthias requested Simon that he might be put to death before his sons: but Simon, in regard that by his means he had gotten the K Citie caused him to be executed last of all. And so he was killed upon the murthered bodies of his sons, in a place where the Romans might behold him: for so Simon cammanded Ananus his executioner who was the son of Bamadus. This man was the most cruell of all Simons followers; who even when he was to kill Matthias, derided him, asking what they could now help him, to whom he sought to flie; and permitted not their bodies to be buried. After them Ananias a Priest, the son of Masbalus a Nobleman, and chief Secretarie to the Councel, a valiant strong man, and born at Emaus, and with him fifteen of the chiefest men in the Citie were put to death, They took also Josephs father, and kept him in prison, and with the publike voice of a Crier proclaimed, that no man should talk with him, nor visit him, pretending fear of Treason: and whosoever bewailed his estate, were put L to death without any trial. It happened a certain man called Judas the son of Judas, who was one of Simons Captains, seeing this, (who also kept a Tower that Simon committed unto his charge, perhaps moved with compassion towards them that perished without desert, yet, rather fearing his own life) assembled together ten of his most trustie companions, and Said:

Ananus one of the cruellest souldiers about Simon.

Ananias the Priest, with fifteen of the noblest people slain.

Iosephs father taken.

Iudas consultation with his companions.

How long shall we endure these calamities? Or what hope have we of life, in being trusty to a most impious man? Behold how famine doth take our Citie. The Romans are almost within our walls, and Simon is cruel and faithless, even towards them that have well deserved at his hands: with him we are in fear of punishment; if we flie unto the Romans, we shall assuredly be received into favour. M
Wherefore let us deliver the wal unto them, and save our selves and our Citie. Neither can Simon hereby sustain any great loss, in being punished a little sooner, then otherwise he should be, being now desperate of his own health and safetie. The ten men to whom in this manner he brake his mind, agreed hereunto, and so he in the morning sent the rest of his souldiers under his rule into divers places, that they might not perceive his intent, and he at the third houre of the day, standing upon the Tower, called the Romanes. But some of the Romanes proudly contemned their offer, and others scarcely beleeved them, and the rest, made no speed to come. In the mean

A time while Titus with certain armed men came unto the wall, Simon had notice of their intent; and ſo ſpeedily got the Tower, and ſlew them that were within, in the ſight of the Romans, and caſt down their bodies over the wall. And Joſeph going about the wall, and coming thither (for he never ceaſed from requeſting the Jews to remember their eſtate) he was ſtruck upon the head with a ſtone, and ſo amazed with the blow, fell down: who being faln down, preſently the Jewes made excurſions out of the Citie, and had carried him away into the Citie, had not Titus ſent men to defend him: and whileſt they fought, Joſeph was carried away, ſcarcely knowing what was done. The ſeditious with loud cries rejoyced, as having ſlain him whoſe death they chiefly deſired; and ſo they reported within the Citie. Hereupon the people were moſt ſorrowful, verily beleeving him to be ſlain, by whom they had confidence
B to flie unto the Romans.

The yeer of the world, 4034. after Chriſt 71.

Joſeph wounded in the head with a ſtone, & the rumour is ſpread thorow the Citie.

When Joſephs mother, who was in priſon heard this, ſhe ſaid unto thoſe of Jotapata that were her Keepers, that ſhe verily believed it, for that he was never taken alive by the Romans: yet ſecretly unto her maidens ſhe wept, and ſaid, that this benefit ſhe received by having born a ſon, that ſhe could not bury him, by whom ſhe hoped to have been buried her ſelf. But this falſe report did not long grieve her, nor comfort the thieves: for Joſeph was quickly healed of his wound, and recovered; and ſhewing himſelf, he cried out unto them, that ere long they ſhould find that he would be revenged on them for his wound; yet he ceaſed not to exhort the people to obey the Romans, and yield: but the ſeditious, ſeeing him alive were aſtoniſhed, and the people conceived good hope. Many (preſent neceſſitie urging them) leapt over
C the walls, and fled unto the Romans; divers with ſtones going forth under pretence to fight with the Romans, yielded themſelves, who had harder fortune there, then within the Citie; and were now more harmed by plentie of victuals which they found amongſt the Romanes, then with their famine they ſuffered in the Citie: for many became by famine all ſwollen, as though they had the Dropſie, and preſently filling their emptie bodies they burſt; and ſo all died, ſave onely thoſe who being warie, did by little and little accuſtome their bodies to food, which they had long wanted. Yet they who thus eſcaped fel into another grievous misfortune: for one of the Jews that were fled unto the Romanes, was found amongſt the Syrians, gathering gold out of his own dung which he had ſwallowed, as is before ſaid, for that the ſeditious did ſearch all, and take that they could find from them: and there was
D very great ſtore of gold in the Citie, and that was ſold for twelve Atticks, which before was worth twentie five. This device being diſcovered in one, preſently, a report was ſpread all over the whole camp, that the Jews that fled from the Citie, came full of gold. And now the Arabians and Syrians did rip the bellies of their poor ſuppliants, to ſee if they could find any gold or ſilver within them. And I am perſwaded that there was no greater calamitie befell the Jews then this was: for in one night the bellies of two thouſand Jewes were ript. Titus hearing of this crueltie, had cauſed the Authors hereof to have been compaſſed round with horſemen, and ſlain with darts; and had the multitude of offenders been known, many more of them ſhould have been puniſhed, then of the Jews that were ſo murthered. Wherefore, he called together the Leaders of the ſouldiers that came to help him, and the Romane
E Captains (for ſome of the Romans alſo did commit this fault) and ſaid unto them in anger, that if any of his ſouldiers did commit any ſuch acts for uncertain gain, and were not aſhamed that their Armour ſhould be made of gold and ſilver: or if the Arabians in theſe wars againſt ſtrangers did what they pleaſed, and preſently cauſe the infamie of their vile facts to redound unto the Romans; they committing ſuch murthers, and exerciſing their hatred againſt the Jews (for now every one that bare arms under him, were defamed with this vile report) he declared unto them, that ſuch being hereafter found in that fact, ſhould be put to death. Alſo he commanded his own legions to make enquirie, who were ſuſpected among them for this matter, and bring him word thereof. But avarice is not terrified by fear of puniſhment, and cruel people have naturally a deſire of lucre and gain, and no one calamitie may be compared to the deſire of wealth; yet ſometime it is bridled and reſtrained for fear. But now
F God, who had given over the people to perdition, ſuffered all things to be turned to their deſtruction: for that which Cæſar did ſo ſtreightly forbid, was ſtill ſecretly committed againſt the poor Jews that fled for mercy unto the Romans. So that now whoſoever fled out of the Citie, the ſouldiers firſt looking about them, leſt any of the Romans ſhould ſee them, ript their bellies, and ſo got an ungodly and impious bootie; yet in very few did they find that they ſought for; and the moſt of them that were ſlain, had no gold nor ſilver found within them. And this miſchief cauſed many that fled unto the Romans to return again into the Citie.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Sacriledge committed about the Temple, and the dead bodies cast out of the Citie, and of the Famine.

The year of the world, 4034. after Christs Nativity 72.

John falleth to sacriledge, and taketh away many presents out of the Temple.

WHen John could rob no more, nor get any spoil from the Citizens, whom he had robbed of all they had, he presently fell to sacriledge, and took many gifts that were bestowed upon the Temple, & carried away sacred vessels for Divine Service, as Cups, Plates, Tables, and the Cruets of gold that Augustus and his wife sent. So that now a Iew robbed and spoyled the Temple of all gifts, wherewith the Roman Emperors and other Nations had honoured it: affirming unto his associates, that without fear they might use the holy things of the Temple, seeing they fought for God and the Temple. And therefore it was lawful for them to be fed by the riches of the Temple. Moreover, that it was lawful for them to spend the holy Wine and Oyle, which the Priests reserved for Divine Sacrifice: which he distributed in the Temple amongst the multitude, and they without fear were anointed therewith, and drank thereof. I will not cease to speak that which grief compelleth me. I verily think, that had the Romanes forborn to have come against these seditious, that either the Earth would have swallowed the citie up, or some deluge have drowned it, or else the thunder and lightening which consumed Sodome, would haue light upon it: for the people of the Citie were farre more impious then the Sodomites. In brief, by their desperation and obstinacie, the whole Nation was extinguished. What need I recount every particular miserie? Mannæus the son of Lazarus, flying to Titus out of the gate that was committed unto his custodie, and yielding himself unto him, recounted unto Titus, that from the time that the Romanes Army was placed neer the Citie, from the fourteenth day of April, until the first of Iuly, were carried out of that gate he kept, a hundred, fifteen thousand and fourescore dead bodies; yet was he not the keeper of the gate; but being appointed to pay for the burying of the dead at the charges of the Citie, was forced to number the dead bodies. For others were buried by their Parents, and this was their burial, to cast them out of the Citie, and there let them lie. And certain Noblemen flying unto Titus after him, reported that there were dead in the Citie six hundred thousand poor folks which were cast out of the gates, and the others that died were innumerable: and that when so many died that they were not able to burie them, that then they gathered the bodies together in the greatest houses adjoyning, and there shut them up. And that a bushel of Corne was sold for a Talent, which is six hundreth Crowns: and that after the Citie was compassed with a wall, that now they could not go out to gather any more hearbs, many were driven to that necessitie, that they raked sinks and privies to find old dung of Oxen to eat; and so the dung that was loathsome to behold, was their meat. The Romanes hearing this, were moved to compassion; yet the seditious within the Citie, who beheld this miserable sight, were nothing moved, nor repented not, but suffered them to be brought to that calamitie: for their hearts were so blinded by the providence of God, that they could not see what hanged over their heads, and over their Citie.

Six hundreth thousand dead carcasses cast out of the city.

Cow-dung & dirt gathered together is the Iews food.

CHAP. I.

Of the breach made in the wals: and how the mounts were burned: and how Sabinus assaulted the wall.

F THE misery of Jerusalem every day increased, the seditious being by reason of their misery more and more incited against the people: for now the famine was not onely amongst the people, but amongst them also. And it was a miserable sight to see the multitude of dead bodies heaped together in the Citie, from which came a pestilent and infectious smell, so that it hindred the souldiers from making excursions. For they were forced to tread upon dead bodies, as though they were to march a long a field covered with dead carkasses. Having now embrewed their hands in the blood of their Country-men, they prepared to resist and fight with their enemies, and (as it seemeth to me) hereby upbraiding God, in that he so deferred to punish them. For the greatest part of them did now fight more earnestly then before, not for hope of safetie, but as despairing of all. The Romanes though much troubled to get wood to build withall; yet did they in one and twentie dayes finish their Mounts, having cut down all the woods neer the Citie by ninetie furlongs. It was miserable to behold that Countrey and place, before all beset with trees and fertill plants, now to lie plain like a desart, and all cut down: neither was there any stranger that before-time had seen Judæa, and the beautifull suburbs of Jerusalem, who now beholding it, could abstain from tears, or not lament the woefull change so farre different from the former. For now this warre extinguished utterly all signes of beautie: neither could one comming suddenly now know the place, which he well knew before. G

The Jewes upbraided God, in that he so long delayed to punish them.

Judæa desart and desolate.

The Iews and Romans are equally afraid.

When the mounts were ended, both the Romans and the Jews greatly feared the Jews, for that except they were destroyed, their Citie would be presently taken; the Romanes, for that if these were overthrown, they knew not how to erect more, wanting matter: and now their bodies were wearied with labour, and their minds with many griefs and molestations. But the Romanes were more grieved at the calamitie of the Citie, then the Citizens within: for the Jews notwithstanding these miseries, did nevertheless stoutly defend their walls: but the courages of the Romans failed, when they saw that the Jewes policie made their mounts unprofitable, that the strength of the walls resisted the Engines, that the Jews boldnes overcame their strength in fight; and especially, seeing that the Iews having endured such calamitie, famine, and misery, were still more couragious then before: so that they deemed their strength not to be overcome; and that their minds were invincible, who were hardned and encouraged by misery. For who were able to abide their forces in prosperitie, who by adversitie were incited to vertue? Wherefore the Romanes made a stronger watch about their mounts. But Johns followers who were in the Castle Antonia, fearing what might ensue if the wall were battered, prevented it in what they could, before the Rams were set up: and taking firebrands in their hands, they assaulted the Mount; but deceived with a vain hope, they retired themselves. For first of all they seemed to disagree among themselves; so that they came from their walls one after another, and some space between every one; so that they came softly and fearfully; and briefly, not after the manner of the Jews: for they wanted courage, rashnesse, and flocking together at once, which is proper unto all that Nation, and so came more soberly, and with lesse courage then they were wont. They did also finde the Romanes more couragious then of late, who so defended their Mounts with their bodies and weapons, that it was not possible to come and fire them; and every one was fully determined not to shrink out of his place till he was slain. For besides that, if so be that work were destroyed, they had no hope left to build more, they all accounted it a shame that their vertue should be overcome by subtiltie, or their weapons by rashnesse and temeritie, or their skill by a multitude; or the Romanes by the Jews. Also they had Engines to cast darts at them as they came down their walls. And when any one of the Iewes that was slain fell down, he hindred them that followed, and the danger of him that went before, terrified them that came after. They also that rashly adventured within the shot of a dart, either were terrified with the discipline, and multitude of their enemies, or else wounded with their darts: and so they all retired, one accusing another of cowardlinesse, and atchieved nothing. H I K

The Romans most of all fear the desperatenes of the Iews.

The Iews with firebrands set upon the Engines: but losing their hope return back again.

The valour and violence of the Iews decreaseth.

The Iews retire, arguing one another of cowardize.

The first day of Iuly the City was assaulted: and the Iews being now retired, the Romans set up their Rams, notwithstanding, that they were assaulted from Antonia with stones, fire and sword, and what soever their enemies in that extremitie could find. For though the Iews had great confidence in their walls, as that they could not be battered, yet did they not permit the Romans to place their Rams against them. And the Romans being perswaded that the Iews so laboured, because they knew their walls to be weak, and lest Antonia by the breach of the wall should be hurt, did the Romans safely and without danger, (notwithstanding, that many darts were cast at them from off the walls) persist to beat the wall with their Rammes: who being below, and seeing the stones broken with the force of their Engines, they shielded themselves with their bucklers: and so some with their hands pulled the stones out of the wall; some digged under the foundation thereof: and when foure stones with much labour were broken and shaken, the night hindered both parties from doing any more at that time, and in it the wall now shaken with the Ramme (in the place which Iohn had undetermined to destroy the mounts, the myne setling) fell down. So, that fell out otherwise then either part expected: For the Iewes who indeed had cause to be sorrowfull for the myne of the wall, and for that they did not prevent that mischance, were joyfull and coura- L M

The Romans undermine the wall

A couragious, as though Antonia did yet remain firm and strong: And the Romans rejoycing for this unexpected fall, were again dismayed, seeing the other wall that Iohn had built within, yet they judged it easier to be taken then the former; but no man durst ascend it, for that he who first assaulted it, was certain to die. Titus, thinking that by hope and perswasion his souldiers might be encouraged, and knowing, many times promises and exhortations make men forget danger, and sometime to contemn death it self, he called together the most valiant of all his souldiers; and spake thus unto them as followeth:

The year of the world, 4034. after Christs Nativity 72.

No man durst ascend the wall that Iohn built.

Titus exhortation to the most valiant and stronge.

Fellow souldiers, it is manifest cowardlynesse to exhort men to enterprize a thing without danger both in them that are exhorted, and in him that exharts: for exhortations are onely to be used in doubtfull affairs, wherein it is praise-worthie for every man to adventure himself. So that I con-
B fesse it is hard for you to ascend the wall: yet will I shew that it is a glorious death to die in such a fight, and especially, it becometh them that are desirous to winne honour; and that they that first adventure valiantly to do it, shall not go away unrewarded. And first let this move you which terrifieth others, to wit, the patient minde of the Iewes, and their constancie in adversitie. For it is a shame for the Romane souldiers, who in time of peace practice themselves in warlike feates, and are accustomed in time of warre to get the victorie, now to be overcome by the Iewes; and that in the end of the victorie, we having also God to help us: for all our harms proceed from the Iewes desperation; and their destruction and calamitie by Gods favour and your valour is every day increased. For what else is betokened by
C their sedition amongst themselves, their famine, the fall of their walls without our engins to batter them, and the siege it self: then the wrath of God towards them, and his favour towards us? Wherefore it is unseemly for you either to give place to your inferious, or to betray Gods favour and furtherance. Is it not a shame that the Iewes, who, were they conquered, sustained no great reproach, as being accustomed to serve and obey others, should so valiantly contemne death, lest they should hereafter suffer or endure the like; and many times boldly to adventure and make excursions even amongst the middest of us, not for hope they have to overcome us, but onely to shew their valour: and we, who have conquered almost the Earth and Sea, to whom it is an infamie not to be victorious, to lie idle, never making valiant assault upon our Enemies, but being thus armed, to D expect till fortune and famine deliver them into our hands? Especially, seeing that by undergoing a little danger, all will be ours. If we get into Antonia, we have taken the Citie. For suppose that we were then to fight against them that are within the Citie (which I doe not think) we having gotten the higher part of the Citie, being above our enemies head, are then assured of a pefect victorie over them. I omit now their commendations who have been slain in wars, and their immortalitie whom martiall furie hath deprived of this life: and those that do not so think, I pray that they may die of some evil death in peace, whose souls are condemned to be interred with their bodies. For what valiant man knoweth not, that the soul of him that dies in warre, is presently received into the most pure airie Element, and from thence carried and placed among the starres of Heaven, and the good and valiant ghosts doe alwayes assist his posteritie? And that all that in peace do die of some disease and sickneesse, their souls are kept in the bowels of the earth in darkness, notwithstanding, that they be most just and pure: and presently they are forgotten, and their life
E and memorie together with them extinguished. Seeing therefore that we are all certain to die, and that to die by the sword is a more easie death, then to die by any disease, why should we deprive our selves of this opportunitie, seeing that at last we must necessarily forgoe our lives as due debt unto the destinies? And this I have spoken as though it were unpossible to escape with life, you doing your endeavours; yet they that bear the minds of men, can finde means to save themselves even in the greatest dangers. For first of all, that part of the wall that is falne may easily be entred, and the wall new built is not hard to be thrown down: and many of you together enterprizing this work, may one exhort and help another, and your audacitie and courage will quickly daunt the enemies heart, and perhaps may get us the victorie if we get this one
F place without bloodshed. For they will not resist us if we offer to ascend the wall: and let us but effect any one exploit either secretly or openly, and the Iews will never more endure us, though we be but few in number. And I would be ashamed, if I did not so reward him that doth first begin, as to make all that are in our armie to envie his happinesse: and from henceforth I decree, that whosoever escapeth, shall be Governour over them that are now his equals; and who so is slain in this quarrell, I will do him great honour.

The patient minds of the Iews, and their constancie in misfortunes.

The wrath of God against the Iews, is the Romans furtherance.

Titus speaks of the life to come, after a poetical manet

The reward of valiant men.

Titus having thus spoken, the rest of the multitude feared the greatnesse of the danger: but one of them that warred in the companies, named Sabinus, a Syrian born, a man of excellent strength and courage; yet of so small stature, that if one had seen him, they would have deemed him unfit to have been a souldier: for he was of very small stature and of black colour,

but

but he had a mind far bigger then his body, and ſtrength ſcarce able to be contained in ſo little room Sabinus riſing up, ſaid; I offer my ſelf unto thee, O Ceſar, firſt of all to aſcend the wall, and that with a willing mind, requeſting that my fortune may aſſiſt my ſtrength and mind: yet if fortune ſhal hinder my enterpriz, know that I die not againſt my expectation, but that I will gladly give my life for thee. When he had ſo ſaid, he took his ſhield in his left hand, and holding it above his head, with his drawn ſword in his right hand, about the ſixth houre of the day, he went unto the wall: and eleven men followed him, who onely envied his vertue. But Sabinus with a divine fervour of ſpirit went before them all; notwithſtanding, that on every ſide the Jews upon the wall caſt an infinite number of darts at him, and rowld down upon him huge ſtones, which did ſtrike down ſome of the eleven that followed him. But Sabinus, meeting the darts and peſtering arrows, yet did not remit his force, till ſuch time as he had gotten to the top of the wall, and put the enemies to flight: who terrified with his ſtrength and courage, and indeed thinking that more had come up after him, fled. Wherein, who may not juſtly blame Fortune, and accuſe her; as envying at vertuous Acts? For this man failed not of his purpoſe, yet was he ſtricken with a ſtone, and thrown down flat upon his face moſt violently with a great noiſe: ſo that now the Jews ſeeing him alone, and lying on the ground, returned again, and ſhot at him on every ſide: and he kneeling upon his knees, and covered himſelf with his ſhield, did firſt of all revenge himſelf upon his enemies, and wounded many that came neer him, till with wounding them, he was ſo weary, that he could ſtrike no longer; and ſo at laſt, was ſlain with arrows: A man, who for his valour deſerved better fortune, and died as valiantly as his enterprize was couragious. Thoſe that were left of his company, having almoſt gotten to the top of the wall, were ſlain with ſtones, and the reſt being wounded, were carried into the camp. And this was done the third day of Iuly.

How the Romanes aſſaulted Antonia, and how they were driven back from thence by the Jewes.

The Romans invade Antonia.

TWo dayes after, twentie of the watchmen which guarded the Mounts, two horſemen, and one trumpeter, gathered themſelves together: and about the ninth houre of the night, they came by the ruines into Antonia without any reſiſtance: and finding the firſt Watchmen aſleep, they ſlew them and got the wall, and commanded the trumpeter to ſound; by which ſound the reſt of the Watchmen were awaked, and fled for fear, before they ſaw what company of the Romans was gotten upon the wall: and the ſound of the Trumpet perſwaded them, that a great multitude of enemies were come up the wall. Ceſar, hearing the ſound of the trumpet, preſently armed his ſouldiers; and accompanied with his chief Captains, and a company of choſen men, he aſcended the wall. The Jewes fled into the inner Temple, and the Romans alſo brake in amongſt them by the myne that John had made to deſtroy the mounts of the Romans. And the followers both of John and Simon did couragiouſly drive them back: for they thought it the utter ruine of all that the Romans were now gotten into the holy place, which indeed was the beginning of their victory. So they began a ſore fight, even in the very entrance, the Romans ſtriving to get the inner Temple, and the Jews endeavouring to beat them back towards Antonia. And now arrows, darts, and ſpears, nothing availed either part, but they both fought it out at handy blows with ſwords: and in that conflict no man could diſcern on which ſide any one fought; for the ſouldiers on both parts were mingled together, and for the ſtraightneſſe of the place, could not keep their rooms: for there was ſuch a noiſe that no man could hear one another, and many were ſlain on both parts: and the dead bodies of thoſe that were ſlain on both parts: and the dead bodies of thoſe that were ſlain, and their weapons falling with them, did hurt many that trod upon them; and whoſoever had the worſt, preſently cried out pitifully, and the victours ſhouted for joy: neither was their any place to flie, or follow; the fight was ſuch, that now one had the better, and now the other. Moreover, they that ſtood in the fore-front of the battell, were either of neceſſitie to kill or be killed: for there was no void ſpace left between the two Armies. At laſt the Jews courage overcame the Romans skill, and they were all beaten back, (having fought from the ninth houre of the night, unto the ſeventh hour of the day.) The Jewes were encouraged to fight for fear they ſhould be overcome. And that parcell of the Roman Army (for as yet the legions were not come) thought it ſufficient at that time to have gotten the Caſtle of Antonia.

Of the exceeding valour of Julian the Roman ſouldier.

The yeer of the world, 4034. after Chriſts Nativity, 72.

THere was one Julian, a Centurion, born in Bithynia, of good parentage, who (as my ſelf well knew) was moſt valiant of all, both in ſtrength of body and skill, and courageous mind. This Julian, ſeeing now the Romans to have the worſt (ſtanding by Titus in Antonia) he preſently leapt down, and all alone purſued the Jews who had the victo-
B rie, into the inner Temple. And the whole multitude fled, deeming him by his force, and courage, not to have been a man. But he amongſt the middeſt of them, ſlew whomſoever he light on, one of them for haſte caſting down another. So that this his deed ſeemed admirable to Cæſar, and terrible to his enemies. Yet did that deſtiny befall him which no man can eſcape; for having his ſhooes full of ſharp nails, as other ſouldiers have, running upon the pavement, he ſlipt and fell down, his Armour in the fall making a great noiſe: whereat his enemies, who before fled, now turned again upon him. Then the Romans in Antonia fearing his life, cried out: but the Iews many at once ſtruck him with ſwords and ſpears. And he defended many blows with his ſhield, and many times attempting to riſe,
C they ſtruck him down again: yet as he lay, he wounded many; neither was he quickly ſlain, becauſe all parts of his body, which being wounded might cauſe preſent death, were armed, and ſhrunk in his neck a long time till the reſt of his body being cut off, and no man helping him, his ſtrength failed, Cæſar was very ſorrowful to ſee a man of ſo great force and fortitude ſlain in the ſight of ſuch a multitude: and that the place wherein he was, hindered him from helping Julian: and others that might have helped him, durſt not for fear.

At laſt, when Julian had a long time ſtriven with death, and wounded many of them that ſlew him, he was with much ado killed, leaving behind him a renowned memory, not onely amongſt the Romans and Cæſar, but alſo amongſt his enemies. Then the Iews took his dead body, and beat back the Romans, and ſhut them in Antonia. In this battel one Alexas

Ioſephs ſpeech, perſwading the Jews to yield their Citie: and how many of them fled unto the Romans.

AFter that Titus had commanded his ſouldiers to pull down the foundations of Antonia, and make an eaſie entrance for the whole Army: he called Joſeph unto him (for E he underſtood, that day being the ſeventeenth of Iuly, that the Iews were wont to celebrate a certain feaſt to God, which they called Entelechiſmus, and that it was not ſolemnized for want of men; ſo that the people greatly mourned therefore) and again commanded him to tell John that whereof before he had ſent him word, to wit, that if he deſired to fight, he ſhould have libertie to come, with what multitude he pleaſed; ſo that the Citie and the Temple might not both periſh with him, willing him now to deſiſt from prophaning the holy place, and from ſinning againſt God: ſending him alſo word, that if he ſo pleaſed, he would grant him leave to celebrate the feſtivitie which had been now long time omitted, and that by what company he pleaſed. Joſeph, to the intent that not onely John F might hear this offer of Titus, but alſo the reſt of the people, he ſtood in an eminent place, from whence he might be heard, and in the Hebrew tongue he recounted unto the Iewes Cæſars pleaſure, earneſtly requeſting them to ſpare their Countrey, and forbid the fire now ready to take hold of their Temple, and to offer the accuſtomed ſacrifices unto God. When he had thus ſaid, the people were very ſorrowful, and every one held his peace, not knowing what to ſay. But the tyrant John, having uſed many railing ſpeeches againſt Joſeph, at laſt he anſwered, that he need not fear the deſtruction of the Temple and Citie, ſeeing that it belonged to God.

Then Joſeph with a loud voice cried out, *True it is, you have kept it pure and unprophaned for God, and the holy things you have kept inviolate, neither haſt thou committed any iniquitie againſt him, from whom thou expecteſt help, but haſt offered ſolemn ſacrifice unto him. warres? Doſt thou impute theſe offences to the Romans? why? they even now do defend our Religion, and command ſacrifice to be offered, which thou haſt forbidden. Who doth not bewail this unexpected change, and lament our Citie? Strangers and enemies correct thy impietie, and thou a Jew born, and brought up in our law, art more cruel then they. But conſider, John, it is no ſhame to repent thy wickedneſſe in extremitie: and at the laſt caſt, If thou be deſirous to ſave thy Countrey, thou haſt a good example of Jechonias, ſometime King of the Jewes; Who, when the Babylonians warred againſt him, of his own accord went out of the Citie before it was taken, and willingly endured captivitie with all his family and kindred onely, leſt he ſhould betray theſe holy places to his enemies, and behold, the Temple fired. And for this act of his, he is of ſacred memorie among the Jewes, and hath thereby gained immortall credit amongſt all his poſteritie. This is a good example, O John, although danger be at hand: and I will promiſe thee alſo pardon from the Romans, onely remember that I thy Countrey man admoniſh thee, and promiſe this unto the Jewes: behold, who is the Author and Counſeller hereof. God forbid, that ever I ſhould ſo live a captive, that I ſhould not live according to the laws of our Countrey. Yet, thou art again incenſed againſt me, and exclaimeſt on me, and curſeſt me. But true it is, I deſerve worſe then this; who ſeek to perſwade contrarie unto the determination of Gods providence, and ſtrive to ſave them whom his ſentence hath condemned. Who is ignorant of the writings of the ancient Prophets and their Prophecies, now hanging over this wretched Citie? For then it is foretold by them to be deſtroyed, when we murther our own Nation: and now not onely the Citie, but alſo the Temple is full of your dead bodies. Certainly, it is God, God it is that together with the Romans, bringeth in fire to purge this Citie filled with iniquitie.

Joſeph thus crying with tears and lamentations, he could ſpeak no more for ſobbing: And the Romanes compaſſionating his ſorrow and affliction, were aſtoniſhed. But John and his confederates were ſo much the more incited againſt the Romans, and ſought to take Joſeph; yet his ſpeech did move many of the Nobles; and divers fearing the ſeditious watchmen, remained ſtill where they were, making full account both of their own deſtruction, and the ſubverſion of the Citie. Yet ſome there were, who finding opportunitie, fled unto the Romans: amongſt whom were two Prieſts, Joſeph and Jeſus, and three ſons of Iſmael the Prieſt, who was beheaded at Cyren, and four ſons of Matthias the Prieſt, and one of the other Matthias, who eſcaped unto the Romanes before his father was put to death by Simon Giora, with his three ſons, as is before ſaid: and many other Nobles revolted with the Prieſts, whom the Emperour received very courteouſly, and ſent them unto Gophna; knowing that it was a grief for them to converſe amongſt the people of divers maners from them, and willed them to remain there, and promiſed every one of them great poſſeſſions after the warres were ended. So they joyfully departed unto the people appointed: but the ſeditious, for that they were not ſeen, reported unto the people, that they who had fled unto the Romans were ſlain, meaning hereby to terrifie the reſt from fleeing to them: and thus their device a while prevailed, as their former did; and they that fain would, durſt not now flee for fear. But afterward, when Titus recalled them from Gophna, and commanded them to go about the walls with Joſeph, and ſhew themſelves unto the people; then many of the Jewes fled unto the Romans.

And after they had gathered themſelves together, ſtanding all before the Romanes, they beſought the ſeditious with tears, firſt to receive the Romans into the Citie, and ſave their Countrey: or if it pleaſed them not, at leaſt to depart out of the Temple, and to deliver it up unto them. For the Romans durſt not, except neceſſitie urged them thereto, fire the holy Temple. But their malice againſt the Romans encreaſing, and rayling againſt them that had fled unto them, they planted all their Engines to caſt ſtones, darts and arrows upon their holy Porches. So that all the void ſpace about the Temple was filled with dead bodies like a Sepulchre, and the Temple it ſelf reſembled a Caſtle, and they now with their weapons having their hands imbrewed with the blood of their Countrey-men, preſumed to enter into the Sanctuary where none ought to come: and they became ſo injurious againſt their own laws, that look what indignation the Iews ought to have conceived againſt the Romans, if they had ſo prophaned the holy places, the ſame they cauſed the Romanes to have againſt them, for doing the like. For there was not one amongſt the Roman ſouldiers, that did not with reverence behold the Temple, and adore it, and that did not heartily wiſh that the thieves would repent themſelves before it was too late. Moreover, Titus pitying the ſeditious, once again ſpake unto John, and his adherents, ſaying: O ye impious people, have you not invironed the Temple about with a Cloiſter? have not you your ſelves in Greek and our language engraven in Tables, forbidden all men to enter into thoſe limits? did not we licence you to kill any man that ſhould paſs them, notwithſtanding, that he were a Roman? Why, then, ye wicked

A wicked wretches, do you tread upon dead mens bodies within your Temple? Or wherefore have you polluted the Temple with the blood of ſtrangers, and of your countrie men? I call my countrey gods to witneſſe, and him who ſometime dwelt in this place, if ever there were any (for now I am perſwaded there is none;) I call alſo my Army to witneſſe, and proteſt to the Jews that are with me, and to your ſelves; that I will not compel you to violate theſe ſacred things: but that if your Army will depart from this place, that then no Roman ſhall come into theſe holy places, nor commit any thing in contumely of them, but I will preſerve the Temple for you againſt your wills.

Titus in deſpight of the Iews, ſtrives to ſave the Temple.

CHAP. V.

B How the battell was renewed, the Rampiers being again builded, and of the excurſions of the Jews.

Ioſeph having delivered theſe words of Titus to the Jews, the ſeditious thinking that they proceeded not of good will, but of fear, began to be more proud hereat. Then Titus, ſeeing they neither pitied themſelves, nor the Temple, determined again to fight, though very loath ſo to do; yet could he not bring all his Armie againſt them, the room was ſo little. Wherefore out of every hundreth he made choice of thirtie of the ſtrongeſt among them, and over every thouſand he appointed a Colonell, and made Cerealis their Captain or Generall, commanding him at the ninth hour of the night to aſſault the watchmen of the C enemy. Alſo he himſelf would have gone down with them armed; but his friends, and the Captains about him, foreſeeing the great danger he might fall into, would not permit him: affirming, that he might do more good ſitting in Antonia, and encouraging the ſouldiers that fought, then if he ſhould go and endanger himſelf: for every man being in the view of the Emperour, would fight more couragiouſly. Titus was herewith perſwaded, telling the ſouldiers that the onely cauſe he went not with them was this, that he ſtaied behind to view and judge every ones valour and vertue, and to the intent that no one behaving himſelf valiantly ſhould go away unrewarded, nor any coward eſcape unpuniſhed, but that he himſelf would be a beholder of every mans vertue, and a witneſſe thereof, who was their Lord either to reward or puniſh.

Titus choſe thirtie out of every hundreth, moſt ſtrong and able men, and bids them charge the beſieged.

Then went he unto a watch-tower in Antonia, from whence he beheld what was done. D But they whom Titus ſent did not find the watchmen aſleep, as they hoped, but with a crie, aſſaulted the Romanes that came againſt them: and at this noiſe they awaked their fellows, who came in whole companies to aſſiſt them, and made excurſions upon their enemies. So the Romans ſuſtained the violence of their firſt companies: but the ſecond that came, fell upon their own fellowes, and uſed them like their enemies: for no man could know one anothers voice for the noiſe there, neither could one ſee another by reaſon it was night: and moreover, ſome were blinded with fury, ſome with anger, ſome with fear: wherefore every one ſtruck him that met him, without any reſpect. And the Romanes received ſmall damage thereby, becauſe that they were defended with their ſhields, and remembred one anothers watch-word, But the Jews fell on every ſide, ſhewing themſelves raſh as well in E curſions as in their retyring; ſo that many times one of them took the other to be his enemy, every one falling upon him that retyred, as though he had been a Romane, aſſaulting them in the dark. Briefly, more were wounded by their fellows then by their enemies, till day breaking that every one knew his companion; and each one keeping his rank, did then betake themſelves to their darts aud arrows. Neither part gave back, nor was wearied with labour: but many Romanes together and apart, did in the view of the Emperour ſhew their courage, every man accounting that day the beginning of his preferment, if he behaved himſelf valiantly. The Jews fought ſtoutly, both for that they feared their own emminent danger, if they were overcome, and the deſtruction of the Temple: and John ſtanding by, encouraged them to fight, ſome with blows, otherſome with threatnings. They fought moſt commonly F with handy blows; yet fortune often changed: for neither part had either far to flee, or any ſpace to follow them that fled. The Romans in Antonia cried unto their fellows that fought the battell, Now for the hope of victory: preſently encouraging them to ſtand to it, when they began to give back; ſo it was as it had ben a Theater of warre: for Titus, and they with him, beheld all that was done; ſo at laſt, in the fifth hour of the day the fight ceaſed, having continned from the ninth hour of the night, neither party forſaking the place where firſt they began battell, neither any part having the victory. Many Romanes there fought couragiouſly, and amongſt the Jews theſe that follow: Judas, the ſon of Merton; Simon, the ſonne of Joſias; and Jacob, and Simon Idumæans; this, the ſonne of Cathla, but James was the ſonne ſon of Soſa: and all theſe were of Simons company, and of Johns followers Gypthæus and Alexas; and of the Zelous, Simon the ſon of Jairus. But the ſeventh day, the reſt of the Romans pulling down the foundations of Antonia, made a large enterance for the reſt of the Army. And the legions coming unto the wall, preſently began to raiſe mounts, one againſt the corner of the inner Temple, which was ſcituate North and Eaſt: and another againſt the gallery on the North ſide betwixt the two porches: and the other two, one againſt the porch of the Weſt ſide of the outward Temple; the other againſt the North porch. So with much toil and labour they finiſht this work, fetching wood to build it withall one hundred furlongs off. And many times they were endamaged by treacherie, not being wary by reaſon of their victorie: and the Jews deſpairing of themſelves every houre, more and more were encouraged. For many of the horſemen going either to get wood or hay, while they were about it, they took the bridles from off their horſes, and permitted them to feed till they had ended their buſineſſe; and preſently the Jews iſſuing out in Troups upon them, took them away.

Four mounts raiſed neer to the Temple.

The Iews ſurprize the Romans horſes.

Titus ſeeing that this fell out, deemed (as indeed it was) that his mens horſes were ſtolne rather by their negligence, then their enemies valour: wherefore he thought by the ſevere puniſhment of one, to make others look better to their horſes. And ſo he put to death one of the ſouldiers that had loſt his horſe: by whoſe puniſhment the reſt of the ſouldiers being terrified, kept their horſes better. For after that, when they went about any buſineſſe, they never left their horſes in the paſtures, but kept alwayes with them. Thus the Romans aſſaulted the Temple, and builded there mounts. The day following, certain of the ſeditious, who now could get no more booties in the Citie, and now alſo began to taſte of hunger, aſſaulted the Romanes that were placed towards mount Olivet about the eleventh houre of the day: for they hoped to take them unawares, as being now at dinner. But the Romans perceiving their intent, came out of their places, and reſiſted them who attempted violently to break in upon them over the wall: ſo that there was a hot fight, and many other deeds were done on either party, the Romans having both ſtrength and knowledge in warlike affairs; the Jews led with a deſperate furie: and ſhame forced the Romanes to fight, and need compelled the Jews: for the Romans accounted it a ſhame not to overcome the Jewes, who were as it were faln into their hands; and the Jews thought it the onely way to ſave their own lives, to break down the wall by force. And one of the horſemen called Pedanius, the Jews being put to flight, and driven into the valley, purſued them with his horſe as faſt as he could gallop, and overtook a young man, one of his enemies, being heavie of body, armed all over; and taking him about the ankle, he carried him violently away: thereby ſhewing the ſtrength of his arm and of the reſt of his body, and his skilful cavilry, and ſo brought the captive unto Cæſar as a preſent. Titus admiring Pedanius his ſtrength, and puniſhing the captive for having attempted to aſſault the wall, he now haſted to aſſail the Temple, and commanded the workmen quickly to diſpatch the mounts. In the mean time the Jews being ill handled in the former wars, and war ſtill increaſing to the overthrow of the Temple, they did, as the cuſtom is in a putrified body, prevent the plague from going any further, by cutting off the corrupted members. For that part of the porch that reached from the North unto the Eaſt, joyned unto Antonia: which they firing, ſeparated it 20 cubits from it, having now with their own hands begun to caſt fire into the holy place. Two dayes after, which was the 24 day of the aforeſaid moneth, the Romans ſet the porch on fire, and the fire having gone fourteen cubits, the Jews pulled down the top thereof, and not deſiſting from their accuſtomed works, they pulled down all adjoyning unto Antonia; when it was eaſie for them, and that they ought to have hindred the fire. The porch being on fire, they permitted ſo much to be burned, as they thought good for their purpoſe. The fight about the Temple never ceaſed, many excurſions were made one againſt each other.

Jonathan provokes the ſtouteſt Roman to a ſingle combate.

About this time a certain Jew of low ſtature, and to ſee to a contemptible perſon, every way an abject, both by reaſon of his baſe parentage, and otherwiſe, named Jonathan, going to the monument of John the Prieſt, dared the ſtrongeſt amongſt the Romanes to come and fight a ſingle combat with him, The Romans that beheld him, diſdained him: yet ſome amongſt them (as it is commonly ſeen) were afraid of him: others wiſely deemed, that they ought not to fight with one that was deſirous to die: for they that were deſperate, neither fought adviſedly nor had the fear of God before their eyes: & ſo that it was not a ſign of valor, but of overmuch hardines, to fight with ſuch a one; whom though they overcame, yet they could win no credit but with infamy hazard themſelves to be vanquiſht. So a long time none of the Romans came againſt him, and he upbraided them of cowardlineſs. At laſt, an arrogant and proud fellow, one of the Romane horſemen, named Pudens, diſdaining his inſolency, and perhaps alſo for that

A that he was of little ſtature came againſt him; and fighing with him, fortune frowned upon him, ſo that he was laught to ſcorn by his fellow, for he falling down, Jonathan ſlew him; and ſetting his foot upon the dead bodie, with his left hand he flouriſhed his ſhield, and with his right his bloody ſword; and ſtriking his weapons one againſt another, he inſulted over the Romane army, and over the dead body, upbraiding the Romanes, ſo long till Priſcus a Centurion as he was thus vaunting, ſhot him thorow with an arrow, and ſo he fell down dead upon the body of his enemy; at which deed, both the Romanes and the Jewes raiſed a confuſed cry or noiſe. So Jonathan there ſhewed how quickly revenge purſued the felicity of warlike victory, falling out contrary to all reaſon.

CHAP. VI.

How the Romanes through the deceit of the Jewes were conſumed with fire, and of one Artorius.

B THe ſeditious that kept the Temple, did now every day openly in fight reſiſt the Romanes that kept the Mounts, and the 27th. day they deviſed this ſtratagem: they filled the void part of the Eaſt porch of the Temple with dry wood and brimſtone, and bitumen, and then fled out of it as not able longer to reſiſt. Wherefore many of the Romanes raſhly purſued the Jewes that fled, and with ladders got into the galleries. But the wiſer ſort conſidering that the Jewes had no juſt occaſion to flie, kept their place. The porch being now full of Romanes that were got up into it, the Jews gave C fire to the wood and brimſtone, and upon a ſudden all the porch was compaſſed with the flame: ſo that the Romanes who were out of danger were thereat amazed, and thoſe that were amidſt the flames became deſprate: and invironed with the flames, ſome ſought to run back into the town, otherſome unto the enemies; others kild themſelves ſo preventing the fury of the fire: and preſently the flame over took thoſe that ſought to flie. Cæſar though offended at the ſouldiers for having aſcended into the porch unbidden, yet ſeeing them die ſo wofully in the flames, he compaſſionated them. And although that the fire could not be quenched, yet the poor ſouldiers dying amongſt the flames were hereat comforted, in that they perceived him to be ſorrowful for them, for whom they had loſt their lives. For they be- D held him crying to their fellowes to help to extinguiſh the fire, and he himſelf laboured what he could to do it; ſo that every one eſteemed his ſorrow and lamentation for them as much as a ſumptuous funeral: but ſome eſcaped the fire and got into the largeſt part of the porch: yet invironed round about with Jewes, having long reſiſted, though with many wounds; yet in the end they were all ſlain.

The Jews fill the void part of the Eaſt porch with dry wood ſulpure bitumen.

The Romanes calamity in the fire.

Cæſar hath compaſſion of the Romanes that were in the fire.

At laſt a young man named Longus, was an honour to all this miſery: and notwithſtanding that every one that there periſhed deſerved particularly to be remembred, yet he ſhewed himſelf the moſt valiant of them all. The Jews were deſirous to kill this man for that he was ſtrong, and willed him to come down unto them, ſwearing unto him to ſpare him. But his brother Cornelius, who ſtood on the other ſide, intreated him not to diſcredit his own honour and the Romanes, whom he obeyed: and he lifting up his ſword on high, that either E part might ſee, ſlew himſelf. Yet one Artorius from amidſt the fire eſcaped by this device; he called unto him one Lucius his fellow-ſouldier and chamber-fellow; I will (quoth he) make thee heir of all my inheritance; if thou wilt catch me in thy armes. Lucius willingly endeavouring to do it, Artorius caſt himſelf down upon him, and ſo eſcaped with his life, but Lucius upon whom he fell was bruiſed againſt the pavement, and ſo died. This calamity a while did greatly grieve the Romanes, yet it made them more wary afterward, and acquainted them with the Jews ſubtilties, whereof before being ignorant, they ſuſtained great damage; ſo the porch was burnt unto the tower which John built, during his wars againſt Simon; and the Jews, after the Romanes that were aſcended into it were con- F ſumed, pulled down the reſt. The next day the Romanes fired the North porch, even unto the foreſaid Eaſt porch, which contained the corners of the wall builded over the valley Cedron, ſo that it was terrible to behold the valley from thence, by reaſon of the depth.

Of the famine amongſt the Jews.

The yeer of the world, 4034. after Chriſts Nativity, 72.

The inteſtine wars of the Jewes that were welnigh famiſhed with hunger.

SUch were the affairs about the Temple: but an infinite multitude periſhed within the City through famine, ſo that they could not be numbred: for in every place where any ſhew or ſign of food was, preſently aroſe a battel, and the deareſt friends of all now fought one with another, to take the food from other poor ſouls, neither did they believe them that were now a dying for famine, but the theeves ſearched them whom they ſaw yeelding up the ghoſt, thinking that they dying for famine, had hid about them ſome food: but they were deceived of their hope, being like mad dogs, greedy of meat, and fell againſt the doors like drunken men, ſearching the ſelf-ſame houſes twice or thrice together in deſperation, and for very penury they ate whatſoever they light upon, gathering ſuch things to eat, as the moſt filthy living creatures in the world would have loathed. In brief, they did eat their girdles and ſhooes, and the skins that covered their ſhields, ſo that a little of old hay was ſold for four Attiques. But what need is it to ſhew the ſharpneſſe of this famine by things that want life? I will recount an act never heard of, neither among the Greeks, nor any other barbarous people, horrible to be rehearſed and incredible: ſo that I would willingly omit this calamity, leſt poſterity ſhould think I lie, had not I many witneſſes hereof, and perhaps ſhould incur reprehenſion, not fully recounting all accidents of them that are dead.

The Jewes eat their own girdles ſhooes, the leather of their Targets, and old hay.

CHAP. VIII.

Of a woman that for famine killed her ſon, and dreſſed him for meat.

A Certain woman named Mary, dwelling beyond Jordan, the daughter of Eleazar of the town of Vitezokia, which ſignifieth the houſe of Hyſſope, deſcended of noble and rich parentage, flying with the reſt unto Jeruſalem, was there with them beſieged, her other goods the tyrants had taken from her, which ſhe had brought from beyond the river into the City: and whatſoever being hid, eſcaped their hands, the theeves daily came into her houſe and took it away: whereat the woman greatly moved, curſed them, and with hard ſpeeches animated them the more againſt her, yet no man either for anger, or compaſſion would kill her, but ſuffered her to live to get them meat: but now could ſhe get no more, and famine invaded her, with rage and anger more then danger. Wherefore by rage and neceſſity ſhe was compelled to do that which nature abhorred, and taking her ſon unto whom ſhe then gave ſuck; O miſerable child (quoth ſhe) in warre, famine, and ſedition, for which of theſe ſhall I keep thee? If thou continue among the Romanes, thou ſhalt be made a ſlave, yet famine will prevent bondage, or elſe ſedition worſe then them both. Be therefore meat for me, a terrour unto the ſeditious, a tragicall ſtory to be ſpoken of by poſterity, and that which is onely yet unheard of among the calamities of the Jewes. Having thus ſpoken ſhe ſlew her ſon, and did ſeethe the one half of him and eate it, the reſt ſhe reſerved covered. Preſently came the ſeditious, ſmelling the ſent of that execrable meat, threatning preſently to kill her, except ſhe forthwith brought ſome of that unto them which ſhe had prepared. Then ſhe anſwered that ſhe had reſerved a good portion thereof for them, and preſently uncovered that part of her ſon which ſhe had left uneaten, at which ſight they trembled, and a horrour fell upon them. But the woman ſaid, This is truly my ſon, and my doing, eat you of it, for I my ſelf have eaten thereof. Be not more effeminate then a woman, nor more merciful then a mother. If religion make you refuſe this my ſacrifice, I have already eaten of it, and will eate the reſt. Then the ſeditious departed hereat, onely trembling; and ſcarcely permitting this meat to the mother. Preſently the report of this hainous crime was bruited all about the City, and every man having before his eyes this execrable fact, trembled as though himſelf had done it. And now all that were vexed with this famine, haſtened their own deaths, and he was accounted happy that died before he felt this famine. This unnatural fact was ſoon after recounted unto the Romanes, and ſome of them would not believe it, others pitied them within the City, and many hereat encreaſed their hatred towards that nation.

A the Jews peace, free pardon and forgiveneſſe for all their offences paſt, and that they did rather make choice of warre then peace, of ſedition then quietneſſe, of famine rather then wealth and plentie, having with their own hands begun to ſet on fire the Temple, which he had preſerved for them, and that therefore ſuch like meat was fit for them, and that he would bury this abominable crime of eating their own children in the ruines of their countrey, and that he would not in any part of the world ſuffer the Sun to ſhine upon ſuch a City, wherein mothers did eat their own children, and that ſuch food did more beſeem fathers then mothers, who for all their miſeries would not yet ceaſe from arms. Having thus ſpoken, he conſidered the deſperation of the enemies, and that they would not recall themſelves, who had already endured all ſuch calamities, which might if it had been poſſible have altered their opinions, rather then have endured them.

CHAP. IX.

How the wall was taken, and the Temple burnt.

THe eighth day of Auguſt, two of the Romane Legions having finiſhed their mounts, they began to place their Rammes againſt the Eaſt galleries without the Temple, having ſix daies together without intermiſſion, alreadie beaten the wall with their ſtrongeſt Rammes, and nothing prevailed, the ſtones being ſo ſtrong, that the Rammes could not move them: others of the Romanes labour-
C ed to dig up the foundations of the Porch, that was on the North ſide; and after much toil, they onely could pull away the outward ſtones, and the inner ſtones did ſtill ſupport the porch. At laſt the Romanes ſeeing themſelves not prevail by their javelins and other inſtruments, they ſet ladders to aſcend into the galleries. The Jews did not greatly labour to hinder them from getting up: but when they were within the galleries, then they came and fought with them, and caſt ſome of them down headlong, forcing them to retire; others they ſlew that ſtood in it; and other that were upon the ladders going down, before they could defend themſelves with their ſheilds, were with ſwords ſtricken down, and they alſo thruſt down ſome ladders full of armed men. So that there was a great Maſſacre of the Ro-D manes, ſome fighting for their enſignes, which the Jews had taken from them, eſteeming the loſſe thereof a great ſhame unto them. At laſt the Jews got their ancients, and ſlew them that came up to reſcue them; and the reſt terrified with their deaths that were ſlain, went down again, and no one of the Romanes died, who before he was ſlain did not ſome valiant act; and thoſe ſeditious people that in the former battels did ſhew themſelves valiant, did now alſo fight valiantly, and beſide them Eleazar, ſonne unto the Tyrant the brother of Simon. Then Titus perceiving that he ſpared the Temple of the Jews to his loſſe, and to the death of his ſouldiers, he commanded fire to be put to the Temple gates: preſently Ananus of Emmaus the moſt cruel of all Simons followers, and Archelaus the ſonne of Magadatus fled unto Titus; who for their cruelties committed, determined to put them to death,
E yet they hoped for pardon, for that they had now forſaken the Jews when they had gotten the better hand. But Titus affirmed they came not of good will, but for neceſſity, and that they did not deſerve to live forſaking their Countrey now ſet on fire for their offences: yet his promiſe bridled his wrath, and he diſmiſſed them, but they were not ſo much eſteemed as the reſt. The Romane ſouldiers did now put fire unto the Temple doores: and the ſilver plate wherewith they were covered being molten, the flame quickly fired the wood, and encreaſing took hold preſently on the next porch. The Jews ſeeing themſelves invironed with flames, were now altogether diſcouraged, and their ſtrength failed them, and being amazed, no man ſought to extinguiſh the flame, and ſo they ſtood ſtill beholding the fire,
F yet not lamenting that which was ſet on fire, more then deſiring to ſave the reſt: and ſo that day and all the next night the fire encreaſed, for the porches were burnt by little and little, and not all at once.

The Jews overcome the Romanes, and ſeize their enſignes.

Two of Simons guard revolt from him.

Titus promiſe eſtraineth his wrath.

None of the Jews goeth about to extinguiſh the fire.

The next day Titus cauſed part of his army to quench the fire: and calling unto him his Captains, and ſix that were the chiefeſt among them, to wit, Tiberius Alexander General of the whole army, Sextus Cerealis Commander of the fifth legion, Largius Lepidus of the tenth, Titus Frigius of the fifteenth, with whom alſo was Aeternius Fronto Commander of the two legions that came from Alexandria, and Marcus Antonius Julianus Governour of Judæa, and with them the Colonels and Captains, he deliberated with them what was to be done concerning the Temle. Some counſelled to uſe the cuſtome of wars, for that the Jews, would never live peaceably their Temple ſtanding; all their Nation whereſoever living, G aſſembling themſelves thither at certain times. Others perſwaded Titus, that if ſo be the Jews yeilded their Temple, and fought not for it, then to ſave it; for if they fought for it to burn it: for now it ſeemed a caſtle and not a Temple: and if any man were offended hereat, it ſhould not be imputed to the Romanes or to their General, but to the Jews who conſtrained them to do it; and he offended not, they forcing him to fire it. But Titus affirmed that although the Jews fought for their Temple being men without conſcience, yet it ſhould not be deſtroyed: for he would not ſo be revenged of their iniquities: neither would he ever fire ſo goodly a building; for ſo it would redound to the loſſe of the Romanes: as alſo it H would be a credit unto them, if it were left remaining. And now Alexander, Fronto, and Cærealis, perceiving Cæſars mind, were of his opinion and ſo he diſmiſſed the convocation, and commanded the ſouldiers and Captaines to reſt, that they might be more able to fight when need required: and preſently he appointed certain choſen men to make the waies even, and eaſie for the army to paſſe by the ruines, commanding them to quench the fire; and that day the Jews being fearful and weary did make no reſiſtance. The day following taking heart and aſſembled together, they aſſaulted the watchmen that kept without the Temple, the ſecond hour of the day. The Romanes valiantly reſiſted their firſt aſſault, ſo defending themſelves with their ſhields as though they had a wall before them; yet ſure it was that they would not long abide, for that they were fewer in number then their enemies, and I not ſo deſperate as they were. Then Cæſar before his men retired (beholding the fight from Antonia) with certain choſen horſemen came to ſuccour them: whoſe force the Jewes not ſuſtaining, but the firſt of them being ſlain, the reſt fled: and the Romanes departing, they returned and fought againſt them; and when the Romanes returned again, preſently they fled till about the fifth hour of the day, the Jews were forced to betake themſelves into the Temple, and there they were ſhut up. Then Titus returned into Antonia, purpoſing the next day to aſſault them with all his army, and winne the Temple. But the ſentence of God had already determined, that it ſhould be conſumed with fire: and now the fatal day was come after many years, which was the tenth of Auguſt: upon which day alſo, the King of Babylon did once before fire it, yet was it now firſt ſet a fire by our own Countrey-men, who were in- K deed the cauſe thereof. For the ſeditious being quiet till Titus was departed, then again they aſſaulted the Romanes, and ſo fought with the guard that were without the Temple, labouring to extinguiſh the flame; who putting the Jews to flight, came unto the Temple.

CHAP. X.

How the Temple was burnt againſt the will of Titus.

THen a certain ſouldier who expected no command, nor feared to do ſo execrable a fact, moved with ſome divine fury, and lifted up by his fellow; took L in his hand a flaming firebrand, and caſt it into the golden gate which entred into the rooms on the North part of the Temple, and the flame preſently aroſe: which cauſed a great cry amongſt the Jews, expreſſing their calamity, and every one haſted to extinguiſh the fire; now neither accounting of their lives nor forces, having loſt that for which they ſo fought. News thereof was preſently brought unto Titus, by one who came from the fight, who then was reſting in his tabernacle, and he preſently aroſe and ran unto the Temple to hinder the fire, and all the Captains after him; whereat the ſouldiers being terrified followed, and there aroſe a great cry and tumult in that army being unordered. Cæſar both with his voye and hand made a ſign unto the ſouldiers, that were fighting to M quench the fire. But they did not hear him, there was ſo great a noiſe, neither did they percieve the ſigne he had made unto them with his hand, becauſe that ſome were diſtracted with fight, others with anger: and the ſouldiers iſſued in, not reſtrained either by commands or threatnings, but every one went whither fury carried him: and thronging together at the entrance, many preſſed one another to death; and many being amongſt the fiery ruines of the galleries, periſhed as miſerably as thoſe that were overcome. When they came unto the Temple, every one counterfeited himſelf not to hear Cæſars command, and ſo exhorted his fellows that were before him to fire the Temple. The ſeditious now had no hope to withſtand them, but either fled or were ſlain; and many unarmed and unable people, whereſoever they were found, were ſlain: ſo that about the Altar were an innumerable company

The burning of the Temple: Great ſlaughter in the Temple.

A pany of dead bodies heaped together, and their blood flowed down the Temple ſtaires; and their bodies that were ſlain rouled down, Cæſar ſeeing he could not reſtrain the fury of the mad-brain ſouldiers, and that the fire encreaſed entred into the Temple with his Nobles, and beheld all the holy things there, and whatſoever elſe was there, farre ſurpaſſing all report which ſtrangers had given of it, and equall to the report which the Jews made of it. And the flame not having yet pierced into the inner part of the Temple, nor yet conſumed the houſes and roomes about it, he deemed that as yet it might be preſerved: wherefore himſelf came and intreated the ſouldiers to extinguiſh the fire: commanding Liberalis the Centurion of his guard to beat thoſe with a trunchion that would
B not be obedient, and drive them away. But their fury and the rage of warre, and the hatred they bare againſt the Iews, overcame in them all Cæſars commands. And fear of them that forbade them. Many were incited ſo to do, hoping of ſome booty, thinking that all the Temple within was full of money, becauſe they ſaw the gates of gold. Moreover, a certain ſouldier, when Cæſar ſought to quench the flame, fired the poſtes about the doores: and preſently the flame appearing within, Cæſar and the Captains departed, and ſo every one ſtood looking upon it, and no man ſought to extinguiſh it. Thus the Temple was burnt againſt Titus his will. And although every man will judge it a lamentable caſe, in ſuch a building ſurpaſſing all that ever was ſeen or heard of, both in greatneſſe, workmanſhip, coſtli-
C neſſe and plenty of all things; in this yet we may comfort our ſelves, in that the deſtinies had ſo determined. For neither living creatures, nor places, nor buildings can avoid their deſtiny. One may alſo admire the exact and juſt revolution of time: for it was now deſtroyed in the ſame moneth, and on the ſame day that the Babylonians firſt deſtroyed it: and from that time that Solomon began the firſt Temple, unto the deſtruction of the ſecond Temple, which hapned the ſecond yeer of Veſpaſians reign, were a thouſand a hundreth and thirty yeers, ſeven moneths, and fifteen daies; and from the building of the latter Temple which Aggæus built in the ſecond yeer of the reign of King Cyrus, unto the deſtruction thereof now in Veſpaſians reign, were ſix hundreth thirty nine yeers and five and fourty dayes:

CHAP. XI.

Of the Prieſts: the Treaſure houſe and the Porch.

WHen the Temple was thus conſumed with fire, whatſoever the ſouldiers found therein, they carried away, and put all to the ſword that were in it, which was an infinite number: neither did they ſhew any pity to old age, or infants: but old, young, Prieſts and common people, all were ſlain without reſpect, and all ſorts of peo-
E ple taſted the calamity of warre, whether they reſiſted, or intreated for mercy. And now the flame encreaſed, which grieved even them that were yeilding up the ghoſt: and by reaſon of the height of the hill, and the building together, one would have thought the whole City had been on fire. Then a moſt lamentable cry was raiſed between the Romane legions, and the ſeditious now invironed with fire and ſword, and of the people that were taken in the higher part of the City, and had fled unto the Romanes, lamenting their calamity; and they of the city anſwered the cries and teares of them in the hill, and many whoſe eyes death by famine had already cloſed, took ſtrength a while to bewaile the Temple, which they now opening their eyes beheld on fire. The countrey beyond Jordan, and the mountaines about did eccho with their laments: and yet the calamities ſurpaſſed that tumult.
F For one would have judged the hill whereon the Temple was ſcituate, to have been burnt up by the roots, it was ſo full of fire: Yet multitude of blood ſhed ſurpaſſed the fire. Many that were ſlain were covered with them that ſlew them, and all the ground was overſpred with dead bodies, ſo that the ſouldiers ranne upon the dead bodies to purſue them that fled. At laſt the theeves having driven the Romanes without the Temple, they ranne into the City; and the reſt of the people that were left, fled into the outward porch. And many of the Prieſts firſt uſed ſpits, and then their ſeates made of lead, in ſtead of darts againſt the Romanes; at laſt, nothing at all prevailing, and the fire falling upon them, they went unto a wall eight cubits broad, and there ſtaied. Yet two of the Nobles, when they might either have fled unto the Romanes, and there have been ſaved, or elſe have endured like fortune with the reſt, they notwithſtanding caſt themſelves into the fire, and ſo were burnt with the Temple: one of them was named Meierus the ſonne of Belga, the other Joſeph the ſonne of Dalæus.

The Romanes thought it in vaine to spare the buildings about the Temple, seeing the Temple was already consumed, and so set fire on them all, the porches, galleries and gates; two onely excepted, one on the East side, and the other on the South side, both which afterward they raxed unto the ground: they burnt also certaine chests called Gazophylacia, or money boxes, wherein was great store of coine, and rich garments, and other precious things; and indeed all the Iews treasure, for the richest of the city had brought all their wealth thither. There came into the porch that was left standing, many men, women, and children, to the number of six thousand. And before Cæsar and the Captaines did determine any thing what should be done with them, the furious souldiers fired the porch wherein they were, and so they all perished in the flames; save a few, that leaping down to avoid the fire, were slain in the fall, so that no one escaped of all that multitude. A certain false prophet was cause of all their deaths, who the same day preached in the city, and commanded them to go into the Temple, and behold signes of their deliverance: for many false prophets were then suborned by the tyrants, to perswade them to expect Gods help, thereby to hinder them from flying to the Romanes, and to cause the souldiers to fight more valiantly to defend their City. Men easily believe and are credulous in adversity, so that if any deceitfull person promise deliverance out of calamity, he that suffereth misery, is full of hope thereof.

CHAP. XII.

Of the strange signes and tokens that appeared before the destruction of Jerusalem.

THese miserable people were thus easily perswaded by impostors who did bely God, yet would they not believe, nor give any eare or regard unto certain tokens, and signes of the ruin of their city: but as it were blinded, neither having eyes nor souls, they counterfeited themselves not to see what God foreshewed them. One while there was a Comet in form of a fiery sword, which for a yeer together did hang over the city: another time before the first revolt and warre, the people being gathered together to the feast of unleavened bread (which was the eighth day of April) the ninth hour of the night there was so much light about the Altar & temple, as though it had been bright day, which remained half an hour: this the ignorant people interpreted as a good sign; but they that were skilfull in holy Scripture, did presently judge what would ensue before it came to passe. At the same festivity, a Cow led to be sacrificed at the Altar, brought forth a lamb in the midst of the Temple: and the inner gate of the Temple on the East side being of massive brasse, which at night time had alwaies at least twenty men to shut it, and was bound with locks of Iron, and was barred with barres, the ends whereof went into morteis holes in the stones on either side the door (the foresaid stones being on each side one whole stone) was seen at the first hour of the night to open of his own accord: which being presently related unto the Magistrate by the keepers of the Temple he himself came thither and could scarcely shut it, and this also to the ignorant seemed a good sign, affirming that God opened unto them the gate of his blessings; but the wiser sort judged that the defence of the Temple would decay of his own accord, and that the opening of the gate foretold, that it should be given to the enemies, affirming one unto another that this sign signified desolation. A little while after the feast daies, on the 21. day of May there was seen a vision beyond all belief, and perhaps that which I am to recount might seem a fable, if some were not now alive that beheld it, and that calamity worthy to be so foretold ensued: for before the sunne set, were seen in the ayre Iron Chariots, all over the countrey, and an army in battell aray passing along in the clouds, and begirting the city. And upon the feast day called Pentecost, at night the Priests going into the inner Temple to offer their wonted sacrifice, at first felt the place to move and tremble, and afterward they heard a voice which said, Let us depart hence. And that which was most wonderfull of all, one Jesus the sonne of Ananus a countrey man of the common people, four yeares before the warres began, when the City flourished in peace and riches, coming to the celebration of the feast to Jerusalem, which we call the feast of Tabernacles, suddenly began to cry out thus; A voyce from the East: A voyce from the West: A voyce from the four windes: A voyce against Jerusalem and the Temple: A voyce against men and women newly married: A voyce against all this people: and thus crying night and day, he went about all the streets of the city.

The blindnes of the people. The first prodigie, A comet like unto a sword. The second prodigie was, that a bright light shined about the Altar and Temple by night. The third prodigie was a Cow that brought forth a lamb in the midst of the Temple. The fourth the brazen gate of the Temple opened it self.

The fift, arm'd chariots and men seen in the ayre. The sixth, a voyce in the inward Temple. The seventh prodigie, Jesus a countrey mans cry and death.

Some

A Some of the Nobility disdaining misfortune, took him & scourged him with many stripes: but he, neither secretly speaking for himself, nor to those that did beat him, persevered crying as before. The Magistrates then thinking (as indeed it was) that the man spake this through some divine motion, led him unto the General of the Romanes, where being beaten till his bones appeared, he never intreated nor wept, but as well as he could, framing a weeping voice he cryed, Wo, wo unto Jerusalem. Albinus (being then Judge) asked him what he was, or of whence, or wherefore he said so, but he made him no answer. Yet he ceased not to bewail the misery of Jerusalem, untill Albinus thinking him to be out of his wits, suffered him to depart. This man even untill the time of war never went to any Citizen, nor was seen speak to any one: but still as it were studying of some speech, he cryed, Wo, wo unto Jerusalem. Neither did he ever curse any one, though every day one or other did beare him, nor thank any one that offered him meat. All that he spake unto any man was this heavy prophecy. He went crying as is aforesaid, chiefly upon holy daies, so doing continually for the space of seven years and five moneths, his voyce never waxed hoarse nor weary, till in the time of the siege, beholding what he foretold them, he ceased, and then once again upon the wals going about the City, with a loud voyce he cryed, Wo, wo to the City, Temple & people: and lastly he said, Wo also to my self. Which words were no sooner uttered, but a stone shot out of an engine smote him, and so he yeelded up the ghost, lamenting them all.

B Iesus for seven years space & five moneths cried about the City.

A stone shot from an engine killeth Iesus.

If any one do diligently consider all these, he shall finde that God hath a care of mankind, and doth every way foreshew betime, what is most expedient for them, and they through their own madnesse, to have voluntarily perished in their wickednesse. For the Iews, when the Castle Antonia was taken, made the Temple four-square: notwithstanding that it was C written in the holy Scripture, that the City and Temple should be taken, when the Temple was made four-square. But that which chiefly incited them to war, was the doubtful prophecy likewise found in the holy Scriptures: That at the same time one in their dominions should be Monarch of the whole world, and many wisemen were deceived in this interpretation, making account that he should be one of their own nation, yet indeed thereby was foretold Vespasians Empire. But men cannot prevent destiny, though they foresee it. Thus the Jews interpreted some of the signs as they pleased, and at others they laughed, till by the ruin of their countrey, and their own woful overthrow, their iniquity appeared.

The Iews interpreting the signs to their own good liking, are their Countries ruin and the cause of their own calamity.

How Titus was made Emperour: and of the death of the Priests.

After the seditious were fled into the City, all the Temple and places thereabout being set on fire, the Romanes placing their Ensigns in the Temple over against the East gate: and there celebrating sacrifice, with great cryes declared Titus Emperour, and the Romanes got many preyes and booties, that they sold gold in Syria for half the value. And among those Priests that kept on the wall, a child being thirsty, desired peace of the Romane watchmen, saying, that he was thirsty. So they, pitying both his years and his need, gave him their hands that he should have no harme, and then he came E down and drunk, and filled a bottle which he brought with him: and when he had done, he ranne up again to his fellows, and none of the watchmen were able to overtake him, and they upbraided him with falshood. But he answered, that he had done nothing, but that which he and they intended: for they did not give him their hands to secure him to remain with them, but onely to come down and take water, which he had done. The Romane watchmen greatly admired the subtilty of him that was but a child. The fifth day, the Priests being almost famished came down, and the watchmen carried them to Titus, whom they besought to grant them their lives. But he answered them, that the time of pardon was past, seeing that was destroyed, for the which he might have pardoned them, and that it was meet that the Priests should perish with the Temple: and so he commanded them to be put F to death. Then the Tyrants with their followers being on every side beset with warres, and having no way to flee, they being thus beleagred round, requested to parley with Titus; who for his natural meeknesse, his friends also perswading him thereto, thought at least to save the City (judging indeed that now the seditious had already their mindes) and so he stood in the West part of the inner Temple: for there was a gate built above a galle[illegible]ie, and a bridge that joyned the Temple and City together, which was then between Titus and the tyrants. Many souldiers on both parts flocked about their Rulers; the Jews about Si- mon and John, hoping for pardon: the Romanes about Titus, desirous what he would say unto them: and Titus by an Edict commanding the souldiers to be quiet, and to shoot no arrows, spake unto them first by an Interpreter, thereby shewing that he had the upper hand, and said, "O ye men of Jerusalem, are ye not now glutted with the calamities of your "countrey? Neither calling to mind our power, nor your own infirmity, but with a rash fury "have destroyed your people, City and Temple: your selves also having justly deserved to "perish; who since Pompey first conquered you, have never ceased to be seditious, and at last, "have openly born arms against the Romans. Did you trust unto your multitude? You have "seen that a small parcel of the Romans army hath sufficiently resisted you. Or did you ex- "pect forrain aid? What nation is not under our dominion? and who would rather make "choyce of the Jews then of the Romans? Did you trust in your strength of body? why you "know the Germanes serve us. Or in the strength of your wals? what wall, or what greater "hindrance then the Ocean, wherewith the Britains invironed, have yeelded unto the Ro- "mane forces? Or to your courage, and politick counsel of your Captains? You have al- "ready heard that the Carthagenians have been by us surprized. It was therfore the Romans "humanity that incited you against themselves, who first of all permitted you to possesse your "countrey, and gave you Kings of your own nation: and after all this, we kept your laws in- "violate, and suffered you to live as your selves desired, not onely in your own countrey, but "also amongst other nations; & which is the greatest of al our benefits bestowed upon you, "we permitted you to gather tribute and gifts to the maintenance of your Temple and sacri- "fices to God; of all which, we neither forbade any to be brought unto you, neither hindred "any that would offer unto your Temple, but suffered you our enemies to be made richer "then our selves, so that you have used our own money against us. Wherfore, having recei- "ved so many benefits at our hands, you have now disgorged your selves upon us, and like "spightful serpents spet your poyson upon them that made much of you. Let us omit that "by Nero his negligence you became forgetful of your duty, and like some member in the "body broken or shrunk, you being still tumultuous, at last were taken in a greater offence, "and were encouraged with immoderate desires to hope for unlawful libertie. My father "came into your countrey, not to punish you for your misdemeanour towards Cestius, but by "good counsel and warning to reprehend and quiet you. And whereas if he had come to de- "stroy your nation, he ought first to have cut down the very root, & to have come unto this "City and destroyed it, with the inhabitants: he rather chose first to waste Galilea, and the "places adjoyning, that in the mean time you might repent you, and consider of your estate. "but this his mercy towards you was held for cowardlinesse and infirmity in him, & by our "long suffering, you were emboldned against us: and when Nero was dead, you did as treache- "rous subjects are wont to do, taking occasion by our civil dissention, to revolt from us: and "whilest my father and I were gone into Egypt, you prepared your selves to war against us: "neither were you ashamed to trouble them that were designed Princes, whom notwithstan- "ding you had found most gentle Captains unto you. At last, when the Empire fell unto us, "and all things being now quieted, all nations with gifts and presents came to congratulate "us: behold again, the Iews shewed themselves our enemies, and you sent an Embassador be- "yond Euphrates, onely to nourish your rebellion, walling and fortifying your towns anew: "and contending like seditious and tyrants one with another, set abroach civil warres: all "which, none but impious people would have committed. Wherfore being commanded by "my father, who was now urged thereunto, I came against this citie with a heavi charge, yet "did I rejoyce when I heard that the people desired peace. Before I warred against you, I ex- "horted you to peace: after war was begun, I desisted a while from using severitie: I spared "all them that of their own accord fled unto me, and kept my promise unto them, pitying "those that were captives. I with strokes restrained them that hasted the war against you a- "gainst my will, and even forced so to do, I set the Romans against your wals, and alwaies "restrained my souldiers so much desirous of your blood. As often as I overcame you, so of- "ten did I exhort you to peace, as though I had been vanquished. Again, when I approached "unto the Temple, I (willingly omitting the law of arms) requested you to spare both it "and the holy things, offering you leave to depart, & promising you safety, or licencing you "to fight another time in another place, if so you thought good. Al these my offers you refu- "sed, and with your own hands fired your Temple. And now you wicked wretches urge me "to a parlee. What thing can you now preserve so excellent, as that which is already perished "What pardon can you expect, seeing your Temple is destroyed? nay even now you stand "armed, not so much as counterfeiting submission in the last cast. O wretches, with what hope?

A hope? Is not your people dead, is not your Temple deſtroyed, and your city now in my hands, yea, your lives alſo? But do you think death the renown of fortitude? I will not ſtrive with your obſtinacy: yet if you will caſt down your weapons, and yeeld your bodies, I will ſpare your lives: And like as in a private houſe I will ſhew my ſelf unto you a gentle maſter; and after I have puniſhed that which otherwiſe is incurable, I will reſerve the reſt for my ſelf. The year of the world 4034. after Chriſts Nativity 72.

Titus grants the Jews life, on condition they ſhould lay aſide their weapons and ſubmit themſelves.

To this they anſwered, that they could not receive pardon at his hands, having vowed the contrary: wherefore they requeſted licence to depart with their wives and children by the camp which he had invironed with a wall, and ſo to go into the wilderneſſe and leave the Citie to the Romanes. Titus was hereat greatly enraged, that they being in a manner captives ſhould impoſe upon him conditions; as though they were victors; and commanded a
B crier to tell them, that henceforth they ſhould not flee unto him, nor hope that he would pardon them: for he would ſpare nothing, willing them with all their forces to fight and ſave themſelves as they could, for he would now in all things uſe the law of arms: and ſo he permitted the ſouldiers to ſack the Citie and ſet it on fire. The ſame day they did nothing: but the next day following they fired the Councel-houſe, the Palace Acra, and Ophla, and the fire came unto Queens Helens palace, which was ſituate in the midſt of Acra,: alſo the houſes and ſtreets of the Citie full of dead bodies were ſet on fire. The ſame day, the ſonnes and brethren of King Izates, and with them many Nobles of the people, aſſembled together, beſought Cæſar to pardon them: and he though incenſed againſt them all, yet not changing
C his manner, received them to mercy, and put them all in priſon, and afterward carried them bound to Rome for hoſtages, that were the Kings ſons and kinſmen.

CHAP. XIIII

Of the prey of the ſeditious, and the burning of the inner part of the City.

D THe ſeditious went unto the Kings Palace, where many had left their wealth, becauſe it was a ſtrong place: and driving the Romanes from thence, they ſlew all the people there aſſembled, amounting to the number of 8000. and 400. and carried away all the money, and they took there two Romane ſouldiers alive one a horſeman, and the other footman; and they ſlew the footman and drew him all along the Citie, as it were in the body of that one, revenging themſelves upon all the Romanes. But the horſeman affirmed that he had ſomething to ſay unto them, which would greatly profit them, and ſave their lives: who was carried to Simon; and not having there any thing to ſay, Simon delivered him to one of his Captains called Ardala to be ſlain, and he brought him where the Romanes might behold him with his hands bound behind him, and a veil before his eies, meaning there to behead him: but he, whileſt the Jew drew out his ſword, fled to the Romanes. And Titus would not put him to death, becauſe he had
E eſcaped from the enemies: yet deeming him unworthy to be a Romane ſouldier, who ſuffered himſelf to be taken alive; he took from him his arms, and diſcharged him from bearing them any more, which to a wiſe man was worſe then death. The next day, the Romanes putting the ſeditious to flight that were in the lower Citie, they fired all unto Siloa, rejoycing that the town was deſtroyed: yet they got no booties, becauſe the ſeditious had already robbed and ſpoiled all, and carried it into the higher City. For they nothing repented them of their wickedneſſe, but were as arrogant as though they had been in proſperity: ſo that they with joy beheld the Citie on fire, affirming that they deſired death; for that the people being ſlain, the Temple deſtroyed, and the citie on fire, they ſhould leave nothing
F to their enemies. Yet Joſeph in that extremity laboured to ſave the reliques of the Citie, much inveighing againſt their crueltie, and earneſtly exhorting them to ſave themſelves: yet he nothing profited in all this, but was derided for his labour: for neither would they yield to the Romanes for their oathes ſake, neither were they able to fight with the Romanes, being now as it were beſieged round by them; yet their accuſtumed murthers did encourage them to ſtand out.

The Jews are arrogant in the midſt of their calamity.

The Jews refuſe to ſubmit themſelves to the Romanes, yet are they unable to wage warre with them.

Thus diſperſed all over the Citie, they lurked in the ruines, lying in wait for thoſe that ſought to flee unto the Romanes, and many of them were taken, and all of them were ſlain; for famine had ſo weakned them, that they could not flee, and they caſt their dead bodies to dogs. And any death were eaſie in reſpect of famine. So that many fled unto the Romanes, manes, having no promiſe, no nor hope to be pardoned by them, and upon purpoſe fell into the hands of the ſeditious, who never ceaſed from murther: and now there was no place in the whole City void, but was fill'd with dead bodies, who either periſhed by famine or ſedition. But the tyrants and factious theeves put their laſt refuge in the vaults, where they hoped whatſoever hapned to ſave themſelves, hoping that there they could not be found, and ſo after the City was deſtroyed, to eſcape, which was onely their vain fantaſie. For they could neither be hid from God, nor the Romanes: yet at that time they truſted in thoſe caves, from whence they fired the City more then the Romanes, and cruelly murthered them, that having eſcaped the flames, came and fled into ſecret places, and ſpoiled them: alſo if they in any place found any meat, though all bloudy, yet they took it, and did eat it, and now one of them began to fight with another about the ſpoil they got. And I verily perſwade my ſelf, that had they not been prevented by the deſtruction of the City, their crueltie would have been ſuch, that they would have eaten the bodies of dead men.

The tyrants uttermoſt hope was in their vaults.

CHAP. XV.

How the higher part of the City was aſſaulted: and how ſome of the Jews fled unto Titus.

Cæſar perceiving that the higher part of the Citie would not be won without mounts, being ſituate in a ſoil, round about the which were high and deep places, on the twentieth day of Auguſt, he ſet all his ſouldiers on work, and the carrying of wood for that purpoſe was very painful: all trees within 100. furlongs off the Citie were already cut down, and uſed in the former work, as is before ſaid. So the four Legions raiſed a mount on the Weſt ſide of the Citie, and all the reſt made a mount againſt the Porch, bridge and tower, which Simon during his warres with John had built. About this time, the Captains of the Idumæans aſſembling together, deliberated to yield themſelves, and ſent five of their company to Titus, beſeeching him to confirm a peace unto them: and he hoping that the tyrant would yield after them, who were the greateſt part of his army, with much ado granted them life, and ſo ſent them to their fellows: but Simon had notice of their departure, and preſently ſlew thoſe five that were ſent unto Titus, and taking the Captains (the nobleſt of whom was James the ſon of Soſa) he put them in priſon, and alſo kept and guarded the Idumæans, who now having no Governours knew not what to do. yet the guard could not hinder them from fleeing, for although many of them were kill'd; yet divers fled and eſcaped and were all received by the Romanes; Titus courteſie being ſuch, as that he remembred not his former Edict to the contrary, and now the ſouldiers hoping for gain, and having already gotten ſufficient, abſtained from murthers: for leaving onely the common people, they ſold the reſt with their wives and children for a ſmall price, many being expoſed to ſale, and few coming to buy them: ſo that he having made an Edict that none ſhould flee unto him alone, intending thereby to bring their families with them, yet he now received them alſo, appointing ſome to enquire who had deſerved puniſhment, and to inflict it on them. And an infinite number was ſold, and more them 40000. of the people were ſaved, whom the Emperour diſmiſſed, and permitted to go whither they pleaſed. The ſame time a certain Prieſt, the ſonne of Thebathus, named Jeſus, was promiſed pardon on condition he ſhould deliver certain holy things given to the Temple: and ſo he came and brought out of a wall two candleſticks, like to them that were in the Temple, tables, goblets, cups, all made of ſolid and maſſie gold: alſo the veil and the ornaments of the Prieſt, and the precious ſtones about them, and many veſſels made for ſacrifice. Moreover, the Keeper of the holy Treaſure called Phineas, brought forth the garments, and all things that did belong to the Prieſts, and much purple and ſcarlet, which were laid up in ſtore, to make tapeſtry or hangings, among which alſo was ſome Cinnamon, Caſſia, and many other odoriferous things, whereof were compounded ſweet odours to be offered to God. He alſo delivered him much wealth of other mens, and much ſacred Treaſure: for the which, notwithſtanding he was taken by force, yet he was pardoned, as they were that fled unto Cæſar.

CHAP. XVI.

How the reſt of the City was taken.

The year of the world, 4034. after Chriſts Nativity, 72.

THe ſeventh day of September, the Mounts being finiſhed, which was the 18. day after they were begun, ſome of the Romanes placed their Rams and Engines to batter them; and ſome of the ſeditious, who now deſpaired to keep the Citie, left the walls, and fled into Acra, others hid themſelves in certain vaults, and many hindred the Romanes, and reſiſted them for placing their Rams againſt the walls, who were overcome by them, being both more in number then they were, and alſo ſtronger and more valiant. The Jewes being now all diſcouraged and ſorrowful, ſo ſoon as any part of the wall was broken down, or ſhaken with the force of the Rams ſtraightwayes fled, and now the tyrants were ſurprized with a greater fear then needed. For even before ſuch time as the enemies had entered the wall, they ſtood in doubt whether they might flee or no: and they who a little before were proud and arrogant malefectors, did now tremble and quake, ſo that it was pitiful to ſee ſuch a change in them, though they were wicked perſons. And they endeavoured to aſſaile the wall that Titus had built to compaſſe the whole City withall: but ſeeing themſelves forſaken of all thoſe that were wont to be truſty unto them, every one fled whither neceſſity did drive him. Preſently newes was brought them that all the Weſt wall of the City was beaten down, others affirmed that the Romanes had entered, and that they had ſeen the enemies in the towers, fear dazeling their eyes: and proſtrate on the ground, they bewailed their misfortune; and as though they had been lame, they ſtood ſtill and ſought not to flee. From whence one may chiefly perceive Gods juſtice toward the impious, and the Romanes fortune; for the tyrants deprived themſelves of their ſtrong holds, and voluntarily departed out of their towers, wherein they could never have been taken but by famine: and the Romans having ſo much laboured at the lower walls, did now by fortune take theſe, which their Engines could never have ſhaken, for there were three inexpugnable towers that could not be battered with the Engines, whereof before we have made mention. So the tyrants having forſaken theſe, or rather being by Gods will driven from thence, preſently they fled unto the valley Siloa: after the fear was paſt, they again took heart, and went unto the wall that was in that place: yet not uſing ſuch courage and violence as their need required, they were beaten by the watchmen that guarded it; their ſtrength now failing and wearied with labour, fear, famine and calamity. And ſom were driven one way, and ſome another, & were forced to hide themſelves in vaults and ſinks. The Romanes having obtained the wall, placed their colours in the towers, and clapping their hands and ſinging for joy, they cryed, victory, finding the end of the warre nothing ſo terrible as the beginning. Yet did they not believe that was the end becauſe they got the wall without any bloodſhed, but admired; ſeeing no man did offer to reſiſt them. And now iſſuing into every ſtreet, they ſlew whomſoever they found without any reſpect, and fired houſes, and all the people that had fled into them, and deſtroyed many whereas they entered for to get a prey, and they found whole families dead, and houſes full of dead bodies, conſumed by famine. Thus terrified with that heavy ſight, they departed out, not taking any thing away, yet for all that they pitied not them that were left alive, but ſlew whomſoever they met, whereby they filled the narrow ſtreets ſo full of dead bodies by them ſlain, that none could paſſe that way for them: all the whole Citie flowed with blood, ſo that many things ſet on fire, were quenched with the blood of them that were ſlain. At evening they ceaſed from killing, but all the night long the fire encreaſed: and ſo in the morning which was the eighth day of September, all was now on fire; the City in the time of the ſiege having endured more miſery and calamity, then ever it received joy and happineſſe from the time of the firſt foundation, notwithſtanding that they were ſo great, that all Cities might juſtly envy it, and it no wiſe deſerved ſo to be oppreſſed with ſuch miſery, ſave onely for that it foſtered and bred ſuch impious perſons as wrought the overthrow thereof.

The houſes and families of beſt reckoning are left full of dead bodies.

Titus, entring into the City, amongſt the reſt admired the ſtrong holds thereof, and the rocky towers which the tyrants like mad-men deprived themſelves of; and ſeeing the height, firmeneſſe, bigneſſe, and the joyning of the ſtones together, and their breadth and height, he ſaid: Surely, God hath aſſiſted us in the fight, and he it was that did withdraw the Jewes from theſe fortreſſes. For what could mens hands and engines prevail againſt them? And having ſpoke much to this effect, coming with his friends, he ſet them at liberty whom whom the tyrants had left bound in the Caſtles: and when he deſtroyed the reſt of the City and wals, he left thoſe towers ſtanding as a monument of his good fortune and victory, by the which he had gained them, though unexpugnable. The ſouldiers now being weary with killing the miſerable Jews, and yet a great multitude remaining alive, Cæſar commanded that onely the armed Jews and they that reſiſted ſhould be ſlain, and the reſt left alive. But the ſouldiers alſo killed old folks and weak perſons, and taking all able men and luſty, they carried them into the Temple, and ſhut them there in the place appointed for the women. Cæſar left one Fronto a Libertine and his friend to keep them, giving him alſo charge to make inquiry who had deſerved puniſhment; who ſlew all the theeves and ſeditious, one of them bewraying another, and reſerved certain choſen young men of large ſtature and beautifull withall for the triumph: and all the reſt that were above ſeventeen years old, he ſent bound into Egypt, to be imployed in certain works there, as digging, delving and manuring the fields, and to be uſed in other publike buſineſſes. Titus alſo ſent many of them unto divers Provinces to be ſlain in the Theaters with beaſts or ſwords; and they that were under ſeventeen years of age were ſold. And during the time that Fronto kept them, 1c000. died for hunger; partly, for that their keepers hating them, would not give them any meat; partly, for that ſome refuſed meat when it was offered them. Of the number of the captives, and them that were ſlain.

I

The number of the captives and ſuch as died during the ſiege of the City.

THe number of all the captives that were taken during the whole time of warre, was 97000. and the number of all that died and were ſlain during the ſiege, was 110000. the moſt of them being Jewes by nation, but not inhabitants of that place. For being aſſembled together from all parts to the feaſt of unleavened bread, preſently and on a ſudden they were invironed with warre, and firſt of all a Plague fell among them by reaſon of the ſtraightneſſe of the place, and immediately after, famine, worſe then it. And that the City was capable of ſo many men it is evident, for that Ceſtius before numbered them; who deſirous to ſignifie the flouriſhing eſtate and ſtrength of Jeruſalem unto Nero, who contemned our nation, requeſted the high Prieſts, that if poſſibly they could, they ſhould number all the people in their City: and that upon the feaſt of Eaſter, when they killed offerings from the ninth hour of the day untill the eleventh (and to eate a Lambe not fewer then ten perſons were aſſembled, for it is not lawful to feaſt alone, yea, many times twenty are in a company) they numbred 256000. and 500. oblations or Lambs to be killed; ſo that if we reckon to every Lambe ten men, the number amounts to 2700000. men, all purified whole and ſound: for it was not lawful for any that were lepers, or had a flux of ſeed, nor women that had the monethly tearms, to eat of that ſacrifice, nor for any ſtranger, except he came thither for religion ſake. And this multitude was aſſembled together from other places, and was there by the providence of God ſhut up as it were in a priſon. And the City being filled with men of war was beſieged, that the number of them that were ſlain, paſſed all that ever periſhed, either by any plague ſent from God, or by the means of men; who were partly openly ſlain: partly taken by the Romanes: who ſearching the vaults, and opening the ſepulchres, ſpared none they met withall. There alſo were found more then 2000. whereof ſome ſlew themſelves with their own hands, otherſome kild by others, the reſt periſhed by famine. The ſtink of dead bodies was ſo great, that many minding to go and ſearch the foreſaid places, and being entred into them, were forced to retire: yet others for lucre ſake treading on the dead carkaſſes, ſearched the dead bodies, if they could finde any thing; for much riches were hid in the vaults, and covetouſneſſe omitted no way to gain. Moreover, many were taken out from thence, whom the tyrants had bound, who even in their extremity ceaſed not to tyrannize: yet God plagued them both according to their deſerts: for John being now almoſt famiſhed with his brethren in a vault, beſought the Romanes to ſave his life. And Simon, having long ſtriven with neceſſity, as we ſhall hereafter make mention of, at laſt yeelded himſelf, who was kept for the triumph; and John was condemned to perpetual priſon. Then they deſtroyed the walls, and fired the outward parts of the City.

CHAP. XVIII.

A brief Hiſtory of the City of Jeruſalem.

The yeer of the world, 4034. after the nativity of Chriſt, 72.

Ieruſalem being five times ſpoiled, was at that time once more ſackt.

THus was Ieruſalem taken the ſecond yeer of Veſpaſians reign, on the eighth day of September, and having been already five times before ſurprized, it was finally again deſtroyed. Firſt Aſocheus King of Egypt, and after him Antiochus, then Pompey, and after them Herod with Soſius took the City, and yet deſtroyed it not. But before them the King of Babylon deſtroyed it, when he had enjoyed the ſame, a thouſand three hundreth and threeſcore yeers, eight moneths and ſix dayes after it was firſt built: but he that firſt built it, was one of the Princes of the Cananeans, in his own language called the juſt King. For he indeed was ſo, and therefore was the firſt Prieſt that ſacrificed unto God, and dedicated a Temple, called the City Solyma: but David the King of the Iews having driven out the Cananeans, gave it unto his people to be inhabited, and after four hundreth threeſcore and four yeers and three moneths, it was deſtroyed by the Babylonians, and from King David who was the firſt Jew that reigned there, untill the time that Titus deſtroyed it, were a thouſand one hundred ſeventy and nine yeers, and from the time that it was firſt erected untill it was by him deſtroyed, were two thouſand one hundred and ſeventy ſeven yeers: yet neither the antiquity, nor riches, nor the fame thereof now ſpread all over the world, nor the glory of Religion did any thing profit or hinder it, from being deſtroyed. Such was the end of the beſieging of Jeruſalem. When there was none left to kill, nor any thing remaining for the ſouldiers to get, and that now there was nothing, againſt which the ſouldiers could ſhew their outrage (for they would have ſpared nothing that they could have ſpoyled) Ceſar commanded them to deſtroy the city and Temple, onely yet leaving ſtanding certain towers, that were more beautifull and ſtronger then the reſt, to wit, Phaſælus, Hippicos, and Mariamme, and the wall that was on the Weſt ſide; meaning there to keep a garriſon, and that they ſhould be monuments of the Romanes vertue, who had ſurpriſed a City ſo well fortified as it appeared by them. All the reſt of the city they ſo plained, that they who had not ſeen it before, would not believe that it had ever been inhabited. This was the end of their madneſſe, who were alwaies given unto ſedition in Ieruſalem, a moſt worthy City and famous amongſt all nations.

The Romanes wholly ruinate both the city and the Temple.

CHAP. XIX.

How the ſouldiers were rewarded.

Ceſar determined to leave the tenth legion for a garriſon in Ieruſalem, with ſome troupes of horſemen, and other companies of footmen: and all warres being now ended, he purpoſed to thank the whole army for their valiant acts, and reward the moſt couragious for their deſerts. And placing a great tribunall in the mideſt before the camp, ſtanding in it with the chief Peeres about him, from whence the whole army might hear him, he gave them hearty thanks for that of their good will towards him, they had patiently abode with him during thoſe warres, praiſing them for their loyalty during all the foreſaid time, and that in many skirmiſhes they had ſhewed themſelves valiant, and by their valour had enlarged the dominions of their countrey: likewiſe they had now given all nations to underſtand, that neither the multitude of enemies, nor ſtrong holds, nor greatneſſe of Cities, nor raſhneſſe, nor barbarous cruelty of their adverſaries could ever reſiſt the forces of the Romanes, nor eſcape their hands; notwithſtanding that in many things fortune favoured them: adding that it was a credit for them to have ended thoſe warres that had continued a long time; which was all that they hoped for at their coming; and which was moſt glory of all unto them, that thoſe Captains whom they had elected to be the Romane Emperours, were all liked and imbraced of all men, all ſtanding to their appointment; and acknowledging themſelves beholding to them that elected them. Moreover, that he admired them and loved them all, for that every one ſhewed himſelf valiant and couragious: affirming that he would now recompenſe thoſe with honours, and due deſert, who had behaved themſelves moſt valiantly, and moſt hazarded themſelves, and effected worthy deeds, and whoſoever was forwarder then the reſt, ſhould have reward according to his deſert, And that he would be more diligent in honouring them that had been his companions in that warre, then in punishing their offences; then presently he willed them to whom it appertained, to nominate them who had valiantly behaved themselves in those warres, and had performed any worthy exploit: which being done, he called every one by his name, and praised them, as greatly rejoycing at the valour of his countreymen, crowning them with crowns of gold. and put chains of gold about their necks, and gave them large spears of gold, and ensignes made of silver; he also preferred every one of them, and gave them of the spoil, precious garments, with gold and silver very plentiously: and thus having rewarded every one according to his merit; and praising God with all his army, he descended with great applause out of the tribunall, and went and offered sacrifices for the victory, and having gathered a great multitude of Oxen about the Altar to sacrifice them, he offered them all, and therewith feasted his army, and himself three daies with all his Nobility, dismissing all the souldiers to depart whither they would, or thought good, appointed the tenth legion to keep Ierusalem, and did not send it back unto Euphrates, where before it was. He banished also the twelfth legion out of all Syria, remembring that under Cestius his government they fled from the Jews, being before at Raphanæas, which he sent unto Malto that is scituate by Euphrates, in the confines of Armenia and Cappadocia and the other two he kept with himself, as sufficient to guard him into Egypt, which were the fift and fifteenth legions. And coming to Cæsarea by the Sea coast, he there laid up all his spoiles, and caused the captives to be kept, because that the Winter season permitted him not to sayl into Italy.

Of Vespasians voyage by Sea, and how Simon was taken: and of the spectacles, and shews made upon his birth day.

Vespasians sayling and journey.

Shews at Cæsarea.

WHilest Titus was busied in the siege of Jerusalem, Vespasian in a Merchants Ship sayled to Rhodes: and from thence departing in a Gally, having visited all Cities by the which he passed, being joyfully received of them all, he went from Ionia into Greece, from thence unto Corcyria, and then unto Japygia, and afterwards by Land. Thus Titus being returned from Cæsarea on the Sea-coast, he came unto Cæsarea Philippi, and there he made a long abode, proclaiming all sorts of pastime: wherein many captives perished, some being cast unto wild beasts, others forced in great companies to fight one against another; being in this place, he understood that Simon the sonne of Gioras was taken. This Simon at such time as Jerusalem was besieged, was in the higher part of the city, when the Romane army had entered the walls, and began to waste it: and with his most trusty fellows, and certain Masons, having provided them all necessary tooles, and victualls that might have sufficed them all for many daies, he accompanied with them, and went into a secret cave, unto the end thereof, and there he caused them to digge further, hoping so to get out at some place where he might safely escape away. Yet this his hope had not so good successe as he expected: for they had but digged a little way, ere victualls failed them: notwithstanding, that they had made very great spare thereof. Then Simon thinking to fear the Romanes, clothed himself in white, and a purple cloak buttoned about him, and so came out of the earth in that place where the Temple had been builded beforetime. And they that did first see him, were astonished awhile, and stirred not, but let him alone: yet at last they came unto him, and demanded what he was. but Simon would not tell them, willing them to call their Captain unto him, and presently some of the souldiers ranne to call him, and so he came: at that time Terentius Rufus was Captain of the souldiers. Terentius having learned the truth of all, kept him bound, and related unto Cæsar the manner of his taking, and thus Simon was by the power of God delivered into his enemies hands, who hated him above measure, and so was justly hereby punished, for having so cruelly tyrannized over his own countreymen, not taken by their force, but yeilding himself unto them, having cruelly butchered many, under pretence of false criminations: to wit, for having revolted unto the Romanes.

But impiety cannot escape Gods vengeance, neither is the Divine justice of so weak force, but that it can at one time or other punish them that violate it, and it many times inflicteth a grievous punishent upon men, when they think they have escaped all, for they were not presently punished; which also Simon felt, after he fell into the Romanes hands: his coming out of the earth, made a great many more of the seditious at that time to be taken in the caves. When Cæsar was returned into Cæsarea by the Sea coast, Simon was presented bound

Yet the Romanes thought all theſe puniſhments too light and eaſie for them. After this, Cæſar came to Berytus (which is a City in Phænicia, and a Colony of the Romanes) and here alſo he made ſome long abode, and celebrated the birth of his father, with farre greater ſolemnity then the former, as well in making divers ſhews unto

CHAP. XXI.

Of the calamity of the Jews at Antiochia.

C AT the ſame time the reſt of the Jews were in great miſery, and the city of Antiochia was incited againſt them, both for certain criminall cauſes now laid unto their charge, as alſo for certain offences before committed, which neceſſarily I muſt recount, before I ſpeak any thing of the reſt. The nation of the Jews is mixed almoſt amongſt all nations of the world, and eſpecially amongſt the Syrians, by reaſon of their vicinity, and many of them were at Antiochia, becauſe it was a great City, and the Kings that ſucceeded Antiochus, permitted them freely to inhabit there, and to enjoy all liberties of the city. For Antiochus ſurnamed Epiphanes, deſtroyed Jeruſalem and ſacked the Temple: but the Kings ſucceſſors reſtored all the braſſe that was taken from the Temple unto the Jews, offering it unto their Synagogue in Antiochia, and permitted them to have the ſame liberties in the City, that the Greeks enjoyed, and the other Kings alſo of later times uſed them after the like ſort: ſo that their number greatly encreaſed, and they enlarged their Temple and enriched it with ſundry offerings, oftentimes
D winning many Pagans to be of their religion, and ſo as it were made them alſo a part of their nation. Now about the time that the wars began, and Veſpaſian was newly arrived, the Jews began to be generally hated of all men: then one of them named Antiochus, reverend for parentage, whoſe father was chief of all the Jews in Antiochia, at ſuch time as the people of Antiochia were aſſembled in the Theater, this man came in amongſt them, and accuſed his own father, and the reſt of the Jews to have conſpired together to burn the City in the night time, and delivered ſome Iews unto them that were his gueſts, as conſpirators with the reſt. The people hearing this, could not repreſſe their rage, but preſently cauſed them that were offered unto them, to be burnt in the Theater, and made great ſpeed to ſet upon all the Iews, hoping that by ſpeedy diſpatch they might preſerve their countrey, which o-
E therwiſe was like to periſh. And then Antiochus to enrage them the more, did now offer to ſacrifice according to the cuſtome of the Pagans, thereby as it were aſſuring the Antiochians, that he hated the Iews and their cuſtomes, willing them alſo to compell all the reſt of the Iews to do the like, for whoſoever refuſed ſo to do were traitors. The Antiochians followed his counſell: but few Jews would obey them, yet they that denied to ſacrifice were ſlain. Then Antiochus receiving a charge of ſouldiers from the Captain of the Romanes, became moſt cruel againſt his countreymen, and would not permit them to keep holy the ſeventh day; but in it to do all labour and buſineſſe, that they were accuſtomed to do upon any other day, and ſo urged them hereto, that within ſhort time the ſeventh day was not onely violated among them of Antiochia, but alſo in other places and Cities round about.
F The Iews at Antiochia having then endured the foreſaid miſery, now fell into as great calamity as that was, whereof I intending to ſpeak, was forced to relate the former. For it happened that the fourſquare market was fired, and the publike places, where all Writings and Regiſters were kept, as alſo the Kings Houſes: and the fire ſo encreaſed, that with much ado it was hindred from firing the whole City. Of this fact Antiochus accuſed the Iews, thereby ſufficiently inciting the Antiochians againſt them, although that they had not before born them any malice, and making them ſo eaſily believe his calumniations, who now gave full credit unto his accuſations. by reaſon of that which was paſt: ſo that now they almoſt perſwaded themſelves, that they did ſee the Iews put fire unto them, and ſo in a great rage all of them ſet upon them that were accuſed. Wherefore Collega the youuger had much ado to pacifie the people, notwithſtanding that he requeſted them to permit him to informe

Then Collega making diligent enquiry of the matter, found out the truth, and not one of the Jews accused by Antiochus was guilty: for certain impious people had done all this mischief, being indebted; thinking that if they had burnt the market-place, and the publike writings, that then their debts could not be required at their hands. Yet the Iews lived in great fear, and expected the event of those forged accusations.

CHAP. XXII.

The yeer of the world, 4035. after Christs Nativity, 73.

The City of Rome entertaineth Vespasian with all willingnesse and pomp.

After that Titus had received letters from his father, that he was arrived in Italy, and all Cities wherein he as yet came, welcomed him very joyfully, and that especially Rome, had entertained him with great pomp and triumph, he was now eased of the care he had before, and very joyfull for his fathers welfare, and good fortune. For all the people of Italy did reverence Vespasian, though absent, as though he had been present with them, desiring to see his expected arrivall, whose coming they so heartily wished for. For the Senate, remembring what calamities had befalne the City in the change of Princes, desired to receive their Emperour dignified with the honour of old age, and martiall renown, whose presence onely would be to his subjects profit and safety. And the vulgar sort also troubled before with civill warres, long expected his arrivall, assuring themselves therby to have an end of their calamity, and to recover again their wonted affluence. Especially he was expected by the souldiers, who knowing his skill in martiall affairs, by that which himself had already done, and finding their other Captains under whom they warred, ignorant and unskilfull, they wished for his coming, thereby to be delivered from the disgrace wherein they lived, desiring to receive him by whom they might both be honoured, and preserved from danger. The Nobility seeing him so beloved of all men, could no longer wait his coming, but went and met him, he being farre from the City, and accompanied him; and no man stayed his coming, but in whole multitudes they went to meet him, they were so desirous to see him: so that more went to meet him then stayed at home.

The Romanes issue out to meet with Vespasian.

When news was brought that he approached neer unto the city, and how friendly and courteously he had entertained all men, the people with their wives and children stayed in the way he came, to salute and see him: and whersoever he came, with joyfull applauses and acclamations they cried, calling him their Conserver and Benefactor, and he who onely was worthy to be the Romane Emperour, and the whole City was as it had been a Temple, all hung with garlands, and full of sweet odours and perfumes: and the multitude of the people being such that he could scarcely get into the palace, he offered sacrifices unto his household gods for his safe return, and all the people were feasted by their tribes, kindred and neighbours, sacrificing unto God, and requesting that Vespasian might long continue their Emperour, and his son after him, and that the Empire might never depart from his linage. The City of Rome having thus received Vespasian, it presently was blessed with all happinesse and felicity.

CHAP. XXIII.

The exploits of Domitian against the Germanes and Frenchmen.

The causes of the revolt of the Germanes and French, from the Romanes.

Before such time as Vespasian was gone to Alexandria, or that Titus besieged the City of Jerusalem, a great part of Germany was revolted, with whom the Frenchmen that bordered upon them, renouncing their allegiance, they were in great hope to free themselves from the yoke and government of the Romanes. The first motives that caused the Germanes to revolt, and to warre against the Romanes, was their temerity and rash natures prone to fight, having but a very little hope of successe; then the hatred of their nobles, who knew that none could by force bring them into subjection but onely the Romanes, and chiefly thereunto encouraged by the opportunity they had. For they seeing the Empire greatly afflicted with civill wars, by reason

A reaſon of the often changing of Emperours, and knowing that all the world under their dominion was now in ſuſpence, they thought that by reaſon of their troubles and civil wars, fit opportunity was offered them, and they were hereunto perſwaded by one Caſſius and Civilis, two of the moſt potent amongſt them, who long before deſired alteration; and now finding opportunity, ſhewed what minds they bare: who now taking courage, made tryal what the common people thought of this point, and the greateſt part of them manifeſtly condeſcended hereunto, and perhaps the reſt were not unwilling. At this time, as it were by Gods providence, Veſpaſian ſent letters unto Petilius Cerealis (who before-time had been Governour of Germany) and declared him Conſul, commanding him to go into Britain and take the rule of the countrey. He forthwith obeyed Veſpaſians command: and hearing that B the Germanes had revolted, he came againſt them, they having now leavied an army, and gave them a great overthrow, killing many of them, and forced them to their due obedience unto the Romanes. Notwithſtanding, if he had not come thither, not long after they had aſſuredly been puniſhed for their offence. For ſo ſoon as news of their rebellion was brought to Rome, Cæſar Domitianus hearing of it (not as one of his years would have done, being very young) undertook that expedition to go and conquer them: but having his fathers courage, and being more skilful then his age required, he preſently went againſt them: who terrified with the report of his coming yeelded unto him, thereby gaining this, that without bloodſhed they were brought under ſubjection as before. Now all things in Gallia C being well diſpoſed of, ſo that it was not eaſie for them although they would, to rebel any more, Domitian returned again to Rome, being a credit unto his age and countrey.

When Veſpaſian heard thereof, and how Mæſia was all waſted, he ſent Rubrius Gallus to be revenged upon them; who having ſlain many of them in fight, he forced the reſt to retire into their own countrey. The General of the Army having thus end- D ed that war, provided to prevent them if hereafter they did attempt the like; for he built far more ſtronger Forts then were before, ſo that the enemy could no way paſſe out of their own countrey; by which means the wars in Mæſia were quickly ended.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the River Sabbaticus, and the famous triumph of Veſpaſian and Titus.

E TItus the Emperour having ſome while remained at Berytus (as is before ſaid) and being returned from thence, he ſhewed many ſpectacles in all the Cities of Syria, wherein he came, reſerving for that purpoſe the Jewes that were captives, to let all men underſtand of their overthrow; in his journey, he beheld a river worth the recital, which runneth in the midſt between Arcas and Raphaneas, two Cities of the kingdome of Agrippa, which had a miraculous nature: for when it floweth it is very full of water, and runneth with a ſwift ſtream; yet having flowed ſix dayes, it is on the ſeventh day ſo dry that you may ſee the bottome, and ſo continueth his courſe; which for this cauſe the Jews called Sabbaticus, taking the name thereof from the Jews Sabbath, which is the ſeventh day. When the Antiochians underſtood that Titus was coming to their City, F they could not contain themſelves within their walls for joy, but all went out to met him; and not onely men, but alſo women and children, expecting his coming thirty ſtounds of; and when he approached near unto them, they holding up their hands to him, ſaluted him with great joy, and having received many courteſies from him, they returned with him, and amongſt other acclamations, they often beſought him to baniſh the Jews out of their city. But Titus returned no anſwer, making as though he heard not what they requeſted. Yet the Jews doubtful what he would do, and what his intent was, were all in exceeding great fear. For Titus did not tarry at Antiochia, but paſſed from thence to Zeugma towards Euphrates, where Vologeſus the King of Parthians meſſenger came unto him, bringing him a golden Crown for his conqueſt of the Jewes: which he receiving, feaſted the Kings Ambaſſadours,

So the Antiochians seeing they could not attaine their former petition, requested another thing of him, to wit, that he would take away the brazen tables, wherein were engraven the Jews priviledges, but Titus would not grant that, but leaving the Jews in the same estate he found them, he departed from thence into Egypt: and as in the way he past by Jerusalem, comparing the desolation of that place with the beauty and goodly buildings that were before it was destroyed, he lamented and pitied the H overthrow thereof, not insolently rejoycing as another would have done, for having destroyed so fair and strong a City, but cursing the seditious who forced him to destroy it, not purposing to make his virtue known by the calamity of wretches. For as yet great part of the treasure of the City was found in the ruines, and some the Romanes found of themselves; but the most they got, the captives told them of, which was gold and silver, and other precious things buried by the owners in the earth, being uncertain what would betide them. Titus going forward in his journey speedily past the wilderneſſe, and came to Alexandria: and determining now to sayle unto Italy, he sent the two legions that accompanied him unto the places from whence they came, the fifth into Mæssia, the fifteenth into Pannonia, commanding John and Simon Captains of the prisoners and others, to the number of seven hundred, all of goodly stature and beautiful, to be carried presently into Italy, meaning to I use them in his triumph. When he was now arrived at Rome as he desired, the people were so affected towards him, as if he had been their father, and came to meet him. Vespasian also honoured his son Titus, meeting him in his own person with great joy: all the citizens likewise received him with exceeding joy, seeing that now the father and his two sons were met. Within a few dayes after they purposed to make a triumph in common, but the Senate had decreed a private and peculiar triumph, for their valiant deeds: and in the day perfixed for the same, no man in all the City remained at home, but every one got a place to stand in, that they might see the Emperours, leaving onely roome between them for their passage. All the souldiers before it was day light, every one with his Captain in companies, came and expected the Emperour, not at the Palace gate, but near the Temple of Isis (for the Emperours that night lodged there) and at day-break Vespasian and K Titus came forth both crowned with Lawrel, and in purple garments made after their countrey fashion, and they went unto Octavians walks, where the Senate, Captains and Knights expected their coming. Before the porch was made a tribunal, and in it placed seats of Ivory which they ascending sate down in, and presently all the souldiers with a loud voice declared their valour and fortitude. The Emperours were unarmed and cloathed in silk, and crowned with Lawrel. Vespasian having received their praises, they offering still to speake more in his commendations he beckned with his hand, and made a sign unto them to be silent: which being done, he arose up, and covering the greatest part of his head with his garment, he performed his solemn vowes, and Titus also did the like. That done, Vespasian speak unto them all in general in few words, and so dismissed the souldiers to go to dinner, which according to the custome, the Emperour was to provide for them: himself departed from L thew to the triumphant gate so called, for that all triumphs passed that way, and they did eat meat, and put on triumphant apparel,. having offered sacrifies unto the Gods that were placed by the gate, and so went in triumph all along the place where people strived to see them, to the end that all people might have a better view of them. But the spectales there exhibited, both for number, variety, and costlinesse, cannot be described sufficiently, being excellent in all things, which any man could devise, both workmanship, riches, and varieties, and novelties of nature. For almost all things that ever were in any place amongst men that lived in felicity, either rich or beautiful, and pleasant to behold, all of them were that day shewed and seen in that triumph, giving a testimony of the large dominions of the Romanes. For there was such store of works of gold, silver, and Ivory, that M one would not have deemed them to have been made onely for the pompe of that day, but to have been so plentiful, as if they had flowed all about the City: some carried fine tapestry made all sorts of purple, othersome carried others diligently wrought with pictures and Babylonian work, and there were so many gemmes and precious stones, some set in crowns of gold, some in other works, that it appeared, that without reason, we judged them to be rare and scarce, Moreover, the pictures of their gods were carried with them, which were admirable both for greatnesse and workmanship, and all of precious matter. And divers sorts

The most precious garments.

A sorts of living creatures were there to be seen, all adorned with some attire, agreeing and alluding unto their nature. There was also an infinite multitude of men, in purple garments over-wrought with gold, which carried all these things, and they who were separated from the rest to be seen, were attired in such garments. that as many as beheld them admired. The captives went not without their gorgerous attires, but the variety & beauty of the garments hid all the deformity of their bodies, which hapned through their bad usage. The Pageants that were born in that triumph, were of an admirable bigness, so that the people that beheld them, wondred how it was possible that men should carry them: for many were builded with three or four lofts one above another, surpassing all that can be imagined of them for work and cost, for many of them were hanged about with Tapestry of golds and all things annexed unto them, whereon they were carried, were made of wrought gold or Ivory. Therein was curiously represented the manner of war, and all stratagems, and manners of fighting, that could be devised; some in one part of the Pageant, some in another. There might one have beheld a most fertil and fortunate land destroyed, and all the army of enemies to be slain, and some flying, others taken prisoners, and strong and huge wals battered down with Rammes, and Castles and strong holds destroyed, and the wals of populous Cities to be ruined, and the army entring the wals, all places filled with massacred men, and how those that were not able to fight, yeelding themselves, asked mercy, the Temples set on fire, and after all else was wasted, the houses thrown down upon their owners heads, and a river representnig sorrow, not flowing as it was wont, into tilled places, and to serve the use of man, nor for cattel to drink, but into a country which was in every part burning, and invironed with flame, all which the Jews in their wars endured. These things were so artificially represented unto their views that had not seen them, as though they were now a doing. Before every Pageant went the Captain of the City, representing the manner how it was taken. After all these followed many ships, and in every place were carried the spoils taken in war: amongst all which, those that were taken in the Temple of Jerusalem, were most excellent, for there was a golden table weighing many talents, and likewise a golden Candlestick, the use whereof was now not such as we were wont to put it unto, for in the midst of the stem thereof was fixed a base, and out of it proceeded many small branches, framed like a three forked spear, every one being at the top made like a Lamp, which were seven in number, shewing the honour of the seventh day, which is called the Sabbath amongst the Jews. After all this, was carried the Jews Law, which was the last of all the spoils. Then followed many that carrying the image of Victory, all made of gold and Ivory. Afterwards came Vespasian, and after him Titus, and with him Domitian gallantly adorned, and mounted upon an excellent horse, and so they went all to the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and there was the end of all this pomp, where they made some abode.

The last of the spoils was the Law of the Jews.

For it was an ancient custome of their countrey, to repose themselves there till some came and brought news unto them, of the death of him, who was General of their enemies. This as then was Simon Giora, who was also carried in the triumph, and having a rope fastned about his neck, was drawn all along the market place, where they that drew him did kill him. For it is the custome of the Romanes, there to put malefactors to death that are condemned. After word was brought that he was dead, all the people made joyful exclamations, and so they began to sacrifice: which done according to the custome, they returned into the Palace, and they feasted some, othersome had prepared banquets for themselves at their own houses. For this day was sacred amongst the Romanes, in joy of the victory over their enemies, and an end of civil calamity, and the beginning of good fortune and hope, which they had in their new Princes. When the triumphs were ended, and all the Romane Empire quieted, Vespasian built a Temple, and dedicated it unto Peace, which he did in so short a space as it was admirable: and having bestowed great cost upon it, he also beautified it with divers pictures and carved works. And he placed in that Temple all things that men of former ages had come to see, from the uttermost parts of the earth. And he placed there all the golden vessels, and other necessaries that the Jews used in their Temple, doing them great reverence. But their law and the Tapestry or purple veil of the Sanctuary he commanded to be kept in the Palace.

CHAP. XXV.

How Herodium and Macherus were taken by Bassus.

CÆsar sent Lucius Basilius into Judæa to be Lieutenant there, who receiving an army of Cerealis Petilianus, he took the Castle and garrison of Herodium, being yeelded unto him. After this, gathering together all his army, who were dispersed in divers places of the countrey, he with the tenth legion purposed to war against Macherus; for he thought it necessary to destroy that Castle, lest that for the strength it might move many to rebel: for by reason of the situation of the place, they that were in it, had certain hope of their safety, and those that sought to assault it, were in great danger. For it was built upon a rock that was exceeding high, which made it almost inexpugnable; and nature had so devised, that it is hard to come unto it, who hath environed it round about with valleys; so deep, that the bottome thereof cannot be described, neither could one passe over them, nor fill them up: for that which is on the West part is threescore stounds large, and endeth at the lake Asphaltites, and on this side Macherus hath a very high prospect, and it is environed on the North and South with valleys of the like measure that the former is, whereby it is impossible to win the Castle; but that valley which is on the East side, is at least a hundred cubits deep, and it endeth upon a mountain near unto Macherus. King Alexander seeing the nature of the place did there build a Castle, which afterward Gabinius in the war against Aristobulus destroyed. But Herod when he was King, judged this place worthy to be fortified, as a principal defence against the neighbouring Arabians. For it was aptly situate upon a mountain, where one might behold their borders: wherefore making a large wall, he builded a Citie there in the place that men do enter unto the Castle: he also compassed the very top thereof with another wall, and in the corners he placed towers that were threescore cubits high, and in the very midst of all he built a Palace, for largenesse and beauty admirable, and made many cisterns to receive water in convenient places, which served the people abundantly, as it were striving with nature, that the places which she had made inexpugnable, he by Art might make places more strong then that was. He also laid up there in store, arrows and engines, and made all provision wherewith the Inhabitants might be able to hold out a great siege.

Herod environeth Macherus with a great wall and tower.

Wonderful store of arrows and other engines in this tower.

In the Kings Palace, there grew the herb called Rue, which was very admirable for the greatnesse, for there was no fig-tree taller or broader then it; and it was reported that it had continued ever since Herods time, and had endured longer, had not the Jews inhabitants of the place cut it down. In the valley that lyeth on the North side of the City, there is a place called Baaras, where also groweth a root of the same name, the colour whereof resembleth the flame, and it shineth at night like the Sun-beams, and is not easie to be pulled up, till that one cast upon it the urine of a woman or her flowers: which done, whosoever toucheth it is sure to die, except he carry the root hanging on his hand. It is also gathered another way without danger, after this manner: They dig all round about it, so that they leave a very little of the root covered with earth, and then they tie a dog unto it, which striving to follow his master who maketh as though he would go away, he easily pulleth up the root, and the dog presently dieth, as it were in his stead that seeketh to get it, so that afterward none that handleth it or taketh it, need to stand in fear thereof. This herb notwithstanding all this danger is diligently sought out for the virtue it hath. For it driveth away devils (which are the spirits of wicked men) out of mens bodies, if it be but applyed unto them, whereas otherwise if they had no help, these devils possessing their bodies would kill them. Out of that place also do spring certain hot waters, very different in taste one from another; for some are bitter, some sweet, there are also sources of cold waters, one near unto another in a Plain: but which is most admirable, there is a cave hard by, not very deep, environed with an eminent rock above, from the which there cometh as it were two dugges or paps hard by one another, and out of the one of them there floweth very cold water, out of the other very hot; which mingled together make a pleasant bath, and serve to cure many diseases, and especially helpeth all pains of the sinews. In the same place also are mynes of Sulphure and Alome.

Rue, of admirable greatnes.

Bassus having veiwed this place on every side, resolved to besiege it, and endeavoured to fill up the valley that was on the East side, and so make a way unto it: which he began to do, hastning

A haſtning to raiſe a very high mount, and ſo make it eaſie to be taken. Thoſe that were inhabitants, conſtrained the Jews that were ſtrangers, to go into the lower City, judging them an unprofitable multitude, and ſo cauſed them to endure the firſt brunt of the enemies, and they themſelves kept the Caſtle, both for that it was ſtrong, and alſo to preſerve themſelves, hoping that by yielding the place unto the Romanes, they might obtain pardon of them; yet firſt they purpoſed to make triall if they could avoid the ſiege: and therefore very couragiouſly, every day they made excurſions, and fought with them they found, and many were ſlain on both parts. Fortune and opportunity ſometime cauſed one to be victors, ſometime another: for the Jews got the beſt when they could aſſault the Romanes, at unB awares, and the Romanes overcame, when they were aware of the Iews coming and armed themſelves. But the ſiege was not ended by theſe skirmiſhes: yet a chance befell, that forced the Iews to yeild their Caſtle. Amongſt them that were beſieged was one Eleazar a young man, and very hardy and bold in any enterprize, who oftentimes made excurſions and fought to hinder the Romanes work, who alwaies in every fight did greatly endamage the Romanes, and by his valour and adventurous courage, he gave them that were his fellows opportunity to aſſault the Romanes, and to flie again and retire in ſafety, himſelf being alwaies the laſt that ſo retired. It hapned one day that the fight being ended, and both parts parted, he as it were contemning all men, and thinking that none of his enemies durſt undertake to C combate with him, ſtaied without the gate, ſpeaking to them that were upon the wall, and giving great attention unto them. Then one Rufus an Egyptian one of the Romane army, eſpying this opportunity; ran upon him ſo ſuddenly, that he at unawares took him all armed as he was, and they upon the walls ſtood amazed, whileſt Rufus led him unto the Romanes camp. Then the Generall of the Romanes cauſed him to be led into a place, where they in the city might ſee him, and there to have all his cloaths taken off him, and whipped; and the misfortune of this young man did greatly diſcourage the Iews, and all the city was reſolved into tears for the calamity of that one man. Baſſus ſeeing this, he deviſed this counſell againſt them; for he ſought to move them ſo to compaſſion, that for to ſave him they ſhould yeild their caſtle: which fell out as he deſired. For he preſently commanded a croſſe to be D erected, as though he would preſently have crucified Eleazar: which ſight greatly moved them in the caſtle to ſorrow: ſo that now with loud cries they lamented, ſaying that this calamity was inſupportable: Then Eleazar beſought them not to deſpiſe him, who was now to die a moſt miſerable death: and moreover to provide for their own ſafety in yeilding the Caſtle unto the Romanes vertue and fortunate ſucceſſe.

Then they moved with his words, and many alſo within the City intreating for him (for he came of a great parentage and had many kinsfolks,) though contrary to their natures, compaſſion took place in them: and ſo ſending ſome of their company ſpeedily, they deſired to parley, affirming they would yeild their caſtle, upon condition that they might ſafely depart away, and Eleazar might be likewiſe reſtored unto them. Which offer of theirs, the Romanes accepted; and the Jews in the lower part of the city having intelligence of this E covenant, reſolved themſelves to flie away in the night: but ſo ſoon as they had opened their gates, thoſe that had agreed with Baſſus, gave him intelligence thereof; either envying that their countreymen ſhould eſcape, or elſe fearing that Baſſus would puniſh them for their flight: yet for all this, the moſt valiant of them that fled, eſcaped, who were gone before the reſt, and the reſt were ſlain to the number of 1000 and 700 men, for the women and children were made bondſlaves. And Baſſus thinking it meet to keep his promiſe unto them of the caſtle permitted them ſafely to depart, and reſtored Eleazar unto them.

Of the Jews that Baſſus ſlew: and how he ſold Judæa.

HIs done, he prepared to carry his army into the paſture called Jardes, for he had notice that many Jews were there aſſembled together, who had eſcaped from Jeruſalem & Machæra during the ſiege. So coming unto the place, and finding it to be as it was reported unto him: he firſt of all invironed it with horſemen, that if any of the Jews ſought to eſcape, the horſemen might withſtand them, and he commanded the footmen to cut down the wood, into the which they fled to hide themſelves. ping by a courageous fight to find opportunitie to flie: wherefore they altogether with a cry violently assaulted them by whom they were invironed, and they did valiantly withstand them, and by their valour, and the Iews desperation the fight endured a long time: yet the event of the war was not like unto the rest of the fight, for onlie twelve Romanes were slain and very few wounded, and all the Jews were slain in that fight, being in number three thousand; and their Captain Judas the son of Iairus (of whom we have already made mention, who during the siege of Jerusalem was Commander of a company there) hid himself in a certain cave, and secretly escaped from thence. At that time Cæsar writ unto Liberius Maximus his Governour, and unto Bassus, to sell Judæa: for he did not build in all the countrey and citie, but appropriated it unto himself, leaving there onely eight hundred souldiers, and giving them a place to dwell in called Emaus, thirtie stounds distant from Jerusalem, & he imposed a tribute upon all Jews whersoever they lived, commanding every one of them every year to bring two drachmes into the Capitol, according as in former times they were wont to pay unto the Temple of Jerusalem: and this was the estate of the Jewes at that time.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the death of King Antiochus: and how the Alans invaded Armenia.

Cesennius Petus President of Syria, accuseth Antiochus before Cæsar.

IN the fourth year of Vespasians reign, it hapned that Antiochus King of the Comagenes with all his familie fell into great miserie upon this occasion; Cesennius Petus Governour of Syria (either for envie, or for that indeed it was so, for it is not well known) sent letters unto Cæsar, declaring unto him that Antiochus was determined to revolt from the Romanes, together with his son Epiphanes, and had made a league with the King of the Parthians, and that therefore it was necessarie to prevent them in time, lest that if they first began to revolt openlie, they might trouble all the Romane Empire with wars. Cæsar did not neglect these news, for that the nearnesse of both the Kings countries one to another, seemed to require that they should be quickly prevented: for Samosata the greatest Citie of Comagena is situate upon Euphrates, which might both easilie receive the Parthians, and be a strong hold for them, and also there might easilie passe over the river. Wherefore Vespasian beleeving it, permitted him to do what he thought expedient: and he forthwith, Antiochus thinking nothing, suddenly entred into Comagena, with the sixt legion, and certain other companies of footmen, and troupes of horsmen, accompanied with Aristobulus King of Chalcis, and Sohemus King of Emesa, who came to assist him. So they entred the countrey without any fight, for none of the inhabitants offered to resist.

Antiochus is suddenly invaded by Cesennius.

Antiochus daunted with these unexpected news, did not so much as think of any warre against the Romanes, wherefore he determined to leave the whole Kingdome in that estate that then it was in, and with his wife and children depart from thence, hoping hereby to clear himself unto the Romanes, from that which they suspected of him: and going almost a hundred and thirtie stounds from the City into a field, there he placed a Tabernacle. And Petus sent men unto Samosata to take it, and left them to keep the City, and he with the rest of the souldiers purposed to go against Antiochus. But for all this the King though by necessity urged thereto, yet would he not fight against the Romanes, but bewailing his misfortune, endured patiently all whatsoever: but his sons being lustie strong young men, and skilful in martial affairs, could not easily abstain from fight in that their distresse. Wherefore Epiphanes and Callinicus his two sons, had recourse unto their forces, and in a great fight that endured a whole day, they shewed their valour, and departed receiving no losse. But Antiochus after this fight would not any longer abide in his countrey, but taking his wife and daughters he fled into Cilicia, and thereby discouraged his souldiers, who despairing to keep the kingdome for him, revolted unto the Romanes. But Epiphanes and the rest were forced to seek to save themselves, before such time as they were left destitute, and so accompanied with ten horsmen, they passed the river Euphrates: and thus being out of danger they came to Vologesus, of whom they were received, not as fugitives, but with great honour, and according to their degree, as though they yet possessed their ancient dignitie. And Petus coming to Tarsus of Cilicia, he sent a Centurion to carry Antiochus bound unto Rome. But Vespasian permitted not a King to be so brought unto Epiphanes, and they with him hearing this were eaſed of the great care they took for their father, whom they greatly feared to be fallen into ſome danger, and now they alſo conceived ſome hope to be reconciled unto Cæſar. Whereof Vologeſus writing unto Cæſar (for they were contented to live out of the Romane Empire, notwithſtanding that they were honourably entertained) Cæſar courteouſly gave them leave, and they came to Rome, and their B father was preſently ſent for unto them from Lacedemon, and ſo remained at Rome in great honour. Having therefore licence to rob and ſpoil, for that no man reſiſted them, they came into Armenia, and waſted all the countrey thereabout: and Tyridates was then King of that countrey, who with an army coming to fight againſt them, was al- C moſt by them taken alive in the battel; for one caſt a halter about him and began to draw him amongſt the enemies: and ſo had done, but that he with his ſword did quickly cut the rope and fled: and they being more enraged, by reaſon he fought againſt them, waſted all the countrey, and carrying with them a huge multitude of men and cattel out of both countries, they returned into their own.

D Baſſus dying in Iudæa, Flavius Silva ſucceeded in his place, and now perceiving that all the countrey elſe were conquered ſave one onely Caſtle, he with all the forces he could make went againſt it. This Caſtle is called Maſſada. The Captain of the Sicarians named Eleazar, who firſt invaded it, was a very ſtrong and valiant man, born of the tribe of Juda, who perſwaded a great many Jews as is before ſaid, not to enroule themſelves when Cyrenæus was Cenſor, and ſent to taxe Judæa. For at that time the Sicarians had conſpired againſt them that obeyed the Romans, and in all things uſed them like enemies, taking and driving away their goods, and firing their houſes, affirming that they did not any thing differ from ſtrangers, who betrayed the libertie of their countrey, rather then they would fight for it, and that they had rather have them war on the Romanes ſide. The yeer of the world, 4038. after Chriſts nativitie. 76.

E But that was onely an excuſe to hide their avarice and injurious dealing as the proof made manifeſt, for they themſelves revolted and bare armes againſt the Romanes, and their enterprizes againſt the Romanes were worſe then the reſt, and when their firſt forged pretence was known and confuted, they did rage more then before againſt thoſe that upbraided them with it. For that time amongſt the Jews abounded with all manner of iniquitie, ſo that none was left undone: yea, though one endeavoured to invent ſome new villanies, yet could he deviſe none that was not then practiſed: all laboured with this malady, both in particular, and in common, and every one did ſtrive with other, to ſurpaſſe his fellow in impiety againſt God, and injuſtice towards his neighbour. The mighty vexed the weaker ſort, and the meaner ſort deſtroyed the Potentates, and took their riches away from them; they gaped F after rule and dominion, theſe after miſchief.

The time among the Iews which was moſt fruitful in all manner of impiety.

The Sicarians were the firſt that were ſo cruel and injurious againſt their neighbours: for not provoked thereunto, neither by deed nor word, they ſlew and injured all men without cauſe, but John ſhewed them to be very moderate. For he did not onely ſlay all that counſelled that which was good and profitable, as his greateſt enemies, and eſpecially dealing thus with the citizens, but alſo many wayes injured his countrey, like one who had impiouſly alſo contemned God himſelf. For he did eat forbidden meats, and violated his countries temperance:

perance: ſo that is was no wonder to ſee him obſerve no juſtice nor fidelity towards men, G who had now infringed the laws of God. Again, what villany did Simon Giora leave undone, or what injury did he abſtain from to offer unto their bodies, who had choſen him for their ruler? What did kindred and friendſhip then prevail any man? ſave onely this, that it made them be more cruelly uſed, and every day be more tyrannouſly butchered, then otherwiſe. For they thought it a hainous offence to abuſe ſtrangers, and a glory to exerciſe crueltie upon their moſt familiar friends. The Idumæans were followers of this furie, who killed the high Prieſts, and left not any one of note in the Citie, whereby God might be honoured; and induced all injuſtice poſſible, wherein the zealous excelled. For they committed all miſchief, leaving nothing unattempted, that had ever before that time been practiſed: yet they took their name from them that imitated good and godlineſſe, but in truth it H was to mock and flout them that did well: ſo ſavage and cruel was their nature, or elſe accounting the greateſt impietie to be goodneſſe. But their end was as they deſerved, God puniſhed their deſert with his juſt vengeance. For even unto the latter end of their lives, they endured all the miſeries that is poſſible for mans nature to abide, being killed with divers ſorts of torments. Perhaps one will ſay that their puniſhment was not ſo great as they deſerved: but what puniſhment could be deviſed ſufficient for their deſerts? But I cannot now ſtand to lament thoſe who periſhed by theſe mens crueltie: Wherefore I will return to that where I left.

Silva the captain of the Romanes beſiegeth Maſſada.

The Romane Captain came againſt Eleazar, and them that kept Maſſada with him, who were Sicarians, and he brought an armie with him, and preſently ſubdued all the confines & borders round about, and he placed in everie fit place garriſons, and invironed the Caſtle I with a wall, leſt any of them that were beſieged ſhould eſcape, and that they that beſieged them might there keep a continual guard. Moreover, he placed his camp in a fit place for the ſiege, even there where the rock, that the Caſtle was built upon, joyned unto the other mountain, which was an unfit place to get neceſſaries in. For not onely victuals were fetcht far off by great labour of the Jews, who were commanded to do it, but alſo water for the whole armie ſomewhere elſe, for there was no fountain neer that place. This done, Silva attempted the ſiege, wherein it was requiſite for him to uſe both art and labour, by reaſon of the ſtrength of the Caſtle, which is thus ſituate. It is invironed round with a huge ſtone very high on everie ſide, and the valley underneath is ſo deep, that one cannot ſee the bottom, all K rockie, and inacceſſible to all living creatures, ſaving onelie that in two places there is a difficult paſſage unto it, one of them is from the lake Aſphaltites towards the Eaſt, and the eaſieſt of the two is the Weſt ſide: the firſt is called a Snake; taking his name of the ſtraitneſſe & and crooked turnings, for the rock that is eminent, ſeemeth as it were broken in ſunder, and by little and little often returneth again unto it ſelf, and it is by little and little extended in length, ſo that he that goeth that way, can make no haſt, but muſt ſtep with one foot firſt upon them, and the other upon another, and muſt ſtand upon one foot whileſt he removeth the other, and he that falleth is ſure to be ſlain in the fall: for there is ſuch a hollow place on either ſide between the rocks, that it is able to terrifie the boldeſt man alive. When thou haſt gone thirtie ſtounds by this way, then thou comeſt to the top of the hill, which is not L ſteep at the top, but hath a Plain about it, and Jonathan the high Prieſt was the firſt that built a caſtle in this place, and called it Maſſada: and Herod after him beſtowed great labour and coſt in building that place, for he invironed it with a wall, ſeven ſtounds circuit, all of white ſtone, twelve cubits high and eight cubits broad, and placed in it ſeven and twentie towers that were fiftie cubits high, by the which men paſſed into the houſes that were round about the wall within: for the King appointed the top of the hill for tillage, becauſe it was a more fertil and fatter ſoil then any ground elſe, ſo that if at any time they within the Caſtle wanted proviſion from other places, yet they might not be famiſhed, having this to finde them. He alſo builded in this place a Palace for himſelf, the way to which was on the Weſt ſide within the caſtle wall, whoſe proſpect was toward the North, and invironed the ſame M with a moſt ſtrong wall, and in the corners thereof he built four moſt firm towers threeſcore cubits high, very ſumptuous within, having divers rooms and galleries and baths, ſupported in every place with pillars, every one of which was one onely ſtone, the wals thereof were of ſolid ſtone of divers colours: and to every houſe, and in the top of the hill, and round about the Palace, he hewed certain ciſterns out of the rock for to bear water; ſo that by this means water was as plentiful, as though they had fountains within the Caſtle. There was a way unto the caſtle under the ground & from the Kings Palace, which they that were without could not perceive, the way above ground was inacceſſible, for as we have already Herods Palace.

A already ſaid, the way on the Eaſt ſide no man could paſſe, and as for that on the Weſt ſide, it was ſtopt up with a tower built in the ſtreight thereof diſtant a thouſand cubits from the Caſtle by which it was impoſſible to paſs, and it was not eaſie to get it by force, and the more leiſurely they went, the neerer they were to danger. And thus was this Fortreſs ſtrengthned both by Art and Nature. The yeer of the world, 4038. after Chriſts nativity, 76. A tower to the Weſt ſide.

The proviſion within the Caſtle was admirable both for the magnificence thereof, and alſo for the long time it had continued, for their was corn ſufficient for many yeers, and Wine and Oyl and divers other proviſion and heaps of Dates. All which Eleazar found readie there, having deceitfully obtained the Caſtle with his Sicarians, which proviſion was all as ſound and as freſh, as though it had newly been laid up in ſtore: notwithſtanding, that from Great ſtore of proviſion in the Caſtle.

B the time it remained there, unto the time that the Romanes took it, were a hundreth yeers, and the Romanes found the reliqves of the fruit incorrupted: and one may juſtly think that the cauſe hereof is the Air about the Caſtle, which by reaſon of the height of the place is moſt pure, and free from all earthly corruption. There was alſo found all maner of Armour in great quantitie, which Herod made, and would have armed ten thouſand men; alſo unwrought Iron, braſſe and lead, ſo that one may judge that proviſion to have been reſerved for ſome great cauſe. It is reported that Herod prepared that Caſtle for his refuge, when he doubted two great dangers, firſt, that the people of the Jewes would depoſe him; and make them Kings whoſe anceſtors had before reigned. Fruit for an hundred yeers kept uncorrupt.

C The other which was more dangerous then the firſt, was, for that he feared Cleopatra Queen of Egypt, who not concealing her intent, did often requeſt Antonius that Herod might be ſlain, and that ſhe might have the Kingdome of the Jews given unto her. And it was a great marvel that Antonius doting ſo upon her, did not fulfil her requeſt. Herod for theſe occaſions having builded Maſſada, left it unfurniſhed at the laſt bulwark for the Romans to make war againſt the Jews. For the General of the Romans, having now compaſſed all the place without it with a wall, (as is before ſaid) to the end that none might eſcape, he did very wiſely, and ſo began to aſſault the Caſtle, finding one onely place that would bear a mount. For behind the Tower, that on the Weſt ſide ſtopped up the paſſage into the Caſtle and Palace, there was a great rock very large and long, yet not ſo high as Maſſada by three hundreth cubits. The rock was called Leuce, which ſignifieth white. When Silva had gotten this rock, Herod ſuſpecting a double peril, builded the place for a refuge.

D and aſcended it, he commanded his ſouldiers to build a mount thereupon; and they cheerfully labouring, raiſed a ſudden mount two hundreth cubits high: by reaſon of the height it ſeemed not firme nor ſufficient enough to bear the Engines, but upon it was built a Tribunal with great ſtones fiftie cubits high, and as many cubits broad, and the Engines were ſuch as firſt Veſpaſian, and after him Titus deviſed to batter walls with, and ſo they made a Tower threeſcore cubits high, all plated about with iron. There was but one place about Maſſada to raiſe a mount to batter on.

Now the Romans with many ſhot did drive the Jews from off the Caſtle wals, not ſuffering them to lift up their heads. And Silva having builded a mighty Ramme, cauſed the wall to be continually battered therewith, but it could ſcarcely enter upon: and the Sicarians quickly prevented that, building another wall within, which could not be broken with the

E the Ramme being yet ſoft, and ſo would break the force thereof, for they did ſawe timber in pieces, and as it were made two rails, and then filled the ſpace between the two rails with earth, and with other planks they kept the earth from falling down, ſo that they made a work like the wall of a houſe, and for that it yielded unto the blowes of the Ramme (being ſoft earth) the Ramme could not prevail againſt it, but rather made it more ſtrong then before, by ramming the morter together. The Citie battered with a large Ramme, and by Silvas appointment.

Silva perceiving this, judged that he might ſooner deſtroy the wall with fire then with his Engine: and ſo he commanded the ſouldiers to caſt upon it many burning firebrands, and the fire did quickly take hold of the wall, becauſe it was for the moſt part built with wood, and eaſily alſo pierced thorow it, by reaſon it was not clean wrought together, and there was

F a great flame. Firebrands darted againſt the walls.

At the very beginning of the fire, the North winde did greatly annoy the Romanes, for the fire blowing furiouſly from above againſt them that were Romanes, it did drive it extremely upon them, ſo that they were in great deſpair; fearing their Engines would be burnt, and preſently the wind changing and blowing from the South, (as it were by Gods providence) it turned the fire again upon the wall, and now all of it even unto the foundation thereof, was there moſt cruelly on fire. And the Romanes having Gods aſſiſtance, returned again into their Campe joyfully, purpoſing the next morning betimes to aſſail their enemies, and that night to place ſtronger watches, leſt any of the enemies ſhould eſcape. But The North wind diverting the flame, turneth it on the Romans.

Eleazar thought not to flie, neither would he permit any one of his company ſo to do. And G
The yeer of the world, 4038. after Chriſts Nativitie, 76. ſeeing now the wall was fired, and not knowing any way elſe to help himſelf, conſidering likewiſe what the Romans would do unto their wives and children if they ſhould take them, he deliberated of all their deaths, which he in that extremitie judged to be the beſt way they could take. And ſo he aſſembled the moſt valiant of all his company, and exhorted every one thereunto, after this manner.

Eleazars Oration to his companions

Valiant Champions, we long agoe reſolved our ſelves neither to ſerve the Romans, nor any other ſave onely God, for he alone is the true and juſt Lord of all men. Behold, the time is now come, that exhorteth you to ſhew your reſolute mindes: let us not therefore diſhonour our ſelves, and beſides our ſlaverie, ſuffer alſo intolerable torments if we be taken alive by the Romanes. For, we were the firſt that revolted from them, and the laſt that war againſt them. And I verily think H
Eleazar confeſſeth Gods wrath to be kindled againſt the people. that God hath given us this benefit, that we may die well in our own libertie, which he denied to other, who were overcom contrarie to all expectation. We are certain to be conquered as ſoon as it is day light: but to die valiantly with our deareſt friends, is a glorious reſolution unto valiant men, and of this our enemies cannot debar us, who do labour to take us alive, and carrie us away captives, and we are not able to vanquiſh them in fight. For truely, at the firſt (when we who coveted libertie, ſuffered all miſerie at the hands of our owne Countrey men, and worſe at the hands of our enemies) we ſhould have conſidered that God, who was ſometime favourable unto the Nation of the Jewes, had now condemned them unto perdition: for had he yet been favourable unto us, or had he been but lightly offended at us, he would not have permitted ſo many men to have periſhed, and have delivered his holy Citie into the hands of the I enemies to be conſumed with fire. And we onely amongſt all our Nation, hoped to live in liberty, as though we had no wayes offended the divine Majeſtie, nor been guiltie of any offence, who indeed taught others iniquitie. So you ſee how we are checked for longing after vain hope, being brought into greater extremitie then we expected. Neither hath our Caſtle by nature inexpugnable, any thing profited us to our preſervation, but we having ſtore of victuals and armour, and all other neceſſaries, have loſt all hope of ſafety, God himſelfe openly taking it from us. For, the fire that once was carried againſt our enemies, did not of it ſelfe return againſt us and unto the wall we built.

The puniſhment of thoſe crimes which the Iews impiouſly attempted againſt the Gentiles.

But it was the puniſhment of our offences, who furiouſly raged againſt our own nation. For the K which I requeſt you, let us not be puniſhed by the Romanes; whoſe forces are invincible, but by our ſelves, let us ſatisfie the ire of God, and ſo it will be more tolerable for us; even by that means our wives ſhall die undefiled, and our children ſhall not taſte of ſervile captivitie. After whoſe deaths, we will one help another to die with credit, concerning our libertie, which is the beſt ſepulture of all: yet let us firſt fire our Caſtle, and burn our treaſure: for it will be no ſmall grief unto the Romanes, if they neither get our bodies alive, nor can finde any one jot of our riches for recompence of their labour. Let us onely leave our victuals as a ſufficient teſtimony, that famine did not at any time cauſe us to be conquered, but that wee, as at firſt wee reſolved, preferred death before bondage.

The beſt grave is when libertie is maintained.

Eleazar, having thus ſpoken, they that were preſent did not all accord unto him, for ſome joyfully haſted to execute his advice, thinking it ſo glorious a death. But they who moved with compaſſion towards their wives and families, were ſomthing effeminate, or elſe L abhorred to kill themſelves, one looking upon another with teares, did ſhew his minde to diſagree from that which Eleazar perſwaded. Which when Eleazar perceived, and that his counſell through fear was defeated, fearing alſo that they who courageouſly had accorded thereunto, would be withdrawn by the tears of others, he did not ſo end his exhortation; but ſtanding up; and with a vehement ſpirit, he began to ſpeak unto them of the immortalitie of the ſoul, and fixing his eyes upon them that wept, he uſed a vehement exclamation, ſaying:

Eleazars Oration touching the immortalitie of the ſoul.

"How much am I deceived, who thought that valiant men fighting for their liberty, would "rather chuſe to die then to live? but ye do ſhew your ſelves nothing to excel any ordinary
"men, who fear to die, notwithſtanding, that thereby you may eſcape great miſery, and cala- M
"mitie, when in this point you ought not to have expected any admonition thereunto, nor to "have made any delay to do it. The ancient cuſtomes, which have endured ever ſince men "had reaſon, the divine doctrine of our nation, which hath continually bin confirmed by the "deeds of our predeceſſours, do inſtruct us, that it is miſerie to live, and not to die. For death
"freeth our ſouls from priſon unto their moſt pure and proper place, where never after they "ſhall be touched with calamitie. Which whileſt they are bound in a mortal bodie, and do
"participate of his miſeries, may probably be affirmed to be dead. For it is an unſeemly

"con-

A "conjunction for that which is divine, to be coupled and conexed unto that which is mortall:
"True it is, that our ſouls can do much being joyned to our bodies, for they uſe the bodies as "their inſtruments, ſecretly producing in them motion, and many other actions paſſing the "nature of mortall things. But when the ſoul is looſed from that heavie burthen which doth
"weigh it down even unto the earth, which hangeth upon it, and hath received his proper "habitation, then it enjoyeth free and perfect felicitie, and remaineth inviſible to our "mortall eyes as God himſelf is, neither is it viſible in our bodies. For it cometh ſecretly "into them, and ſo departeth from them again, that no man can perceive it, having onely a "nature incorrupt, and cauſing a change in our bodies. For whatſoever the ſoul toucheth, "that preſently liveth and flouriſheth; and what it forſaketh, that incontinently withereth
B "and dieth: ſo much doth it participate of immortalitie. The ſleep may be an evident argu"ment unto you of this which I ſpeake, where the ſoul not diſtracted, taketh a moſt pleaſant
"and ſweet repoſe; and communicating with God, it is with him preſent in every place by
"reaſon of affinitie, and foretelleth many future events. Wherefore ſhould we then fear death
"who love the reſt that we have in ſleep? were not he a mad man that for a ſhort life would "hinder himſelf of eternal life? It were neceſſary that we who are inſtructed in the law of our "nation, ſhould give example to others to deſpiſe and contemn death. But if we ſeek confir"mation hereof from ſtrangers, let us ſee the example amongſt the wiſer ſort of the Indians:
"for they being juſt men do tolerate this life as a neceſſary office of nature for a certain time,
"though againſt their wils; yet do they haſten to unlooſ the ſoul bound in this mortal body
C "though not urged thereunto by any calamitie or neceſſitie, but only for deſire of immorta-
"litie, telling others that they will depart out of this life; neither doth any one ſeek to hinder
"them, but all men eſteeming them moſt fortunate, ſend by them commendations and other "meſſages unto their friends departed: ſo firm is their belief that the ſouls of them that are "dead have communion and converſation together: And ſo they having all inſtruction what "to ſay to the ſouls departed, do with great applauſe leap into the fire, that thereby their "ſouls may be purified from their bodies. And their friends go more joifully with them when "they go to their deaths, then any doth that bringeth his friend on the way when he is to go
"a great journey; and they bewail themſelves, not thoſe who are dead and have attained im"mortality. Shall not we then be aſhamed not to believe ſo firmly as the Indians do? deſpiſing D "through our own ſloth our countrie laws which are to be emulated of all men? Nay, ſuppo-
"ſing that by our law we had bin inſtructed contrariwiſe, to wit, that to live in this life is bliſ,
"and to die is calamity: yet notwithſtanding, this preſent neceſſitie, this preſent time had bin
"a ſufficient motive to cauſe us to embrace death rather then life, ſeeing that by Gods ap"pointment, and of neceſſitie we muſt needs die. In times paſt it appeareth God ſo provided,
"that he ſhortned the daies of our own nation, that would not uſe their life as they ought to "have done. I dare not aſcribe it unto the Romanes, nor report of our ſelves that their wars
"conſumed us all. For this did not happen through their forces, but a more potent cauſe here-
"of there was which made them conquerors. Which of the Romans ſlew the Iews that inha"bited at Cæſarea? whom the inhabitants thereof upon the Sabbath day, they being aſſem-E "bled in one place together with their wives and children, did maſſacre, notwithſtanding, that "they had no intent to revolt from them, nor never lifted up their hands in their own defence
"nothing fearing the Romans, who only accounted them of our nation their enemies that "revolted from them. But ſome may object the Jews at Cæſarea, and the inhabitants thereof "were alwaies at variance, and that now they revenged their old quarrel, having gotten op"portunitie. What then ſhal we ſay of the Scythopolitans? who bare arms with the Græcians "againſt us, and denied to aſſiſt their own kindred againſt the Romans. What profit did they "receive by this their good will and fidelitie? for they were altogether with their whole fa"milies cruelly ſlain, and this was the reward they had for their labour, for having withſtood
"us to have done the like unto them; it were too long to recount all things ſeverally to this F "effect. For as ye know there is no citie in all Syria that hath not maſſacred the Jewes there
"inhabiting, being more our enemies then the Romans were, where they of Damaſcus, al"though they could not deviſe any probable cauſe for it, yet did they maſſacre all the Jewes
"living among them, who amounted to the number of eighteen thouſand, beſide their wives "and families. And as we have heard it reported, the number of the Jewes ſlain by the Egyp"tians were above 60000. It may be that finding no adverſitie in a ſtrange countrey they "were put to death by their enemies: but they that in their own Countrey fought a-
"gainſt the Romans, wanted nothing that might have cauſed a perfect hope of a full victory "over the Romans, they had weapons, armour, wals, and ſtrong holds inexpugnable; their

"valorous courage in fighting for libertie shunned no danger, and encouraged men to revolt: G "which all, having a while served their turns, at last was a cause of their greater miserie. For all
"were taken and subdued by the enemies, as though they had been built and made to make "their enemies victorie more famous, and not to doe them service. And we may justly deem
"them happie who were slain in the warre, for they died in libertie. Yet who doth not pitie
"the multitude of them that fell into the Romans hands; or who would not hasten to die, ra"ther then endure the like misery that they suffered? Some of them being tortured, and some "with fire and stripes perished; and others half eaten of wild beasts, were reserved alive for "their second food: and they are most miserable of all that are yet alive, who often wish for "death and cannot find it. Where is now that gorgeous Citie? where is it that was once the "mother citie of all the nation of the Jews? so strengthned with such strong wals, so fortified H "with towers and castles to defend the wals, scarcely able to contain the provision made for "war, having in it so huge a multitude of men to fight for it; what is it now become,
"wherein God himself was thought to dwell? It is now razed down even unto the very "foundations; and no other memory or reliques thereof is left standing; their camp is de"stroyed, only a few old men and unhappy survive, who sate among the ashes of the Temple,
"& a few women whom the enemies reserved to satisfie their filthy lust. And wil any amongst "us, considering all these things, desire to behold the light of the Sun, although he could live "without molestation? Who is such an enemy to his native soyle? who is so effeminate, or "desirous of his life, that doth not grieve to have lived till this time? would God we had "been all in our graves, before we had seen that sacred Citie fired by a hostile hand, before I
"we beheld the holy Temple destroyed by impietie: and seeing that the hope we had to be
"revenged upon our enemies, is now vanished away, and that we are left alone in misery and "necessitie, let us hasten to die well, and take compassion upon our selves, our wives and chil"dren, and that whilest we have time, to compassionate our selves. For both we are born to "die, and all that are begotten by us, and the strongest men living cannot avoid it: but injury "and bondage, and to see our wives and children abused before our faces, is no necessitie pro"ceeding from mans nature, but they onely are forced to endure it, who when they might "have died without it, did refuse for fear. We first of all trusting to our strength, rebelled "against the Romanes; Now lastly, they exhorting us to obedience, we denied: which
"of them then will not be enraged against us, if they can take us alive? Most miserable shall K
"those young men be, whose strength will endure many torments, and those old men will "move compassion whose aged yeers cannot suffer tortures; one shall see his wife carried a"way from him, and another his son having his hands bound behind him, cry out unto his fa"ther for help: who now whilest they are free from the thraldom of their enemies, may glo"riously assist us with their swords. Let us with our wives and children die free men, let us al"together depart out of this life. This our religion commandeth, this our wives and children
"perswadeth; God himself hath driven us unto this necessitie for this purpose. The Romans
"would have it otherwise, who fear lest any of us should perish, and not fall into their hands
"alive. Let us therefore hasten, that in stead of their expected hope, whereby they verily
"perswaded themselves to take us alive, we may contrary to their expectation daunt them "with a sudden admiration of our glorious deaths. L

It is a happines among the Jews to die free.

Whilest Eleazar was yet speaking, and desirous still to continue his exhortation, they all interrupted him: every one now in a fury bent to follow his advice, made hast to effect it; and as though they had been urged by some spirit thereunto, every one laboured to prevent one another in the execution thereof, judging him to shew most valour and fortitude, that first dispatched himself. They were also desirous to kill their wives and children with themselves. And which is most strange, their minds were nothing altered when they came to effect this bloody work; but with the same resolution they had, when they heard Eleazars speech, every one retained his good affection towards his friends: yet permitting reason to take no place, and perswading themselves that thus they had well provided for their children, they all at once embraced their wives and children for their last farewell, and took their leaves M of them, kissing them with teares, and then at once slew them, as though it had been done by the hands of other men, and not their own, comforting themselves, being forced so to do, in that hereby they should escape the tyranny and cruelty of their enemies. Finally, no man was so cowardly, who durst not presume to this action; so every one of them killed his dearest friends. O miserable people, whom necessitie forced to slay their wives and children, accounting the action thereof to be the very least of all their miseries! Wherefore, now not enduring the griefe that ensued upon this fact, and thinking that in living any

The women in the vaults heard this cry, and coming forth, declared to the Romans all that had hapned, one of them relating unto them the event of all the whole matter: yet for all this the Romans did not eaſily beleeve the words, by reaſon of the greatneſs of that fact, but they endeavoured to quench the fire, and paſſing thorow it, they preſently came into the Palace, where they beheld all the dead bodies, yet they did not inſult over them as their enemies, but admired that ſo many ſhould be ſo obſtinately minded to deſpiſe death.

The chief and Elders of the Jewes ſeeing this, and that they could not repreſſe them without danger, they aſſembled all the Jewes together, and declared unto them the temeF ritie of theſe Sicarians, ſhewing them to be the Authours of all the miſerie that had befallen the Jewes, and that now notwithſtanding they were eſcaped, yet they were not certain of their lives; for that if they were known, the Romanes would preſently put them to death, and draw them alſo into the like miſerie, who were not partakers of their wickedneſſe. Wherefore, they admoniſhed the multitude to beware leſt they drew themſelves into the ſame danger, wherein they were, and to make ſatisfaction unto the Romanes for themſelves, by delivering ſuch people unto them. For notwithstanding, that all torments and tortures that could be devised were inflicted upon them, onely to force them to confess, that Cæsar was their Lord, yet no one of them would say so, nor make any shew thereof, but all persevered in their former opinion, as though the body tormented had been dead, and not alive. Moreover, their children were most to be admired, for not one of them could be constrained to call Cæsar Lord. So much did their boldnesse overcome the torments inflicted upon their bodies.

How the Temple of Onias at Alexandria was shut up.

AT that time Lupus was Governour of Alexandria, who with all speed by letters gave Cæsar notice of these troubles. And Cæsar, seeing that it was necessary to beware of the Jewes, who were naturally enclined to sedition and unquietnesse, fearing also that they would once again gather themselves together, and cause some to joyn with them, he commanded Lupus to destroy the Temple, which Onias erected in Egypt, which was builded and named upon this occasion: Onias the son of Simon one of the high Priests, being driven out of Jerusalem, Antiochus King of Syria then warring against the Jews, he came unto Alexandria, and was courteously entertained by Ptolomæus, who was then also enemy unto Antiochus, affirming, that he would annex unto his Countrey the people of the Jewes, if he would agree to that which he required. The King according to all that could be granted, he requested him to permit him to build a Temple in some place of his Countrey, and that he might worship God therein according to the custome of their Countrey: for so the Jewes would hate Antiochus the more, who had destroyed their Temple at Jerusalem, and be friendly unto him, and many of them did flie unto him for Religion sake. Ptolomæus agreed so to doe, and gave him a piece of ground for that purpose, a hundreth and foure-score stounds from Memphis, in that place which was called the way to Heliopolis: where Onias building a Castle, made also a Temple unlike to that of Jerusalem; but he erected K a Tower like that of Jerusalem, with stones, that was threescore cubits long, and he built an Altar after the fashion of that of his Countrey, and adorned it with all manner of gifts (save onely a candlestick) which had in stead thereof a Lampe to give light, which he caused to be hung before the Altar in a golden chain, and he invironed all the Temple with a wall made of brick, and the gates he made of stone, and the King granted unto it great revenewes of money and ground, to the intent that the Priests might have abundance of all things which they required.

But Onias did not this with a good conscience, but for that he was at variance with the Jewes of Ierusalem, for that they forced him to flie: and he perswaded himself that by the building of this Temple, he might withdraw all men from Ierusalem thither; and of this, there was a Prophecie 970. yeers before, and Esaias foretold that a certain Iew should build L a Temple in Egypt. And thus that Temple was built, and Lupus having received the Emperours letters, went unto the Temple, and taking away certain gifts from it, he shut it up: And after him Paulinus who succeeded in his stead, left not one gift there (for he threatned the Priests, if they did not bring forth all) and permitted not any that came thither for to sacrifice, to come neer it; but shutting up the gate thereof, he left no signe of divine service there, and from the time it was built, till the time it was shut up, were three hundreth thirty and three yeers.

The yeer of the world, 4038. after Christs Nativity, 76.

Of the Massacre of the Jews at Cyrene.

THe boldnes of the Sicarians, like some infectious disease, infected also the Towns about Cyrene. For one John, a Weaver, and a wicked man, having escaped, perswaded many simple people to follow him, and led them into the Wilderneſſe, promising to shew them signes and visions, and thus he deceived the simplest sort of the Jews: but the noblest of them of Cyrene, understanding his deceit, gave Catullus notice of his preparation and departure, who was then Governour of Lybia; who sending horsemen and footmen, did easily surprize them being unarmed, and the most part of them were slain, yet some were taken alive, and brought to Catullus. But their leader Jonathan at that time escaped: yet being diligently laid, and sought for over all those Countreyes, he was at last taken, and being brought unto Catullus, he sought to delay his own punishment, in offering an occasion of iniquitie unto Catullus. For he accused the richest among the Jewes, to have been his advisers to doe this matter. Catullus was glad of those allegations, and exaggerated his accusations very much with tragical terms, so that he seemed to have made an end of the warres against the Jewes, and which was worst of all, to be content to credit whatsoever was maliciously spoken: he himself instructed the Sicarians to frame scandalous accusations; and commanding them to nominate one Alexander a Jew, whom he had long hated, and his wife Bernice, he put them first of all to death, and after them, all that were well moneyed, who amounted to the number of 3000. And this he thought he did without controul, because he confiscated their possessions unto Cæsar. And lest any Iew living in any other place should complain of his injustice, he extended his malicious lies against others further off, and perswaded Jonathan, and certain others that were taken with him, to accuse the most trustie and faithful Iewes at Rome, and Alexandria: one of them who were thus falsly accused, was named Joseph, who writ this Historie. But this device of Catullu, had not succes as he hoped: for he came to Rome, and brought Jonathan, and the rest bound with him, thinking that no more inquirie would be made of the false accusations invented by himself.

But Vespasian, suspecting the matter, made diligent inquirie to know the truth: and finding these crimes injuriously imposed upon those men, at Titus intreatie, he acquitted them, and punished Jonathan, according to his desert; who being first whipped, was afterward burned alive. And Catullus at that time, by reason of the mildnesse of the Emperour, had nothing said unto him: but not long after he fell into a grievous disease, and was cruelly tormented not onely in body, but also in minde. For he was greatly terrified, and still imagined to see the ghosts of them, whom he had so unjustly slain, ready to kill him; so that he cried out, and not able to contain himself, leapt out of his bed, as though he had been tortured with torments and fire. And this disease dayly increasing on, his guts and bowels rotting, and issuing out of him, at last he died in this manner, leaving behinde him an evident argument, that the Divine Iustice doth punish impious malefactours. And this is the end of the Historie, which we promised to be set down with all fidelitie, for them that are desirous to know the event of the wars between the Iews and the Romans. And as for our style, we leave it to the judgement of the Reader: but touching the veritie of the History, it is such, as no man need to doubt of; for I do affirm that to be the onely scope, which I aymed at in this whole work.

The First Book of FLAVIVS JOSEPHVS The son of MATTHIAS:

Written against APION, as touching the Antiquitie of the JEWES.

I

I Suppose, (O thou worthiest amongst worthie men! Epaphroditus) that I have sufficiently testified unto them, who shall read those Books which I have written, as touching the Authentique Historie of the Jews, that our Nation is most ancient, and that they have had their original from themselves, and have from the first beginning inhabited that Countrey, whereof they are now possessed at this present. To which effect I haue gathered out of our sacred Writings, and publisht in the Greek tongue, a Historie containing the occurrences of five thousand yeers. And for that I see there are divers, who being too much addicted and seduced by the scandalous blasphemies and reports, which some of those who are lewdly affected towards us, have published against us) have misconceited and misbelieved that which I have written of our Antiquitie, and labour to approve our Nation to be modern, because none of the most ancient, and most renowned Historiographers among the Grecians, have thought our Ancestours worthy to be enrowlled in their writings: I have for these causes held a part of my dutie to write some short Treatise hereupon; both to reprove the evill intent and affected lying of those our calumners, as also to correct their ignorance, by teaching those who are desirous to know the Truth, what the Originall of our Nation is. For proof whereof, I will produce no other Testimonie then those, who from antiquitie have been judged worthy of credit among the Greeks; laying open before their eyes, that they who have slanderously and falsely written against us, are convicted by their own mouthes: I will also enforce my self to express the causes why very few Grecians have made mention of us in their Historie: and moreover, I will make it known to those who are ignorant, (either in effect or pretence) who they have been that omitted not our History.

The History of the Antiquitie containeth the events of five thousand yeers.

K

The causes that moved him to write this Book.

L

First of all therefore, I do not a little marvel at those, (who in respect of antiquitie) suppose that the truth ought onely to be gathered from the Greeks: and that they justly may claim the honour and knowledge of faithful writing, whereas they neither vouchsafe either us, or any others, the credit or truth in that we set down, although I am able to prove, that all things have falne out quite contrary. For which cause it behoveth us not to look to mens various opinions, but to examine that which is right, and gather the same by the effects. For, whatsoever is set down by the Greeks is new, and of late memory, and hath been brought to execution in a manner but yesterday: I mean the foundations of Cities, the inventions of Arts, and the descriptions of Lawes, and the latest practice among them hath been, and is, the diligent travel in Historie.

All things among the Greeks are modern, but such things as were done among the Egyptians, Chaldees and Phœnicians, are of happy memorie and venerable antiquitie.

M

But amongst the Egyptians, Chaldees and Phœnicians (for I presume not to compare my countreymen with them) as they themselves confess, the memory of their writings is most ancient and infallible. For all these Nations dwell in such countries as are not subject to the corruption of Aire; and have carefully provided, that none of those things that have been done by them should sleep in obscuritie, but should be kept in memory in the publike writings writings of the learnedſt men: whereas innumerable corruptions have crept in among the Greeks, by which the memory of things ſo repaſſed, is defaced. But they alwayes who have eſtabliſhed new eſtates, have each of them ſuppoſed in their own behalf, that whoſoever was of theirs, he was the firſt of the world. Yet notwithſtanding they have had the knowledge of the nature of letters very late, and have attained the ſame with very great difficultie. For they that ſpake of the moſt ancient uſe of the ſame, doe boaſt and glorifie themſelves, that they have received the knowledge thereof from the Phœnicians, and Cadmus. Yet notwithſtanding, there is not any one of them that can ſhew any Record of that time, either in their Temple, or in their publike Regiſters: whereas, after, there aroſe a great doubt and queſtion, whether thoſe letters were in uſe during their time, who ſince have for the ſpace of many yeers continued the ſiege before Troy. And inſooth, their opinion who affirm that they were ignorant of the uſe of thoſe letters, which are at this preſent allowed and accuſtomed among us, is not to be refuſed. For it is moſt manifeſt, that there is not any writing extant among the Greeks that is more ancient then Homers Poeſie, which as it is moſt manifeſt, hath been in allowance and continuance ſince the time of the ſiege of Troy: and yet it is reported, that he left no part of that his Poeſie in writing, which was compoſed of divers ſongs, and onely ſung by roat; by which means it came to paſſe that there are ſo many contradictions in the ſame. And as touching thoſe who have undertaken to write Hiſtories among them, I mean Cadmus the Mileſian, and Acuſilaus the Argive, and after him if there were any others; they were not alive, but very little time before the paſſage of the Perſians into Greece. Furthermore, they who among the Greeks were the firſt that introduced Philoſophie, and the knowledge of celeſtial and divine things, that is to ſay, Pherecydes the Syrian, Pythagoras and Thales, theſe all of them confeſſe with one accord, that being inſtructed by the Egyptians and Chaldees, they have publiſhed ſome few writings, which are ſuppoſed to be the moſt ancient among the Greeks, and it is hardly believed alſo that they were written by them. What reaſon therefore have the Greeks to be ſo proud, as if there were none but themſelves onely who knew the affairs of Antiquity, and could exactly expreſſe their truth and veritie? Or who cannot eaſily conjecture by their own Writers themſelves, that their writings were only upon hearſay and ſuppoſition, and that their ſtyle was onely tied to their vain conjectures? Hence cometh it to paſſe, that in their books they cavil and reprove one another, and make no conſcience to maintain and write contradictions in one and the ſame thing.

Innumerable corruptions invaded Greece.

The Phœnicens and Cadmus the firſt inventers of letters.

Among the Greeks there is not any writing more ancient then Homers Poem.

But it may be ſaid, that I task my ſelf to a fruitleſſe labour, if I ſhould go about to inform thoſe who are better experienced then my ſelf: in how many points Hellanicus differeth from Acuſilaus as touching the Genealogie: in how many places Acuſilaus hath corrected Herodatus; or how Ephorus hath approved that Hellanicus was a lier in the greater part of that which he reciteth. Ephorus hath been reproved by Timæus; and in general, all they have taxed Herodotus. Neither hath Timæus vouchſafed to accord with Antiochus or Philiſtus, or Callias in the Hiſtories of Sicily. Neither have they who have written the Hiſtories of Athens, or thoſe who have entreated of the Argoliques, followed others. What need I reckon up thoſe who in particular have entreated of Cities, or of ſuccinct and ſhort matters? whereas in the deſcription of the Perſian warre, and thoſe exploits that were performed therein, thoſe of greateſt authoritie are moſt at oddes. Thucydides is accuſed by ſome for a lier in divers places, notwithſtanding that he ſeemeth to have deſcribed the Hiſtory of his time moſt exactly. But the cauſes of this diſcord are divers, and it may be that they who ſhall narrowly prie into them, ſhall find more. For mine own part, thoſe two which I ſhall here ſet down, in my opinion are of greateſt waight. The firſt, and in my judgement the chiefeſt, is, that amongſt the Greeks, from the begining they have not been induſtrious to keep publike Regiſters of ſuch matters as happened in any time or place: which hath made them erre, and given thoſe a priviledge to lie, who afterwards would look to write any thing of ſuch matters as were acted long ſince. Neither are the other Greeks onely to be touched with this negligence for not making account of ſuch Regiſters, but amongſt the Athenians alſo (who are reputed to be glorious for the antiquitie of their Countrey, and who are exerciſed in Sciences) there is no mention of them. For it is ſaid, that the moſt ancient and publike writing which they have, are thoſe capital lawes which were ſet down by their Lawmaker Draco, who lived but a little time before Piſiſtratus tyranny. What need we ſpeak of the Arcades, who vaunt themſelves of their antiquities? For they have learned the uſe of letters with very great difficultie, and ſome time after this: whereas therefore there was not any writing publiſhed before that time, which might inſtruct thoſe that would learn,

Thucydides writ a moſt exact Hiſtory of his time.

The cauſes of diſcord among the Iews.

learn, or reprehend those that published untruths: from thence it is, that so many differences G
Another cause of their discord recorded by the Grecian Historiographers. have happened amongst Historiographers. A second cause is, for that they, who addicted themselves to compose Histories, did not busie themselves about the inquisition of the Truth (notwithstanding, that each of them did ordinarily promise no lesse) but they laboured to expresse how eloquent they were, and fixed their whole study thereon, as the onely means whereby they hoped to obtain reputation above the rest. Some of them therefore addicted their styles to fables, other some by flattering prayses thought to currie favour with Kings and Cities. The rest inforced their studies to accusations, by obtrecting the work of the Writer thereof, under trust to get the more credit thereby. In effect they have followed that course in composing their Historie, that was every way different from the true
The sign of a true Historie. nature thereof. (For the assured sign of a perfect and true Historie is, whereas all men accord both in word and writing in setting down the same thing:) and they who have written H diversly, made men believe that they were the truest amongst all the rest. We ought therefore to grant the superioritie to the Grecians in all that which concerneth Eloquence, and the Ornament of Language, but not in that which appertaineth to Antiquitie or truth of Historie, and especially, when the question is, what each man writ as touching his own Nation.

Seeing therefore that both the Egyptians and Babylonians long time since used all diligence in writing, insomuch as their Priests were hereunto enjoyned, who did most curiously intreat of all such points: the same also did the Chaldees amongst the Babylonians, and the Phœnicians also (inhabiting amongst the Greeks) used lawes (both concerning private and I publike affairs) which, because all men confesse it, I will omit to speak of. I let passe also to recount what care our Nation had of this point (no doubt greater then those Nations above mentioned had) charging our high Priests and Prophets to execute this office, which custome hath been observed even untill this our age: yea (and if I may presume so farre) will be observed in all succeeding ages, as by the scope of my speech ensuing, I will endeavour to make manifest. For our Nation did not onely depute this office to the most just men amongst them in the beginning, and unto such as were alwayes readie to appease the heavie displeasure and wrath of God kindled against them; but they also provided to preserve the line and descent of Priests from all impuritie, and from being intermingled with others. For A custome which the Priests observed. no man amongst us can be a Priest, who is not born of a woman descended from the Priests K line; neither in this case is any respect made either of riches or honours: but the partie who claimeth the dignitie of Priesthood, must by many witnesses prove his Genealogie, and that he is descended from Priests. This custome is not onely of force in Jurie, or our own Countrey, but whersoever else any of our Nation inhabit, as in Egypt and Babylon, and in any other place, where continually the Priests in their marriages have this respect, not to marry with any woman that is not of their own line, and they send unto Jerusalem the name and pedigree of the woman whom they have married, and all testimonie hereof which they can deduce from her ancestors. Now if wars molest our Nation (as often they have) in the time of Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, of Pompey the great, Quintilius Varo, and especially in this our age, then those Priests who survive make new Genealogies, and pedigrees out of our holy writ for the foresaid women, that are not devoured by the furie of warre. For they come L unto these women, not fearing the company of strangers amongst whom they live: yea, this is an evident token of the Priests integritie, that every Priest during the revolution of two
The Priests amongst the Jews are every one registred with the name of their fathers and this custome hath continued two thousand yeers thousand yeers, are registred together with the names of their fathers, and if any one do erre or falsifie any of the things before-said, he is then interdicted from the Altar, and from exercising any Priestly function. So that in the writings of such men, all things must of necessitie be true, and as they ought to be, for that neither all men are permitted to write, nor yet any dissonance and disagreement is found in their writings. For such things as past in ancient times quite beyond the memory of men, were onely written by our Prophets, who had the knowledge thereof by inspiration from God himself: but other things of later time are onely recorded by those who lived in the age, wherein the things they writ of were done. M
Two and twentie books of holy writ. The books amongst us, containing the Histories of all ages, are neither infinite, nor one repugnant to another: for all our Chronicle is contained in 22 Books, to which books it is impietie to deny credit.

Five of these books were written by Moses, comprehending Genealogies, and the beginning of mankind, and such notable events as hapned even from the beginning of the world untill his death; which is little lesse then three thousand yeers. After the death of Moses, untill the time wherein Artaxerxes lived, who was King of the Persians, and son to Xerxes,

A the Prophets of our Nation every one writ the Hiſtorie of his time wherein he lived, ſo that of theſe mans writings we have thirteen books: the four other books, which make up the number already mentioned, are known to contain holy Hymnes dedicated unto God, and wholeſome precepts for mans life and converſation. All things which from Artaxerxes, untill our time have hapned, are alſo ſet down in writing: yet the books wherein they are regiſtred, do not deſerve ſo much credit as the former of ancient times, for that there was no certain ſucceſſion of Prophets in this age. Moreover, it is evident, that to the former works we give as great credit as to things we our ſelves write; and notwithſtanding, they have been ſo long written, yet in all that time no man durſt preſume either to alter or blot out any thing therein contained. For all Jews even from their cradle do believe theſe books to be ſa-
B cred, holy, and divine, and therefore do give all credit poſſible unto them, and ſo would willingly ſuffer death, rather then to do the contrarie. Many captives of our Nation have already been cruelly tormented, and divers wayes put to death in open Theaters, onely for that they would not commit any thing either in word or deed againſt their lawes, nor violate the writings of their forefathers. Now who amongſt the Greeks did ever ſuſtain the like? Nay, they are ſo far from doing it, that none can be found among them who would ſuffer any loſſe: in his goods or fortunes, thereby to preſerve all the writings of their Nation from perdition: and the reaſon hereof is, that every one eſteemeth the veritie of their Hiſtories to depend upon the will of the Writer. And this they do alſo of their moſt ancient Hiſtorio-
C graphers, and not without cauſe: for they every day ſee men of their own times writing Hiſtories of matters long paſt before in former ages, wherein neither themſelves were preſent, neither yet vouchſafe they to credit the writings of ſuch as were then ey-witneſſes thereof: yea, ſome among them have divulged Hiſtories of ſuch things, as of late befell our Nation, when themſelves never have bin in the place where ſuch matters paſt as they did write of were, nor have lived in any neighbour place, where they might have probable report how matters paſt, but onely making a few centones or broken news, they moſt impudently arrogate to their patcht ſtuff, the name of a Hiſtorie.

The Jewes and Grecians are compared together.

Some others have written of the wars of the Jews.

I my ſelf have compoſed a moſt true Hiſtory of thoſe wars, and of every particular thing there done, as well I might, having been preſent in all thoſe affairs. For I was Captain of the Galileans amongſt our Nation, ſo long as any reſiſtance could be made againſt the Romanes:
D and then it ſo fell out, that I was taken by the Romanes, and being priſoner unto Titus and Veſpaſian, they cauſed me to be an eye-witneſſe of all things that paſt. Firſt, in bonds and fetters, and afterward freed from them, I was brought from Alexandria with Titus, when he went to the ſiege of Jeruſalem. So that nothing could then paſſe whereof I had not notice. For beholding the Romane Armie, I committed to writing all things with all poſſible diligence. My ſelf did onely manage all matters diſcloſed unto the Romanes by ſuch as yielded themſelves, for that I onely did perfectly underſtand them. Laſtly, being at Rome, and having now leiſure, all buſineſſe being paſt, I uſed the help of ſome (for the privitie of the Greek tongue) and ſo I publiſhed a Hiſtory of all that had happened in the foreſaid warres:
E which Hiſtorie of mine is ſo true, that I fear not to call Veſpaſian and Titus Emperors in thoſe wars, to witneſſe for them. I firſt gave a copy of that book to them, afterwards to many noble Romans, who alſo were preſent in thoſe wars; I ſold alſo many of them to our own Nation, to ſuch as underſtood the Greek language, amongſt whom were Julius, Archelaus, Herod the honeſt, and the moſt worthy King Agrippa, who all do teſtifie, that my Hiſtorie containeth nothing but truth: Who would not have been ſilent, if any thing either for ignorance or flatterie I had changed or omitted any particular. Yet notwithſtanding all this, ſome ill diſpoſed perſons endeavour to diſcredit my Hiſtorie, as though they were diſputing pro and contra amongſt children in ſchooles, being ſometimes on a ſudden to forge a feigned accuſation, and otherwiſe to feign a ſlanderous and ſudden detraction, never conſidering that he who promiſeth other men a true relation of things paſt, muſt either be privie unto them by his own knowledg, as having been preſent in the affairs, or elſ have that which he ſpeaketh
F from other mens mouthes, by report of them who know them: both which I have done. For I gathered my other bookes of Antiquitie out of holy Scripture, being my ſelf a Prieſt, and skilfull in our Law; and the Hiſtorie of our wars I have written, my ſelf being an Agent in many matters therein contained, and an eye-witneſſe of the reſt; ſo that nothing was ſaid or done whereof I had not notice. How then can any one excuſe them from impudencie and malice, who labour againſt me to prove my relation falſe? They perhaps alledge, that they have read the Commentarie containing the Emperours acts, yet for all all this, they were not preſent in any action, repugnant to that, which my Hiſtorie recounteth. G

Thus have I (as I thought it neceſſarie) made a digreſſion to ſhew how they are able to perform their word, who diſcrediting my Hiſtorie, promiſe to ſet down truth in writing. I have alſo ſufficiently (as I think) demonſtrated, that the regiſtring of things is more ancient amongſt other Nations, then amongſt the Greeks. I will now firſt of all diſpute againſt thoſe, who with all might and main labour to prove our Nation of no Antiquitie, for that (as they ſay) no Greek Writer maketh any mention of it. This done, I will bring forth proof and teſtimonie of the Antiquitie hereof out of other Writers, and ſo I will ſhew that their tongues are no ſlander, who ſeek to diſcredit our Nation. Firſt therefore, our Nation neither inhabiteth a Countrey bordering upon the Sea, neither are we delighted in Merchandize, nor for this cauſe wearied with pilgrimages from place to place. But our Cities are ſcituate far from the Sea in a moſt fertile ſoyl, which we till with all induſtrie, and our whole endeavors are how to get food for our children, and to keep our Countrey Lawes and how to leave unto our poſteritie the knowledge of Pietie, which work we think all our age ought to be employed in. Beſide all this before mentioned, we have a form of living, different from all other Nations: all which concurring together, we had no need to traffick with the Greeks, as the Egyptians and the Phœnicians doe, who give themſelves to bargaining and merchandize onely for the covetouſneſſe of money. Neither were our Anceſtours delighted in thefts and robberies, nor did our fathers make war upon any Nation, for deſire of larger poſſeſſions, Notwithſtanding, our Countrey was furniſhed with many thouſands of ſtrong warlike men. Wherefore the Phœnicians ſailing unto the Greeks to traffick with them, they were thus made known unto them, and by them the Egyptians, and all other Nations, who ſayling upon the Seas, brought Merchandize into Greece. The Medes alſo and Perſians were known unto them, after ſuch time as they openly reigned over Aſia, and the Perſians warred even to the other oppoſite continent.

Two things which Joſeph intendeth.

H

The Jews care to bring up their children. The ancient Jews had no need to traffick with the Grecians.

I

Morover, the Greeks knew the Thracians, becauſe they were their neighbours, and the Scythians by ſayling to Pontus; and finally, all that were diſpoſed to write, knew all the Nations bordering either upon the Eaſtern and Weſtern Seas; but ſuch as dwelt farre from the Sea and Sea-coaſt, were long time vnknown, as alſo appears in Europe: for neither Thucydides, nor Herodotus, nor any other of that time, maketh any mention of Rome; notwithſtanding, that ſo long ſince it was ſo mightie, and made ſo great wars: yet at laſt, with much adoe the Greeks heard of it. Yea, their moſt curious Writers, and namely Ephorus, were ſo ignorant of the Frenchmen and Spaniards, that they thought the Spaniards to be a people only denominated of one Citie, wherein they inhabited, whereas the whole world now knoweth them to inhabit a vaſt Countrey, and a great part of the Weſtern world. Likewiſe, the ſaid Greek Writers relate the manners of the foreſaid people to be ſuch, as neither are, nor were ever uſed among them. And the onely cauſe why they were ignorant of the truth, was the diſtance of the place, and theſe writers would ſeem to tell ſomething which others of former time had not ſpoken of. No marvel therefore though our Nation was unknown, and none of them in their writings made any mention of us, being both ſo far from the Sea, and living after a different manner.

K

The Romans were lately known to the Greeks.

Certain Hiſtoriographers report Spain to be onely one Citie.

L

Put caſe therefore that I denied the Greeks to be of any antiquitie, and to prove my aſſertion ſhould conclude their Nation to be modern, for that our Hiſtories made no mention of them, would they not laugh at this reaſon, and uſe the teſtimony of their neighbour Nations to prove their Antiquitie? I therefore will do the like, and uſe the teſtimony of the Egyptitians and Phœnicians, whoſe Record, the Greeks cannot denie. For all Egyptians in generall, are our enemies, and among the Phœnicians they eſpecially of Tyre; Which I cannot juſtly ſay of the Chaldees, who have been Princes over our Nation, and becauſe of their affinitie and alliance with our Countreymen, have in their Chronicles made mention of the Jews. Yet when I have proved what I now aver, and refell the ſlanderous reports againſt us, I will then alſo ſhew who amongſt the Greeks ſpake of us, that ſo the Greeks may alſo be deprived of this ſhift and refuge, to excuſe their malicious lies falſly forged againſt our Nation. And firſt of all I will begin with the writings of the Egyptians, who as they well know, do nothing at all favour us. Wherefore Mathenon, an Egyptian born, skilfull in the Greek tongue, as by his works appears (for he writ in Greek) compiling a Hiſtory of the cuſtomes and religion of his forefathers, collected (as himſelf reporteth) out of the Egyptian holy writings, often reprehendeth Herodotus, who being indeed ignorant, did much help the Egyptians. This Arguments to prove the Jews of more antiquitie then the Greeks.

M

Manethon an Egyptian Writer.

Manethon,

A Manethon, in his ſecond book of the Egyptian cuſtomes ſaith thus (I will ſet down his own words, becauſe I uſe them as a witneſſe.) We have a King (quoth he) named Timaus, in whoſe reign God being angry with us, contrary to all expectation, an obſcure people taking courage, came from the Eaſt, and pitching their tents in our countrey, conquered it by force, no man reſiſting them; and committing our Princes to bonds, did finally burn our Cities, and deſtroy the Temples of our gods, and behaved themſelves moſt cruelly againſt the inhabitants, killing many of them, and making ſlaves of the reſt with their wives and children: finally, they choſe a King amongſt themſelves, who ſhould be then of our countrey, his name was Saltis, who coming to Memphis, made both the higher and lower Province tributaries, leaving garriſons in ſtrong holds, and fortifying thoſe places in the Eaſt: Likewiſe, foreſeeing that the Aſſyrians were more mighty then he, and would invade his countrey, he found out in this Province a city called Saite fit for his purpoſe, being ſcituate on the Eaſt ſide of the river Bubaſtis, which by an ancient divine was called Avaris, he builded up this city, and compaſſed it with moſt huge walls, and placed in it two hundreth thouſand armed men to keep it. This Saltis came in harveſt time, to the intent that he might both pay his ſouldiers, and be a terrour unto other people, and after he had reigned nineteen yeers, he died. Saltis ſubdued the Egyptians.

After him ſucceeded another King called Baon, who reigned four and fourty yeers, next to him Aphinas, who reigned thirty ſix years and ſeven monethes, then Apheſis, who reigned threeſcore and one yeers, and then Iannas, who reigned fifty yeers and one moneth, after them alſo reigned Alſis, nine and fourty yeers and two moneths; and theſe ſix were the firſt Kings amongſt them, ever deſtroying and warring upon the Egyptians, and labouring to extinguiſh their race. This Nation was called Hicſos, which ſignifieth Kings ſhepheards: for Hic in the ſacred tongue, ſignifieth a King, and Sos a ſhepheard or ſhepheards, according to the common ſpeech, and Hicſos is a compound word. Some ſay theſe people were Arabians: but in other copies I find that Hicſos, is not interpreted Kings ſhepheards, but ſhepheards that were captives: for Hic, and Hac alſo when it is pronounced, doth in the Egyptian tongue ſignifie a captive, and this latter expoſition ſeemeth to me to be the trueſt, for it is more agreeable with the Hiſtory. Wherefore Manethon reporteth theſe foreſaid kings and ſhepheards to have ruled Egypt five hundreth and eleven yeers: and after theſe, the King of Thebes, and the King of the reſidue of Egypt, uniting their forces together, invaded the ſaid ſhepheards and held on great and long warres againſt them, and that the ſaid ſhepheards were overcome by the King Aliſfragumthoſis: alſo that then they loſt all Egypt which he had in their power, and that they were ſhut up in a place called Avaris containing ten thouſand acres of ground, which as Manethon reporteth, theſe ſhepheards environed round about with a huge wall, to the end that all their whole proviſion might be fortified, and all the preys which they got, defended. Moreover, that Themoſis ſonne of the ſaid Aliſfragumthoſis endeavoured by force to ſubdue them, and for this cauſe beſieged them with four hundreth and 80000 armed men: and at laſt deſpairing to take them by ſiege, he covenanted with them that they ſhould ſafely depart out of Egypt whither they would; and that they upon theſe conditions together with all their families and goods, and cattell, departed out of Egypt into the wilderneſſe, and ſo into Syria, being in number two hundreth and fourty thouſand, and that fearing the puiſſance of the Aſſyrians, who at that time reigned in Aſia, they builded a city in the countrey now called Judæa, which they made ſo large that it might receive them all, and this city they called Jeruſalem. Further, the ſaid Manethon in another book of the Egyptian affairs ſaith, that in the holy writings, he findeth the foreſaid ſhepheards called captives, wherein he ſaith moſt true. For our Anceſtors were wont to feed cattell, and ſo leading a paſtorall life, were called ſhepheards, neither are they unjuſtly called captives: for our forefather Joſeph told the King of Egypt that he was a captive; and long time after he called his brethren into Egypt by the Kings command; but we will hereafter examine this point more ſtraightly: I will now cite the teſtimony of the Egyptians concerning this point, and alſo relate the words of Manethon touching the time when this befell, who ſaith as followeth. Kings ſhepheards.

After that the nation of ſhepheards were departed out of Egypt unto Jeruſalem, King Themoſis who drave them out of the Land, reigned twenty five yeers and four moneths, and then died: and his ſonne Chebron ſucceeded him, who reigned thirteen yeers, and after him Amenophis twenty yeers and ſeven moneths, next, his ſiſter Ameſſes one and twenty yeers and nine moneths, then reigned Mephios twelve yeers and nine moneths, and Mephamuthoſis muthosis twenty five yeers and ten moneths, Themosis nine yeers and eight moneths, Amenophis thirty yeers and ten moneths, Orus thirty six yeers and five moneths, after him his daughter Achencheres, twelve yeers and one moneth, and the brother of Rathotis nine yeers, Achencheres twelve yeers and five moneths, another Achencheres twelve yeers and three moneths, Armais, four yeers and one moneth, Armesis one yeer and four moneths, Armesesmiamus threescore and six yeers and two moneths, Amenophis nineteen years and six moneths. Moreover, that Sethosis having made ready a huge army both of foot and horse, and also a Navy at Sea, left the government of Egypt unto his brother Armais, and permitted unto him all other Kingly authority, onely forbidding him to wear a Diadem, and to oppresse the Queen, mother to his children, commanding him also to abstain from the rest of the kings concubines. And Sethosis himself went to Cyprus and Phœnicia, against the Assyrians and Medes, and subdued them all, partly by the sword, partly by the fear of his power and greatnesse: and being proud of all this his fortunate successe, he bent himself against the Eastern countrey, and destroyed with fire and sword the cities of that place, with whole Provinces: and spending much time in these warres, his brother Armais whom he left in Egypt, did without fear commit all that he forbade him to do: for he oppressed the Queen violently, and daily lay with the rest of the Kings concubines, and being thereto counselled by his friends, he put a Crown upon his head and rebelled against his brother. Also that he who was then chief of the Egyptians holy customes, sent letters unto Sethosis, containing all that had hapned, and how Armais had rebelled against him; who returning to Pelusia, came and enjoyed again his own kingdome which by his name was called Egypt: for Manethon writeth that this Sethosis was named Egyptus, and his brother Armais Danaus.

Sethosis King of Egypt, made his brother Armais Governour of his countrey.

Whereupon Egypt took his name.

Thus far Manethon out of whom it is evident by computation of the foresaid times, that our nation was delivered out of Egypt, three hundreth ninety and three yeers before Danaus, and inhabited this countrey of Judæa so long, before Danaus came unto Argos: notwithstanding the inhabitants of Argos boast their city is most ancient. Wherefore Manethon recounteth two things for us out of the Egyptian letters: first, that we came from another place to them, afterwards went out of their countrey again, and that so long ago, as it was almost a thousand yeers before the Trojane warres. Touching those things which Manethon professeth himself, not to have gathered out of the writings of the Egyptians, who did write out of certain tales and reports, I will hereafter shew, how they are alleadged without any reason for them. For I will once again leave these, and go to the testimony of the Phœnicians, which they writ concerning our Nation. The Tyrians therefore have Chronicles of very great antiquitity, which they have kept with all diligence, concerning that which hath been done among them, and indeed they are worthy of memory. Amongst these records it is written, that King Solomon built a Temple at Jerusalem, a hundreth fourty three yeers and eight moneths, before the Tyrians erected Carthage. So they have registred the building of our Temple, for Hircanus King of the Tyrians, was our King Solomons friend, obliged unto him for his fathers sake, who for this cause also of his own liberality, gave Solomon a hundreth and twenty talents of gold towards the building of the Temple, and cut down the most goodly wood called Libanus, which he bestowed upon him, to make the roof of the Temple withall: for which bounty, Solomon gave him again many liberall gifts, and among the rest a countrey of Galilee named Zabulon: but Solomons wisedome was the chief cause of this Kings friendship towards him. For they sent Problems one to the other to be answered. and Solomon in his answers appeared most witty, as also he did in many things else; and even untill this day, many of the Epistles sent one unto another, are kept among the Tyrians. And that I do not fear the authority amongst the Tyrians, I will prove by the testimony of Dius, a man who by common consent hath faithfully written the Phœnician History, wherein he writeth as followeth.

Manethon sheweth the Jews coming into Egypt & their departure.

Solomon built a Temple in Jerusalem 143 yeers and 8 moneths, before the Tyrians builded Carthage.

The friendship of the Tyrian King and of King Solomon.

Problems of Hircanus and Solomon.

After the death of Abibalus, Hircanus his sonne reigned in his stead, who encreased the number of his Eastern Cities, and inlarged Jerusalem, he also joyned the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, scituate in an Iland, unto it, filling up the water with earth, adorned it with golden gifts. After this ascending into Libanus, he cut down the wood to build Temples, and that the King of Jerusalem named Solomon, sent unto him certain riddles to be expounded, and he again the like unto him, covenanting together, that he who could not tell the meaning of one anothers riddles, should pay unto the other a summe of money, and that Hircanus confessing he could not expound Solomons riddles, did pay unto him much money: Lastly, that one Abdemonus a Tyrian did expound the said riddles, and writ more unto Solomon, which

A which if Solomon could not interpret, he should pay unto Hircanus a summe of money, and this testimony Dius beareth us concerning the foresaid matter. But I will now recount the words of Menander an Ephesian, who hath registred the acts of all Kings both at home and abroad, endeavouring to make a true History out of the writings of every countrey. This man writing of the Tyrian Kings, and coming to Hiramus, he saith thus of him: Abibalus dying, there succeeded in the Kingdome his son Hiramus, who lived 34 yeers: and this king with a rampire conjoyned Eurychorus, and erected there a pillar of gold in Jupiters Temple, and went into the woods, and cut down the Cædars of Libanus to make coverings for the temples; of which, pulling down the old, he erected new, and dedicated the temple of B Hercules and Astartus: but that to Hercules in the moneth of Peritius, and then the other to Astartus, when he with an army went against the Tyrians, who did not pay him tribute, whom when he had subdued, he returned again.

The testimony of Menander the Ephesian.

The Genealogie of King Hiramus.

At this time lived Abdemonus a servant unto the King, who was wont to expound the parables, which King Solomon of Jerusalem sent unto King Hiramus: now how long it was from this Kings time till the building of Carthage, we may thus calculate. After the death of Hiramus, his sonne Beleastartus, succeeded him, who lived fourty and three yeers, and reigned seven: after him his sonne Abdastartus, who lived twenty years, and reigned nine; but this
C King was treacherously slain by the four sonnes of his nurse, the eldest of whom reigned twelve years. Next, whom Astartus the sonne of Feleastartus, who lived fifty and four yeers, and reigned twelve: after him ruled his brother Astarimus, who lived fifty and four yeers, and sate in the Kingdome nine, then he was slain of his brother Phelletes, who reigned eight moneths, and lived fifty yeers, and was slain by a Priest of Astarta named Ithobalus, who lived threescore and eight, and reigned thirty two yeers: him succeeded his sonne Badezorus, who lived fourty five years, and reigned six yeers, to him succeeded his sonne Mettinus, who lived thirty two yeers, and reigned nine. After him Pigmalion who lived fifty six yeers, and reigned fourty; in the seventh yeer of whose reign, his sister Dido builded a City in Africa, and named it Carthage: so that from the time of King Hiramus unto the building of Carthage, is by this computation a hundred fifty five yeers, and two
D moneths: and for as much as the Temple of Jerusalem was built in the twelfth yeer of Hiramus his reign, the computation of the time since that yeer untill the building of Carthage is a hundred fourty three yeers, and eight moneths. What need we alleadge more, seeing this testimony of the Phœnicians? The truth is now sufficiently made manifest: for our ancestors must needs have come into this countrey we inhabit, before such time as they built a Temple in it, as I have also made manifest in my Books of Antiquity, collected, out of our holy Scripture.

Carthage built in Africk by Dido Pigmalions sister.

I will now speak of that which the Chaldees writ of us in their Histories; which do much agree in all other matters with those of our Nation. And first let Berosus be my witnesse, who was a Chaldean born, yet a man famous and known unto all that love learning, for he in the Grecian tongue did write Astronomy, and the Chaldees Philosophy. Berosus imi-
E tating the most ancient Histories writeth of the Deluge, and how mankind was therein extinguished, and he in all things imitateth Moses. He also speaketh of the Ark wherein our forefather was preserved, and affirmeth that it was carried into the tops of the mountains in Armenia: after this he prosecuteth the Genealogy of all that reigned from Noe, untill Nabulassarus King of the Babylonians and Chaldeans. He likewise setteth down how long every one reigned, and in prosecuting the deeds of this King he recounteth how he sent his sonne Nabuchodonosor into Egypt, and to our countrey with great power, who finding them rebels, subdued them and burnt the Temple at Jerusalem, and so departed, carrying with him all our Nation into Babylon: whereupon our City was desolate seventy yeers untill
F the reign of Cyrus King of the Persians. Moreover he affirmeth that the Babylonian kept Egypt, Syria, Phœnicia and Arabia, exacting more of his subjects then ever any King of Babylon or Chaldea had done before his time. And the words of Berosus must needs be to this effect: Nabulassarus his father hearing that his substitute in Egypt, Cœlosyria, and Phœnicia had rebelled, he himself not being able to take such pains, committed these affairs unto his sonne Nabuchodonosor, and gave unto him a part of his army, for that he was in the flower of his age, and sent him against him: and Nabuchodonosor fighting with the said Champion, overthrew him, and subdued the countrey which of old belonged unto them, and at the same time his father Nabulassarus fell sick in Babylon, and died, having reigned twenty nine yeers. But Nabuchodonosor long after understanding his fathers death, he disposed of Egypt and other Provinces as he thought good, and taking the captives of Iudæa, to be brought with other carriage and his army to Babylon,; and ſo he himſelf accompanied with a very few, took his journey to Babylon thorow the Deſart: and finding that the Chaldees ruled all, and that their Nobility reſerved the kingdome for him. he was made King, and commanded houſes to be built for the captives that were coming, in the moſt convenient places of Babylon, and he of the ſpoil beautified the Temple of Belus and other places moſt richly, and built a new city without the wall of the old: and providing leſt hereafter the enemies might turn the River and ſo have acceſſe unto the City, he invironed the inner City with three ſeverall walls, and the outmoſt City likewiſe. The walls whereof were made of brick, but the walls of the inner City were of brick and bitumen:

this done, he builded moſt ſumptuous gates which might have become Temples: and H moreover, neer unto his fathers palace he builded another farre greater, and more coſtly then it was, the pomp whereof it were hard and perhaps tedious to expreſſe. Yet this we will rehearſe worth the noting, that this ſo ambitious and above all credit gorgeous Palace, was builded in fifteen daies: in it he erected rocks of ſtone like mountains, beſet with all ſorts of trees; he alſo made a famous garden, all ſupported with pillars, for that his wife being brought up in the countrey of the Medes, deſired to have a proſpect into the fields and mountains.

Nabuchodonoſor builded a Palace.

This he relateth of the forementioned King, and many things more in his book of the affairs of the Chaldees, wherein he reproveth the Greek writers, who falſly affirm that Semiramis the Aſſyrian Queen built Babylon, and that they falſly report thoſe wonderfull works about Babylon, to have been by her made and finiſhed. We muſt needs think that the I Chaldean Hiſtory is true, ſeeing it agreeth with that of the Phœnicians, which Beroſus writ of the King of Babylon, who ſubverted both Phœnicia and all Syria: with them alſo accordeth Philoſtratus in his Hiſtory of the ſiege of Tyria, and Megaſthenes alſo in his fourth book of the affairs of India; where he laboureth to prove, that the ſaid King excelled Hercules in ſtrength and valour, affirming that he ſubdued the greateſt part of Africk, and Spain, and that the temple of Jeruſalem was burnt by the Babylonians, and again reedified by Cyrus; and we may prove it out of Beroſus, who in his third book ſaith as followeth: Nabuchodonoſor having begun the third wall, fell ſick and died, when he had reigned fourty three yeers, and his ſonne Evelmeradochus ſucceeded him; who for his iniquity and luſtfull living, was treacherouſly ſlain by his ſiſters husband, named Nirigliſſoroor, after he had reigned two years. K
He being dead, the traitor Nirigliſſoroor uſurped the Kingdome, and reigned four years, whoſe ſonne then a child was made King, called by name, Laboroſardochus, and he reigned nine moneths; who for that he ſeemed to be of very corrupt manners, was ſlain by his own friends: after whoſe death, they who ſlew him conſulting together, did make one Nabonidus a Babylonian, King. At this time the walls of Brick and Bitumen about the river of Babylon were built. In the eighth year of this Kings reign, Cyrus coming with an army out of Perſia, conquered all Aſia, and came with his forces againſt Babylon: but the King of Babylon having notice of his coming, levied an army meeting him in the way, and joyned battell with him; but being overcome in the fight, he accompanied with a very few of his men, was forced to flye into Borſippa. Cyrus now beſieged Babylon. and purpoſed to deſtroy the out- L ward walls thereof, but by reaſon that it was too ſtrong and too hard to win, he returned to Borſippa to beſiege Nabonidus the King of Babylon who was fled thither. But Nabonidus not abiding the event of warre, yeelded himſelf unto Cyrus, who dealt mercifully with him, and gave him a Territory in Carmania, but expelled him out of Babylon: ſo Nabonidus led the reſt of his life in that Province. This Hiſtory agreeth with ours; for in our writings we find that Nabuchodonoſor in the eighteenth yeer of his reign did deſtroy our Temple, and that it ſo remained threeſcore and ten years: alſo that in the ſecond year of King Cyrus, the foundations thereof were laid again, and that it was finiſhed and reedified in the ſecond yeer of King Darius his reign. This done I will alſo relate the Hiſtories of the Phœnicians, that we may abound with proof of that we ſay, for they make a computation of the years after M this manner: In the reign of King Ithobalus, Nabuchodonoſor beſieged Tyre thirteen years, after whom Baal reigned ten years, next him Judges were appointed, to wit, they that follow; Ecnibalus the ſonne of Balachus judged two moneths, Chelbis the ſonne of Abdæus ten moneths, Abbarus the High Prieſt three moneths, Myttomus and Geraſtus ſonnes of Abdili-mos judged ſix years, after whom Balatorus reigned one year, and after his death the Tyri-ans called Merbalus from Babylon, and made him King, and he reigned four yeers: and he then dying, they ſent alſo to Babylon for his brother Iromus, who reigned twenty yeares,

A in whose reign Cyrus obtained the Persian Empire, so that this whole time is fifty four years and three moneths: for Nabuchodonosor began to besiege Tyre in the seventh year of his reign, and in the fourteenth year of King Iromus his reign Cyrus was made Emperour of Persia. Nabuchodonosor besieged Tyre.

Wherefore both the Chaldees and Tyrian Historiographers agree with us concerning our Temple. So that the Antiquity of our Nation above mentioned is now made manifest, and without all controversie. And that which is already alleadged to this end, may be sufficient for them, who are not upon purpose contradictious. It is therefore requisite (to satisfie them who give no credit to the writings of other nations, and contend that the Grecian Histories onely are to be beleeved) to bring many testimonies from the Greeks themselves, who have as opportunitie served, made mention of our Nation, and known it. Pythonis a B Samian born, both of great antiquitie, and excelling all other Philosophers in holinesse towards the gods, is not onely convinced to have known the customes of our Nation, but he did also as it plainly appeareth imitate them in many things. His writings are in no place extant, but divers have recorded many notable things of him, and especially Hermippus a man most diligent in searching of Histories. This Hermippus recounteth in his first book of Pythagoras, that the said Philosopher (having one of his familiar friends named Calliphon dead, who was a Crotonian born) reported this mans soul to be perpetually with him, and that the said soul commanded him not to passe the place where his asse fell, and that he should abstain from unclean water, and that he should with all diligence eschew blasphemy: and then it followeth, this he did and said, imitating the opinions of the Jews and Grecians, and applying them to himself. For it is certainly reported that this man gathereth much of his Philosophy out of the Jews laws. Our nation in times past was well known C to divers Cities, so that many of them do now observe our customes, and others esteeme them worth the imitation, as Theophrastus doth witnesse in his book intituled De legibus: for he saith that the Tyrian laws forbid to swear by any strange Sacrament, and amongst these strange and forrain Sacraments, he reckoneth the oath called Corban, which oath is used onely amongst the Jews, and in our language signifieth the gift of God. Herodotus of Halicarnassus knew our Nation also, and in a manner maketh mention of it: for speaking of the Colchians, he saith thus in his second book: The Colchians, Egyptians, and Æthiopians onely amongst all other Nations did use Circumcision in the beginning: for the Phœnicians and Syrians living in Palestina do confesse themselves to have learned this custome D from the Egyptians, and the Syrians living near unto Thermodoontes, and the river Parthenius, and their neighbours the Macronians, are reported lately to have learned it of the Cholcians: and these are they onely that use Circumcision, and they do like unto the Egyptians, but I am not able to say, whether the Egyptians or Æthiopians learned it of the other. Herodotus therefore affirmeth the Syrians in Palestina to use Circumcision, and it is manifest that of all that inhabit Palestina, the Jews onely use it, which he knowing writeth so of them. Cherilus also an ancient Poet maketh mention of our Nation, and affirmeth that our countreymen warred under Xerxes against the Greeks, and numbring them of the countries that followed him, he lastly spake thus of our Nation: The Chaldees and Tyrians agree with the Iews History. Hermippus writings and testimony of Pythagoras. Theophrastus. Corban the gift of God. Herodotus the Halicarnassian touching the Iews circumcision. Cherilus an ancient Poet his testimony of the Iews.

E A people strange followed this royal throng.
Their language was th' unknown Phœnician tongue:
In th' hills of Solymus their dwelling was,
Neer to a lake for greatnesse which did passe:
Their heads were shav'd and for the heads attire,
They ware an horse-skin dryed at the fire.

It is evident as I think that he speaketh of the Jews: for the mountains of Solymus are in our countrey, and that lake also called Asphaltites, which is the greatest and vastest of all lakes that are in Syria, and thus Cherilus maketh mention of us. And that the Iews were not F known onely of the Greeks, but also admired of them, it is easie to prove not out of the obscurest Writers, but by the testimony of their wisest Philosophers: For Clearchus disciple unto Aristotle, & the best amongst all the Peripateticks in his first Book De somno, saith, that his master Aristotle spake thus of a certain Jew, and reporting Aristotles words, he saith thus: It were too tedious to recount all things else which he alleadgeth, but I will set down that onely that may cause the man to be admired. Hyperochides answered that they were all very desirous to hear it: then quoth Clearchus, according to Aristotles precepts in his Rhe- Asphaltites the lake. Indian Philoſophers, and they are called (as I hear reported) among the Indians, Calani, and among the Syrians, Jews, taking their name from the place where they inhabit, called Jury; the name of their City is hard to pronounce, for they call it Jeruſalem. This man entertained many ſtrangers, and he came from out of the higher countrey down unto the ſea-coaſt, and he was very eloquent and of great courage. We at that time lived in Aſia, when this divine man came unto the place where we were, and began to conferre with us, and with other Philoſophers, making tryall of their knowledge: and for that many learned men were aſſembled about him, he at laſt for this cauſe more willingly imparted ſome of his H knowledg unto them. Thus farre Ariſtotle in Clearchus; recounting moreover at large the admirable abſtinence of the foreſaid Jew from meat, and his chaſtity: all which they that are deſirous to know may read in Clearchus, for I am loath to write any thing ſuperfluous.
So now it is evident how Clearchus by the way of a digreſſion ſpeaking of another matter, Hecatæus Abderita brought up with King Alexander. maketh mention of us. But Hæcatæus Abderita a Philoſopher, and one brought up with King Alexander, and dwelling with Ptolomæus of Lagus, did not onely briefly make mention of us, but alſo writ a whole book of our Nation the Iews, out of which I will briefly note ſome few points that occurre, but firſt I will ſhew of what antiquity he is. For he recordeth the time when Ptolomæus near unto Gaza fought with Demetrius, which hapened the eleventh year after Alexanders death, in the hundreth and ſeventeenth Olympiade, as Caſtor writeth: who ſpeaking of this Olympiade ſaith, that in this time Ptolomæus Lagus overcame Demetrius the I ſonne of Antigonus at Gaza in fight: which Demetrius was called Poliorcetes, and all men confeſſe that Alexander died in the hundred and fourteenth Olympiade: ſo that it is evident that at that time wherein Alexander lived, our nation flouriſhed. And Hecatæus ſaith, that after that battell fought at Gaza, Ptolomæus was made Lord of the places bordering about Syria, and that many men hearing of the clemency of Ptolomæus, followed him into Egypt, and converſed with him: amongſt the which one was called Ezechias the Jews high Prieſt, a man about threeſcore and ſix yeers old, and of chief notice and dignity of all his Nation, and moſt prudent and eloquent, one alſo who in all affairs had more experience then any A thouſand and five hundreth Prieſts receive the Iews tenths. man elſe. He likewiſe reporteth that the number of the Iews Prieſts who receive their K tenths, and rule all in generall, is a thouſand and five hundreth or thereabout: and again making mention of the ſame Ezechias, he ſaith, This man being in this reputation and honour, and converſing with us, by the help of ſome about him, declared all things wherein we and this Nation differ and ſhewed unto us the place of his dwelling, and the maner of his converſation, which he had in writing.

After this, Hecatæus ſheweth what manner of people we are, and how religious in our laws, and how that we rather will ſuſtain all torments and death it ſelf, then violate them in any thing, and that we account it a worthy thing ſo to do: adding moreover, that being much ha-

Kings and their officers, yet that we could not be forced to change our opinions, but that we L are continually exerciſed to give a reaſon thereof. He alſo recordeth an example of our con-ſtant mindes: for Alexander (quoth he) being at Babylon, and purpoſing to reedifie the temple of Bell, he commanded all his ſouldiers to carry timber to the building hereof, and the Iews onely diſobeyed his command, for the which they endured many ſtripes and torments, till ſuch time as the King freed them from it: and they (quoth he) returning to their own countrey, deſtroyed all the temples and altars that they found there, and ſome of them were by the officers therefore puniſhed, other eſcaped free; adding that we may juſtly be admired for theſe things, and that our nation is exceeding populous; likewiſe that many of us were carried captives into Babylon, and there ſerved the Perſians. Moreover, that many more were diſperſt into Egypt after Alexanders death, for a tumult begun in Syria. He alſo record- M eth the greatneſſe of our countrey, and the fertility thereof; they inhabit (quoth he) a countrey that hath almoſt thirty hundreth thouſand acres, of moſt fertill ground; for Iewry was very populous; he ſpeaketh alſo of the building of our Temple in this manner: The Iews have many other towns and villages in every Province, but they have one moſt ſtrong city, the compaſſe of whoſe walls is fifty ſtounds, and in it inhabit a hundred and fifty thouſand men, and this City they called Ieruſalem, in the midſt thereof is a building of ſtone with four Porches a hundred cubits about, it hath alſo double gates wherein is a fourſquared

A Altar made of unhewn ſtones joyned together, and it is twenty cubits ſquare every way, and ten cubits high, and about it is a moſt huge building, wherein is an Altar and a Candleſtick both of gold, weighing two talents, and there is kept a continual light night and day, which never goeth forth. Therein is no image nor gift, no trees nor wood growing there, nor any thing of this ſort. Therein inhabit Prieſts both night and day, celebrating certain purifications, and they drink no wine in the Temple.

The Prieſts do dwell in the Temple and drunk no wine.

Moreover, he ſhewed how our Nation warred under Alexanders ſucceſſours, and he reporteth that which he heard of a certain Jew in the army, and I will ſet down the Authors own words. As I went (ſaith he) to the red Sea, a certain Jew, one of the horſmen that conducted us, named Moſollamus, who was a courageous man, and one who excelled all archers
B elſe, both Greeks and other Nations; This Jew (every one haſting on forward of his journey, and being willed by a Southſayer to ſtand) asked for what cauſe the multitude ſtayed and went not forward? Preſently the Southſayer ſhewed him a bird which he diligently viewed, & told the Iew, that if that bird did ſtand ſtill in the place, then it was expedient for them to ſtand, and if the bird did mount up and flee, that then they ought to march on forward; but if it flew towards the place from whence they came, that then it was wiſedome to retire. The Jew hereat was ſilent, yet drawing his bow, he ſhot an arrow and killed the bird; whereat the Southſayer and certain other were offended, and curſed him. But he, taking the unhappy bird in his hand, ſaid unto them: Are ye ſo mad, as to think that this bird, not having the foreſight to preſerve her ſelf from this death, is able to direct us in the ſucceſſe of our journey? Had this bird foreknown future events, ſhe would have eſchewed this place, for dread, that Moſollamus, a Iew ſhould have ſtrucken her with an arrow. But we will now
C leave the teſtimony of Hecataus: for every one that liſt may read his book, and there underſtand this more at large. I will not omit the teſtimony of Agatarchides, a man of no evil in his own opinion, yet indeed one who hath uſed detraction to our own Nation. This man ſpeaking of Stratonice, how leaving her husband Demetrius, ſhe came into Syria, and how Seleucus would not marry her as ſhe hoped (who having an army at Babylon, warred againſt Antioch, and had taken the City) and that ſhe fled into Seleucia, whereas ſhe might have made a ſpeedier eſcape by water, but that ſhe was forewarned in a ſleep ſo to do, and that ſhe was there taken and died, &c. Agatarchides, having uſed this preface, and inveighed againſt Stratonices ſuperſtition, uſeth an example of our Nation on this manner: the people that D are called Iews, inhabit a moſt ſtrong City, which they call Jeruſalem; theſe people are wont to reſt upon the ſeventh day, and do neither bear arms, nor till their grounds, nor do any other buſineſſe on that day, but their cuſtome is to remain in their Temple, and there with ſtretched out armes continue in prayer till night. And ſo upon a time they perſevering in that foolery, whileſt they ſhould have defended their City, Ptolomaus Lagus entred it with many people and a great army: who greatly tyrannized over them; and ſo they found by experience, that the ſolemnity appointed by their Law, was prejudicial unto them: ſuch like Churches as this, did teach them and all Nations elſe to flee unto dreams, which their law teacheth; neither conſidering that humane policy cannot prevail againſt that which muſt neceſſarily happen. Agatarchides thought this which he reports of us to be ridiculous; but they that weigh it with indifferency, ſhall perceive, that it is greater commendation to our E nation, who rather ſuffer their countrey and our ſafety to be loſt and endamaged, then to violate the Laws of God.

Agatarchides his teſtimony of the Iews.

The Iews Sabbath.

I think, I am thus able to ſhew, that many Writers omitted to make mention of our Nation, not for that they knew us not, but for envy. For Jerome, who writ a book of ſucceſſion, in the ſame time that Hecataus lived, who was a friend unto King Antigonus, and being Preſident of Syria, never mentioneth us in all his Hiſtory; notwithſtanding he was brought up almoſt in our countrey. But Hecataus writ a book of us; ſo different are the minds of men: for one of them thought our nation worthy to be diligently recorded, the other through malice was hindred from ſpeaking the truth: yet the Hiſtories of the Chaldees, Ægyptians and Phœnicians, may ſuffice to prove our antiquity, together with the Greek Writers: for F beſides thoſe before mentioned, Theophraſtus alſo, Theodotus, Manaſſeas, Ariphanes, Hermogenes, Euemeus, Conon, Lepyrion, and many others; no doubt (for I have not peruſed all mens books) have manifeſtly teſtified of us. For many of the foreſaid men were blinded with errors, as not having read our holy Scriptures, yet they all joyntly teſtifie our antiquity, for which I now alleadge them. Truly Demetrius Phalereus, Philon the elder, and Eupolemus did not much erre from the truth, and therefore reaſon it is they ſhould be born withall: for they were not ſo skilfull as to teach our writings with ſo much curioſity. Being come

thus

thus far, it resteth that I now present one point more, whereof I made mention in the beginning of this book: to wit, that I declare the detractions and slanderous reports of divers, concerning our Nation, to be false and void of truth; and I will use the testimonie of those writers, who record, that the lying Historigraphers, at such time as they committed to writing the foresaid detractions, did also even against themselves register such like slanders as they did against us. And I doubt not, but that all those who are conversant in Histories can testifie, that the like hath been done by most writers for certain private hatred, or such like respects. For some of the Gentiles, have attempted to deface the honour and reputation of the most renowned Cities, and to defame the manners of their inhabitants. Thus did Theopompus to Athens, and Polycrates to Lacedæmon; and the Author that writ Tripolitum (for it was not Theopompus as some suppose) used the City Thebes very hardly: and Timæus in his Histories of the foresaid places, doth many times detract both them and others. And this they do, calumniating the most excellent that are, in something or other; som for envy & malice, others, that their fond babbling may make them famous, and so indeed it doth among fools, that are known to have no sound judgement, but wise men will condemn their malice. To be short, this is the cause of so many slanderous reports forged against our nation: some to gratifie the Egyptians have attempted to deprave the truth, and so have neither reported the varietie concerning our ancestors coming into Egypt, nor touching their departure from thence, and they have had many causes of malice and envie urging them hereto. And chiefly for that our progenitors in their countrey waxed mightie, and so departing to their own countrie, were made happie and fortunate. Secondly, the diversitie of our two Religions made great discord and variance amongst us, our Religion so far excelling theirs in pietie, as the divine essence GOD excelleth unreasonable creatures (for they commonly worship such brute beasts for Gods, and every one worshippeth divers kinds:) vain and foolish men, who from the beginning have been accustomed to such sottish opinions, as would not permit them to imitate us in our divine Religion, and conformable to reason: and yet seeing many favour and follow our Religion, they were hereby incited to such hatred. that to derogate from us, they feared not to falsifie their own ancient records, not considering that in so doing they were led through a blind passion, to write against themselves. Moreover, I will prove all I have spoken to be true, by one mans words, whom a little before (being a famous Historiographer) we have produced as a witnesse of our Antiquitie.

The last part, against certain detractions & slanders.

The cause of malice between the Egyptians and Iews.

The Egyptians idolatry.

Manethon therefore, who confesseth himself to have gathered the Egyptian Historie out of their holy writings, having by way of a Preface recounted how our predecessors came into Egypt with many thousands, and there conquered the inhabitants, he afterward confesseth that losing all their possessions in Egypt, they got the countrey which is now called Jewry, and in it builded a city named Jerusalem, and a Temple; and thus far he imitateth ancient Writers. And then usurping to himself authoritie to lie, protesting that he will insert into his Historie certain reports divulged amongst the common people, he reports things of the Jews altogether incredible, intending to mixe with our Nation the lepers of the Egyptians, and other sick people of other countries, who (as he saith) being abominable to the Egyptians, made an escape from thence; affirming also that they had a King named Amenophis, which is a fained name, and therefore he durst not presume to speak determinately of the time of his reign: whereas he speaketh exactly of the reign of all other Kings. Hereupon also he addes certain fables, forgetting himself that he reported the shepheards departure out of Egypt to Jerusalem, to have been almost five hundred and eighteen years before his time: for King Themusis reigned when they departed out of Egypt, from whom the time that other Kings did reign, untill the two brethren, Sethon and Hermeus, accomplished the terme of three hundred fourscore and thirteen years. He also saith, that the eldest of these two, Sethon, was called Egyptus, and the other Hermeus, was called Danaus, whom his brother Sethon expelled, and afterward reigned fiftie nine years; and after him Rampses, his eldest son, reigned threescore and six years. Having therefore confessed, our ancestors to have departed out of Egypt so many years before, now lastly he addeth, that Amenophis was their King, who was a contemplator of the Gods, as Orus their King before him was, and that one Amenophis a Priest, the son of Papius, did in all things most excellently accomplish his desire: which Priest seemed to participate of some divine nature, for he excelled in wisedome, and could foretell things to come, and that he gave the King his sirname, that he might also see the gods, if so be he would endeavour to cleanse the countrey from lepers, and other unclean people. Whereat the King rejoycing gathered together all

A the impotent people of his land, amounting to the number of 80000. and ſent them, and other Egyptians appointed to this work, in the Eaſt part of Nilus, there to hew and ſquare ſtones. And that amongſt them there were alſo certain learned Prieſts infected with leproſie; alſo that this divine Prieſt Amenophis, greatly feared, leſt the indignation of the gods would fall upon the King and himſelf (who had perſwaded and councelled the King to do violence to the foreſaid lepers) likewiſe that he ſaid that becauſe he uſed the help of unclean perſons, they ſhould obtain dominion over Egypt for thirteen years; yet durſt he not preſume to ſignifie this to the King, but he kild himſelf, leaving this written in a book, where men might find it: and the King, having notice hereof, fell into great ſorrow and heavineſſe. This done, he ſpeaks as followeth: So the King, being requeſted for their quietneſſe and defence to aſſign them a city to inhabit, appointed unto them a deſolate place called A-B varis, which had been the ſhepheards city (this city the ancient Divines call Triphonis) but they, having got the poſſeſſion of this place fit for rebellion, made choice of one of the Prieſts of Heliopolis to be their Captain, whoſe name was, Oſarſiphus, and bound themſelves with an oath to obey him in all things: and he preſently made a law, that they ſhould neither worſhip the Gods of the Egyptians, nor that they ſhould abſtain from thoſe beaſts which the Egyptians count holy, and that they ſhould marry with none but ſuch as they judged to be their friends.

Oſarſipus, Captain of Avaris.

Having ordained this and many things elſe contrary to the Egyptians religion, he commanded them with great labour to inviron their city with a wall, & to make preparation to war againſt King Amenophis: and he himſelf making choice of ſome Prieſts, and a few other unclean perſons, ſent to Jeruſalem to the ſhepherds which were driven out of Egypt by King
C Themuſis, declaring unto them their own and their fellows injuries, and requeſted them to levie an army to fight with them againſt Egypt, promiſing them free entrance into Avaris, the countrey where their fore-fathers inhabited, and that he would furniſh them with all neceſſaries, teling them that they ſhould now fight in ſo happy a time, as that without al doubt they might conquer the countrey. The ſhepherds hereat rejoycing, all of them armed themſelves to the number of two hundred thouſand, and leaving their city, they came to Avaris. But Amenophis, King of Egypt, hearing of their invaſion, and remembring what Amenophis, the ſon of the Prieſt Papius, had left in writing was in great fear, and preſently aſſembling together the people of Egypt, and conſulting with the Princes of his countrey, he ſent all holy beaſts, and all that the Prieſts eſteemed before him, giving the Prieſts eſpeciall charge D to hide their idols: and he commanded his ſon Sethones (who alſo by his father Rampſes was called Rhameſſes) being but five years old, unto the cuſtody of a friend of his: and then accompanied with three hundred fighting men, he met his enemies, but would not fight with them, fearing leſt he ſhould fight againſt the pleaſure of the Gods; and ſo he retired himſelf to Memphis: and taking Apis and the reſt of the Egyptian Gods, he, with all his troups of Egyptians took ſhip, and fled into Æthiopia. For the King of Æthiopia upon courteſie obeyed him, and for this cauſe he entertained him and his followers, and provided all neceſſaries for them, for that fatal thirteen years baniſhment, and this was done in Æthiopia. In the mean time, the inhabitants of Jeruſalem came down into the countrey with the unclean Egyptians, and did ſo tyrannize over the inhabitants, that all their beholders judg-E ed their victory to be full of cruelty: for not content to fire the cities and towns, and to commit all manner of ſacriledge, and to deſtroy the idols of the Gods, they did alſo moſt cruelly tear in pieces the ſacred Beaſts, and forced the Prieſts and Prophets to lay violent hands upon them, and kill them: after which deed they drave them out of the countrey naked. It is therefore reported, that a Heliopolitan Prieſt, Oſarſiphus by name, made laws for them, and ſtatutes to govern them. This Prieſt was called Oſarſiphus, taking his name from the God of Heliopolis, called Oſiris, who being now thus converſant with this people, changed his name, and called himſelf Moſes.

And this is Manethons report: but for as much as he writeth old wives tales, dotages and lies, I will by manifeſt reaſon convince him; firſt, diſtinguiſhing that whereof I am to ſpeak hereafter. He of his own accord granteth and confeſſeth, that our anceſtors at firſt were not Egyptians, but ſtrangers that came thither from another place, and conquered the countrey, and again departed from thence. out out of his own writings endeavour to shew, that the weak people of Egypt were not mixed with us, and that Moses, who indeed was our conductor out of Egypt, and lived many ages before was no leper. He therefore first of all setteth down a ridiculous cause of this forementioned faction, which was, that King Amenophis was desirous to see the Gods, which Gods trow ye? he could already see the Oxe, the Goat, the Crocodile, and the Munky, but the God of heaven how could he see? And why had Amenophis this desire? Forsooth, because a certain King one of his predecessors had seen them; he therefore knowing by him what things they were, and how he came to the sight of them, needed no new device to accomplish his desire: but perhaps the foresaid Prophet was a man of great wisdom, by whom the King had confidence to attain his desire: but if so he had been, how chanceth it that he was so unwise he could not perceive, that it was an impossible thing to satisfie the Kings desire? for that which he promised was not brought to passe. Or what reason moved him to think that the Gods were invisible, because of lepers and weak people? The Gods are offended with mens impieties, not with the defects of their bodies. And how was it possible that at one instant so many thousand lepers and infirm persons should be gathered together? or wherein did not the King obey the prophet? He commanded that the lepers and infirm persons should be exiled the countrey, and the King did not banish them the countrey, but sent them to hew stones, as though he had needed workmen, and not purposed to cleanse the countrey from lepers. Lastly, he saith, that the Prophet foreseeing that Egypt was to suffer, and fearing the wrath of the gods, killed himself, and left his mind in a book writen unto the King. How chanced it then that the Prophet did not at first foresee his own death, and so oppose himself to the Kings desire to see the gods? or wherefore did he fear such calamities as were not to fall in his life? or what great misery hanged over his head, which might worthily cause him to kill himself to prevent it? But let us hear that which followeth, more sottish then all the rest.

Manethons words repeated.

The King (quoth he) hearing this, and stricken with fear, did not for all this expel those lepers he ought to have exiled, but at their request gave them (as he saith) a City, wherein before-time the shepheards did inhabite, called Avaris; whereinto they being come, they made a Priest of Heliopolis their Prince, who devised laws for them: commanding them neither to adore the Gods, nor to abstain from offering violence to such beasts as amongst the Egyptians are sacred, but that they should kill and spoil all things, that they should marry with none but such as were their confederates, that he bound the people with an oath to keep those laws, and that they fortified Avaris to fight against the King. Adding moreover, that he sent to Jerusalem for help, promising to yeeld Avaris unto them, being a place sometime possessed by the ancestors, and that they from that place leading their forces, might easily subdue all Egypt: he then saith, that the Egyptian King, Amenophis, came against them with 300000, and yet for that he would not strive against the decree of the Gods he fled into Æthiopia, and carried with him Apis and other holy beasts, and that the inhabitants of Jerusalem coming down invaded the land, fired the Towns and Cities, slew their Nobles, used all sorts of cruelty possible, and that the Priests name, who made laws and statutes for them to live under, was one of Heliopolis, Osarsiphus by name; deriving the same from Osiris, the god of Heliopolis: and that this man, changing his name, was afterward called Moses.

Moreover, that Amenophis, having lived in banishment thirty years, came with a strong power out of Æthiopia, & fighting with the shepheards and polluted, he slew many of them, and put the rest to flight, pursuing them unto the borders of Syria. Manethon remembreth not, that here again he telleth a very unskilful tale: for although the lepers and impotent persons were offended with the King, for appointing them to hew stones; yet it is to be thought that they receiving their own desire at the Kings hands, to wit, a City to dwell in, that now they again became the Kings well-willers. Supposing also their hatred still continued towards him, they rather should have attempted revenge by treason against him, then towards all their nation, wherein they had many dear friends and alliance. And although they had purposed to warre against these men, yet would they not have been so impious as to have rebelled against the Gods, and to have violated the laws wherein they were brought up.

A confutation of Manethons words alleadged.

We have therefore cause to thank Manethon, in that he cleareth us, and affirmeth his own countreymen (yea a Priest) to be authors of this impiety, and that by oath they bound themselves so to do. But is it not against all reason, that neither any of their countreymen nor kinsmen rebelled with them, but that the poor distressed people were glad to send to Jerusalem

A lem for succour? But what society of friendship had they with the people of Jerusalem, of whom they came to demand help? Why? they were more their enemies then the rest of their countreymen, and were all of quite different manners from us. They of Jerusalem (as he saith) presently did as they were willed to do, in hope that, according as they were promised, they might subdue Egypt. Were they ignorant of that countrey out of which they had been driven by force? had they lived in poverty or misery, perhaps they might have been induced to have done it: but seeing they inhabited a fortunate and rich Citie, and possessed a goodly fertil soil far better then Egypt, what might move them thereto,? What reason had they, at the request of their ancient enemies (and they also so diseased, as they of Je-B rusalem could not abide their own friends among them that had the like diseases) to thrust themselves into danger? they could not fore-know the kings intent to flee; as for Manethon himself saith, he met them at Pelusia with 300000 men. And this they that went to war well knew. But what reason had they to conjecture that the kings mind would change, and r he flee? Then he saith, the armie of Ierusalem getting the granaries of Egypt into their hands, did much harm: and this he upbraided them withal, as who should say, they were not requested to com as enemies? or as though these matters be to becast in souldiers teeths that are strangers and sent for from out of another countrie; when as the Egyptians themselves before their coming had done the like, and bound themselves with an oath to per-
C form the same. But short time after, Amenophis fought with his enemies, and got the victorie of them, & put them to flight, and pursued them unto the borders of Syria. As though that Egypt were a countrey so easily to be won by any man, that as any place or part thereof invadeth it? and that the souldiers of Ierusalem, having now by the laws of armes possessed that, and knowing Amenophis to be yet alive, would not have fortified that part of the countrie, whereby he might have invaded them, having all opportunitie to do it? or at least they would have gotten more help from one place or another. Amenophis, as he saith, pursued them even unto Syria, thorow the sandie and drie places: as though it were easie for an armie that had nothing else to do, but to march on forward, to passe leasurely thorow them. To conclude therefore, our nation neither came of the Egyptians, as Manethon confesseth, neither
D was mingled with the diseased of that countrie: for it is probable, that manie of those sick people perished in the stone works, manie in the great fight and battel, and the rest of them in the flight. It now remaineth that I refute that which he speaks of Moses.

The Epilogue that the Iews came not of the Egyptians.

The Egyptians do all agree that this man was a divine person, and one to be admired, and they commit great impietie in labouring to challenge him for their countrieman, saying that he was a Priest of Heliopolis, banished with the rest for leprosie. For he is recorded to have lived five hundred and eighteen years before this time, and to have guided our ancestors out of Egypt, into that countrie wherein we now inhabite: and his own words testifie his bodie to have been clean from that disease of leprosie: for he commandeth all lepers to be expelled out of the towns and villages, and to live apart eby themselves, also to be clothed in some torne garment, and that whosoever toucheth them, or cometh under the same roof
E with them, is to be accounted an unclean person. And if so be a leper happen to be cured of that disease, he appointed certain purifications, cleansings, and baths of fortunate waters, and all his hair should be shaved off; and that then after many and sundrie sacrifices, he should be admitted into the holie Citie. But contrariewise, had he been urged with that misfortune and calamitie himself, he would surelie have been more provident, and more merciful to such as should have been afflicted with that disease.

An answer to Manethons slanders touching Moses.

Moses was not a leper.

He did not onelie make these severe laws against lepers, but he also interdicted all that wanted any joynt or parcel of the bodie, from being Priests, or exercising anie office at the Altar: yea he also appointed, that if anie Priest should have anie of these defects beside him after he was a Priest, that then he should be deprived of the dignitie. How can it then be F probable, that to his own prejudice and discredit he would have enacted such laws? Also the changing of his name is incredible: for he was called (as he saith) Osarsiph, which nothing agreeth with the transmutation of his name, but his true name betokeneth that Moses was saved from the water. For, Moy in the Egyptian tongue signifieth water. But I have now sufficiently, as I think, declared how Manethon, whilest he followed the ancient writers did not much erre, but when he fell to old wives tales, he then either absurdlie fained them of his own head, or else for hatred he bare to our nation, beleeved them. I now think it not amisse to examine a little the words of Charemon, who professing himself to write the Egyptian Historie, maketh mention of the same king Amenophis his son Rhamsses, as Manethon doth, and he reporteth that Isis appeared to Amenophis in his sleep, checking him for that her and diseased persons, he banisht them out of his land, to the number of 250000. And that their Captains were called Moses and Joseph, holie Scribes, also that these Egyptian names were so, that Moses was named Tisithes, and Joseph, Peteseph: and that they came to Pelusium, where they found 380000. left there by Amenophis, whom he would not permit to come into Egypt: also they all entring into a league together, suddenlie invaded Egypt, and Amenophis not abiding the brunt fled into Æthiopia, leaving his wife great with child, who hiding her self in caves and dens, did bring forth a child whom they called Messenes, who afterward drave the Jews into Syria, being in number 200000 and this done, he recalled his father H Amenophis out of Æthiopia. And thus Chæremon saith.

Messenes son of Amenophis.

But I imagine, that which I have alreadie said, to be sufficient to declare the vanitie of both these writers. For if that which they report were true, it were unpossible that they should so much differ: but they labour to devise lies, and write not anie thing agreeable to other mens writings. For Manethon saineth, that the cause of the banishment of the lepers was the Kings desire to see the Gods; and Chæremon saith, that it was for that Isis after appeared unto him in his sleep. Manethon also saith, that Amenophis gave the King that counsel so to cleanse the countrey; and Chæremon saith that he that counselled the King was called Phiriphantes. The number also of lepers hath verie good consonance I warrant you. Manethon I saith, they were almost fourscore hundred. Chæremon saith, two hundred and fiftie thousand. Moreover, Manethon writeth how that these lepers were first sent to a place to hew stones, and afterward came to Avaris to dwell, and that they having alreadie begun wars in Egypt, that then they sent for help from Jerusalem. And Chæremon saith, that they having left Egypt found at Pelusium two hundred and fourscore thousand men, whom Amenophis had kept there; with whom they joyning again, returned and invaded Egypt, and then Amenophis fled into Æthiopia: and which is worth the noting, he setteth not down what countriemen, or to what purpose this great armie was, whether Egyptians or strangers, neither doth he shew anie reason why the King would not carrie them into Egypt. Moreover, Chæremon faineth a dream of the lepers and Isis, and reporteth that Joseph together with Moses was expelled, whereas Joseph lived four ages before Moses, everie age containing at least K a hundred and seventie years. Rameses also, Amenophis son according to Manethons Historie, being a young man fled into Ethiopia, and was banished with his father, & afterwards assisted him in the wars: whereas Chæremon reporteth that he was born in a cave after his fathers departure, and that he getting the victorie, did drive the Jews into Syria, who were in number two thousand. O felicitie in lying! for he neither told what nation those three hundred and fourscore thousand were, nor yet how a hundred and fourscore thousand of them perished, neither were they slain in the fight, or fled unto Rameses: and which is most to be admired, one cannot gather out of his words whom he calleth Jews, or whether he attribute this name unto the 250000 lepers, or unto the three hundred and fourscore thousand which were at Pelusium. But it is follie to oppose my self against them who have sufficientlie contradicted themselves: for had other men controlled their writings, they had been the more to be borne withal. I will adde Lysimachus unto the two former, who hath the same lie that they have; yet far more absurde a fiction then theirs. For he saith, that at such time as Bocchoris reigned in Egypt, the people of the Jews being scabbed and infected with leprosie, fled into the Temples to beg maintenance, and that so manie men were with this disease infected, that a dearth and scarcitie did fall upon Egypt. Likewise that King Bocchoris went unto Ammon to know of the Oracle what caused the dearth, and that answer was made, that if he would expel all lepers and unclean persons from out of the Temples into the desart, that then the famine would cease, and that he should drown these lepers, as if the sun disdained that M they should live, and that then he should purifie the Temples, and so the earth would again yeeld fruit: also that Bocchoris having this answer from the Oracle, he called together the Priests and sacrificers, and having gathered lepers and unclean people together, he delivered them to souldiers to be conducted into the desart, and that then they should be lapt in lead, and cast into the Sea. Moreover, they being drowned, other diseased people were gathered together, and were carried into the wilderneſſe to be destroyed, and that they taking counsel one of another what to do, the night following they made great

For if they were Egyptians, they would not ſo eaſily have forgotten the religion wherein they were brought up: or of what place elſe ſoever they were, they had ſome laws or other, which they had been accuſtomed to keep. If they had vowed to have born no good will unto them by whom they were driven out of their countrey, they had ſome juſt occaſion ſo to do. But to undertake war againſt all the world,

The Second Book of the Antiquitie of the Jewes; Written by Flavius Josephus against Apion of Alexandria, and Dedicated to Epaphroditus.

THrice Honoured and beloved Epaphroditus, I have in my former Books so far forth as I was warranted by truth, both protested and approved the Antiquity of our nation, out of the writings of the Phœnicians, Chaldees and Egyptians: and for the further confirmation thereof, I have pro- I duced the testimony of divers Greek Authours. Furthermore, I have opposed my self against Manethon and Cheremon, and divers others. At this time likewise I will undertake to contradict all the rest of those writers, that have published any thing against us; for in respect of Apion, who pretendeth himself to be learned, I grow half suspicious, whether it be a matter answerable to my discretion and judgement, to vouchsafe him any reply at all. For as touching the one part of that which he hath written, it seemeth to be one, and the same with that which the rest have written: and as touching the other, it is very cold and barren. The greater part thereof is farced with follies and detractions, and betrayeth his ignorance, approving him to be a man both loose in condition, and turbulent in his life, And for as much as divers men are so disfurnished of K judgement that they rather suffer themselves to be won by these follies, then to be wearied and wrought by that which is written with better consideration, vainly doating on detractions, and growing discontent to give ear to other mens well deserved praises: I have thought it necessary to examine such a mans labours, the rather, for that he hath written against us, as if he intended to accuse us before a Tribunal, aud convict us by a publick trial. For I see that it is an ordinary course for the most part of men, to hugge and take hearty pleasure, when as he that beginneth to blame another man, is himself convicted and found guilty of those defaults, which he imputeth and objecteth against another.

Apion wrote something very coldly.

Truly it is no easie matter to lay open the ambiguous and doubtful speeches which Apion useth, neither to understand perfectly what he intendeth to expresse. But like a man that is grievously distracted, and confused in his fooliſh lying, he groweth almost to that point L to recapitulate that, which hath been heretofore set out, and searcht for, as touching the departure of our forefathers out of Egypt: and afterwards he falleth to accuse the Jews that inhabited Alexandria: and thirdly, he intermixeth his blameful blasphemies against the Ceremonies accustomed in our Temple, and depraveth our laws, and ordinances likewise. Now, that our predecessours have not taken their original out of Egypt: neither have been driven from thence for any infirmity, or deformity of their bodies, or for any wound, ulcer, or pollution; I suppose that I have not onely sufficiently approved the same, but also produced far more then was requisite. I will therefore briefly report and repeat that which Apion alleadgeth: For in the third book of his Egyptian History, he writ thus: Moses, as M I have heard it from most ancient Egyptians, was born at Heliopolis, who being instructed in the fashions of his countrey, converted such prayers which were wont to be said in open places and abroad, and caused them to be practised and accustomed in private Cloysters, such as were within the City, and ordained that in praying they should turne themselves towards the rising Sun. For such is the situation of the city Heliopolis, and in stead of Obelisques or Pyramides, he erected certain pillars, under which there were certain ingraven Basons, on which the shadow hapning to fall (the place wherein they stood being discovered and in open air) they observed the same course that the Sun doth in the firmament. See here what eloquence this learned man used.

Apion concerning Moses and the Jews.

Now,

A Now this lye of his needeth no words to refute it, ſeeing it is clearly refelled by the effects. For when Moſes firſt built that Tabernacle in honour of God, he had no ſuch intent, nor faſhioned any ſuch form, neither ordained his ſucceſſours to do the like: and after this when as Solomon builded the Temple in Ieruſalem, he never thought of any ſuch curioſity as Apion forgeth. He ſaith that he hath been informed by thoſe of antiquity, that Moſes was a Heliopolitan, for you muſt underſtand that Apion himſelf was young, and believed the relation of the aged ſort of his acquaintance which converſed familiarly with him: yet cannot this learned Grammarian juſtifie where Homer was born, neither from what countrey Pythagoras came, although in reſpect, they lived but yeſterday: and as touching Moſes, who lived ſo many ages, and ſo great a number of years before them, he decideth the matter ſo
B eaſily, and giveth credit to the reports of antiquity ſo ſlightly, that it appeareth moſt manifeſtly that he is but a lier. As touching the time wherein he ſaith that Moſes led away the blind, leprous, and lame: this diligent Authour accordeth very willingly with that which he himſelf hath ſaid. For Manethon ſaith, that the Iews departed out of Egypt about the reign of Themoſis, three hundreth ninety ſix years before Danaus fled out of Greece. Lyſimachus, he ſaith, that this thing hapned during King Bocchorus time, that is to ſay, one thouſand and ſeven hundreth yeers before that time; Molon alſo and ſome others have alleadged their opinions. But Apion, who pretendeth to be a man of more credit then the reſt, hath preciſely and exactly ſet down the time, averring that our departure was about the ſeventy Olympiade: nay more, in the firſt year thereof, wherein as he ſaith, Carthage was builded by the Phœnicians. Now hath he onely and purpoſely made mention of Carthage in this place; ſuppoſing it to be an infallible argument of the truth of his allegation: yet conceiveth he
C not, that he maketh a rod for his own tail, and draweth an argument againſt himſelf, by which himſelf may be convinced. For if we may give credit to the Phœnician Chroniclers as touching this Colonie, it appeareth by them that King Hiram lived more then one hundreth and fifty yeers before the foundation of Carthage. The truth whereof I have heretofore approved out of the words of the Phœnicians, who report that Hiram was Solomons friend, who builded the Temple in Jeruſalem: and that he furniſhed him with much timber and other matter toward the finiſhing of that building. Now Solomon builded the Temple ſix hundreth and twelve years after the departure of the Iſraelites out of Egypt. And after he had inconſiderately reckoned the number of thoſe which were driven out of Egypt in like manner as Lyſimachus had done, namely, of one hundreth and ten thouſand men, he D yeilded a moſt admirable reaſon, and ſuch as may be eaſily believed: from whence he pretendeth that the name of Sabbath was derived. For (ſaith he) after they had travelled for the ſpace of ſix daies, there grew certain inflammations in their groins, by reaſon whereof they reſted on the ſeventh day, being ſafely arrived in the Countrey which at this day is called Judæa, becauſe the Egyptians call Sabbatoſis an Ulcer that groweth about the groine.

Apion's fiction concerning the Temple and Moſes refuted.

The computation of the time is different among the Hiſtoriographers.

The friendſhip between Hiram and Solomon, whereof we made mention in the firſt book againſt Apion in the beginning.

The Egyptians do call a diſeaſe about the privie parts, Sabbatoſis.

Who can otherwiſe chuſe but laugh at this foppery? or contrariwiſe who would not hate ſuch an impudent cuſtome in writing and coyning lies: for he reporteth as farre as a man may conjecture by his writings, that all the Jews who were to the number of an hundred
E and ten thouſand perſons, had theſe Ulcers in their ſecrets. Now had all of them been hault, lame, blind, and ſickly as Apion reporteth, they could not have journied one day, but ſince they travelled thorow the Deſart, and vanquiſhed all armies that reſiſted them, it is no likely matter that all of them were ſick of a diſeaſe in their privie parts every ſeventh day: neither is it naturally poſſible, that ſuch a diſeaſe ſhould befall ſo many thouſand men in their journey, and that they every day ſhould travell a certain ſpace and a limited march, neither ſtandeth it with any probability, but rather a manifeſt abſurdity, that any ſuch thing ſhould befall them: but this admirable Apion ſaith, that they arrived in Judæa within the ſpace of ſix dayes.

Again he writeth that Moſes aſcending up the mount Sinai, which is betwixt Arabia and F Egypt, hid himſelf in that place for the ſpace of fourty dayes, and deſcending from thence, gave Laws unto the Jews. But how I pray you was it poſſible for him to remain fourty daies in a Deſart without water? or how could all the Iews within ſix daies travell from Egypt, into Iewrie? As for his Grammaticall divination of the word Sabbath, it ſavoureth too much of impudency, or at leaſt of ignorance: for theſe words Sabbo and Sabbatum do greatly differ: for Sabbatum in the Iews language, ſignifieth reſt from work; but Sabbo in the Egyptians tongue, betokeneth a diſeaſe about the privie parts, as Apion ſaith. See here what cavilling fictions this Egyptian Apion uſeth concerning Moſes, and our departure out of Egypt; wherein he counterfeiteth and coyneth abſurdities unthought of by any others. Shall we then wonder if he belie our forefathers; who maketh no bones to belie himſelf! for being born at Oaſis a town in Egypt, this high unreputed honour of the Egyptians foreſweareth both his Countrey and Nation, and counterfeiting himſelf to be an Alexandrian, he ratifieth his Nations wickedneſſe. No marvell then though he term them Egyptians whom he hateth and raileth againſt, for if he had not been perſwaded that the Egyptians were wicked baſe people, he would never have denied himſelf to be their countreyman: for ſuch as proudly boaſt of their famous countrey, eſteem it a credit to bear the denomination thereof, and reprehend ſuch as without juſt cauſe make themſelves of their Nation. Wherefore the Egyptians are one of theſe two wayes affected towards us Iews, for either they claim us to be their countreymen, as glorying of us and their countrey; or elſe for that, they and their countrey being infamous, they deſire that we ſhould be partakers of their ignominy. But indeed this worthy Apion ſeemeth ſo to inveigh againſt us, as thereby rewarding the Alexandrians for beſtowing their cities upon him: and knowing them to be at variance with the Jews at Alexandria, he as it were caſteth a bone between them, and raileth not onely on the Iews of that City, but on all whereſoever: but he belieth both them moſt impudently. But let us examine thoſe hainous and enormous matters, (and as he ſaith) ſuch as are not to be ſuffered, of which he accuſeth the Alexandrian Iews. Coming (quoth he) out of Syria, they ſeated themſelves near the Sea-coaſt, where there was no Haven near unto the ſurges of the water.

Apion raileth againſt the Iews, as thereby rewarding the Alexandrians.

The ſea-coaſt of Alexandria.

Now if this place which they inhabited were ignominious, yet it followeth not that the Jews own countrey was ſo alſo: yea herein Apion raileth againſt Alexandria, which he maketh his own countrey: for the ſea-coaſt is part of Alexandria, and as all men judge the beſt place thereof to dwell in. Now if the Jews by force of armes ſo vanquiſhed this place, that they could never ſince be driven out of it: it is no diſcredit to them, but rather an argument of their valour. But Alexander gave them that place to inhabit, and the Macedonians did allot them as great priviledges as the Alexandrians had. I know not what Apion would have ſaid, if the Iews had dwelt about Necropolis, and not about the Kings ſeat: their Tribes being even at this time called Macedonians. If therefore Apion have read the Epiſtles of King Alexander, and Ptolomæus Lagus, or others their ſucceſſours Kings of Egypt, or ſeen the pillars that are erected in Alexandria, containing the priviledges that Cæſar the great granted unto the Jews; if I ſay he knew of theſe, and yet did preſume to write the contrary then he was a bad fellow: but if he was ignorant hereof, he was then an unlearned perſon. The like ignorance alſo diſcovereth he, where he wonders that the Jews that were in Alexandria called Alexandrians. For all that are one Colonie, though very different people, yet do they all bear the name of their founder: and that I may ſhun prolixity, the Jews of Antioch are called Antiochians; for Seleucus the founder made them alſo Citizens: the like may be alſo ſaid of the Jews of Epheſus, and at the other Jonia, who by the Kings gifts enjoy the ſame priviledges with the reſt of the Citizens. The Romanes alſo of their clemency have granted the name of their nation, which is no ſmall gift, not onely to private perſons, but to great Nations in generall. To be ſhort, the ancient Spaniards, the Tyrrhenes, and Sabines, are called Romanes; or if Apion will take away this denomination of the City wherein men inhabit, let him ceaſe to call himſelf an Alexandrian: for he being born in the heart of Egypt, can in no wiſe be an Alexandrian, if the priviledge of the City be taken from him, as he would have it from us. And the Lords of the whole world the Romanes, have amongſt all other nations onely prohibited the Egyptians from having the priviledges of any City: and ſo this gallant gentleman being himſelf incapable of dignity, endeavoureth likewiſe to hinder them from it, who have true right unto it.

The liberties and priviledges granted unto the Iews.

Alexander.

For Alexander labouring with all diligence to build that City, did not make choyce of us for want of people to furniſh the ſame withall: but for that he beſtowed the liberty thereof upon us as a reward and teſtimony of our vertue and fidelity, endeavouring in deed to honour & credit our Nation thereby: for Hecataus reporteth that Alexander for the Jews good ſervice and fidelity, beſtowed upon them the countrey of Samaria, and freed them from paying tribute for it. The ſame good affection towards the Iews of Alexandria, Ptolomæus Lagus continued after him, for he delivered into their hands the ſtrong holds of Egypt (for that he judged that their valour and fidelity would keep them) and intending to make himſelf Lord of Cyrene and other places in Libia, he ſent certain Iews to inhabit the ſame. After him Ptolomæus Philadelphus did not onely releaſe and ſet free all captives of our nation in his countrey, but alſo did many times remit their payments of money, and (which

A was the principall point of all) he desired to be instructed in our laws and holy Scriptures, and for this cause sent unto us, requesting that we would send him some learned men to interpret them unto him: and that this might be performed with more diligence, he commited the care hereof not to any but Demetrius Phalereus, Andreas and Aristæus, Demetrius being the onely mirrour of learning in his age, the other two being Esquires of his own body: nether would he have ever desired to have been instructed in our lawes and customes, if he had despised us, and had not rather admired us. But Apion knew that almost all the Macedonian Kings his successours in order, did peculiarly affect our nation. For Ptolomæus the third which was also called Euergetes, conquering Syria by force, did no sacrifice unto the gods of Egypt for his victory, but came to Ierusalem, and there after our manner sacrificed mans
B hostes unto our God, and to him dedicated gifts worthy of such a victory. Ptolomæus also surnamed Philometor and his wife Cleopatra, committed the rule of his whole kingdome unto the Jews, and Onias and Dositheus, both Jews, were Generals of his army, whose credit Apion detracts: whereas he rather ought to have admired them, and have thanked them for delivering Alexandria, whereof he maketh himself a citizen.

The 70 Interpreters.

3. Ptolomæus Euergetes.

4. Ptolomæus Philometor.

For when there was a rebellion in Cleopatras kingdome, and all was in perill to be destroyed, these two men delivered Alexandria from civill warre: But Apion saith that after this Onias came and brought a little army into the City at such time as Termus, the Romane Embassadour was there present. True it is, and that fact of his was most just. For Ptolomæus Physcon after the death of his father Ptolomæus Philometor, coming out of Cyrene, endeavoured to expell the Queen Cleopatra, and the Kings sonnes, to the end that he (contrary to all justice) might possesse the Kingdome: and this was the cause why Onias took armes against
C him in Cleopatras behalfe, not forsaking his fidelity unto Kings in the time of necessity: yet God himself did manifestly witnesse his justice in this action. For when Ptolomæus Physcon presumed to fight against Onias his army, and took all the Jews, their wives and children that were in the city and bound them, and stripping them naked, cast them before Elephants to be destroyed, (and to the intent that the Elephants might the rather tread upon them, made the said beasts drunken) all which fell out contrary to his expectation: for the Elephants forsaking the Jews which were cast before them, did fall upon Ptolomæus his friends that stood by, and slew many of them; which done there appeared unto Ptolomæus a most horrible vision forbidding him to harm the Jews: and his chiefest best beloved concubine (also whom some call Ithaca, other Herene) came unto him and besought him to abstain
D from such impiety: whereupon he being sorry, did penance for that he had already committed, and that which he thought to commit; so that the Iews of Alexandria celebrate this day in remembrance that upon it God did manifestly deliver them; yet Apion (who speaketh well of no man) accuseth the Jews of impiety for bearing armes against Physcon, whereas indeed he ought rather to have commended them for it. But Apion extolleth Cleopatra the last Queen of Alexandria, onely for that she was unjust, and ingratefull unto us; when he rather ought to have reproved her, in whom all impiety and wickednesse reigned, both concerning her own kindred and her husbands who loved her, and also generally against all the Romanes, and the Emperours his benefactors, who killed her own sister Arsinoe in the Temple, E who had not any waies offended her: she also treacherously slew her own brother, and destroyed her ancestors gods and sepulchers: and receiving the kingdome from the first Cæsars gift, she ingratefully rebelled against his sonne and successour; and infecting Antonie with her poysoned drinks and amarous inchantments, she made him rebell against his countrey, and to be unconstant unto his own friends, depriving some of Kingly dignity, and compelling others to be instruments of her impiety: And what else shall we say of her, who in the battel by sea forced Antonius her own husband (who also had many children by her) to yeild himself, the Empire, and army unto her, and become one of her followers? Lastly, when Alexandria was taken by Cæsar, she was so cruelly minded, that not remembring her own estate, she accounted this her safety, if with her own hand she might kill the Jews, that she might be
F cruell and trothlesse to every body.

5. Ptolomæus Physcon ceased to persecute the Iews.

Of Cleopatra the last Queen of Alexandria.

Antony the husband of Cleopatra.

Is it not a glory think you to us, that (as Apion reporteth) in time of dearth and famine, wheat was plentifull in Jury, that it was not sold by measure? But Cleopatra was punished as she deserved. And we call great Cæsar himself to witnesse of our fidelity, and the service we did him against the Egyptians, the Senate also and their decrees, and the writings of Augustus Cesar, wherein our deserts are testified. These letters Apion ought to have read and to have examined all testimonies of us, which were left first by Alexander, and then by all the Ptolomees, and what the Senate of Rome decreed, and the mighty Emperours. And if ſo be Germanicus could not get corn to ſuffice all the inhabitants of Alexandria, that was a token of ſcarcity and dearth and not the Jews fault. For what all Emperours thought of the Alexandrian Jews it is manifeſt enough: for the Iews want of corn was not onely left unſupplied, but alſo the want of other Alexandrians. But they have alwaies kept that wherewith the ancient Princes did put them in truſt, to wit, the keeping of the river, and whole countrey, as not being thought unfit for their purpoſes. But Apion thus urgeth us; If (quoth he) the Iews be citizens, how hap they worſhip not the ſame God, nor have the ſame religion, that the reſt of the Alexandrians have? To whom I thus anſwer; How hapneth that you Egyptians do ſo contend and warre againſt one another onely for diverſity of religion? ſhall we hereupon conclude that you are all Egyptians, or not all men, becauſe you worſhip and with great diligence nouriſh beaſts againſt nature? yet our Nation ſeemeth one and the ſame. If therefore amongſt you Egyptians ſuch difference of opinions be; why doeſt thou ſo marvell of this, that we in a ſtrange place, to wit, at Alexandria, do conſtantly perſevere in our firſt religion? But he ſaith that we are the cauſe of all ſedition; which ſuppoſe he ſpeak true of the Jews of Alexandria, yet are not all Iews in all places the cauſe of ſedition, for we are known to be peaceable amongſt our ſelves. But indeed as every one may perceive, the people like Apion himſelf, are authours of ſedition in Alexandria. For whileſt the Greeks and Macedonians held Alexandria, they and we lived peaceably together, and they permitted us quietly to uſe our own ſolemnities: but when the number of Egyptians encreaſed, by confuſion of time, ſedition alſo by their means encreaſed: but our nation remained unpermixted. They therefore were authors of thoſe troubles, not having the government of the Macedonians, nor the wiſedome of the Greeks; but uſing their Egyptian manners, and renewing their old hatred againſt us. and that wherewith all they hit us in the teeth, befalleth them: for moſt of them not having the priviledges of the city themſelves, call us ſtrangers that have them. For none of the ancient kings beſtowed the liberty of the City upon the Egyptians, neither have any of the Emperours of Rome beſtowed the priviledge. But Alexander himſelf brought us into the City, the kings after him encreaſed more priviledges, and it hath pleaſed the Romane Emperour to ratifie and confirm them. But Apion detracteth us for not erecting ſtatues to the Emperours, as though the Emperours knew not hereof, or that they needed Apion to ſpeak for them: whereas he ſhould rather admire the Romanes magnanimity, and modeſtie, who compell not their ſubjects to violate their ancient laws and religion, but content themſelves with ſuch honours as the giver may with pietie and equity give them. For they account not of forced honours which come of compulſion.

The Greeks and divers others think it not amiſſe to erect ſtatues; for they delight to have the pictures of their anceſtors, wives and children, and ſome of their beloved ſervants alſo: what marvail then if they accord to yeild the like honour to Princes and Emperours? But our Law maker, not as prophecying the Romanes power not to be reverenced: but foreſeeing that it was neither profitable to God nor man, forbade us to make an Image of any living creature, much more of a not living God (as we will prove hereafter.) But he permitted us to reverence all good men, with any honour elſe not due to God, and all thoſe we give unto the Emperours, and people of Rome, and make our continuall ſacrifice for them; and not onely upon workie daies do this, at the proper coſt of all the Iews, but upon ſuch daies as we offer no other ſacrifice no not for our own children, we then ſacrifice for the Romane Emperour, yeilding that honour to the Romane Emperour which we do to none elſe. And let this ſuffice to anſwer that which Apion alledgeth againſt the Iews of Alexandria: yet can I not but admire at them who gave him this occaſion, namely, Poſidonius and Apollonius Molon, who accuſe us for not worſhipping the ſame gods that other do, although they lie all alike, ſlandering our Temple moſt abſurdly: and yet for all this they do not believe that they herein commit any impiety: whereas it is a moſt ignominious thing for any freeman to lie upon any occaſion: much more of a Temple famous over all the world for ſanctity For Apion affirmeth that the Jews in that ſacred Temple placed the head of an aſſe, and worſhipped it moſt religiouſly. And this (quoth he) was manifeſtly known at ſuch time as Antiochus Epiphanes ſpoyled that temple, who found that aſſes head being of maſſie gold, of great value. To this firſt ſlander I firſt anſwer, that were that true which he reporteth, yet an Egyptian ought not to have ſpoken againſt us for it: ſeeing that an aſſe is of no leſſe worth then a Goat, and other brute beaſts that they honour for Gods. Was it poſſible that he knew not the contrary of his own affirmations, by our deeds and Scriptures? For we uſe the ſame laws that at the firſt we did, and remain in them without change, and for all

An anſwer to the objection of the aſſes head.

A all that our City (as others alſo have) hath by the variable event of warre, been vexed and troubled, and that Antiochus ſirnamed the god, and Pompey the Great, and Liſinius Craſſus, and now laſtly Titus Cæſar have all vanquiſhed our Temple, yet did they never find in it any thing as Apion affirmeth, but ſincere piety, not lawful for us to diſcloſe to ſtrangers. And as touching Antiochus, many writers of good credit report that he never had any juſt cauſe to ſpoil our Temple, but that he was drawn unto this fact for want of money; Not for that he was our enemy, but for that as from his friends and fellows, he ſought ſupply, and found nothing in that place that was worthy of deriſion: and thus do Polybius Megapolitanus Strabo the Cappadocian, Nicholaus Damaſcene, Timagenes Caſtor the Chronicler, and Apollodorus avow, who all do witneſſe, that Antiochus wanting money, brake the league he had with the Jews, and rob'd and ſpoiled their Temple being full of gold and ſilver. Apion ought to have conſidered this, had he not had an Aſſes heart, and a dogs impudency, which he and his Countreymen worſhip for gods. As for us, we do neither honour nor reverence Aſſes, though the Egyptians do their Crocodiles and Aſpes, eſteeming them that are bitten by Aſpes, and devoured by Crocodiles, to be happy and fit for God.

But we eſteem thoſe to be Aſſes which all our wiſemen do, to wit, them who beare burdens impoſed upon them; and if coming into a field they fall to eat, and do not that which they ought to do, we uſe to beat them with many ſtripes, and force them to till the ground, and do other drudgery. But Apion was either the greateſt Aſſe that ever was, in telling a lie; or elſe having begun to do it, he could not compaſſe his enterprizes, in that he found not any juſt cauſe of detraction againſt us. He addeth another fable of the Greeks detracting us: to the which I will make onely this reply, that it is more commendable and agreeing to piety, and leſſe uncleanneſſe, to paſſe through the Temple, then for Prieſts to come and fain impious words and ſpeeches: which they not reſpecting, laboured rather to excuſe the ſacrilegious Kings, then to write the truth of us and our Temple, endeavouring to curry favour with Antiochus, and to cover and hide his ſacriledge, uſed againſt our nation, for that he wanted money, believing us even in things that are to come. And Apion as prophecying of the reſt, ſaith that Antiochus found a bed in our Temple, and in it a man lying, and a table ſet before him, furniſhed with all fowles that uſe either ſea or land, and that the man was hereat aſtoniſhed: And that ſo ſoon as Antiochus came into the Temple, he adored him as though he hoped for great help from the King, falling down at his feet, and with a ſtreched out arm, craving licence to ſpeak: which the King granting, and willing him to declare what he was, and why he dwelt in the Temple, and the cauſe of his meats before him; the man with ſighs and tears bewailed unto Antiochus his calamity, ſaying, "He was a Grecian; and that travelling in the countrey to get his living, he was ſud-
"denly ſeized upon by certain out-landiſh men, and brought unto the Temple, and ſhut up
"therein, and that no man might ſee him, & that he was there fed or fatted with all dainties
"that could be provided; and that at firſt this daintie fare made him joyful, but afterward he "began to ſuſpect it, and laſtly, he was hereat amazed; and then demanding of a Jew that ad-
"miniſtred unto him, for what cauſe he was there kept, he underſtood the Jews purpoſe, and
"law not to be revealed, for the fulfilling whereof he was there nouriſhed, and that the Jews "were wont to do the like every year upon a day appointed: and to take a Grecian ſtranger,
"and feed him a year, and then to carry him to a wood, and there to kill him, and ſacrifice
"him according to their rites and ceremonies, and to taſte and eat of his entrails: and in the "ſacrificing of the Grecian, to ſwear to be enemies to the Greeks, & the reſidue of the mur-
"thered man they caſt into a certain pit. And that then this Greek reported unto Antiochus, "that the time allotted unto him by the Jews to live was now almoſt expired, and there"fore requeſted, for the reverence he bare to the Grecian gods, to ſave his blood from being
"ſpilt by the Jews, and to free him out of that eminent calamity.

E

Who are accounted Aſſes amon, ſt the Iews and other wiſe men.

Certain Hiſtoriographers endeavour to cover and hid Antiochus his periury and ſacriledge.

That the Iews ought once a year to ſacrifice a Grecian.

F This fable is not onely ſtuft full of all tragical cruelty, but alſo mingled with cruel impudency: yet for all this, the firſt deviſers hereof do not free Antiochus from ſacriledge, as they hoped hereby to do, who write it purpoſely to flatter him. For that which they report of the Greek found in a bed, did not move him to come and ſack our Temple, he not knowing of it before he came and found it ſo (as they ſay.) Antiochus therefore was moſt impious and not aſſiſted by Gods favour in that enterprize, (whatſoever thoſe lies mutter) as it is eaſie to learn of the fact of him committed. For we do not onely differ from the Greeks in religion, but a great deal more from the Egyptians, and other Nations; and what Nation in the world is there, that ſometime doth not travel thorow our countrey? Is it then then probable that we onely renew that conſpiracy againſt the Greeks? Or how it is poſſi- G ble that ſo many thouſand people as are of our own Nation, ſhould all eat of the entrails of one man as Apion reporteth? Or why did he not name this man whoſoever he was? Or why did not the King carry him with trumpets into his countrey? ſeeing that in ſo doing he might have been eſteemed full of piety, and a great favourer of the Greeks, and greatly ſtrengthen himſelf againſt the hatred of the Jews by their aide? But I omit to ſpeak more of this: for unſenſible people void of all reaſon, muſt not be reprehended in word, but by deeds: for all men that have ſeen the building of the Temple, can teſtifie what it was, and the undefiled purity thereof. For it had four porches about, and every one of them by our

The deſcription of the Temple and Porches. laws had ſeveral keepers: and into the outward porch, all people, yea ſtrangers might enter without breach of our laws, women onely excepted that have their monethly courſe. Into H the ſecond porch it was lawful for onely Jews to come: and all Jews might go into it, and their wives alſo when they were free from pollution of their flowers. Into the third porch, they onely of our Nation that were purified and ſanctified might come. Into the fourth, might onely the Prieſts enter, who were cloathed with Prieſtly Stoles, and into the ſecret part of the Temple might onely the high Prieſt come, attired with a Stole proper to him onely: yea we are in all things ſo careful of piety, that our Prieſts are appointed hours when to enter into the Temple.

For in the morning when the Temple was opened, the Prieſts that were to ſacrifice the hoſtes which were given them, entred into the Temple; and at noon again when it was ſhut;
What was in the Temple. yea it was not lawful to carry any veſſel into the Temple. but there was onely there an Altar, a Table, a Cenſer, and a Candleſtick, as is in our law mentioned, and there is no other I ſecret or hidden myſtery done, neither is there in that place any eating, and all the people can teſtifie this which I have here ſet down, and our writings do the like. For notwith-Four Tribes of Prieſts, and of every Tribe more then five thouſand men. ſtanding that there are foure rites of Prieſts, and every Prieſts tribe containeth above five thouſand men: yet every one waiteth on certain appointed dayes in their turn, and their time of waiting being expired, others ſucceed them in ſacrificing; and the day before they are to finiſh their waiting, they deliver up unto their ſucceſſours the keyes of the Temple, and all veſſels belonging thereto, in the full number that they received them: and nothing is brought into the Temple, pertaining either to meat or drink: yea and are forbidden to be offered at our Altar, thoſe things onely excepted, whereof we make our ſacrifice. What then ſhall we ſay of Apion, who examining nothing of all theſe, hath raiſed ſuch incredible K reports of us? How ignominious a thing it is for a Grammarian, not to be able to deliver the truth of a Hiſtory? Well, he knew the piety uſed in our Temple, but he purpoſely omitted it: yet could he remember to tell a fained tale of the ſacrificing of the Greek, his dain-tie fare, and that hidden food, that all men alſo that would, paſſed thorow our Temple:
whereas the moſt noble among our whole Nation, are not permitted to come there, except they be Prieſts.

This therefore is great impiety, and a voluntary forged lie, to ſeduce them that will not examine the truth. For they have attempted to ſlander us by thoſe impieties before mentioned, not to be ſpoken of. And again, like one full of all piety, he derideth the vanity of theſe L fables, and reporteth that at ſuch time as the Jews for a long time together, warred againſt Another tale deviſed by Apion of Zabidus. the Idumæans, Zabidus departing out of a City of Idumæa where Apollo was worſhipped, came unto the Iews, promiſing them to deliver unto them Apollo the Dorians god, and bring him unto their Temple, if ſo be that all of them would there aſſemble themſelves together:
and that afterwards Zabidus did make a moſt excellent kind of wooden inſtrument, and placed it in three ranks of candles, and put it upon him, and walked like a ſtar gliding on the ground (for that ſhape he reſembled to them that were afar off from him.) And that the Jews hereat (ſeeing this ſtrange viſion) admired and were aſtoniſhed; and ſtanding afar off, they were all ſilent, and how by this ſhift Zabidus eaſily got into the Temple, and took away the golden Aſſes head (for ſo he writeth plainly) and ſo to have returned ſpeedily to M Dora. Wherefore we may ſay that Apion leadeth an Aſſe, to wit, himſelf with fooleries and lies; for he nameth places that are not, and ſetteth down Cities to himſelf unknown:
Dora is a city of Phœnicia and not of Idumæa. for Idumæa is a Province near unto us, and bordering upon Gara, and there is no City in it called Dora; but in Phœnicia near unto the hill Carmelus, there is a City of that name, yet nothing conſonant to Apions ſlanders, for it is four dayes journey from Judæa.

Why therefore doth he ſo raſhly accuſe us for not worſhipping the ſame gods that other nations do, ſeeing (as he ſaith) our predeceſſours did ſo eaſily believe that Apollo would come

A come unto them, and that he walked upon the earth with ſtars upon his back? Perhaps indeed they had never before ſeen a candle or lampe, themſelves having ſo many: or is it likely that he walking thus quite through our countrey, where ſo many thouſand men are, no one of them all met him? Did he in the time of war find the towns and villages, by which he paſt, without any watchmen? Well, I omit the reſt. The gates of our Temple were threeſcore cubits high, twenty cubits broad, all covered with gold, yea, almoſt all of clean gold, and theſe gates every day were ſhut by two hundred men: and it was too impious a thing to leave them open. Is it then credible that this candle-bearer could eaſily open them, who alone was judged to have the Aſſes head? So that now it remaineth doubtful
B whether Zabidus did bring back again the Aſſes head, or elſe Apion took it of him, and brought it again to our Temple, that there Antiochus might find it, and ſo Apion might have another occaſion of lying. He alſo belieth us concerning the oath which he ſaith we Jews do take, ſwearing by the God of heaven and earth, and ſea, never to favour any ſtranger, and eſpecially the Greeks. This lier might better have ſaid, not to favour any ſtranger, and eſpecially the Egyptians, and ſo his former lies, and theſe ſhould have had better correſpondence, with the beginning, if our anceſtors had been expelled by their predeceſſours out of Egypt, not for their wickedneſſe, but for their own calamity. But we are ſo far
C from the Greeks, that we ſcarcely ever think of them: ſo that no man can ſay that there is any enmity between us and the Greeks. But contrariwiſe, many of them have embraced our religion, and ſome of them therein perſevered: others again have forſaken it; yet none of them will ſay that he heard this oath ſpoken of among us: but it ſhould ſeem that onely Apion heard of it, in that he himſelf indeed forged it. Truly his wiſedome and great providence is worthy to be admired (as ſhall hereafter appear:) for he, to prove theſe his lies to be true, ſaith, that is a certain teſtimonie that the laws we obſerve are moſt unjuſt, and that we worſhip not God as we ought to do, in that we are ſubject to divers Nations, and our City endured many calamities: Whereas touching themſelves, they are of a City that
D flouriſheth in abſolute authority, accuſtomed to govern from the foundation thereof, and not to ſerve the Romans. In effect, who can reſiſt their valour? Truly no man but Apion would ever have flouted us herewith, ſeeing that few cities ſo flouriſh and reign over other, that they again at no one time have been brought into ſubjection; for many Nations are ſubject to others: onely the Egyptians are freed from the captivity of ſuch as rule Europe and Aſia, for that (as they ſay) the gods fleeing into their countrey, were ſaved by entring into the bodies of beaſts. Yet have they not indeed had one dayes liberty ſince the beginning of the world, neither under the government of their own Princes, nor under ſtrangers.

I will not ſtand to reckon how often the Perſians have waſted their City, deſtroyed their Temples, and ſlain their ſuppoſed gods. For it is not decent that I ſhould imitate herein Apions fooliſhneſſe: neither am I calling to memory what befell the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, the laſt of which, are recorded to have been moſt valiant, and firſt to have been
E moſt devout and religious: neither will I reckon up thoſe moſt Godly kings, amongſt whom Creſus was one, who notwithſtanding fell into great calamities. Moreover, I will not recount how the caſtle of Athens was ſet on fire, and the temples of Epheſus & Delphos likewiſe, and many others. There is now one Apion, a new accuſer of the Jews, who upbraideth them with their calamities, forgetting quite all miſery that hath befallen his countreymen the Egyptians: but he was blinded with the fable of Seſoſtris (whom he ſaith to have been King of Egypt,) We could report and boaſt of our Kings, David and Solomon, who ſubdued many Nations unto them: but it is not fit here to ſpeak of them. But Apion was ignorant of F that which all the world knoweth, to wit, that the Egyptians have ſerved firſt the Perſians, and afterwards the Macedonians, and that as bondſlaves: where we remaining in free libertie, reigned over all Cities round about us 120. years, even unto the time of Pompey the Great; and when all the other kings were ſubdued by the Romans, onely our kings for their fidelitie and friendſhip towards them, were dear unto them. O but this ſticketh upon Apions ſtomack! that we have not had any famous men of our Nation, who have invented Arts and Sciences, and been excellent in wiſedome, ſuch as Socrates, Zeno, Cleanthes, and others, whom he ſetteth down, were: and which is moſt to be admired, Apion puts himſelf into the number of theſe famous men: and ſaith, that Alexandria is bleſſed and happy, that hath deſerved to have ſuch a Citizen as he is: and great reaſon that he himſelf ſhould teſtifie that of himſelf, which all men elſe perceive in him, to wit, that he is an impudent deceitful ful fellow, both of corrupt life and manners. So that any Alexandrians had juſt cauſe to be G ſorry that they ever had any better opinion of him. But that our Nation had men equal at leſt unto thoſe whom he mentioneth, all men know that pleaſe to read the book of our Antiquity. The reſt that his accuſation containeth, it is not amiſſe to let paſſe without anſwer, for that it rather impeacheth the Egyptians, his own countreymen, then us: for he doth complain of us for ſacrificing ordinary beaſts, and from abſtaining to eat ſwines fleſh, and Why the Iews do ſacrifice common beaſts and do not eat ſwines fleſh. greatly laughed at circumciſion. Touching the ſacrificing of theſe beaſts, we do as all nations elſe do: and Apion, inveighing againſt our ſacrificing, ſheweth himſelf to be an Egyptian; for were he either a Græcian or a Macedonian, he would not be herewith offended:

for both Greeks and Macedonians do vow to ſacrifice Hecatombes to their gods, and uſe Prieſts in the banquets; and yet for all this, the world is not deſolate of living creatures, as H Apion feareth.

But were all men ſo mad as the Egyptians, it would indeed be deſolate of men, and filled with cruel beaſts, which they (ſuppoſing them to be Gods) do diligently nouriſh. If any man ſhall ask of Apion, whom of all the Egyptians he judged to be a wiſe man, and moſt religious towards their gods, no doubt he would anſwer that the Prieſts are. For they ſay, that their firſt Kings in the beginning gave them theſe two commandements in charge; firſt, to ſeek wiſedome; and next, to worſhip the gods: they alſo are all of them circumciſed, and abſtain from ſwines fleſh, and no other Egyptian ſacrificeth with them unto their gods. A- pion therefore was ſurely blind, when, inſtead of detracting us, he ſpeaketh ill of them, to gra-

Apion in us diſalloweth, but alſo do teach others to circumciſe themſelves, as Herodotus re- I porteth. So that I verily think, that Apion was juſtly puniſhed for blaſpheming his countrey laws and religion. For being forced to circumciſe himſelf to avoid a great diſeaſe, he was hereby nothing helped, but for all this, his privy member rotting, he in extreme grief

all piety, and not to deride and detract others: but Apion forſook his own religion, and ſlandered and belied ours. And this was Apions end: and here alſo ſhould end this book,
The defence of Moſes againſt Apollonius and Lyſimachus. but that Apollonius, Molon and Lyſimachus, and certain others, partly for ignorance, partly for madneſſe, have moſt injuriouſly belied our Law-maker Moſes, and the Laws he made, detracting him as a deceitful Magician, and then as the author of all malice and impiety amongſt us; and for ſuch as teach no vertue nor goodneſſe at all. I will therefore, as far as in me K lyeth, declare both our converſation in general, and in particular: for if my judgement be any thing, our laws are moſt forcible both to piety, and to all humanity in general, as alſo to juſtice, pains taking, and contempt of death. I onely requeſt this favour of the Reader, that he will not with a prejudicate or malicious opinion, peruſe theſe writings: for I do not write this as a praiſe and vain oſtentation of our nation, but as a juſt Apology, refuting the ſlanderous reports that ſome have uſed againſt us.

Wherein Apollonius accuſeth the Iews. Apollonius doth not continually inveigh againſt us as Apion doth, but onely here and there;
ſometime affirming us to be ſomewhiles hated both of God and man, ſometime to be cowards, other ſometimes contrariwiſe complaining of our Nations boldneſſe. Saying more- L over, that we are more ſottiſh then any barbarous Nation; and that therefore we onely have had none of our Nation founders of Arts or Sciences, which are profitable for mans life;
all which objections are eaſily refuted, if we ſhew the contrary to all theſe by him reported; both that we have obeyed our laws, and lived in all integrity. If therefore I be forced to ſhew that other Nations have made contrary laws, not I, but they are to be blamed, who comparing ours with them of other Nations, affirm ours to be the worſe: neither of which can charge us, either that theſe laws which I will briefly ſet down are not ours, or elſe that The lovers of order and common laws are excellent in meekneſſe and vertue. we have not perſiſted in them as we ought. Making therefore this beginning, I affirm, that they who have framed themſelves to live together under certain Rules and Ordinances, and kept them inviolate, and were the firſt founders of them, were more to be commended for M humanity and vertue, then they who live under no rule nor ordinance at all: and every Law-maker endevoureth ſo to challenge antiquity for their own ordinances, as that they may not be thought to imitate others, but to be themſelves the firſt Authors thereof, and guides to direct other mens lives. Which being ſo, it is the duty of a good Law-maker to make choice of that which is beſt, and moſt convenient for them, who are to obey their laws, and to ſatisfie them as much as may be, in proving their laws to be good and right, and both in wealth and wo, calamity and felicity, to remain in them, never changing nor

A nor altering them. I therefore aver that our lawmaker is more ancient then any lawmaker mentioned. For Lycurgus, and Solon, and Seleucus of Locris, and thoſe the Greeks admire, are modern, of late times in reſpect of him, as it is well known. For the Greeks themſelves confeſſe, that in times paſt they wanted the name of law. This Homer can witneſſe, who in his whole works never mentioneth this word, law, for the people of thoſe times were not governed by laws, but by indefinite ſentences, and the Princes pleaſure, uſing cuſtomes but not written, and altering and changing them alſo as occaſion ſerved.

Moſes more ancient then all other lawmakers.

Νόμος. This word, law, is not in Homer.

But our lawmaker being very ancient (for this is every way manifeſt, even by our adverſaries own confeſſions) ſhewed himſelf both a good Prince and counſeller unto his people: for making lawes to direct and govern mens lives, he perſwaded them voluntarily, to imbrace them, and firmly to perſiſt in them with all wiſdome. And firſt of all, let us conſider
B the works of his greatneſſe. For he undertaking the conduct of many thouſand of our forefathers out of Egypt into our own countrey, he delivered them from many calamities, almoſt impoſſible to be avoided: for they being to paſſe through a place wherein was no water, and a very ſandy ground, being alſo to war and to keep their wives and children, and goods for the variable event of wars, he in all theſe ſhewed himſelf a moſt wiſe and prudent counſeller, and a true patron and guide unto them all. For he made all the multitude ſo to depend upon him, that he might perſwade them whatſoever he pleaſed, and yet in none of all theſe did he uſurpe any authority over them: and in that time and place wherein all men of authority aſſume power unto themſelves, and uſe tyranny, at ſuch time as the peo-
C ple do oftentimes offend, and live in all manner of impiety; he then being in authority did contrariwiſe uſe all lenity and mildneſſe, to the intent that he might be a pattern of vertue and juſtice to all the reſt, giving all thoſe that willingly followed him moſt aſſured ſafety, uſing in all accidents moſt ſtrange works. And for this cauſe he rightly deemed God to be his captain and counſeller: and firſt examining himſelf, and finding that all the laws he had ſet down were agreeable to the will and pleaſure of God, the chiefeſt care he now had was how to perſwade his people the ſame, which he himſelf now knew: for they who direct their lives according to the will of God, avoid all ſins as our lawmaker did, being neither Magician nor deceiver as his enemies injuriouſly report, but ſuch a one as the Greeks do
D boaſt Minos and others after him to have been: for ſome of them affirmed their laws to be made by Jupiter, others by Apollo and Delphos Oracle; either ſo believing themſelves, or elſe thinking that the people would be eaſily ſo perſwaded. Now who of all the lawmakers made the beſt law, and who did moſt rightly think of God, he that compareth all their laws together may eaſily know; for now occaſion is offered to ſpeak of them: there are therefore an infinite company of nations and laws amongſt men, and ſome nations are ruled by Monarches, otherſome by the common conſent of the people. But our lawmaker doing neither of theſe, did as one ſhould ſay therein declare his Common-wealth to be Divine, chiefly aſſigning all power and principality over us to God, cauſing all men to fix their minds and cogitations on Him, as the onely Giver and Author of all goodneſſe, giving them to underſtand, that whatſoever in their neceſſity they entreate him for, He heareth their E prayers, and underſtandeth what every man doth in private, yea, his very cogitations; and that he is One, Unbegotten, and in all times Immutable and Eternal, differing in a moſt excellent ſhape from all mortal creatures: and this we knew, but we are altogether ignorant what God is as touching his Subſtance and Eſſence.

Moſes maketh God his guide and counſeller.

The origen of lawes amongſt the Greeks.

And thus the wiſeſt Greeks that ever were, judged of God, who how learned they were (he giving the ground of all their knowledge) I now omit to rehearſe: and that theſe things afore rehearſed are beſt and moſt agreeable to the nature and magnificence of God, many do witneſſe, as Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, and Plato, and after them the Stoicks, and almoſt all other Philoſophers have ſo thought of the Divine nature. But they delivering this their F Philoſophy in ſhort ſpeech, durſt not publiſh the truth of their doctrine among the people, already ſeized upon by ſuperſtitious opinions. But our lawmakers works and words ſo agreed, that he ſatisfied at large all his people, and they that were to be born of them, and their ſucceſſours, inſpiring as it were a certain conſtancy into them to perſevere in the ſame ſtill referring the cauſe of his laws to their profit and commodity. For he did not affirme the worſhip of God onely to be part of vertue, but he aſſigned other part thereof, to wit, fortitude, juſtice, and mutual concord of all his citizens. For all our actions, ſpeeches, and what elſe ſoever, are all referred to divine piety. Which he left not touched without any more diſcourſe of it. For theſe two are the methods of all diſcipline and morality, whereof one frameth and directeth the ſpeech, the other the manners and actions; which being ſo, other lawmakers were indeed wiſe in advice and counſel, and yet they made choice of one of theſe methods, and left the other; for the Lacedemonians were inſtructed in manners and not in words, as alſo they of Creet were: but the Athenians and almoſt all the Greeks were directed and trained up by lawes in every thing they were to do, yet never could they put their written laws in practiſe. But our lawmaker very induſtriouſly did conjoyn both theſe together, for he neither omitted the training them up in manners and good exerciſes, neither did he ſurceaſe to leave them written laws, And firſt of all, making his entrance from the very meats, and preſcribing to every one a convenient diet, he left no man liberty amongſt us to direct himſelf in the leaſt matter concerning his meat, but he by laws defined, both from what meats we were to abſtain, and what to eate, and what ought to be our ordinary diet, as alſo when we ought to labour, and when to ceaſe from work; ſo that we as it were under the government of a father or maſter, might neither ſin willingly, nor for ignorance: for he did not appoint puniſhment for them that were ignorant of it, but by law enacted a moſt neceſſary and milde chaſtiſement for the voluntary offenders: and for this cauſe he did not onely will, that we ſhould once or twice or often hear the lawes, but that once every week we all, omitting other buſineſſe, ſhould come to hear the laws, and ſo learn them perfectly, which things all other lawmakers as it is well known omitted; All which laudable cuſtomes all other lawmakers have neglected, and the moſt part of men are ſo far from living according to their own laws, that they are altogether ignorant of them; and having offended their laws through ignorance, they then learn by other mens means, that they have made breach of their laws; yea, the chiefeſt and moſt eminent men amongſt them, do profeſſe herein that they are ignorant, cauſing thoſe that are learned and skilful in their laws, to ſit as it were in commiſſion with them to direct them. Whereas every one of our Nation being demanded of our laws, can anſwer as readily as he can tell his own name: for every one of us learning them as it were ſo ſoon as we come to the uſe of reaſon, we have them as it were written and printed in our minds, and by this meanes both we offend more ſeldome, and when we offend we are ſure to be puniſhed.

Moſes commandeth all the Jews to come and hear the law.

And this eſpecially is that which hath cauſed ſuch an unity and concord amongſt us. For to worſhip one God all after the ſame manner, and nothing differ in manner and converſation one from another, is the onely way to eſtabliſh amity and concord in a Common-wealth. For onely amongſt us no man ſhall hear any different ſpeeches and opinions concerning God, which thing amongſt all Nations elſe is moſt frequent and ordinary: for amongſt them not onely every one of the common people doth ſpeak his pleaſure in this point, but divers Philoſophers alſo preſume to do it, ſome of them with their blaſphemous ſpeeches altogether deſtroying the nature of God, and others with the like impudency denying him to have any care of men; neither is there any difference amongſt us of affairs pertaining to mans life, but all men with us follow one common expreſſe labour, and we all joyntly affirm the Son of God, and that he hath care of humane affairs, and all our actions and exerciſes: yea, any one may learn of our women and children; that all things whatſoever are to be reduced to piety. Hence it groweth that ſome detract our nation; for that amongſt us were no men inventers of new matters and acts: to whom we will thus anſwer, that other nations account it a glory not to perſiſt in any thing that their forefathers uſed, and hold them of moſt account amongſt them, that can beſt tranſgreſſe their forefathers wiſdom. But we contrariwiſe do account it the chiefeſt point of wiſdom and virtue, neither to do, nor think any thing contrary to that which our anceſtors have decreed, which is a token that our law was eſtabliſhed by as good advice as was poſſible. For thoſe laws that in all points are not as they ought to be, are often by experience found faulty. But amongſt us who believe that our law was firſt eſtabliſhed by the will and pleaſure of Almighty God, nothing is pious and virtuous which may any wiſe impugne the ſame. For who can take away any title thereof, or add better in the ſtead? or who is he that can transfer and carry us from the obſervance of them, and ordain for us better laws to govern our Common-wealth? Or what law can be more juſt and better, then that which the wiſdom of God (who is the Lord of all things) hath eſtabliſhed? he firſt of all permitted the diſpoſing of all principal affairs to the Prieſts in general, and moſt wiſely conſtituted a high Prieſt as their head: neither were they choſen to this dignity by our Lawmaker, who either exceld in nobility of birth, or riches: but he appointed ſuch to ſacrifice unto God, who were known to excell others in wiſdome and ſanctity, theſe do both keep

The concord of the Jews in religion.

A keep our lawes, and obſerve all other things belonging to their office with all integrity; for our Prieſts are appointed over-ſeers of all things, and to judge all ſtrifes and controverſies, and to puniſh the offenders. What monarchie then or kingdome can be more holy then this? Or how can God be better honoured then amongſt us; where all the people are prepared to piety, and the Prieſts commanded ſo to rule and govern the common-wealth, as if they were celebrating ſome feſtivity? And whereas other nations cannot celebrate their myſteries, which they tearm ſacrifices, in a few daies; we with joy, and pleaſure and immutable wills, do celebrate our ſacrifices continually without intermiſſion: It reſteth now that I ſet down our precepts and laws, as argument of that which I have ſaid. The firſt is of God: of whom our law ſaith, God hath all things, he is moſt perfect, moſt bleſſed, he is ſufB ficient both for himſelf and all things elſe, he is the beginning, midſt, and ending, famous amongſt all things for his works and benefits, more manifeſt then any thing elſe, but his ſhape and greatneſſe is to us unſpeakeable, all matters (how precious ſoever) being compared with his excellent beautie are nothing worth, and all art compared with his invention is unartificial. we can neither ſee, conceive, nor imagine any thing like him. He is holy, for we ſee his works; the light, the heaven and the earth, the Sun, the Moon, Rivers, and Sea, ſo many different ſhapes of living creatures, and encreaſe of fruits: All theſe God himſelf made, not with hands or work, nor as one needing any to help him, but he ſeeing them to be good, they were preſently made. He is to be followed of all men, who ought to worſhip him by the exerciſing of vertue; for this is the moſt holy way to pleaſe him. We have one Temple, as alſo one God, which temple is common to all men, as he is the common God of all men. For ſimilitude alwaies pleaſeth, him do all our Prieſts honour with ſacrifice, and he C amongſt them hath the firſt place, who by birth is the chiefeſt: and he firſt ſacrificeth to God, ſeeth the laws obſerved, judgeth controverſies, and puniſheth thoſe that are convicted by the law: whoſoever diſobeyeth him, ſhall be puniſhed as one that rebels againſt God himſelf: he offereth ſacrifices not pertaining to gluttony or drunkenneſſe, for God is not pleaſed with ſuch ſacrifices, but is rather injured, and ſuperfluous expences are thereby made.

But God loveth them that are temperate, and orderly, and of good behaviour, and eſpecially requireth in us that ſacrifice, an inviolable chaſtity. In our ſacrifices offered for our common good, we firſt of all pray in common, and then every one for himſelf, becauſe we are all fellowes, and he that delighteth herein more then in his own life, is moſt acceptable to God. We pray and vow unto God, not requeſting riches of him, for he of his own acD cord beſtoweth them upon every one, and left them amongſt us: but we pray that we may have part of them, and having gotten them may keep them. Our law hath alſo appointed purifications both from our chamber-bed and carnal copulation, and many other things, which are too long to rehearſe: And this is our ſpeech and opinion of God, who himſelf is our law. And what concerning marriage? Our law onely alloweth natural copulation between man and wife, done to the intent to get children. But that men ſhould abuſe one another againſt nature, it altogether diſalloweth, and puniſheth ſuch offenders with death. It commandeth us to marry, not reſpecting the dowry, neither muſt we take women violently and by force, nor allure them by deceitfull perſwaſions, but that we rather obtain E his good will, who may grant and uſe ordinary means to perſwade. It alſo appointeth that a woman ſhall be in all things inferiour to the man, neither is ſhe to obey in committing wickedneſſe, but as one under government. For it is God that gave man this authority. With her the husband onely may lawfully accompany, and it is abhomination for her to make trial of another man: and who ſo attempteth this, can no waies avoid death: the like penalty attendeth him, if he offer violence to a virgin deſpouſed unto another man, or if by perſwaſions he overcome a married woman or other, that hath children under her, and all this our law commandeth: It hath alſo interdicted all women from concealing their children being born, or otherwiſe to deſtroy them, for ſo ſhe ſhould be a child killer, deſtroy ſoules and mankind: Whoſo therefore uſeth carnal copulation and corruption is unclean by our F laws, and women after lawful copulation muſt waſh themſelves, judging that a part of their ſoul was by this act defiled, and ſhe being puffed up was wounded in her body, and therefore our law ordained water of purification for them. Neither is it lawful for them to feaſt and banquet at their child-birth, whereby an occaſion of drunkenneſſe may grow, but that their beginning ſhould be temperate: they are likewiſe commanded to train up their children in learning that they may learn the law, and actions of their forefathers, and imitate them; that ſo being trained up in the law, they may not ſinne nor tranſgreſſe them by ignorance.

It alſo appointeth puniſhment for them that have committed murder, either wilfully, or againſt their will. It bindeth every man to obey his Parents next after God, and commandeth that thoſe children that doe not ſhew themſelves grateful unto them, or in any thing doe grieve them, that they ſhould be ſtoned to death: It alſo commandeth all young men to reverence old men, becauſe God is Elder to us all. It permitteth not friends to conceale any impietie; for God is not their friend, who doth not diſcloſe them: And if friends fall out that do know one anothers ſecrets; yet they are commanded not to bewray them, If any Judge take a bribe, he is to be puniſhed with death for omitting Juſtice, and aſſiſting the guiltie. Againſt theft and uſurie.

It is alſo not amiſſe to recount how our Law-maker provided for the entertaining of ſtrangers amongſt us: For he ſeemeth ſo to have provided, that to our knowledge we neither corrupt our owne Lawes, nor denie to impart them to others: but he entertaineth all liberally, that will come and live under our Lawes, judging the communitie of mans life; not ſo much to conſiſt in the Nation whereof we come, as in the unitie of our minds and converſation. He forbiddeth others that are ſtrangers, and come not with that intent to be admitted to our ſolemnities; yet he commanded us to exhibite unto them all other things neceſſary: and that we ſhould give unto all men, fire, water, meat, and burie them being dead. He hath alſo moſt mildly determined how we ought to deale with our enemies, that we neither deſtroy their countrey with fire, not cut downe their fruit-trees. We are alſo forbidden to rob and ſpoyle thoſe that are ſlain in fight, and deale injuriouſly with our captives; and eſpecially, if they be women: yea, he ſo endeavoured to teach us humanity and mildneſſe, that he provided, that we uſe even unreaſonable beaſts courteouſly, and onely imployed them to ſerve our lawfull need, and no further: for he forbiddeth us to kill any tame thing bred in houſes, and that we ſhould not kill the old Birds and their young together; and although many wilde beaſts, enemies to mankind, do aſſiſt us in our labours, yet he commanded to ſpare them alſo. And in every point he eſtabliſhed humanitie and mildeneſſe, amongſt us, uſing (as is beforeſaid) Laws to direct us therein, enacting alſo other, how they who infringe the foreſaid Laws, may be with all ſeveritie puniſhed: for the puniſhment allotted to the violators hereof, is for the moſt part death: as if any man commit adultery, raviſh a Virgin, uſe the ſin againſt nature with another, or ſuffer himſelf to be ſo abuſed. We alſo have Laws concerning our ſervants, and our meaſures and weights, and unlawfull bargains and ſales, or deceit, if either one take any thing that is another mans, or which is not his owne; all theſe are to be puniſhed not as other Nations puniſh them, but much more grievouſly. But whoſoever either injureth his Parents, or committeth impietie againſt God, he ſhall preſently be deſtroyed: but they that obſerve this Law are rewarded, not with gold or ſilver, nor with a Crown beſet with precious ſtone: but every one having his Conſcience to witneſſe, doth greatly profit, and gain Eternitie; as both our Law-maker propheſieth, and God himſelf doth moſt aſſuredly promiſe to them that obſerve them. And if it chance that we be forced to ſuffer death for them, yet doe we joyfully goe to execution, nothing doubting but that we ſhall ſo exchange this life for a better: I ſhould be loth to report this, if our deeds did not make it manifeſt: for, many of our forefathers, onely for that they refuſed to ſpeak againſt our Lawes, or otherwiſe then our Lawes permitted, have moſt manfully, and conſtantly indured all torments and death it ſelf. If our Nation were unknown to all the world, and that this our voluntarie obſervation of our Laws were not manifeſt to all the people, if any man ſhould report unto the Greeks, that either he had read this which I have declared, or elſe that he had found people in a ſtrange land, ſuch as we be, having ſo pious and honeſt opinions concerning God, and who had for many ages perſevered therein; I doubt not but they would all admire and wonder hereat, conſidering the great mutabilitie amongſt themſelves. To be ſhort, there are ſome, who ſticke not to deride them who have lately written of the government of Commonwealths and Lawes, as though they had written things fabulous and altogether impoſſible. And that I ſpeake nothing of other Philoſophers that have written of this Argument, that

A divine Plato amongſt the Greeks, a man who in honeſt life, vertuous ſpeech, and ſound Philoſophie excelled all others. This man is almoſt continually ſcoffed at by them, who in their own conceit are skilfull in civill affairs, and brought in as a Vice in a Comedie. Whereas, whoſoever conſidereth his Writings with diligence, ſhall often and eaſily find matter agreeable with moſt mens manners: yea this Plato himſelf confeſſeth, that he dare not by reaſon of the common peoples ignorance ſet down the true opinion of God. But many think Plato's words full of vanitie, and licentiouſneſſe, and admire Lycurgus, and every one commendeth the Citie of Sparta, for that it ſo long time perſevered in his Laws. It is therefore an evident demonſtration of Vertue to remain in their Laws. But if thoſe who ſo admire the Lacedemonians, doe compare them with us, and the time during the which their Lawes were in
B force, with the time of our Common-wealth: they ſhall finde that ours hath continued more then two thouſand yeers. They ſhall alſo finde that the Lacedemonians did onely perfectly obſerve their Laws, during ſuch time as they were in proſperitie and libertie, and that when their fortune changed, they then became unmindfull of their Laws.

Plato admired amongſt the Greeks.

Lycurgus the Law-maker amongſt the Lacedemonians.

But we, who have felt many thouſand miſ-haps, by reaſon of the often change of Princes in Aſia, have not in theſe our laſt miſeries and evils forſaken our Law. Neither can any man ſay, that libertie and licentious life is the cauſe, why we ſo diligently obſerve them, ſeeing, that whoſo pleaſe may ſee ſufficient proof, that they tie us to more ſtrict life and laborious, then thoſe of the Lacedemonians did them. For they neither tilled the earth, nor uſed any handy-craft, but ceaſing from all labours and pains-taking, lived in their Citie fat and fair-
C liking, having both their meat and all other neceſſaries provided and prepared for them by others, and eſteemed that only their felicitie to do and endure any thing, ſo that they might prevail againſt thoſe againſt whom they enterprized wars: and that they failed alſo herein, I omit to rehearſe. For not onely one or two of them at once, but oftentimes whole companies of them, forgetting their own Laws, yeelded themſelves to their enemies. And can any one tell of, I ſay not ſo many, but of one or two of us that ever was treacherous to his own Lawes, or that feared to die for them? I mean not a common death, ſuch as ſouldiers are ſubject unto, but ſuch a death as is affected by all torments and tortures that can be deviſed. Which I think thoſe that prevailed againſt us, impoſed upon us, not for hatred, but that they deſired to ſee if ſo admirable a matter; and to ſee we being but men, and ſuch who eſteemed it
D the greateſt impietie poſſible to do it, could be compelled by them to ſpeak or do any thing contrarie to our laws. Yet it is no wonder that we for our Law to die with ſuch conſtancy, rather then any other Nation: for other Nations cannot abide to endure that which we account a trifle, to wit, labour and ſimple fare, and that no man eat whatſoever, or what he deſireth, to lie with them whom he ought not, or to be idle, (except he be of noble birth) or go gallantly attired: and we are alwayes carefull that when we fight againſt our enemies, we obſerve our Lawes concerning our meats. And thus we take pleaſure to obſerve and keep our Lawes and to exerciſe fortitude in obeying them.

The Iews compared with the Lacedemonians.

The ſtrict laws of the Iews.

Let now Lyſimachus or Molonus paſſe, and ſuch as they be, wicked lying Writers, and Sophiſters, deceivers of young men, and detracters of our own Nation, as though we were the E wickedeſt people living. As for me, I will not examine the Lawes of other Nations: for it is our cuſtome to keep and obſerve our own, not to detract others; yea, and our Law-maker openly prohibited us from blaſpheming ſuch, as other Nations hold for gods onely, for the Name of God attributed unto them: yet may we not leave the objections of our accuſers unanſwered, ſeeing that which we are to ſpeak againſt them, is not our own device, but many before us have ſpoken it. Who then of all the wiſe Greeks will not condemne the moſt famous Poets, and eſpecially, the Law makers, who at firſt brought and ſettled ſuch vain opinions of the gods among the common people? affirming the number of them to be ſo many as they thought good, and to be born at divers times one of another, allotting to every one his proper place, as unto other living creatures: ſome to be under the earth, F others in the Sea, and the ancienteſt amongſt them in Hell, fettered and bound: and thoſe whom they place in Heaven, in words they doe term him a Father, but in deeds they ſhew him to be a Tyrant, and for this cauſe they report that his wife, his brother, and his daughter, whom they affirme to have been born of his brain, conſpired againſt him to binde him, and hang him, as they report him alſo to have dealt by his father. Againſt theſe vanities all excellent and wiſe men do worthily inveigh, who beſide this already rehearſed, in deriſion adde, how ſome of the gods are young, and ſome old, and ſome infants, others are gods of Arts and Sciences, and one is a Smith, another a Weaver, another a Pilgrime, and is at variance with mortall men, others delight in muſick, others in ſhooting: moreover, that they are at variance one with another amongſt themſelves,& that they fall out one with another in mens behalf,and that not onely one of them layeth violent hands upon the other,but that alſo they are wounded by mortall men, and ſorrow and feel grief for the wounds; and that which is moſt abominable of all, do uſe carnal copulation with mankind, and that moſt undecently, that their unbridled luſt is extended both to men and women. Then that their chief god of all, whom they call father, contemned and drowned certain women whom he himſelf had deceived and gotten with child, and that he could not deliver the children born of theſe women from calamity, for that deſtiny had obliged him, nor ſee their deaths without tears. This is all good ſtuffe, as alſo is that which followeth, to wit, adulteries committed in Heaven, ſo openly, and impudently amongſt the gods, that ſome profeſſe themſelves to envy their fellow gods and goddeſſes tied together in ſuch filthineſſe. And what ſhould the reſt of them do, when as their King and the moſt ancienteſt amongſt them, could not refrain his luſtful licenciouſneſſe from the company of women? Moreover, ſome of them became ſervants unto men, and ſome built houſes for money, and others became ſhepheards, others like malefactors were chained in hell. What man then that ever was accounted wiſe, would not bluſh at theſe follies, and reprove the inventors hereof, and the fooliſh believers alſo? Others preſumed to fain both terrour, and fear, and madneſſe, and ſuch ſimplicity, as that they might be deceived, and all other naughty paſſions to be found in the nature of their gods, and have perſwaded whole cities to offer ſacrifice to the moſt noble amongſt them. And they are in great perplexity, thinking that ſome of the gods are the givers of all good things, others again to be their enemies, and ſo ſeek to pleaſe them with gifts as they would do wicked men; and they are verily perſwaded, that they ſhall ſuſtain great damage by their meanes, except they do daily pacifie their wrath by frequent gifts. What is the cauſe of this ſhamefull ignorance, and erroneous iniquity concerning God? Truely I am perſwaded, for that their firſt Law-makers were themſelves herein to ſeek, and ignorant of the nature of God, and that they did not faithfully deliver unto their Common-wealth, ſo much as themſelves knew concerning this point: but as though it had been a thing of leaſt moment, did wilfully let it paſſe, giving licence to poets, and permitting them to deifie and make gods whom they pleaſed, and that the Orators ſhould write of the Common-wealths affairs, and tell what them liked of ſtrange gods. Moreover, the painters and image-makers amongſt the Greeks, had a great hand in making of gods, it being lawful for them every one to frame what ſhape he liſt, and how he liſt, ſome of earth, others of colours: and the chiefeſt god-makers amongſt them uſe Ivory and Gold to make their god of; a true argument of their mutable novelty. And then the ancient gods whom they firſt ſo honoured and reverenced as they could poſſibly deviſe being now withered with age, are out of credit, and other youngſters poſſeſſe their places, and honours: their Temples alſo ſome are deſolate, others newly erected, as men pleaſe. Whereas contrariwiſe, they ought moſt conſtantly to keep their opinion of God, and his religion.

Apollonius Molon was one of theſe proud fooles: but thoſe Grecians that follow true Philoſophie, knew all that is alreadie ſaid, and the cold reaſons of this allegory, and therefore did juſtly deſpiſe them, and agreed with us in the true and decent opinion of Gods nature. Which Plato well ſeeing, affirmeth that Poets are not to be permitted in a Common-wealth, and ſendeth Homer away very honourably crowned and anointed, leſt that he with his fables ſhould deſtroy or deprave the true opinion of God. For Plato of all others eſpecially imitated our Law-maker, as he did herein alſo, commanding all his Citizens that all of them ſhould perfectly learn his laws, and that for no caſualty, any ſtrange forrain cuſtome ſhould be admitted into their city, but that their Common-wealth ſhould be pure, and they perſiſt in the obſervation of their lawes. But Apollonius Molon not reſpecting this, enveigheth againſt us, for not receiving into our ſociety men of ſtrange opinions or religion, whereas not onely we do ſo, but commonly all Greeks, yea and the moſt prudent amongſt them. The Lacedemonians did expel all ſtrangers and did not permit their citizens to travel into other countries, fearing that by both their waies their lawes might be corrupted. They therefore are to be ſpoken againſt rather then we, ſeeing they neither admit ſtrangers to converſe with them, nor to inhabite amongſt them, no nor impart their religion unto them; but we, though not deſirous to learn other Nations religion, yet do we not deny to impart ours to ſtrangers that deſire to embrace it: which if I be not deceived is a token of magnanimity, and clemency in us: but this ſhall ſuffice concerning the Lacedemonians. Apollonius was ignorant how matters ſtood with the Athenians, who boaſt that

A that their Citie is free from all Nations: for they did moſt ſeverely and without all mercy puniſh thoſe that did but ſpeak any word againſt their God. For what was the cauſe of Socrates his death? he neither betrayed the Citie to enemies, nor deſtroyed their Temples, but onely ſwore by a ſtrange oath, which as he ſaid (whether in jeſt or in earneſt) a Divell, taught him, and for this offence he was put to death, by drinking hemlock: his accuſers alledging, that he corrupted young men, and contemned the lawes and religion of his countrey. And this Socrates ſuſtained being a Citizen of Athens. Socrates a Citizen of Athens.

Anaxagoras was of Clazomenia: and for that he affirmed the Sun which the Athenians worſhipped for God, to be a fiery ſtone, he was by the ſentence of ſome few condemned to die. They alſo proclaimed that whoſoever would kill Diagoras of Melus, ſhould be rewarded Anaxagoras.

B with a talent for his labour, onely for that this Diagoras was ſaid to deride their myſteries: Protagoras alſo had been by them taken and put to death, had he not made quick eſcape, onely for that they ſuppoſed him to have written certain doubts of the Athenian gods. And what wonder is it that they ſo uſed theſe famous men, who ſpared not to uſe the like crueltie upon women? For they killed a Prieſt, for that ſome accuſed her to worſhip ſtrange gods: and their Law appointed, that who ſo did introduce ſtrange gods into their Citie, ſhould be puniſhed with death. It is therefore evident that they who enacted ſuch ſtraight laws, believed not the gods of other Nations to be gods: for had they believed in them, they would not have deprived themſelves of the benefit of many gods. The very Scythians (who de- A talent is 600. crowns.

lighted in man ſlaughter, ſo that they very little differ from bruit beaſts) yet doe they think themſelves bound to maintain their own lawes, as beſt, ſo that they ſlew Anacharſis a The Scythians

C famous Greek, that came unto them onely for that he ſeemed to attribute too much unto the Grecian gods; yea, thou mayeſt find many among the Perſians, who for this cauſe have been tortured. And it is evident that Apollonius approved the Perſian lawes: for when The Perſians manners.

the Greeks admired their fortitude and concord of opinions concerning God, I mean the fortitude they ſhewed in burning of their Temples, this Apollonius in all things imitated the Perſians, violating other mens wives, and putting out their childrens eyes; whereas our Lawes adjudge him to death that ſo uſeth unreaſonable beaſts: And neither the fear and terrour of Potentates, nor the favour of them whom all men reverence, could ever cauſe The Jewes conſtancie in their Lawes.

D us to forſake or abandon theſe Lawes: neither do we exerciſe fortitude, to the end to deprive other men of their goods and fortunes by warre, but to keep our own Lawes: and we who patiently put up all other injurie, yet if any man doe in our Religion provoke us, we preſently ſeek revenge, not reſpecting our own abilitie; yea, though thereby we work our owne utter ruine, and calamitie. What therefore ſhould move us to imitate the Lawes of other Nations, when they that made thoſe Lawes (yea even the law-makers themſelves) did tranſgreſſe them? or how can the Lacedemonians avoid reproach for their inhoſpitalitie, and neglecting marriage? Or the Elians and Thebans for accompanying Againſt the Law-makers of the Gentiles

If therefore we doe valorouſly endure thus much for our Lawes, all men muſt needs grant our Lawes to be very good: but if

F they ſay we ſuffer all theſe calamities for to maintain wicked or naughtie Lawes, what puniſhment are they not worthie of, who having (as they ſay) better Lawes then we, do ſo eaſily forſake them, whereas we doe maintain ours even with our own lives? But ſeeing antiquitie of Lawes is the greateſt argument to prove their goodneſſe, I will ſet down of what The Iewes Lawes are of great antiquitie.

antiquitie our lawes are, together with our Law-makers opinion of the Deitie; if therefore any one compare our Laws with the Laws of all Nations, he ſhall find that ours are of more antiquitie then theirs by many ages. For our lawes eſtabliſhed amongſt us, have been imitated of all other Nations: For though the firſt Greeks did colourably obſerve Lawes, yet all The Lawes of the Gentiles.

their Philoſophers did imitate ours, and our opinions of God; and in humilitie taught others, communion of life, and converſation: yea, the common people did long ſince imitate our Pietie. neither is their any Nation either Greeks or Barbarians, who have not after ſome manner obſerved a Sabbath as we do, and faſting dayes, and candleſticks with light, all which they learned of us, yea many do alſo obſerve our cuſtomes concerning their meats, and our unitie and concord, wherein we excell all other Nations, our communitie alſo and induſtrie in Arts and labours, and ſufferance for our lawes. And which is moſt to be admired, our Law, not having any to force us to obſerve it, hath ſo obliged our hearts, that as God is of all the world honoured without compulſion, ſo are our Lawes amongſt us all, we not forced thereunto: And whoſoever doth diligently conſider his own Nation and family, ſhall find that which I have reported, to be true. I will now generally reprehend the voluntarie malice of all men. for either they mean that we having theſe good Lawes do yet little eſteem them, and follow worſe, or if they doe not ſo mean, let them hold their malicious tongue from any further calumniation. For I doe not take upon me the defence of this cauſe, for that I bear any hatred to any man, but for that I and all the Jewes doe honour and reverence our Lawmaker, and believe that whatſoever he propheſied, proceeded from God; yea, although our ſelves did not know the goodneſſe of our Lawes, yet the multitude of them that imitate them, were a ſufficient motive to induce us thereunto. But I have at large, and with all ſinceritie diſcourſed of our Lawes and Common-wealth, in my Books of our Antiquitie. And now again, I have made mention of them neither in contumely of other Nations, nor in praiſe of our own, but onely to reprove ſuch as have moſt maliciouſly and impudently belied us, contrary to the known truth: And I think I have already fully performed that which I have promiſed. For I have ſhewed our Nation (contarie to their affirmations) to be moſt ancient, which I have proved by the teſtimony of many ancient Writers, who in their works have mentioned us.

The Epilogue of this book.

The cauſe why Joſeph writ theſe books againſt Apion.

A brief rehearſall of all that is aboveſaid.

Our adverſaries affirm us to have come of Egyptians: I have ſhewed that our forefathers came into Egypt out of ſome other place. They alledge that we were expelled Egypt for their miſerie, in that they were infected with diſeaſes; I have proved that they came from thence to their own Country, by means of their own proweſs and force, of their own accord: Others labour to defame our Law-maker as a wicked perſon, whoſe vertue many of ancient times, and ſo long time as hath been ſince him, do witneſſe. It is not needfull to ſpeak more largely of our Lowes: for they by themſelves appear pious and good, and ſuch as do not invite or incite us to the hatred of other Nations, but rather to communion and friendſhip, being both enemies to iniquitie, and commanders of Juſtice, baniſhers of luxurioufneſſe, and teachers of frugalitie and labour: forbidding all wars enterprized for avarice, and preparing the people to ſhew fortitude in them, and for them; inflicting inevitable puniſhment upon their tranſgreſſors, not eaſily to be deceived by glozing ſpeeches; and executing in action, all that they in word command: yet amongſt us the execution of them and obſervation is more ready then the words of them: I therefore confidently affirm that we do teach more pious and vertuous manners then other Nations doe. For what can be better then inviolate Pietie? what more juſt then to obey the Law? what more profitable and commodious, then to be at unitie and peace amongſt our ſelves? and neither to forſake one another in calamitie, nor injure one another in proſperite, to contemne and deſpiſe death in time of war, and in peace to labour and till our grounds, and to uſe other Arts and works, and alwayes to think and believe, that God beholdeth all our actions, and ruleth and diſpoſeth all things? If this be either written or reſerved by any one before this time, we are then to thank them as being their ſchollers: but if they are known never before to have been extant, then we are known to be the firſt Authors and inventers of it. Let therefore all Apions and Molons goe, and all others that with them are convicted of lying and ſlandering. And this book is written to thee Epaphroditus who loveſt the truth, and to others who by thee will, or are deſirous to know the ſame.

This is most evidently proved by the books of the Maccabees, in the Scripture: which books the Jews did not receive as Canonicall, yet do they account it among their sacred Writ. I cannot but congratulate this worthie Colledge (which though famous for many other things, yet is more happie) for that it is so blessed as to enjoy so worthie and unspeakable a Treasure: Or rather all Colonia Agrippina, that happie and fortunate Citie; yet in nothing more happy, then for that it alone doth in her bosome shrine so many, so sacred, and excellent pledges of*

And this best portion and part of her felicitie, this worthie Citie might bestow upon her self, yea, and double the same. FLAVIVS JOSEPHVS OF THE RVLE OF REASON,

A moſt eloquent Book, corrected by Moſt lively ſetting down the Martyrdome of the

I

MACCABEES.

Am at the inſtant requeſt of Polybius of Megalopolis, to put in writing the conſtant ſuffering of the Maccabees, worthy all admiration, not in a Rhetorical and pleaſing ſtile, but rather after our own Countrey faſhion, thereby to exhort our Nation to patience in their calamities. But firſt of all, it is neceſſary for us to ſpeak ſomething of Reaſon, and aſſign unto it the power and vertue to deliberate. For he who hath once fully determined to ſuffer all miſery for Gods ſake, is in my opinion already a Martyr: it is therefore a great merit once to have ſo determined; and therefore, as is above-ſaid, Reaſon beareth the rule of all inferiour paſſions; and then if deſtiny deny us opportunitie to ſuffer, yet have we ſuffered all, becauſe we purpoſed to ſuffer all. Whoſo therefore will renounce the world, and aſpire onely to celeſtiall things, he muſt exerciſe ſobrietie, baniſh gluttonie, with his page laſciviouſneſſe, and all other ſuch like vices as may poſſeſſe and captive the minde: he muſt likewiſe mount up to the top of Vertues Tower; that, after he may from thence war againſt the vices of his body, griefe and fear; the firſt whereof aſſaulteth us when we begin, the laſt when we have begun. There are many examples of the valiant ſouldiers of God, which I would uſe, but that the Ornaments ſprung from the womb of one woman may ſuffice me, which ſhe brought forth, not at one birth, but with the ſame pietie and zeal. And firſt, I will ſpeak of Eleazar, the cauſe and example of their paſſion, and then I will relate what tortures and torments their mother endured: yet cannot man, but onely God determine, who amongſt them was firſt, and who laſt in this noble agony. They therefore, being all ſettled in one opinion, reſembling one another more in mind then they did in body, duely conſidered the frailtie of this life, and therefore neither delighted in the flatteries of the world, nor any alluring enchantments thereof. They ſhewed themſelves not to eſteeme of torments, fetters, nor no other ſorts of tortures impoſed upon them: and to return to our firſt ſaying, they premeditated patience, to endure whatſoever the Judges cruelties could deviſe. I will therefore, what I may, praiſe the fortitude of theſe brethren, or rather I will with all truth rehearſe the moſt worthy agonie of theſe holy men, which deſerves all commendations; and ſetting all adulation apart, proſecute with a bare Hiſtoricall narration, the manner of their martyrdome.

Reaſon hath dominion over our paſſions.

K

The death of the ſeven brethren, and their mother.

But before I begin to declare the death of nobilitie, I will a little entreat of Reaſon, which, as I have affirmed, is no ſmall motive to Martyrdome. Reaſon it is, that maketh us obſerve faſts, and uſe abſtinence, it is Reaſon that makes us deſpiſe money, and by it we are tanght not to account of dignities and honours, which all men generally aim at, yea Reaſons gift it is that we do reſiſt the heat of luſtfull deſires. Hence cometh it, that having once overcome ſuch things as the fleſh delights in, we finde our ſelves a little able to reſiſt, we alſo learn

The deſcription of Reaſon and Wiſedome.

A to deſpiſe pains and torments, and ſo reſolute to ſuffer all things that ſhall be impoſed upon us. Which, that it may more plainly appear, let us ſearch out the cauſe of this order, and we ſhall find wiſedome to be the cauſe hereof. For no man can determine and diſtinguiſh good from evil, that is not endued with wiſedome; this wiſedome is alwayes accompanied with juſtice, and juſtice is ſtill joyned with vertue, and vertue and temperance cannot be ſeparated; ſo that this wiſedome conſiſteth upon four parts. Beſides theſe, there are two things that either do cauſe or hinder paſſion, to wit, pain and pleaſure; one of which we do always refuſe, and the other we do alwaies deſire; yet where pleaſure ariſeth, and is preſently by reaſons rule put away, the mind is there ſtrengthened, and pain compared with glo y, is
B through hope of a greater reward contemned before it come; and being come, our minde is aſhamed not to ſuffer that which before it was reſolved to do. Reaſon therefore is the guide of all our actions, and by it we deſpiſe torments, and deteſt vice, which like a skilful husbandman pruneth and cutteth away ſuperfluous branches, and killeth the heat of all corrupt and hurtful humours, onely leaving that to remain in uſe, which may ſome way be profitable to us.

Grief and paid cauſe or hinder paſſion.

Reaſon reſembleth a skilful gardiner.

Thus reaſon purifieth us by paſſion, encouraging to ſuffer, and in our ſuffering and agony ſtrengtheneth us. Who is not deſirous to eat of the fleſh of wilde beaſts and fiſhes? And who
C luſteth not to eat of feathered fouls? nay, do not the dainty diſhes got either in ſea or land invite us to eat of them? What then cauſeth us to abſtain from them? that all men deſire them, yet no man eats them? even in this thing the mind is taught to overcome it ſelf in delightful objects, and to bridle all pleaſure, that when occaſion of Martyrdome is offered, the mind ſetting aſide all vanities, will not for a little pleaſure forget his accuſtomed vertue.

For this cauſe was Joſeph juſtly praiſed in that he was not overcome by luſt, which reigneth in a youthful body: this reaſon ſo worketh with ſound advice and mature counſel, that it again recovereth loſt friendſhip, and getteth new, and ſuffereth no cruelty to be committed. Of this we have alſo the example of Moſes, who had he not juſt occaſion to be angry againſt Dathan and Abiram, reaſon (no doubt) would have cauſed him to have ſmothered
D all grief of mind. Did not our father Jacob with great vehemency reprove his ſons Simon and Levi, that without reaſon they had uſed ſuch cruelty, ſaying, Curſed be your anger? Which anger and wrath of theirs had it been bridled with reaſon, neither had they been curſed, nor the other had periſhed. For this cauſe, God, the maker of mankind, when he faſhioned us and our manners, having finiſhed all lineaments of the body, he now placed the mind to be in it, and to rule it, leaving it certain precepts to obſerve and keep, to wit, temperance, and to imbrace and follow that which is good, and cleave unto juſtice, and rule and bridle all paſſions in the body ſubject unto it, and obſerve the precepts of God.

An inſtance of Joſephus chaſtity.

But ſome will aske me wherefore we offer to commit wickedneſſe, ſeeing that reaſon ruleth our paſſion? But it is a ridiculous thing to think that reaſon ſo ruleth, for reaſons rule cannot hinder the appetite from deſire, but onely correct deſire, and ſo prevail, that it ſuffer
E with patience the loſſe or abſtinence from ſuch things as it deſired. For example ſake, reaſon cannot hinder thee from being angry, but it can ſo work that thou commit no impiety when thou art angry: in like manner, it cannot hinder thee from deſiring filthy pleaſure, yet can it cauſe thee not to yeeld unto it.

Reaſon therefore cannot utterly extinguiſh vice, but onely bridle it. Witneſſe in this the example of holy David, who fighting againſt ſtrangers with great ſucceſſe, and b ing at evening weary and faint, he came unto his Princely tabernacle, that was guarded by his ſouldiers, where he found them all at meat: yet himſelf being thirſty, durſt not drink, notwithſtanding water was hard by, onely for that religion diſſwaded him, for he had vowed not to F drink before he had conquered his enemies. He alſo forbade his men to drink, ſo that they might fight more couragiouſly, if not for that they were valiant, at leaſt for that ſo they might have drink. Whileſt thus his thirſt encreaſed, three young men of ſtrong bodies armed themſelves, and taking with them a veſſel to put water in, they went unto their enemies camp, and there aſſaulted the watchmen, who for fear of death fled, and ſo they paſt thorow the camp, till ſuch time as they came where the water was, and taking ſome from thence, they brought it to the King. But holy David ſo bridled his humane appetite, that by reaſon he quenched his deſire, and ſhewed an excellent token of patience, teaching how the fear of God was to be preferred before all things. For taking the water he had much wiſhed for, and which had been gotten with ſuch danger, he preſently powred it on the ground, as a ſacrifice to God; chuſing rather to die for thirſt, then to offend the divine

Maieſtie:

Majeſtie: yet reaſon is not ſo forcible, that it is able without due conſideration to repreſſe G the inordinate motions of the mind, and mitigate the grief of the body. But it is now time to come to our Hiſtory, yet is not this former diſcourſe to be thought impertinent, for that it is ſomewhat appertaining to the matter enſuing. Such was the wiſedome and fidelitie of our forefathers, that Seleucus, King of Aſia, enriched our Prieſts, and being a man of ano-Seleucus and Nicanor. ther religion, did aſcribe all his actions and worthy deeds to the religion and faith of our anceſtors. But wicked mens madneſſe could not herewith be ſatisfied. For one Simon, hating the high Prieſt Onias, and finding no wayes or means to be revenged of him in his Simon a traitor to his country. own countrey, went unto Appollonius, governour of Syria, Phœnicia and Cilicia, and before him in a publike aſſembly told him, that he could help the King to an infinite trea-ſure, for (quoth he) there is hidden in Jeruſalem an infinite deal of gold and ſilver, which H by right belongeth unto King Seleucus. Appollonius hearing this, praiſed and commended Appollonius, captain of Syria, come with an army to Ieruſalem, Simon, and confiſcated the gold and ſilver to the treaſure-houſe of Seleucus; and having authority from the King to get it, he levied an army, and ſo accompanied with Simon, came unto our countrey, purpoſing if any violence were offered, to uſe the defence of his ſouldiers.

When the treaſure-houſe of our temple was now a ſacking, Onias wept bitterly, and ſaid, that it was a heavy ſight to them to whom this treaſure was committed, to ſee it, or any part of it taken away. But Appollonius, neither reſpecting the tears and intreaties of the old men, women, nor children, preſſed into the Temple, they all praying God to puniſh him, and I to defend their temple. Being now with a great guard of armed men entred into the holy Angels upon horſes, ſhining with fiery brightneſſe. Temple, there appeared certain Angels on horſeback with weapons in their hands, and ſhining with a fiery flame about them, and they daunted the courage of this infidel Apollonius, who preſently fell down flat upon his face: and lying ſo a great while, at laſt he came a little to himſelf: and riſing up, he leaned upon his ſhoulder who kept the Temple, not being able to ſtand alone, he was ſo terrified with the viſion he had ſeen. When he came a little to himſelf, and was in ſome hope of recovery, he ſtretched both his hands towards heaven, and himſelf deſpairing to obtain pardon for his offence committed, he beſought the Hebrews (whoſe Temple he came to ſpoil) to make intereceſſion for him, himſelf with tears craving pardon for his offence, and not onely acknowledging his fault, but alſo confeſſing K himſelf to have deſerved death, and all puniſhment poſſible. Holy Onias ſeeing this, and Onias by praier obtained Apollonius his life. fearing alſo that if Appollonius ſhould then die, the Hebrews would be ſuſpected to have made him away, he made prayers to God for him, and ſo obtained his enemies life. Apollonius preſently haſted to Seleucus to let him underſtand what had hapned: but when he came he found Seleucus dead, and Antiochus reigning in his ſtead, a man of tyrannous nature, Antiochus his rage againſt the Iews. who bare an ancient grudge to Onias the high Prieſt: and therefore made Jaſon his brother high Prieſt in his ſtead; Jaſon promiſing Antiochus, in lieu of this good turn, to pay him 3660. talents of ſilver every year.

This Jaſon being now made high Prieſt, and chief amongſt all the nation of the Jews, he preſently forced all the people to impietie, and to forſake religion, ſo that to build baths, he hindred the defence and building of the Temple, and all Doctors of our Nation conſpired L with him in this iniquitie. But hereat God was preſently wroth: who being diſpleaſed, it was not needful to ſeek forrain enemies, for Antiochus himſelf was incited to rage againſt them.
who warring againſt Ptolomæus King of Egypt, he heard it reported that the Jews did deem him to be dead, yet was he very gallantly entertained by the inhabitants of Jeruſalem: and preſently after the fight, he made an edict, that who ſo amongſt the Jews refuſed to offer ſacrifice to the gods, he ſhould preſently die upon the wheel. But the godly minded of our nation did little eſteem this edict, yea the women circumciſing their infants (as our law requireth) did afterward caſt themſelves down headlong, to the end that they might ſo obtain a preſent death without longer delay. Antiochus perceiving that the ſeverity of his edict could not compel the Hebrews to forſake their religion, but that men voluntarily did chuſe M death; he ſitting in an eminent place from whence all the Jews might behold him, calling all of them together, he cauſed ſwines fleſh to be ſacrificed upon the Altar, and to be of-Eleazer brought unto Antiochus. 2 Macc. 6. fered to every Hebrew to eat. Amongſt this whole multitude aſſembled from all places, was one Eleazar a Prieſt, well inſtructed in learning, and the fear of GOD, a man of aged years, and of a very reverend countenance, one that was known to all men, and famous Antiochus exhortation to Eleazar. for his vertue. To this man Antiochus ſaid thus:

Be adviſed by me, holy old man, to eſchew thoſe torments prepared for ſuch as are obſtinate, pre-ſerve thy reverend age, and contemne not the benefit of this life, take the ſacrifice and eat of the

ſwines

A ſwines fleſh: for it is contrarie to all wiſe mens advice to credit the Jewes opinions, and to refuſe that meat which Nature hath as well ordained for Mankind as any other. We ſhew our ſelves ungrateſull for Gods benefits, who contemne his graces, and make difference where Nature hath made none; or what reaſon is there to ſhew that this beaſt is more abominable then others? Either all beaſts are to be eaten, or elſe all to be eſchewed: it is ſuperſtition and idleneſs to barre our ſelves from any thing by a Law, when we have no other for it, but our will. Set apart thoſe vain and ſottiſh opinions, and at leaſt in this venerable age change thy opinion into better. Or ſuppoſe your Lawes are forcible and to be obſerved, yet will they excuſe thee, ſeeing thou doſt not ſinne voluntarily, but by compulſion.

Eleazar, being permitted to ſpeak, thus replied to Antiochus, who both exhorted and forced Eleazars anſwer to Antiochus.
B him to breach of his Lawes. We, Antiochus, doe not follow a vain report, but we obſerve the veritie of Religion which our fathers kept, and fear of torments cannot make us embrace another Religion, and forſake our own: yea, ſuppoſe our Religion delivered to us by our fathers had no firm grounds, yet would I in nothing, no not compelled by torments, forſake it. Do not eſteem it a ſmall matter to eat impious meat, and to taſte of that which is ſacrificed to Idols, for it is a profane thing to touch things that are prophane. Our Law condemneth your Philoſophie, wherein he is moſt ignorant that thinketh himſelf moſt wiſe.

We are taught to embrace ſobrietie, to ſubdue in us all inordinate appetite, to keep our bodies chaſte, and to ſuffer with patience whatſoever for Gods ſake is inflicted upon us, and not to denie the Truth, Juſtice or Pietie, or God, who alone is true: and therefore I refuſe this profane meat, well knowing what I ought to eat, as warranted therein by the Precept of the Almightie God, whoſe Lawes
C I have learned to obey, and eſchew all meats ſacrificed to Idols, and embrace with all my force that which is expedient for the ſoul: It is open Tyrannie to compell any one to that which Religion forbiddeth, and to command that which is contrarie to Juſtice.

Doe what thou wilt, mock at thy pleaſure, yet ſhalt thou be more derided, then thou thy ſelf derideſt. I will perſiſt in the holy ſteps of my forefathers; notwithſtanding, thou therefore with Tyrannous hands pluck out mine eyes, and with a ſharp knife rip up my entrails, thou ſhalt never conquer me. I will die ſafe and ſound, and patient in the love of God; neither flatter thy ſelfe for that I am aged, and that my body is now feeble: If need be, that I muſt be ſacrificed for Gods ſake, thou ſhalt finde me in theſe yeers as luſtie as a childe, as conſtant as a young man, yea, and moſt joy-
D full in torments: and prepare an extraordinarie fire for me, or what elſe ſoever, thou ſhalt finde me more conſtant amiddeſt torments, then now I am, before I come to them.

O ſacred Religion! I will never violate thee the foundation of my ſalvation, the defence of the Eleazars conſtancie.
believer, the ground of faith; never will I lift up my hands contrarie to thy Precepts, never will I believe any thing to be juſt, which is repugnant to that which thou haſt taught me: I will not loſe the merit of ſo many years, nor relinquiſh the faith I have hitherto embraced. The chaſte, pure, and devout companie of Fathers ſhall receive me into their number, where I ſhall not fear (O impious King) thy threats. But thou haſt changed the name of King, to Tyrant, yet thou ſhalt never alledge againſt me my deed, my conſent, my word.

Whileſt Eleazar, full of conſtancie and libertie, ſpake thus, the ſouldiers that ſtood there- Eleazar cruelly whipped.
E about haled him to be tortured; and ſtripping him naked, they hanged him up, and whipped him, and whileſt on either ſide he was beaten, a crier with an impious voice ſtill cried unto him, Obey the Kings pleaſure and command. But worthy Eleazar was not overcome by torment, but ſuffered all tortures, as though he had been in reſt and ſleep, and did manfully, and without feare endure all torments: and fixing his venerable eyes upon Heaven, he knew in whom he beleeved, and to whom he ſacrificed his ſoul; and beholding the fleſh on each ſide rent and torn from his body, and the bloud iſſuing out in great aboundance, he admired his own patience, and thanked God the Authour thereof. At laſt, ſeeing in himſelf the frailtie of all fleſh (which is ſcarcely able to endure ſo ſharp torments) he fell upon his face, which with ſtripes was all rent and torn, ſtill glorifying God, as he did before his fall. Then
F one of the ſouldiers, to gratifie the King, did like a mad man ſpurn and tread upon him, thereby to increaſe his torments more But Eleazar, both ſtrong in body and mind, did like a right champion of the true GOD, never ſhrinke at thoſe pains, but this patient old man did by patience overcome the crueltie of his torturers, ſo that even the torturers themſelves admired, that he endured ſo many torments. Then the Kings Officers comming unto him, ſaid;

How long Eleazar, wilt thou neglect to obey the King, and to free thy ſelf from torments? eate of the fleſh of ſwine, and redeem thy ſelfe from all thou endureſt. Eleazar, although in this Martyrdome he had been ſilent, yet could he not without anſwering, endure to heare ſo profane

counſell,

counſell, but as tormented with this ſpeech, he cried out; We ſonnes of the Hebrewes are not ſo effeminate as to forſake the way of our ſalvation, wherein we have walked even untill our old Age, neither are we taught for the avoyding of contumely which will not long continue, to give others example and occaſion to ſinne. It is but a while that this life is to continue: ſo that we forſake but a ſmall triſle, yet hope we for that which is of great moment. Wilt thou Tyrant, eſteeme of us if we ſhould yeeld unto thee? Nay, thou mighteſt juſtly reprove our inconſtancie. We will therefore die, and reſigne our ſoules; (O venerable father Abraham) into thy boſome. G

The ſouldiers ſeeing his conſtancie, did by the Kings command caſt him into the fire, and poured ſtinking and loathſom liquors into his noſtrils. All which this reverend old man did moſt willingly ſuffer, and ſo was conſumed with the flame: yet when Nature began to fail, he ſpake after this manner, lifting up his dazled eyes to heaven: Thou art He (O God) from whom life and ſalvation proceedeth: behold, I die for obſerving thy Lawes, be mercifull to this thy Nation, and do not forſake them whom thou haſt hitherto protected, even in thy boſome, and unaer the ſhadow of the wings of thy Clemencie, let my death end all miſerie, and pacifie thy wrath bent againſt our whole Nation for their offences, receive me for them all, and beſtow them all upon me. And amidſt theſe ſpeeches he joyfully yielded up the ghoſt. H

Eleazars laſt words in the fire.

It is moſt true therefore which we at firſt affirmed, to wit, that the enduring of pains and torments is wrought by our reaſons lore: which once determined and reſolved, maketh a proſperous ſuffering of pains with all patience, which wiſely adviſing men to that which is beſt, doth ſettle and confirm our opinions to follow it. If therefore reaſon and the inferiour powers be at variance, we muſt ſubject them to reaſon if we will make a perfect victorie. I With this guide of reaſon our father Eleazar was moſt ſafely directed, neither to be overcome with pains, nor to give place to unlawfull inticements and allurements, he ſaved the ſhip of his body from all ſhipwrack that might ariſe by the tempeſtuous ſtorms of vanitie, and ſuffered himſelf with no contrary wind to be driven from the right courſe: yea, though it was toſſed upon the waves of Tyrannie, yet did it remain ſound and unbroken, and keeping a direct courſe, arrived in the haven of ſalvation. Never any man did ſeek ſo valiantly to defend his Citie from an enemy, as this holy old man did his ſoul, who amongſt ſtripes, croſſes and flames, was ſtill the ſame man he was before. For as the top of a high rock ſtandeth ſafe, and reſiſteth the wave without any dammage unto it ſelf; even ſo did the rock of Reaſon in this man beat back the rage of thoſe tempeſtuous waves that did beat againſt his K body, nor permitting them to break in and pearce the Celeſtiall and Divine power of the ſoul. O happy old man, more bleſſed then all of thy age, O Prieſt more ſacred then all other Prieſts, who didſt not pollute thy ſacred lips with profane meats; impietie found no enterance that way, from whence ſo many prayers to God had proceeded. The Tyrants crueltie could not prevail againſt thee; Thou therefore art made an example for all Prieſts of God to imitate. Such a one behoved it a Prieſt to be more ſtrong then torments, more able to ſuffer, then the torturers to inflict puniſhment, more forcible then Princes commands, yea, and more potent then the fire, wherein thou didſt periſh: and finally, thou waſt ordained to be crowned with the Lawrel of Martyrdome for thy ſufferance. Thou haſt ſurpaſſed all Antiquitie, thou ſhalt be an example to all poſteritie. It then feeble old age, where- L in all ſtrength and heat of body was extinguiſhed, now unfit to ſuffer torments (as being already broken with age) could by the advice of reaſon endure ſo many torments, ſo many miſeries, who dare deny reaſon to be the chiefe cauſe of our ſufferance? We have ſeen that all crueltie hath been overcome by a determination to perſiſt in the ſervice and fear of God: yet many affirme, that not all men who uſe the advice of reaſon are able to undergo ſuch agonies; but their aſſertion is vain, and of no force: for moſt evident it is, that he onely is overcome by pain, whom wiſedome hath not Armed with patience. And no marvel if he, who raſhly enterpriſeth ſo weightie a matter, and without due conſideration, doe at laſt forſake and repent himſelf of that which he ſo unadviſedly undertook. But if we with due advice and deliberation arme our ſelves, it is not an eaſie matter to remove us by any misfortune from our determination; when we make account that misfortune will betide us, we are M not eaſily diſmayed thereat, when it doth betide, for that nothing befell us that we expected not.

Therefore, he that is wiſe and valiant, is able to conquer his paſſions, for that he doth well deliberate, and when he commeth to his agonie, can put his determination in execution. Neither, is the wiſedome of this old man, ſo much to be admired, ſeeing children, andas it were infants, have ſo deſerved commendations in this point, that they did worke aſtoniſh-

A ment in their tormentors; for the courage and crueltie of Antiochus, being overcome by the wiſedome of old age, was now the more increaſed, and by wicked counſel cauſed ſeven worthie children of the Hebrewes to be brought unto Antioch, out of their Caſtle Soſandrum, who being young in yeers, and ſo as he thought weak and unable to ſuffer torments, his hope was that either by perſwaſions, or terrours, or tortures, he might force them to renounce their Religion. He therefore commanded theſe ſeven together, with their mother Salomana, who now grew well in yeers, to be brought before him: ſo they according to his command were brought, being of excellent beauty, and worthy children of ſo vertuous a mother; yea, they reſembled Angels, their faces ſhining like the clear light of the Sun, their eyes ſparkled in moſt comely and decent maner, as teſtifying, that they ſurpaſſed in vertue all other of hu-

B mane race and condition. She was deſcended of moſt vertuous and noble parentage, and ſo ſhe her ſelf had continued and lived; but that excellent feature of body, enriched with nobilitie of blood and dignitie, was now alſo made more noble by vertue and fortitude, wherein ſhe paſſed all other things that could be ſaid in her commendations. The Tyrant beholding them, and their mother amongſt them, with merry and gladſome countenance, he thus craftily ſpake unto the children:

Antiochus cauſeth ſeven noble young men of the Hebrews and their mother to be brought to Antioch. 2 Mac. 7.

I wiſh your good (O admirable young men) for ſo both your beautie of body and noble Parentage perſwade me: do not therefore like mad men reſiſt my command, avoid not onely torments but death alſo. For I deſire not onely to exalt you un o honour, but alſo to encreaſe your riches and poſſeſi-

The Kings exhortation to the ſeven brethren.

C ons, contemn the ſuperſtitious, and ſuperfluous belief of your Countreymen, and embrace our Religion: Which if you refuſe to do (as I hope you will not) I will deviſe all torments, whereby I may by a lingring and painfull death conſume you. And to the end to terrifie them the more, he commanded all inſtruments of torment to be preſented unto their view and eye-ſight. So wheels, rods, hooks, rakes, racks, cauldrons, cages, gridirons, were brought forth; and engines to torment the fingers and hands, gauntlets, awles, bellows, brazen pots, and frying pans: for theſe are the names which we find. For that which I term bellows, was a thinne plate of iron to kindle or blow the fire with, like a fanne; and far more horrible devices of torments were ſhewed unto them, too long to rehearſe: whereof they having had a ſight, Antiochus ſaid:

D Conſent unto me, O prudent young men: for if that I command you to commit a ſinne; yet do not you offend in doing it, ſeeing you commit it onely upon compulſion. But the young youths inflamed with a divine ſpirit and ſenſe, contemned ſo many kinds of torments, and deſpiſed the Tyrants threats and flatteries; and moſt godly (for they gave him no juſt occaſion) they did drive the Tyrant into a great rage. And by this it is evident how reaſon is maſter over paſſion: for if any ſlothfull man not before trained up to it, ſhould of a ſudden come to ſuch a puſh, at the very ſight of ſuch torments, his minde would have been troubled, and his countenance appalled, his legs under him would have trembled, and he with fear confounded: ſo that he would preſently have ſtept back from ſuch an agony, and would forthwith have alledged himſelf unable to bear ſo many and ſo grievous torments, ſaying:

The young mens conſtancie.

E My ſelf being unwiſe, what ſhould I have made choice of? Whether to endure thoſe torments, or accept of the promiſed benefits? Whether ſhould I have been moved to pittie mine own age, or to compaſſionate my mother? God would not have denied pardon for this deed, I being forced thereunto: and by doing it though againſt my will, I ſhall get the Kings favour. But where reaſon and advice taketh place, and hath well trained the mind to perfection, the other conſequently followeth: As by the example of theſe brethren I will declare, who as it were all with one voice denied to eat the ſacrificed ſwines fleſh, as they were commanded. Wherefore (ſaid they) O Tyrant, doſt thou perſecute us that are innocent? We both deſire and wiſh to die, and will untill ſuch time as death expelleth life, firmly keep that which God commanded, and Moſes taught us. And thou Tyrant, do

The ſeven brethren reply to Antiochus.

F not ſeek to ſeduce us, by proteſting fained love towards us: thou lover of injuſtice, maſter of crueltie, deviſer of iniquitie, the pardon which thou doeſt offer is to us more painfull then puniſhment: we are armed with contempt of death, and eſteem not thy words, as being by our late maſter Eleazar taught to deſpiſe them. Why then doeſt thou eſteem ſuch puſillanimitie to be in us young men, ſeeing of late thou foundeſt ſuch courage in an old man? We follow him: thou canſt not trie, and know our mindes, except by tearing our bodies thou ſearch them out: We will ſafely and ſecurely ſuffer for our God anything, and leaving this earth, we ſhall be entertained into Heaven: and thou for ſo tyrannizing moſt cruelly upon innocent ſoules, ſhalt be reſerved to eternall fire.

The Tyrant greatly moved, to ſee that he could neither prevaile by faire promiſes, nor by threatnings, he cauſed them to be beaten with Buls pizzles: and firſt of all, he commanded Maccabeus, the eldeſt of the ſeven brethren, to be ſtript, and ſtretched out upon a rack, and his hands to be bound behind him, and then to be moſt cruelly beaten, who wearied his tormenters ſuffering, (ſo great the force of vertue is,) ſo that they deſired more to leave beating him, then he requeſted they ſhould leave. This done, he was put upon a wheel, and a waight hanged at his feet, and ſo ſtretched round about it, that his ſinewes and entrailes brake, and ſo his pains increaſed: yet he being overcome with pain, his mouth was not for all this ſtopped, or hindred from calling upon God, who beheld all; and reproving the Tyrant who deviſed thoſe torments for the innocents, and taking ſtrength, he is ſaid to have cried out after this manner: G

Antiochus commanded Maccabeus to be racked.

Bloody Tyrant, who perſecuteſt the Majeſtie of God; I whom thou thus tormenteſt, am no Witch, nor one who have murthered and killed another man, but one who dies for juſtice; obſerving the Law, and for Charitie. Then when the torturers, overcome with compaſsion, willed him to ſubmit himſelf unto the Kings pleaſure, he anſwered: O ye wicked miniſters of tyranny! your wheels are not ſo ſharp and cruell, that I thereby will be forced to forſake Heaven, whereon my mind is fixed: tear my fleſh; yea, if you ſo pleaſe, roſt it at the fire: torture and torment each parcell of my body with ſeverall cruelties; you ſhall for all this find your ſelves unable to force us young men to impietie. H

As he thus ſpake, a fire was kindled, and he, as he was upon the wheel racked, was ſo thrown into the fire: and thus he was by flames and torments ſo burned, that his bowels appeared; his mind nothing moved when his fleſh yielded overcome with pains, who amidſt his pangs cried thus unto his brethren: O beloved brethren, learn of me an example of vertue, conſider the ſtrength of an invincible courage, contemne and deſpiſe the alluring baits of this world, and rather obey God then this Tyrant, who can if he pleaſe humble the proud and mightie, and exals the lowly and dejected. As thus he ſpake, he was taken out of the flame, and ſlain alive, his tongue was pulled out of his mouth, and he put into a frying pan, and ſo he departed out of this life, to the great admiration of all that beheld him, and the joy of his brethren and mother; and went before them to Heaven, there to prepare a Kingdome for himſelf and them. I

The death of the eldeſt brother.

After him, the ſecond brother, called Aber, was haled by the ſouldiers: and before the tyrant asked him whether he would relent, he cauſed all theſe torments to be ſhewed him, thereby to terrifie him: but he nothing thereat moved, and denying to eat of that foreſaid ſacrifice, his hands were bound with iron chains, and he being hanged up by them, the skin of his body was flain from the crown of his head unto his knees: ſo that the entrails in his breſt appeared naked; yet in ſuch manner as yet he might abide greater torments. For he was caſt before a cruel Libard, thirſting moſt extremely after blood, to the intent that he might devour with his teeth the reſt of his body, but the beaſt ſmelling of him (no doubt by the great handy work of Almightie God) forgot his crueltie, and turning away his face, he did no hurt to the Martyr. K

The ſecond brother brought.

But hereat the Tyrants rage increaſed; and the Martyr by ſuffering ſuch torments, was made more conſtant, crying aloud: L

O how pleaſant is that death unto me, which is cauſed by all ſorts of torments for Gods ſake! yea, ſo much the more pleaſant, for that I aſſuredly hope to finde reward for it in Heaven. Let theſe torments inflicted upon me (O Tyrant) ſatisfie thy crueltie, for my paine is not by thy tortures increaſed, but rather my pleaſure, as thou ſhalt finde by my patience in this agonie. More willing am I to ſuffer, then thou to puniſh; yet my pain in ſuffering, is leſs then thine by inflicting the ſame upon me. I am tormented for vertue and obſerving the Law, and the Juſtice of God ſhall baniſh thee from thy Regall ſeat: Thou by tormenting art tormented, and almoſt conſumed, thy wrath and furie being almoſt ſpent upon me in vain, thou ſhalt not eſcape the day of judgement: eternall torments are there prepared for thee, which neither thy prophane minde is able to indure, nor thy crueltie of power to decline thy ſinnefull ſoule being condemned to eternall puniſhments. Thus, remaining conſtant in his faith, and animated by his brothers example, he departed to Heaven. M

Then Machir, the third ſonne was brought, whom all men now pittied for the death of his two brethren, and many exhorted him by his brothers examples to deſiſt from his Opinion, and ſo avoyd puniſhment: but he being angrie hereat, thus replyed; One Father begot us, one Mother bore us, one Maſter inſtructed us, we are all of one minde, and all like affected, doe therefore no longer prolong the time in vain. I came hither to ſuffer, and not to ſpeak, uſe all your tyranny poſsibly againſt this body: for you have no power at all over my ſoule.

Machir the third brother is brought.

A tyrant hereat moved to ſee this third nothing relent by his brothers death, he deviſed more cruelty then humane wit alone could invent. Wherefore he commanded a globe to be brought, and tied the holy martyr about it in ſuch ſort, that all his bones were ſet out of joynt, and diſplaced: whereat the holy martyr was nothing diſmaid. The skin alſo of his head and face was puld off, and then he was put on the wheel: but he could not be rackt any worſe for that his bones were all diſplaced, and did hang one ſeperated from another in moſt pitiful manner: and when blood iſſued from him abundantly, he was deprived of the uſe of his hands and feet; but perceiving his life to be ſpent, he ſpake thus and died: We, O tyrant endure this torment for the love of God, and thou the author of ſuch unjuſt cruelty ſhalt ſuffer everlaſting pain. Then his tongue being cut out of his mouth; he was put into a fry-
B ing pan, and ſo amidſt thoſe torments yeilded up the ghoſt.

Next after, followed Judas, the fourth brother, whom all the people perſwaded and entreated to obey the king: but he contemning their prayers and exhortations, ſaid thus with all conſtancy: Your fire ſhall neither ſeparate nor ſever me from the Law of God, nor from my brethren, who in ſtead of this mortall life enjoy life everlaſting. I denounce unto thee, O tyrant, deſtruction and overthrow; but to ſuch as believe, ſalvation: make tryal of me therefore thou cruel wretch, and ſee if God will forſake me, who hath with open and ſtretched out armes received my three brethren that are gone before me, and whom the womb of ſo holy a mother at ſeveral times brought forth unto glory. The cruel tyrant
C hearing this, was much moved, and leapt down from his chair to torment this martyr himſelf, that ſo he might overcome him, and in his fury commanded his tongue to be cut forth: but he hereat not terrified, ſaid to Antiochus, This cruelty will nothing avail thee, neither ſhalt thou hereby, tyrant, as thou ſuppoſeſt, conquer me. Our God needs not by voice to be awakened, but rather by ſecret cogitation to be praied unto to help his ſervants: he provideth for them that hold their peace, and heareth the prayers of ſuch as do call upon him, if they deſerve to be heard, and onely requireth purity of ſoul. For our God knoweth all things before we ask, and before we our ſelves enter into cogitation thereof, he underſtandeth our neceſſity: cut out my tongue, thou canſt not cut out my mind, while my life remaineth. Thoſe prayers which by it I have uttered to Almighty God, have taught it to ſuffer: would D God thou wouldſt ſo ſanctifie all parts of my body by puniſhing them, for thou therein inflicteſt puniſhment on thy ſelf, and reward upon me, and think not that thou ſhalt thus eſcape long unpuniſhed. When he had thus ſpoken, his tongue was cut out of his mouth, & he bound to a ſtake, and there he was beaten with ropes ends: and he did patiently endure this, notwithſtanding the colour of his face became dead and wan. Being looſed from thence, he was put upon the wheel: and then praying for his countreymen, he by death went unto the reſt of his brethren.

Judas, the 4. brother is brought.

The death of the 4. brother.

Then Achas, the fift brother, before he was haled to torments, ſpake in this manner; Behold (thou tyrant) I come to be puniſhed before thou command me, hope not therefore any jot to alter his mind, who as thou ſeeſt deſireth to be tormented. The blood of my
E four innocent brethren, which thou haſt ſhed, hath condemned thee to hell-fire: I am to make them up the number of five, that by it thy paines may be encreaſed. Tell me (bloody wretch) for what offence by us committed doſt thou thus puniſh us? for what impiety doſt thou ſo perſecute us? what villany have we committed? what wickedneſſe, what naughtineſſe have we attempted? This is all thou canſt alleadge againſt us, that we honour God our Creator, and live juſtly in obedience of his laws, and therefore do not eſteem thy puniſhments: but they are to us honour and ſalvation, and not puniſhment: we ſhall be greatly rewarded by God, if no part of us be left free from torment. Whileſt thus he ſpake, his executioners by the Kings command took him and caſt him into a brazen pot, and was preſt down in it, his head to his feet: and afterward he ſuffered all other torments, which his brethren had endu-
F red; yet not amazed hereat, he ſuddenly ſtarted up, and thus bitterly inveighed againſt the tyrant: Cruel tyrant, how great benefits doſt thou againſt thy will beſtow upon us! yea, the more thou art incenſed againſt us, the more acceptable to God ſhalt thou make us: yea, I ſhould be ſorry if thou ſhewedſt mercy upon me. This ſhort affliction gaineth us life everlaſting; if this temporal death ſhould not betide me, everlaſting life could not befall me. And thus he finiſhed his agony, and died.

Achas the 5. brother preſenteth himſelf to torments before he was called.

Then the tormenters laid hands upon the ſixth brother, who was called Areth, whom the tyrant permitted either to chuſe honour or puniſhment: but he agrieved at his offer, ſaid; Although (tyrant) I be younger in years then my martyred brethren, yet my conſtancy of mind to theirs is not inferiour: for we were all nouriſht up together, all together inſtructed, and we will all die together in the fear of God. Haſten therefore to thy deviſed torments, G and that time which thou wouldſt ſpend in exhorting me, ſpend it in deviſing tortures for me. Antiochus hereat confounded, commanded him to be bound to a pillar with his head hanging down, in ſuch wiſe as humours running into it might cauſe ache: and this done, he cauſed a fire to be made ſo far off him, that it could not burn him, but roſt him. He alſo com„ manded him as he hung to be pricked with awls, that ſo the heat might peirce into the holes

„ they made in his fleſh, Whileſt thus he was tormented, much blood like froth gathered about „ his head and face, and he then ſpake in this manner. O noble fight! O valiant warre! O ſtrife „ between piety and impiety! Theſe men have paſt their agonies, whoſe crown of Martyrdome „ is the puniſhment of their perſecutors: I do moſt willingly follow my brethren, that as by „ blood I am conjoyned unto them, ſo by death I may not be ſeperated from them. Deviſe, O H fire is cold and heateth not, and the Kings weapons are bended and blunted in our bodies;

our God giveth us more courage to ſuffer, then thou haſt to puniſh: and ſo the precept of God remaineth firm in us. And as he thus ſpake, one took hold of his tongue with a hot pair of tongs, and ſuffering the ſame torments that his brethren had done, and fried in a frying pan, he gave up the Ghoſt. I tyrant

A Tyrant hearing this was wroth, and cauſed him to be tormented: but his mother in torment comforted him, and with her kind hands held his head, when with violence of the tortures blood iſſued out of his mouth, noſe and privy parts, the tormentors not ceaſing till life in him was almoſt ſpent: but they (by Gods appointment) gave over, and ſo he took ſtrength again to endure more then any of his brethren had done; at laſt, his hands and arms being cut off, he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and cryed, O Adonai, O Sabaor be merciful unto me, and receive me into the company of my brethren, let thy wrath now ceaſe and grant them mercy, who by us do make interceſſion to thee; having ſaid thus, his tongue being pulled out, he of his own accord went into the fiery frying-pan, and ſo to the great admiration of Antiochus died. The death of the youngeſt brother.

Behold how evident it is, that reaſon can rule our affections, ſeeing that children hereby
B ſhewed more conſtancy then the tyrant could ſhew cruelty. For, it was reaſons force that wrought in them that determination to ſuffer all torments, rather then to forſake the way of ſalvation. Theſe conſtant young men do fitly reſemble inexpugnable towers; and them, who after a great tempeſt and ſhiprack, do ſafely enter the harbour of Salvation, who guiding their courſe amidſt the boyſterous waves, at laſt obtain the wiſhed ſhoar. For every one of them ſtrengthened the other by advice and good counſel, and none of them was like an effeminate perſon, loth to ſuffer Martyrdome. None uſed delay herein, but one followed anothers example. Let us therfore die for our Law, and imitate the three children whom the Aſſyrians fury condemned to the fiery furnace, whoſe patience ſpread their fame even unto
C heaven. Whileſt thus one of them exhorted the other, it came to paſſe, that none of them offended, but each one reſolute in his religion, took example of the virtue, courage and conſtancy of their forefather Iſaac, who underſtanding that it was Gods will that he ſhould be ſacrificed, he refuſed not to ſubmit his body to his fathers ſword. Let us (quoth they) yeeld our ſouls to him of whom we received both ſoul and body: It is a ſmall matter for us to ſuffer loſſe of theſe members, ſeeing that we ſhall in lieu of them receive everlaſting bliſſe. Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob do joyfully expect us, as co-heirs of their Kingdome: let us glorifie that wombe wherein we were for ten moneths ſpace, let none of us be more coward then the other, nor none of us degenerate from the other. We that were all begotten of one
D father, and ſucked of one milk, muſt in all things reſemble one another: we had one teacher and one law inviolate. And in this golden bond of concord were theſe brethren linked together, and none of them mourned to ſee the other tormented, but all rejoyced at the others death. O children, whoſe dignity ſurpaſſeth the royalty of Kings and Princes, whoſe glory and virtue is unſpeakable! None of you were terrified with fear, but you ſo haſtened to your deaths, as though you had onely been to go to bliſſe and felicity: you were truly brethren, who even by death were linked together. God hath greatly in you magnified our Nation, and in you ſhewed us all one example of fortitude: whom therefore I think
E he cauſed to be ſo many in number, as were the dayes wherein he created the world, ſo that theſe ſeven brethren may reſemble the ſeven dayes wherein all things were made. And why ſhould we ſo admire this fortitude in theſe young men, when a woman armed her ſelf with contempt of death? Who indeed is not to be called a mother, but to be honourd with a higher title then humane frailty can afford, who bare into this world ſo many triumphs. Reaſon milde's of our affection. A reſemblitude of the waves. The ſeven brethren exhort one another to ſuffer death manfully. True brotherhood. A pledge and ſign of brotherly amity.

For the mother ſeeing her children dead, was with a kind and Godly zeal inflamed alſo to ſuffer: and no marvel, ſeeing that the very bruite beaſts if they perceive violence offered to their young, do expoſe themſelves to perils in their defence, and protect them with their wings, teeth, and tallons; yea, and every one that is any way able to make reſiſtance, oppoſeth her ſelf to the enemy to defend her young. And not onely bruite beaſts do this, but F even Bees do defend not onely their young, but alſo their honey, threatning their ſtings to them that offer to taſte thereof, and more eſteeming the good of their young, then their own lives. But this zealous mother directed by the Spirit of God, and reaſons lore, haſted that her children might die before her; who not being to live deprived of her children, choſe rather to ſee them die joyfully then to periſh in care and ſorrow. Therefore when all her family had ſuffered, ſhe then the laſt and glory of them all came to her agony, deſpiſing the tyrants threats, and offering her motherly breſt to thoſe torments which her children had ſuffered. O bleſſed ſtock and bleſſed increaſe of the ſelf ſame wombe! Why ſhould I not affirm that in all lineaments and feature of the body you are like your mother: and if this be a commendation in them, that beſide the ſhape of body receive nothing elſe Th mothers grief.

of their mother, I will ſay more of you, that you are like your mother in fortitude, virtue, G and religion; and that you ſo in all things reſemble her, that you are every way equal unto her, ſave onely herein, that ſhe with her eies beheld the immanity of your torments, being alſo as conſtant in her own martyrdome, as you in yours. She therefore herein excelled you, that ſhe ſuffered ſeven torments before ſhe came to ſuffer in her own perſon, and feared in every one of them leſt ſhe ſhould be overcome. But O thou example of all women, I cannot tell, whether thou bare theſe children in thy wombe, or created them, who could with dry eyes look upon them whileſt they were torne in peeces: yea, I ſay little, affirming that thou patiently didſt behold theſe ſights, for even thou thy ſelf didſt exhort them thereunto, thou rejoycedſt to ſee one of them torne in peeces with fleſhhooks, the other to be racked upon the wheele, and the third to be bound and beaten: thou joyfully admiredſt the others H burning, and exhorteditt thereſt not to be terrified herewith, and although whileſt thou be-heldeſt their torments, thy grief was greater then that which thou hadſt in childbirth, yet didſt thou frame a lightſome and merry countenance, as though it had been one triumph-
ing. While they were a killing, thou didſt laugh, and ſeeing onely one of all thy children left, hereat thou didſt nothing relent. Can I deſcribe how every one periſhed, ſeeing thou their mother didſt laugh at their deaths, and when their ſinews were cut in two, their heads flaied, their tongues pulled forth by the roots, their hands broken, their bodies in the fire, and caſt upon iron plates red hot, and upon wheeles, and their ribs pulled in ſunder, and I
many other torments for which we want names? Never was any Swan, which (by report of Antiquity) ſung ſo ſweet a note before her death (ſweeter then the moſt melodious harmony, and the moſt pleaſant voyce) as were the funeral verſes of thoſe thy children that periſhed.

The mother ſuffereth ſeven torments before ſhe was tormented.

You children were not overcome by the fabulous Syrens enchantments, who to honour
God, doubted not to leave your mother without children: And ſhe ſprung of noble ſtock, choſe rather to want you for a ſhort time, then to incur eternal damnation, wiſhing rather that the bodies of her children ſhould be tormented then their ſouls. Well ſhe knew, that nothing was more fraile and infirme then our bodies; which though perſecution be wanting, are often killed with agues, and abundance of blood or fluxes: And who is ignorant of ſhip- K
wrack incident to ſaylers, hazard of life unto them that travel, and ſudden death to thoſe that live at eaſe? ſudden caſualty by fire, and by the hands of theeves, and a thouſand other waies to diſpatch our lives? Seeing then that our mortal bodies are ſubject to ſo many miſeries to bring us to our end, who would not make choiſe of a quick diſpatch, whereby we loſe goods of this world and gain life everlaſting? O thou moſt reverend of all women, the credit of thy Nation, and honour of our religion, who like the Ark of Noe didſt perſiſt inviolate amongſt ſuch ſtormy waves! for as it withſtood the force of the deluge, and being built ſtrongly with firm boards, did not ſuffer any thing within it to periſh: ſo thou ſufferedſt not the Tyrant to overcome the holy Ghoſt which thou hadſt received in thy heart.

A ſimilitude from the Deluge.

Behold of what force and efficacy reaſon is! which oftentimes maketh us men inferiour to L women. For neither was Daniel ſo terrified at the ſight of the Lions, nor the three children with the fiery furnace, as this woman was grieved at the death of all her children, before ſhe came to her own agony. What would another woman and mother have done in this caſe, but wept and with pitiful lamentations have cryed: Ah wretch that I am, moſt unhappy and miſerable of all that breath, who therefore bare ſo many children into this world, that their ſeveral deaths might be ſo many ſeveral occaſions of my grief and ſorrow! ſhe would have iterated her frequent births, and her toile in her ten moneths bearing them, ſhe would have bewailed her hapleſſe fortune who brought forth ſo many deaths end dangers, ſhe would have recounted the milk wherewith ſhe fed them, and their meat ſhe had prepared for them, the pains ſhe had taken with them, how ſhe had carried them in her arms, and ſung to them and taught them to ſpeak; her cares, her watchings, her fear, leſt any miſ-hap M ſhould betide them: and with weeping tears would have ſaid, Shall I a grandmother embrace your children? who a while ago was too fruitful a mother, and am now deprived of you all? If this day I die, I have none to bury me. But this handmaid of God forgot all theſe laments that another mother would have had, and with an Adamant ſenſe ſtouter then the never yeelding rocks, did neither forſake her children in their torments, nor in their death, but in a manner compelled them to periſh, and never ſorrowed thereat. For being apprehended together with her ſeven ſons, ſhe conſidering Eleazars martyrdome, did thus exhort them in the Hebrew tongue. O my moſt dear and loving children, let us

The mothers ſpeech exhorting her ſeven ſons to ſuffer.

haſten

A haſten to that agony wherein we may be a credit to our Nation, and gain of God an ever- " laſting reward; let us without fear preſent our ſelves unto thoſe torments which Eleazars " aged body endured; called to mind our father Abraham of worthy memory, who having but "
one onely ſon, did ſacrifice him being willed by God ſo to do, and feared not to bring him " to the Altar, whom he ſcarcely in his age obtained. Iſaac alſo was willing to be ſacrificed by " his father, knowing that God was to be obeyed in all things: the like may be ſaid of Daniel, "
and the three children: believe me, we are rather tried then tormented. For whatſoever "
this world affordeth is mortal and like a ſhadow.

A golden ſaying of the mother of her ſeven children.

Thus did this mother arme her childrens minds with fortitude, and ſhe a woman wrought
B in men man-like minds. Laſt of all, her children being all dead, ſhe a worthy mother of ſo many champions, kneeling down in the place of torment, beſought of God an end of this life, proteſting, that ſhe had not for love of life ſo long deferred to die, but onely for her childrens ſake, and that now ſhe had ſeen them all ſeven triumphing. The fury of Antiochus now waxed hot, and he commanded this worthy mother to be tormented, who was (as the Tyrant wil'd) ſtripped naked, and hanged up by the hands, and moſt cruelly whipped: her dugs and paps were pulled off, and ſhe put into the red hot frying pan, being moſt willing to follow her childrens ſteps in torment; and lifting up her eyes and hands to heaven, ſhe prayed for all women with child, and ſo yeelded her chaſt ſoul to God. But Antiochus was ſtriken with fire from heaven. O miſtris of juſtice, who followed thy triumphing chil-
C dren! O conquerer of tyrants, and a looking-glaſſe for all Martyrs! O example of patience! not onely to women, but to all men that ſhall be after thee, reverenced of them that now are, and to be worſhipped of them that are to come, and to be admired not onely of our Nation, but of all other people. Thy light obſcureth the bright ſhining Moon: and though ſhe fill the world with her brightneſſe, yet is ſhe not comparable to thy ſhining light. Seven lights inviron thee about, dazling the brightneſſe of the ſeven Planets: could any Painter expreſſe, or any hand in writing declare the torments of your paſſions? none could with dry eyes read or behold them; all people would flock about to ſee it, all people would praiſe and eſteeme him to have offered a great gift, who to Gods glory had painted that golden ſtratagem. And if any skilful workman ſhould engrave this Tragedy upon a ſepulchre or in his
D houſe, doubtleſſe he ſhould be freed from all plague and miſfortune. But where could a ſtone be found able to contain ſo many torments? Therefore the old man Eleazar, the mother and her ſeven ſons, are for their Nobility graced with a ſepulchre, and a great reverence is done unto them of all men, yea, even by men that are not of our religion: and there is a conſtellation of eight ſtars ordained as an argument of their juſtice, and Angels did execute their funerals. The Tyrant himſelf was aſtoniſhed to ſee the conſtancy of ſuch godly minds. And thus have they found ſuch favour in the ſight of God, that they have obtained remiſſion of the ſins of our Nation: For preſently after the Tyrant was deſtroyed, and Iſrael there was freed from his tyranny.

The mother followed her ſons in torment.

The light of the juſt. 1 Cor. 15.

But Antiochus, ſeeing the greatneſſe of their faith, and their contempt of death, gathered
E an army of footmen out of the Hebrews, by whoſe help he terrified his enemies, and got great renown. O bleſſed ſeed of Abraham! behold what benefit the agony of the mother and her ſeven ſons brought to us their countreymen: let us perſiſt in this piety, that ſo we may be like our forefathers: behold, the death of a few did end all the miſeries and ſins of our whole nation, and you by your countreymens hands vanquiſhed their perſecutors enemies, and after that victory our ſins were remitted; and laſt of all, Antiochus being mad, and his entrails devoured with worms, he ſmelling moſt like carrion, gave up the ghoſt; and was ever after death puniſhed for his offence. For when he could not make the Citizens of Jeruſalem to forſake their law, he made war againſt the Perſians, and there received that which he deſerved.

Antiochus leavied an army of footmen from amongſt the Hebrews.

Antiochus died ſtinking exceedingly. 2 Mac. 9.

It now remaineth that we briefly repeat all that is before ſaid. For in her agony, this ſa-
F cred mother ſaid thus unto the ſtanders by; Whileſt it was lawful for me, I kept my ſelf a Virgin, and then I married and lived a chaſte wife, and forſook not my own houſe, I brought forth ſuch ſons as I need not be aſhamed of; and though danted with my husbands death, yet I did not forſake my faith: this, and many things elſe ſhe recounted. And what more? She ſet before her childrens eyes the examples of the Prophets, how Abel by his brother was ſlain, Iſaac to be offered in ſtead of a ſacrifice, how Jacob was baniſhed, Joſeph kept in priſon, Daniel caſt before the Lions, the three children into the fiery furnace: ſhe rehearſed alſo unto them the book of Eſaiah, where it is ſaid: Although thou do go thorow the fire, ing comfort, and are now ſecure of bliſſe and revenge. For they who ſuffer for Gods ſake, ſhall have happy ſucceſſe, when God the Father of all things, ſhall reward them with life everlaſting that follow him. Thus have I conſecrated theſe worthy memorials, which I find in the holy Scriptures of the ſacred Maccabees, to the reading of all men, H

FINIS.

of their mother, I will ſay more of you, that you are like your mother in fortitude, virtue, G
and religion; and that you ſo in all things reſemble her, that you are every way equal unto her, ſave onely herein, that ſhe with her eies beheld the immanity of your torments, being alſo as conſtant in her own martyrdome, as you in yours. She therefore herein excelled you, that ſhe ſuffered ſeven torments before ſhe came to ſuffer in her own perſon, and feared in every one of them leſt ſhe ſhould be overcome. But O thou example of all women, I cannot tell, whether thou bare theſe children in thy wombe, or created them, who could with dry eyes look upon them whileſt they were torne in peeces: yea, I ſay little, affirming that thou patiently didſt behold theſe ſights, for even thou thy ſelf didſt exhort them thereunto, thou rejoycedſt to ſee one of them torne in peeces with fleſhhooks, the other to be racked
upon the wheele, and the third to be bound and beaten: thou joyfully admiredſt the others H burning, and exhortedſt the reſt not to be terrified herewith, and although whileſt thou be-heldeſt their torments, thy grief was greater then that which thou hadſt in childbirth, yet didſt thou frame a lightſome and merry countenance, as though it had been one triumph-
ing. While they were a killing, thou didſt laugh, and ſeeing onely one of all thy children left, hereat thou didſt nothing relent. Can I deſcribe how every one periſhed, ſeeing thou their mother didſt laugh at their deaths, and when their ſinews were cut in two, their heads flaied, their tongues pulled forth by the roots, their hands broken, their bodies in the fire, and caſt upon iron plates red hot, and upon wheeles, and their ribs pulled in ſunder, and I
many other torments for which we want names? Never was any Swan, which (by report of Antiquity) ſung ſo ſweet a note before her death (ſweeter then the moſt melodious harmony, and the moſt pleaſant voyce) as were the funeral verſes of thoſe thy children that periſhed.

The mother ſuffereth ſeven torments before ſhe was tormented.

You children were not overcome by the fabulous Syrens enchantments, who to honour
God, doubted not to leave your mother without children: And ſhe ſprung of noble ſtock, choſe rather to want you for a ſhort time, then to incur eternal damnation, wiſhing rather that the bodies of her children ſhould be tormented then their ſouls. Well ſhe knew, that nothing was more fraile and infirme then our bodies; which though perſecution be wanting,
are often killed with agues, and abundance of blood or fluxes: And who is ignorant of ſhip- K
wrack incident to ſaylers, hazard of life unto them that travel, and ſudden death to thoſe
that live at eaſe? ſudden caſualty by fire, and by the hands of theeves, and a thouſand other waies to diſpatch our lives? Seeing then that our mortal bodies are ſubject to ſo many miſeries to bring us to our end, who would not make choiſe of a quick diſpatch, whereby we loſe goods of this world and gain life everlaſting? O thou moſt reverend of all women, the credit of thy Nation, and honour of our religion, who like the Ark of Noe didſt perſiſt inviolate amongſt ſuch ſtormy waves! for as it withſtood the force of the deluge, and being built ſtrongly with firm boards, did not ſuffer any thing within it to periſh: ſo thou ſufferedſt not the Tyrant to overcome the holy Ghoſt which thou hadſt received in thy heart.

A ſimilitude from the Deluge.

Behold of what force and efficacy reaſon is! which oftentimes maketh us men inferiour to L women. For neither was Daniel ſo terrified at the ſight of the Lions, nor the three children with the fiery furnace, as this woman was grieved at the death of all her children, before ſhe came to her own agony. What would another woman and mother have done in this caſe, but wept and with pitiful lamentations have cryed: Ah wretch that I am, moſt unhappy and miſerable of all that breath, who therefore bare ſo many children into this world, that their ſeveral deaths might be ſo many ſeveral occaſions of my grief and ſorrow! ſhe would have iterated her frequent births, and her toile in her ten moneths bearing them, ſhe would have bewailed her hapleſſe fortune who brought forth ſo many deaths end dangers, ſhe would have recounted the milk wherewith ſhe fed them, and their meat ſhe had prepared for them, the pains ſhe had taken with them, how ſhe had carried them in her arms, and ſung
to them and taught them to ſpeak; her cares, her watchings, her fear, leſt any miſ-hap M ſhould betide them: and with weeping tears would have ſaid, Shall I a grandmother embrace your children? who a while ago was too fruitful a mother, and am now deprived of you all? If this day I die, I have none to bury me. But this handmaid of God forgot all theſe laments that another mother would have had, and with an Adamant ſenſe ſtouter then the never yeelding rocks, did neither forſake her children in their torments, nor in their death, but in a manner compelled them to periſh, and never ſorrowed thereat. For being apprehended together with her ſeven ſons, ſhe conſidering Eleazars martyrdome, did thus exhort them in the Hebrew tongue. O my moſt dear and loving children, let us
haſten

The mother hers [illegible] exhorteth her ſeven ſons to ſuffer.

A haſten to that agony wherein we may be a credit to our Nation, and gain of God an ever- " laſting reward; let us without fear preſent our ſelves unto thoſe torments which Eleazars "
aged body endured; called to mind our father Abraham of worthy memory, who having but "
one onely ſon, did ſacrifice him being willed by God ſo to do, and feared not to bring him " to the Altar, whom he ſcarcely in his age obtained. Iſaac alſo was willing to be ſacrificed by "
his father, knowing that God was to be obeyed in all things: the like may be ſaid of Daniel, "
and the three children: believe me, we are rather tried then tormented. For whatſoever "
this world affordeth is mortal and like a ſhadow.

Thus did this mother arme her childrens minds with fortitude, and ſhe a woman wrought A golden ſayin men man-like minds. Laſt of all, her children being all dead, the a worthy mother of ſo ing of the mo-childrens ſake, and that now ſhe had ſeen them all ſeven triumphing. The fury of Antiochus now waxed hot, and he commanded this worthy mother to be tormented, who was (as the The mother Tyrant wil'd) ſtripped naked, and hanged up by the hands, and moſt cruelly whipped: her ſuffered her dugs and paps were pulled off, and ſhe put into the red hot frying pan, being moſt willing ſeven ſon in tor-to follow her childrens ſteps in torment; and lifting up her eyes and hands to heaven, ſhe ments.

prayed for all women with child, and ſo yeelded her chaſt ſoul to God. But Antiochus was ſtriken with fire from heaven. O miſtris of juſtice, who followed thy triumphing chil-expreſſe, or any hand in writing declare the torments of your paſſions? none could with dry eyes read or behold them; all people would flock about to ſee it, all people would praiſe and eſteeme him to have offered a great gift, who to Gods glory had painted that golden ſtra-tagem. And if any skilful workman ſhould engrave this Tragedy upon a ſepulchre or in his D houſe, doubtleſſe he ſhould be freed from all plague and misfortune. But where could a ſtone be found able to contain ſo many torments? Therefore the old man Eleazar, the mother and her ſeven ſons, are for their Nobility graced with a ſepulchre, and a great reverence is done unto them of all men, yea, even by men that are not of our religion: and there is a conſtellation of eight ſtars ordained as an argument of their juſtice, and Angels did execute their funerals. The Tyrant himſelf was aſtoniſhed to ſee the conſtancy of ſuch godly minds. And thus have they found ſuch favour in the ſight of God, that they have obtained remiſſion of the ſins of our Nation: For preſently after the Tyrant was deſtroyed, and Iſrael there was freed from his tyranny.

But Antiochus, ſeeing the greatneſſe of their faith, and their contempt of death, gathered Antiochus le-E an army of footmen out of the Hebrews, by whoſe help he terrified his enemies, and got vied an army great renown. O bleſſed ſeed of Abraham! behold what benefit the agony of the mother of footmen and her ſeven ſons brought to us their countreymen: let us perſiſt in this piety, that ſo we thoſe he fought may be like our forefathers: behold, the death of a few did end all the miſeries and ſins of the Hebrews.
our whole nation, and you by your countreymens hands vanquiſhed their perſecutors enemies, and after that victory our ſins were remitted; and laſt of all, Antiochus being mad, Antiochus died and his entrails devoured with worms, he ſmelling moſt like carrion, gave up the ghoſt; ſtinking ex-

worthy memorials, which I find in the holy Scriptures of

FINIS.

An exact and orderly Collection of all the Scriptures which are handled by Iosephus in his History of the Antiquitie of the Jews, set down in Chapter and Verse as they lye in the Bible, whereby a man may finde on a sudden any thing wherein the Authour doth either expound, enlarge, or alter the words of Scripture. And hereby the Reader may turne to every Verse as familiar as in the Bible.
